which ancient and modern oratory and faction are the principal subjects,) the Man of the People, Cæsar, Demosthenes, the Man of the Moon, Gracchus, Marius, Catiline, Cromwell, and Socrates, are the speakers, till Ch—s F—x falls asleep, and then, fancying himself in the House of Commons, addresses the Speaker, &c. in consequence of which he is conveyed to a lunar bed of condensed sun-beams. Then plunging, with his lunar guide, into the Mare Crisum, the Lunar Tartarus, or rather purgatory, he sees some mortals petrified, others tanned, Doctors and Monks, Scaliger, Ruddiman, Bentley, &c. doing penance as the pedagogues of savages; a monkey (Lord Chesterfield) teaching a bear (Dr. J.) to dance, who was afterwards to be punished (when raised to the rank of a school-master) by teaching English to 300 Scotch Highlanders; with botanists and natural historians, "Linnean artists," Dr. Solander among them, picking off, numbering, and describing, in a large folio, the scales of salmon. As to Dr. J. our satirist's spleen (whom by this circumstance, and by his preferring Thomson to Hayley and all other modern poets, we should know to be a North Briton), has made him inconsistent with his own principles, the Doctor being then an inhabitant of Earth, and therefore not yet consigned, like the others, to the Lunar Regions, though now, (let the Scots say what they will,) unhappily for the cause of literature, morality, religion, and humanity, this great luminary is, alas! extinguished; this Colossus is fallen; or, rather, this mortal has put on immortality.—Our travellers next make a subterraneous voyage to a school of moral philosophy, the Pandæmonium of the Moon, where, in an Ergastulum, or Penitentiary-house, they see some of the heroes and conquerors of the world doing penance at several forges, with Henry IV. of France and William III. of England, (strange to say!) for their overseers. This Caledonian, we see, has not forgotten Glenco, as his placing the late Duke of Cumberland and General Hawley (misprinted Halley) among the butchers, with Nero, Cortez, &c. shews that he also remembers Culloden and Falkirk.—In this Ergastulum Lady M—y W—y M—u is housekeeper; Quin, steward; Pope, Churchill, &c. shoe-blacks; Queen Elizabeth, for her cruelty, is punished by skinning a seal for some

Greenlanders, and her sister Mary by killing pigs.—We shall only add, that after the Editor has shewn his modesty (as he calls it) by arraigning Doctor J—n, and several others of our most celebrated writers, English and Scotch, and treated his heroes with a breakfast of bread and cheese and nectar at Tycho Brahe's, the illustrious Dane, in the city of Uranibourg, he conducts C—s F—x to earth by his former conveyance, the Man of the Moon's nose, and lands him in Cavendish-square much wiser than he left it.

138. An Address to Brian Edwards, Esq. containing some Remarks on his Pamphlet intitled, "Thoughts on the late Proceedings of Government respecting the Trade of the West India Islands with the United States of America." Also, Observations on some Parts of a Pamphlet, lately published by the West India Merchants and Planters, intitled, "Considerations on the present State of the Intercourse between his Majesty's Sugar Colonies and the Dominions of the United States of America." By John Stevenson. 8vo.

CONSIDERING our late Colonies "not only as alien, but as rival, states," and thinking it the interest of Great Britain to prevent their becoming formidable, this writer is of opinion, with Lord Sheffield, that the allowing them a free trade with our West India Islands "would be productive of very fatal consequences to this country." With this view he combats the arguments advanced by Mr. Edwards, and the West India planters, in favour of that intercourse, endeavours to shew that Canada and Nova Scotia, with some temporary assistance from Great Britain, can, with equal certainty and abundance, supply their wants; that she has a right to the monopoly of their produce, the idea of which, if the Americans were allowed a free trade with her West India Islands, "would be ridiculous in the extreme," and that, in that event, the Americans will engross the carrying trade, to the exclusion of our own shipping. As to limiting the trade, which has been proposed, to vessels of 80 or 100 tons burthen, "if the Americans," he says, "are allowed a free intercourse with our West India Islands in vessels of any burthen whatever, the laudable view of the Loyalists will be entirely defeated, the hopes of our remaining provinces wholly frustrated, the honour of Britain more shamefully tarnished,

"tarnished, her naval force more ma"terially diminished, and her exten"sive empire every where exposed to "the hostile attacks of her ambitious "enemies."

139. Discourses on the Divine Unity: or, A Scriptural Proof and Demonstration of the one Supreme Deity of the God and Father of All, and of the subordinate Character and inferior Nature of our Lord Jesus Christ; with a Confutation of the Doctrine of a Co-equal and Co-substantial Trinity in Unity: and a full Reply to the Objections of Trinitarians. By William Christie, Junior, Merchant in Montrose. 8vo.

THE subject of this book is sufficiently known from the title. Into the argument we will not enter. The manner in which it is printed gives no advantageous idea of the state of that art in Montrose; and, as no Greek or Hebrew types could be procured there, all such quotations are printed in Roman characters.

140. Commentaries and Essays. No II. 8vo. (See p. 762.)

THIS Number contains "IV. Critical Notes on the first Nineteen Verses of the first Chapter of Genesis." In the first verse this writer remarks, on the word God, that "the literal interpretation of the original expression, אֱלֹהִים, is Gods; from whence many have inferred a plurality in the Divinity. This argument, if it proved any thing, would prove too much; for it would prove a plurality of Gods. But the expression is evidently an Hebrew idiom. Thus Gen. xiii. 30, where we read, The man who is the Lord of the land spake roughly to us: the Hebrew has, The man who is the Lords of the land."—Heaven, in the same verse, it is observed, should be translated heavens, in the plural, as in the original, and as in Psalm xix. i. meaning "all the bodies superior to the earth."—"Without form and void, ver. 2, should rather be translated. a confused and useless mass;" the water being liquid, "must have been heated at least 33 degrees of Fahrenheit, and that heat was coeval with its creation, since the Sun was not yet formed." Firmament, ver. 8, "is ill translated, the Hebrew word meaning expansion, an attenuated substance."—"God called" signifies no more than "was called," &c.—

V. "A Paraphrase and Notes on Romans v. 8—19." This passage is briefly paraphrased and examined with a view of exploding the opinion of which it is thought the principal support, (styled, by this writer [Synergus], "a relic of the doctrine of original sin,") that mortality became the lot of all mankind in consequence, not of personal, but of Adam's transgression." He thinks also, that what he has advanced, if true, confirms "the opinion of those who believe the account of the fall to be an oriental apologue." Of that opinion was Will Whiston.—

VI. "Concerning the Apostolical Benediction, 2 Cor. xiii. 14: The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Spirit, be with you all. Amen." Of "this pious farewell salutation" the last clause is here particularly examined, and, in order to shew what the Apostle meant by the Holy Spirit, this writer [Sosipater] enumerates and explains all the passages in the New Testament in which it is mentioned. The result is, that he explains away the third Person in the Trinity; would have to αγιος πνευμα uniformly rendered Holy Spirit, and not Holy Ghost, (as being "nothing but the power of God, exerted by himself, or communicated in various ways to his creatures,") and in the text under examination would translate κοινωνια "the participation," or "the partaking, of the Holy Spirit."

We need not repeat in what school these expounders have studied, or of what Gamaliel they are disciples. In future, unless something very particular occurs, we shall only give the contents.

In some annexed "Observations" Sosipater considers the famous text, John v. 7, as undoubtedly spurious; and, after abridging the evidence for and against it, lately produced by Dr. Griesbach, professor of divinity at Jena in Saxony, who, in his late edition of the New Testament, "2 vol. Halle, 1777," has thrown it out of the text, makes the following remarks, in a note, on what has recently been advanced, in defence of its authenticity, by George Travis, M. A. in "Letters to Edward Gibbon, Esq." &c. originally published in our vol. LII. p. 65, &c. and since collected into a pamphlet*, "1. that it is not the way to

241. Concio ad Clerum Provincia Cantuariensis, in Aede Paulina, XIV Kal. Junias, MDCCCLXXIV. Habita à Gulielmo Barford, S. T. P. Canonico Cantuariensi, et Coll. Regal. Eton. Socio. Jussu Reverendissimi. 4to.

FROM Coloss. iv. 5, Walk in wisdom toward them that are without, redeeming the time, the learned preacher takes occasion to recommend to those that are set for the defence of the Gospel the same care, vigilance, and discipline in their warfare that are exerted by generals in camps and armies, which he illustrates by the examples of St. Paul and the primitive Christians, and the apostolical precept in the text. Of this he; I. supposes the latter clause to be intended as an effect of the former, prudence and circumspection being inculcated in the one, and the reason assigned in the other. After duly weighing the propriety and necessity of such a prudential conduct at the time when this advice was given, he, II. defines and explains the nature of that wisdom which the Apostle recommends. “But here (says the Doctor) it is first observable, that the situation and circumstances of the Church of Christ, as now militant, are very different from those of primitive Christianity, in the times of the Apostles and their immediate successors. To them every “thing was hostile, every thing dread“ful; and first by threats and imprison“ment, and afterwards by the laws and “the higher powers, they were restrain“ed from speaking at all, or teaching in “the name of Jesus. From such ter“rors how exempt, on the contrary,

“how peaceful and amicable, is our si“tuation! Witness this supreme and “sacred place of our preaching and “prayer, erected at the public expence,
“and distinguished by the name of that “great apostle by whom the Gentiles
“were taught to believe in Christ;
“witness also THIS VENERABLE AS-“SEMBLY, convened by the authority “of OUR MOST RELIGIOUS SOVE-“REIGN. But though the life that we “now live is not consumed in solicitude “and daily anxiety, and in repressing unto

“of our Evangelical Faith, which we “may profess, striving against sin; the “very condition of the Christian “Church requiring, if not those dan“gerous, some other duties, in like “manner promoting the glory of God
“and the eternal salvation of mankind.

“On this subject, MOST REVEREND “your opinion, the confirmation of “your authority. That Wisdom, of “which we are to discourse, regards “either the End, to which we ought “to refer all things, or Men them“selves, with whom we are connected;

“or, lastly, the Means by which we “can more effectually attain the End.”
These three heads our Christian orator discusses at large, and, in conclusion, enforces “those other duties which are “required of us, if not by any human “law, by the law of charity,” and which the primitive Christians practised in such perfection as to excite the admiration even of the Heathens, and recommends an allowance with “the in“firmities of others, as far as justice
“and piety will permit.”

242. Thirty Letters on various Subjects. In Two Volumes. The Second Edition, corrected and improved. 8vo.

THESE Letters, which have been well received by the publick, are now acknow-

acknowledged by Mr. William Jackson, organist and composer, of Exeter. None of them have been more noticed than that "On Catches," to which this son of harmony seems to have a mortal aversion; and if his definition were true, viz. that, "when quartered, they have ever three parts obscenity, and one part music," they must certainly deserve the stigma he has given them. Ab abusu ad non usum, is no good argument. We therefore hope, with submission, that, under proper restrictions, this innocent indulgence may still be permitted, and that mirth and decorum may not be inconsistent. The author's observations "on languages and on painting" shew that he has critically studied both those subjects. His explanation of some phrases shall be added.

"Our tongue, as every one knows, is a compound of many. The pains, which William the Conqueror took to graft his Norman French upon it, succeeded in many instances; and there are others where we may trace the dying away of the French by degrees, and the English resuming its old place. Chaucer, in his Character of the Monk, says,

'He was a lord full fat, and in good point.'

This is the remains of the French embonpoint, or, as it was written then, en bon point. The phrase was wearing out in Chaucer's time, the en bon being translated, and point preserved. Now the whole is translated, and we say, in good case, or plight. You may find many other instances of this in the old poets."

"The days are now a cock-stride longer," say the country folks at Twelfth-day; and many have been the conjectures upon the derivation of this phrase (see the Gentleman's Magazine). It is not 'cock-stride,' but 'cock's tread.' In the country tread is pronounced trede (not træd), and in most of the Western counties, Devonshire excepted. Stride has more of the e than i in its sound.... Help mate is an odd corruption. In the book of Genesis it is said, "it is not good for man to be alone, I will make an help meet for him;" that is, an help proper for him: meet is an adjective. But these two words, like the first man and his help, soon became one, and of late have been corrected into helpmate....

"As I was reading John Struys's Voyages the other day, I thought I discovered the original of the word, and perhaps of the liquor, Punch; which, if I am right, has nothing to do with that diverting personage in puppet-shows, of the same name, from whom it is usually derived. Struys was at Gornboon, in Persia, where, he says, he drank 'a liquor much in use there, called Pale Pausen, being compounded of arrak, sugar, and raisins, which is so bewitching that they cannot refrain from drinking it.'—I really believe he ~~forgot~~ to mention the water; for how, in such a climate as the southern part of Persia, it was possible to drink undiluted arrak, I have no conception. The raisins have given place, and very properly, to lemons. But I had better leave this to its own merits."

This letter-writer has quoted, in two of his letters, some striking passages from Quarles, which induce him reasonably to suppose that Pope had never read him, or took his character from common report.

Another letter is "On the Want of accurate Views;" in which there are some good observations. But some of the assertions are too hasty; e. g. "Of the many thousands that are constantly going to the East Indies, not one has published a drawing of the Cape of Good Hope, nor of Adam's Peak in Ceylon, &c.—What I mean by a drawing is, a picturesque view, not a mere outline for the use of navigators, nor the unmeaning map of a pencil directed by ignorance." Mr. Jackson should be told, and before he had so confidently asserted, should have known, that such a picturesque view as he describes of the Cape of Good Hope was taken by the Rev. William Hirst, M. A. an excellent draughtsman and astronomer, (since unfortunately lost in the Aurora), in his return from India with Gov. Vansittart, at that gentleman's desire, and also engraved at his expence by Mr. Canot, and published in 1766.

143. An Author's Conduct to the Publick, stated in the Behaviour of Dr. William Cullen, his Majesty's Physician at Edinburgh. 8vo.

MR. MURRAY, bookseller in London, is here the complainant, and, as it appears to us, upon very just grounds. Having upon hand 84 volumes of Dr. Cullen's "First Lines of the Practice of Physic," to the amount of 16l. which would prove no better than waste paper if he was not permitted to complete them in sets; and being informed that it was not the author's intention to sell the two additional volumes, then printing, separately*, he ex-

* "The edition of Dr. Cullen's 'First Lines,' complete, was advertised to be published in five volumes, although it has been since comprised in four. Mr. M. therefore wanted, at this time, the fourth and fifth volumes." This edition shall be reviewed in our next.

postulated with the Doctor on the subject in two letters, dated in April and May last (the first being unanswered), and desired to have the new edition in exchange for the books he had, volume for volume, according to the usual custom of the trade. In answer, at last, Dr. Cullen, after telling him "shortly," "that his reasoning is not at all satisfying, and his examples not at all in point," peremptorily refused to give an indemnification. This, however, we cannot but think, with the bookseller, "every rule of honesty and fair dealing required;" and we must also, with him, be astonished at the professor's making his circumstances partly an excuse, ("his poverty, not his will,") when we are told, that, "on a moderate computation, he has realised 2000*l*. by the sale of this work."—Without entering into other particulars, in which his Majesty's physician exhibits such specimens of shuffling and cutting as we should not have expected from a professor of so liberal a science, we shall only add an extract of a letter from his late bookseller, Mr. William Creech, of May 25, to shew the sentiments of his countrymen on this proceeding: "Dr. Cullen has behaved in a strange manner to the publick, by withholding the fourth volume from the purchasers of the three former, and obliging them to buy the whole book anew.... I am perfectly clear that the purchasers of the three former volumes have an undoubted ground of action against him.—I mean to publish a notice in the newspapers, with my name, stating the facts, and informing the publick, that the withholding of the fourth volume is not owing to me, but to the Doctor himself."—Professions, it seems, as well as trades, have their crafts. Great is Diana of the Ephesians!—Mr. Murray is unlucky in his transactions with authors, having been engaged, a few years ago, in a disagreeable controversy with another celebrated writer, Mr. Mason. See our vol. XLVII. p. 332.

1. 4. The Justice of the Peace, and Parish Officer. By Richard Burn, LL. D. &c. The Fifteenth Edition. To which is added, An Appendix, including the Statutes of the 1st Session of Parliament (24 Geo. III.) 4 Vols. 8vo.

AS this edition has been so long announced, we are surprised to see the Statutes of the last session (as in the former edition) in an Appendix. On the additions (which are many) we shall not enlarge; but one material mistake (as it affects almost every individual) we shall beg leave to notice and correct, from authority. This is in Dr. Burn's explanation of "the new duty on houses and windows" of last session; where he says, "2. The additional duty on houses is the same on all houses, namely, the former duty of 3*s*. increased to 6*s*. for each house." The Act, it must be owned, is ambiguous, and therefore liable to a misconstruction. But, on the contrary, Mr. Goodenough, secretary to the Commissioners for Taxes, in a letter, which now lies before us, dated "Office for Taxes, 24 November, 1784," says, "he has been directed by the Board to acquaint the gentleman to whom it is addressed, that the Attorney and Solicitor General have been consulted thereon, and have given their opinion, that the additional sum of 3*s*, charged by the Act of last session, is meant to extend to houses containing less than 7 windows only; and that the additional duty of 6*s*, charged by the said Act of last session, on houses containing 7 windows, is the only additional duty meant to be imposed by that Act." And a correct Table of both the old and new duty, which the Board has ordered to be distributed, and which we shall insert at the end of our volume, will be a guide, in future, to the assessors, and the publick at large. As the above authoritative opinion militates so directly with that of Dr. Burn, we cannot but think it incumbent upon him to cancel and amend this leaf, and the table annexed, which is calculated on a false principle throughout*.

145. Observations on the Importance of the American Revolution, and the Means of making it a Benefit to the World. By Richard Price, D. D. LL. D. Fellow of the Royal Society of London, and of the Academy of Arts and Sciences in New England. 8vo. [Not published.]

AS the author wishes that no extracts may yet be made from this pamphlet, and as we hope that it will soon be publici juris here as well as in America, we shall confine ourselves at present to the principal heads of it, which are these: "The importance of the re-

Annexed is a letter on the same subject, by the late M. Turgot, two years Minister of the Finances to Lewis XVI.
 and the predecessor of M. Necker.
 Both deserve the attention of English as well as Americans; but, for the reason above given, our readers must suspend their curiosity. We shall only add, that Dr. Price seems much too sanguine in his views, when we consider the heavy load of taxes, heavier even than our own, with which, we are told, these infant states are at present burthened, and which, for a long series of years, must depress their activity and check their growth.

246. Observations on the late Contentions in the Royal Society. By Andrew Kippis, D. D.
 F. R. S. and S. A. 8vo.

OF these illiberal disputes we have heard satis superque. At political, and even theological, contests, as Dr. Kippis observes, we are not surprised; but for altercations in a philosophical Society, which excludes the discussion both of religion and politics, what can be said? how can we account? Our author's recapitulation of “ the state of facts,” which he had before inserted at large, “ from the “ Journal-book of the Royal Society,”
 &c. is as follows: “ It appears, upon
 “ the face of them, that the President
 “ and Council were dissatisfied with the “ manner in which the business of the “ foreign correspondence had been con“ ducted; that the method they adopt“ ed of expressing their dissatisfaction “ occasioned Dr. Hutton's resignation; “ that his being obliged to quit his of“ fice was regretted by many of his “ friends; that public thanks were re“ turned to him for the services he had “ performed; that the attempt to get “ him restored to the station he had left “ did not meet with success; that he “ was equally unsuccessful as a candi“ date for the secretaryship, vacated by “ Mr. Maty; that it was determined “ by the Society to support Sir Joseph “ Banks in the chair; and that the “ motions tending to criminate his con“ duct were rejected by great majori“ ties.”—Dr. K. farther declares, that, far from being connected, he was scarce acquainted, with Sir Joseph Banks, and at first was rather prejudiced against him; yet, on conviction, he now takes a decided part in his favour, justifying his conduct as to most of the charges brought against him, and of course condemning the violent proceedings and virulent publications of the minority, and in particular lamenting and exposing “ the warmth” of Mr. Maty's disposition, and the “ literary haughtiness” of Dr. Horsley, not only in the Royal Society, but, in his Charge, to the bene-ficed and inferior clergy, and in his controversy with Dr. Priestley, and contrasting with it “ the language of that excel“ lent bishop to whom he has the honour

 “ of being chaplain.”—“ Dr. Lowth,
 “ in whose eye genius and benevolence “ are finely blended, and whose pen is “ dictated by imagination, taste, and “ elegance, is an amiable pattern of the “ affability, condescension, and gentle“ ness, which are the true ornaments of “ high station, and of distinguished abi“ lities and learning.”

247. A Letter to the Right Reverend Father in God Lewis Lord Bishop of Norwich: Occasioned by his late Visitation-Tour through the Counties of Norfolk and Suffolk. With some Remarks on a Preparatory Discourse on Confirmation, by Thomas Knowles, D. D.
 8vo. *

THIS letter-writer, though he addresses the Bishop by his titles in form, “ because custom has rendered it fami“ liar,” disclaims his jurisdiction and the calling any “ minister or servant of “ Christ” Lord or Rabbi, and takes up his pen “ to give vent to the grief, pity, “ and indignation,” that have agitated his mind “ for a fortnight past,” thinking he saw the image of the Beast mentioned in Rev. xiv. 9, 10, not only in “ his Holiness the Pope, with all Pro“ testant Commentators,” but in my Lord of Norwich confirming at Ely. &c.

* On the cover of the last Monthly Review, and in some news papers, this pamphlet is advertised as “ A Letter from Dr. Knowles “ to the Bishop of Norwich.”

especially especially as his intended route was advertised in the news-paper, a "great stir and solemn apparatus" was made against his approach, "public testimonials of joy" were shewn at his entrance. "multitudes were summoned together" from distant towns and villages, bells were rung "even on the Lord's day," &c.; but, above all, because "some of the confirmed have been heard to say, that, when his soft hand touched their foreheads, they felt it do them good," others, that "from that moment they were in a safe state, and fit to die." And as to the clergy informing the people better, that, this writer thinks, is not likely, if he may judge from the tenor of Dr. Knowles's Preparatory Discourse, "which has now gone through ten editions." Hinc illæ lacrymæ.—We will neither embarrass this gentleman with asking him where is the moral turpitude of advertising a visitation which could not be publicly known without it, or of summoning multitudes who otherwise could not attend, or of ringing bells on the Lord's day, which is a high festival, and therefore a day of rejoicing, or how Bishops can prevent or be accountable for the superstitious ideas of all whom they confirm, &c.; nor will we discuss the trite objections urged by the Dissenters against Confirmation, but only advise this "Friend to genuine Christianity" to confine himself to his own meeting-house, and at the same time to open and enlarge his views so far as to think it possible that Confirmation may have the salutary uses which the Church of England and its Ministers intend and inculcate, though, like other good institutions, it may be abused and misunderstood.

148. A Charge delivered to the Clergy at the Primary Visitation of Lewis Lord Bishop of Norwich. 4to. [Unpublished.]

THIS excellent Charge, though distributed through the diocese in which it was delivered, has not been published—we know not why—as it deserves the attention of every diocese.—We will therefore only name the principal subjects, viz. "The end and importance of visitations. General depravity of manners. Its causes. State of religion the principal cause. Clergy, in some measure, accountable

"for it. Residence. Consolidations. Personal unions [peculiar to that diocese]. Voidable livings. Perpetual curacies. Act for repairing and rebuilding parsonage-houses. Curates. Licenses to Curates. Titles. Testimonials. Faith and doctrine, and innovations."

149. An Enquiry into the various Theories and Methods of Cure in Apoplexies and Palsies. By Benjamin Chandler, M.D. et Coll. Reg. M.D. Lond. Permissus. 8vo.

"THE originality, in many points, of Professor Cullen's doctrine on apoplexies, and the so frequent want of success, confessedly, in our treatment of these diseases, have together led" the present writer "to examine what has been produced by former writers, and to compare them with each other, and with the two chapters on these subjects in The First Lines of the Practice of Physic." Of that work therefore Dr. Chandler professes his treatise to be "an amplification," and also "a collation of it with the writings of those who have preceded in the same path of science," convinced, by "reason and experience, of the necessity of a reform in the mode of treating apoplexies," and therefore desirous of "diffusing the doctrines here enforced." Of these the principal seems to be, to explode, with Dr. Cullen, the use of stimulating medicines. "Thus, in treating on the two kinds, sanguine and serous, into which apoplexy has been generally divided, Dr. Chandler says, in one place, 'The intention of rousing such patients, by stimulating applications, to the surface, and by volatiles poured down the throat, would never have entered the heads of sensible men, who had clear notions of the theory here delivered.'" Yet "the very judicious Hoffman" (he adds) and the most celebrated writers, have hitherto recommended stimulants "even in the sanguineous apoplexy, and in the serous even Boerhaave and his commentator, though in the sanguineous they caution us against them." "It; however," says Dr. Cullen, "we are right in alleging that serous apoplexy also commonly depends on a plethoric state of the blood-vessels of the brain, stimulants must be equally improper in the one case as in the other."

"other." And this opinion, enforced as it is by physiological arguments a priori, Dr. Chandler here confirms by his own experience. In another place he observes, "On the false ideas above quoted, and such like, has been founded the torturing and destructive practice, which every man of observation must recollect the having been often witness to." And though, in excuse for this mode of proceeding, it has been said, by Van Swieten, that "if the stimulating medicines are applied in vain, the pain of them is not felt, as the sick are deprived of sensation," this Dr. Chandler will by no means allow, "having seen (he says) apoplectic patients, revived in a good degree by immediate and liberal blood-letting, precipitated again into apoplexy by the stimulating medicines externally and internally made use of; and though deprived of the power of speech, exhibiting the most unequivocal signs of pain, even to the last, by the continual restlessness and contortion of those limbs and muscles which were not yet rendered paralytic." In a state of general insensibility, caused by poison alone, our author thinks "it may be defensible to give pain." For the common interests of humanity, in which all are concerned, we have quoted the above, as all must rejoice to see the species, much more themselves and their friends, rescued, or rather secured, from a treatment which, by prolonging life, only prolonged misery, and to which an easy death (its bitterness being past) was usually preferable. As reason and authority are now the auxiliaries of humanity, we doubt not that this improved mode of practice will be generally adopted.

150. The Character of Wisdom, and the Means of attaining it. A Sermon preached at the Cathedral Church of Christ, Canterbury, before the Society of Gentlemen educated at the King's School, on Thursday, August 26, 1784, being the Day of their Anniversary Meeting. By George Horne, D. D. Dean of Canterbury, and President of Saint Mary Magdalen College, Oxford. 4to.

FROM Proverbs iv. 7, "Wisdom is the principal thing, therefore get wisdom, and with all thy getting, get understanding," the preacher considers WHAT we are enjoined to acquire; HOW we are to acquire it; and WHY we are to acquire it. On the 1st

he proves, by several incontrovertible arguments, the use and necessity both of divine and human learning. On the 1st he explodes the absurdity of innate ideas, and on this occasion makes the following happy use of our late discoveries: "Our countrymen, sent in quest of a new continent, to visit the extremities of the old ones, and the distant isles of the South Sea, have returned with accounts which confirm what has been said, and may serve to convince us, that 'man is born,' as the Scripture expresses it, 'like a wild asses colt,' and without education will continue such; that he is born with capabilities only, and is in reality what he is made by instruction. These accounts should produce in us a sentiment of pity for our fellow-creatures, whose condition is so truly deplorable; and one, at the same time, of gratitude to our heavenly Father, who has cast our lot in a fairer ground. Some modern philosophers seem to think the rocks of Patagonia, and the deserts of New Zealand, to be the only schools in which human nature can be studied to advantage. But surely we might as well expect a statuary to accomplish himself in his art, by looking all day at a block of marble, because out of that block a statue may be formed. Shall we judge of a plant by contemplating the seed from which it is to spring? No; let us view the tree, its root fixed in the earth, and drawing moisture from beneath; its trunk fully grown; its branches expanded, and drinking-in the dew of heaven from above; the whole invested with its foliage as a beautiful garment, and crowned with its fruit in the season. Let us not frame our ideas of human nature by surveying an infant, or a savage. Shew us the man completely formed and perfected by a liberal, a learned, and a religious education." The Dean then shews the absurdity of the opposite sentiments of Rousseau, and justly objects to Mr. Locke's treatise its supposing "that a father shall always be at liberty to take care of his son's education. The same fault (he adds) is chargeable on the plan of a very sensible and agreeable instructress of a neighbouring kingdom. With great force of genius, and goodness of heart, she describes two persons, of noble birth, as giving up the world, and retiring, for a course

"course of years, from public life,
 "that they might devote their time
 "and fortune to the education of their "children*. Undoubtedly the design "is praise-worthy. They were ex"cellently [well] employed. Would
 "to GOD that many of their rank
 "were so employed in every kingdom
 "upon earth! But all cannot do it;
 "the scheme can never become ge"neral."—"The partiality and fond"ness of the tutor, when that tutor is
 "a father," is also mentioned as "an-
 "other difficulty."—A public edu"cation is then recommended, in prefer"ence to a private; and Dr. Johnson's "observations on the plan proposed by "Milton †, are quoted with applause.
 "The advantages attendant on a know"ledge of the learned languages are after"wards inculcated, the "system of sop-
 "pery and immorality recommended
 "by a late noble author" is exploded,
 "and "in times like these, and in a mat"ter of such importance, projects of "innovation" are reprobated "as dan"gerous [things]." III. The plea"sures of wisdom, painted in glowing co"lours, are powerfully recommended to
 "the individual himself, and to the com"munity; and the whole concludes with "a pathetic exhortation to the youth of "the school.

151. Letters and Thoughts (never intended for the Public Eye) which may promote Christian Knowledge and Justice. By Hugh Josiah Hansard, Esq. a Christian of no Sect or Party, and one of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the County of Middlesex. Printed for the sole Benefit of the Foundling Hospital. 8vo.

THESE Letters, &c. which are addressed to the King, the Empress of Russia, the Emperor of Germany, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Amherst, the Dean of Windsor, Mr. Wilkes, and several other distinguished personages, "tend only" (as the author informs us) "to promote Christian knowledge; to feed the poor; to keep the sabbath; to fill the soul with love, justice, and obedience; to cure or heal every seeming evil in life."

As this truly benevolent and Christian Magistrate seems to have the zeal of an ancient prophet, in crying aloud and sparing not, we only wish that he had also the abilities and inspiration. The latter, we are certain, would have prevented his recommending Rousseau's Eloisa (with all its merit a system of education, or rather seduction, of the most dangerous kind) to a virtuous young lady. See p. 135.

152. Britannia's Felicity demonstrated, on the Birth-day of his Britannick Majesty George the IIIrd, King of Great Britain, France, et Ireland, Defender of the Faith, Elector and Hereditary Treasurer of the Roman Empire, &c. &c. &c. being celebrated by Sir James Harris, Knight of the Bath, and his Majesty's Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of Russia, May 24, 1780, at Ozerky, the Prince of Potemkin's Country Seat, near St. Petersburg. By a naturalised Englishman, Peter Holstein, Librarian to the British Factory at St. Petersburg.* 4to.

153. The good Sovereign vindicated by the Attachment of his People. A Poem read, 4 June, 1784, on the Birth-day of his Britannick Majesty George the IIIrd, King of Great Britain, France, et Ireland, Defender of the Faith, Elector and Treasurer of the Roman Empire, &c. &c. &c. being celebrated at St. Petersburg by his Britannick Majesty's Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of Russia, Aleyne Fitzherbert, Esq. By the same. 4to.

THIS rhyming Librarian, though "a naturalised Englishman," is evidently a foreigner. As for his poetry, Sternhold and Hopkins, and Colley Cibber, have doubtless been his models. Witness the beginning of the first:

"Hail, Britannia! tune thy layes
 To sing great George's reign and praise;
 If some will grumble and complain,
 They must their prejudice arraign;
 For of thy sons who rightly judge,
 No thoughts can bear this day a grudge."

At such prose run mad every reader surely must grumble, and none will grudge the author his inspiration.

Among the encomiums of our monarch, he is soon after represented as

"In conjugal love supremely great;
 "A pattern for all beds of state."

The first line is not perfectly clear; and if we do understand the second, it seems no great compliment to a king to make him "a pattern for a bed," even "of state."

* "Theodore & Adele, par M. la Comtesse de Genlis." See vol. LIII. pp. 860, 946.

† "Life of Milton, p. 142."

* So in both.

The second is in Alexandrines, and the chorus of both is, God save Great George our King, &c. We hope that the Great Catherine, who (we are told) understands our language, and such of her subjects as are acquainted with it, will not form an idea of English poetry from this outlandish specimen of a bard who, though "Librarian to the British "Factory," will never be Librarian to Apollo.

154. The Trial of John Peter Zenger, of New York, Printer, for a Libel against Government, on Aug. 4. 1735. Imprinted to the Hon. T. Erskine. 8vo.

MOST writers and publishers endeavour to hit the momentary occasions when the public attention is called to some very important, or very insinuating object. The varying mind has of late, during the long summer recess, never been suffered to flag; for conjurers, balloons, meteors, and libels have very sufficiently occupied all their leisure. The Dean of St. Asaph's memorable trial, and his as memorable discharge, have given rise to many discussions, though, in number and profundity, far inferior to the contemporary subjects above-mentioned. Amongst the catalogue we have received the above pamphlet. The questions which principally arose in the argument were, Whether a libel is the more a libel for being true? a question which has been much agitated in Westminster Hall, where the doctrine maintained is, the more true it be, the more it is a libel. But this seems to contradict the words of the charge in every indictment, viz. "publishing false, scandalous, and seditious words," &c. Let the ingenuity of the long robe reconcile the difference. The other question, Whether Juries have a right to decide on the law and the fact? was likewise discussed; and, after many ingenious arguments of Mr. Hamilton, which did equal honour to his head as to his heart, we are happy to find that the jury coincided with that learned pleader, and, judging of the truth and falsehood of the libel, and also of the law and the fact, acquitted the prisoner.—It appears that Mr. Hamilton was afterwards presented with the freedom of New York, in a gold box of five ounces and a half.—(See Mr. Hamilton's arguments on this trial in vol. VIII. p. 35. of this Magazine.)

AS it is notorious, that this Life was announced before the Doctor had been two days dead, and was published on the ninth morning after the world was deprived of its greatest literary ornament, a few trifling inaccuracies will of course be expected, and pardoned by the indulgent reader. But, as perhaps some, who may peruse this book, were utter strangers to Dr. Johnson and the circumstances of his life, and might be led into mistakes by several little errors, which have unavoidably, and notwithstanding the utmost diligence and most attentive observation, stolen into this account, we entreat the readers to insert the following short notes, and to write these few emendations on the margin of the respective pages of this elaborate work.

P. 9. On Mr. Johnson's arrival in London, he brought with him two poems (the first of which he must have finished in the country by the date). He brought up two poems, though he had only finished one, and that one, which was entitled "London," as he translated only between 30 and 40 lines in a morning, must have been written before he left Lichfield in 1737, as it was published in the Summer of 1738. The subject likewise declares, that it was written in the country. P. 12. Owing to hurry, the other poem, called "The Vanity of human Wishes," is mentioned as if it followed "London" directly. But remember, reader, it did not appear till near ten years after. P. 14. "His motive for going down to Lichfield." We imagine. Wem in Shropshire is intended, as the school for which the Doctor applied was at that place. P. 21. The fictitious names are said to be, M. AGRIPPA, JULIUS FLORUS, SEMPRONIUS, &c. &c. all owing to hurry. For these are the names in the debates inserted in the London Magazine. Those adopted in the Gentleman's were borrowed or formed from "Gulliver's Travels," not from the "Roman History." P. 24. The story of Osborn's prostration is not correctly told. The accident happened while the Dr. was arranging the Harleian collection, in the shop of the poor bookseller—all owing to hurry. P. 26. Savage's Life, believed to be the Dr's first Biographical performance, in 1743. NOTE. Said hastily.

haftily. The Life of Paul Sarpi was published in the Gent. Magazine in 1738. P. 29. The success of Savage's Life, represented as the occasion of his writing the Lives of Drake and others, after which his fame was increasing fast, and his "acquaintance sought with some avidity;" a small mistake. The lives in question were published anonymously in the Gent. Magazine; and, as the author's name was not known, it is suggested, that people could not court his acquaintance on that account. This is only said by way of hint, lest critics should be sour. P. 29. The Dr. is said to have stated the difficulty and unimportance of giving exact dates in literary history, in a passage which is quoted from the "Life of Dryden." NOTE. A small error. The citation says nothing about unimportance. This was occasioned by the author's feeling strongly the over-care of attending to such triflings; and, in some measure, to his being too much hurried, to mind the meaning of the words, while he read and transcribed them. P. 41. The story of the demand of an additional 500*l.* from the Booksellers for the Dictionary should have been stated more clearly, and with the names of the parties at full length, "but there was not time." The defence might then have been omitted—though it fills a page. NOTE. It is hoped that the author of this life will favour the world with his sentiments on all Dr. Johnson's writings. What may not be expected from the man, who kindly allows of the "Idler," that "its allegories and moral essays all "carry the hand of a great matter," and that "some of the lighter pieces are not defective in fancy?" P. 44. NOTE. Reader, pardon the jump back from 1758 to 1754 in this page. Let hurry plead for want of order. P. 64. In apology for the Dr's criticising Congreve's plays from recollection, it is observed, that "fits of petulance and indolence will seize us at the desk," NOTE. By us is meant Dr. Johnson and the author of this life. P. 68. The Dr's letter to Mr. Allen is not a true copy; but let hurry apologize. P. 70. Let the same excuse be pleaded for imperfections in the story of the application at court for the addition to his pension. P. 79. Pardon, gentle reader, the errors of this page. The doctor never was delirious during his illness. What he said about "the fellow's poetry," was uttered just after he awoke, and in consequence probably of a dream from which he was roused. He recollected himself immediately. To inquire how far it is possible for a delirious man to pour out his soul in prayer, must be left to those who assert, that "he recovered his senses before morning." P. 86. He did not leave a book "to each of the most intimate of his literary friends," but only to the few who attended him closely and constantly in his illness. Let those who doubt read the names in the will. P. 88. It is said, Mr. Kearsley had furnished him with a complete list of his works—though in the advertisement it is asserted, that the list given with this life is only drawn up as far as the author's "information could lead him." Hurry surely, gentle reader, may excuse, if not reconcile, this inconsistency. P. 91. He "seldom exceeded 2 or 3 glasses of wine." A small mistake. He never drank any, during the period mentioned by the author. P. 93. He was pensioned, that there might be "one Englishman on the roll of court favour." What countryman was Shebbeare, and when first pensioned? Kind reader, inform the author. P. 103. The repeating nineteen lines from Juvenal was not an instance of Dr. Johnson's great memory. Multitudes could have done it. But the author knew no other instance, and so could give no other. P. 113. The story about the black servant is told in a very slovenly and inaccurate manner; but hurry kept the author from procuring better information. Who can be surprised? P. 120. "—— Langton." Hurry prevented the author's discovering this gentleman's christian name. Not that he had far to go in search of it, as it appears at full length in the next page; but because, if he had found it out, his book would not have been all of a piece.

There are a thousand other inaccuracies, many of them equally unimportant, which some of the author's friends will undoubtedly lay before the public, in order, if possible, to render his book more complete.

* * * We must again observe to the Author of Curialia (see p. 852), that though that Memoir is said, p. 1, to have been "read at the Society of Antiquaries, March 21, 1782," yet, in p. 102, it is dated "Whitehall, June 4, 1784."

☛ TITLE PAGES, a GENERAL PREFACE, and INDEXES, for ib. Vol. 1784, will be published in our next Number.

TRANSLATION OF AN UNPUBLISHED
LATIN ODE BY THE LATE
DR. JOHNSON.

To T. L. M. D. [1778.]

YOU own, then, with the vulgar
train,
Too prone to murmur and complain,
That Wisdom's aid no cure supplies
To grief, and Learning, like a dastard, flies.
You the misfortunes all must share,
Nor brave subdue, nor pious bear;
Skill'd in a thousand drugs, you find
No remedy to heal a wounded mind.
Thro' the long, tedious gloom of night,
Thro' the slow, useless hours of light,
Languid and torpid, cares infest
Your too solicitous, paternal breast.
More than enough of grief; at length
Rise, bravely rise; collect your strength;
You sages dead, a numerous band,
You your lov'd medical pursuits demand.
Trust to th' Almighty each event;
Trust, firm in hope; nor thus lament
With female softness, but once more
To us and to yourself yourself restore.

LINES ON THE DEATH OF
DR. SAMUEL JOHNSON.

WHEN borne to Heaven, the Muses' arms between,
Had I, great Johnson, thine Elisha been,
Fager thy mantle I had caught, and then Inscrib'd a Johnson's fame with Johnson's pen!

But now I dare not, impious, touch thy shrine
With diction rude, or with unhallow'd line;
Yet, though to silence aw'd, with grief sincere
The infant Muse shall think!—and drop a tear!

S. T. P.

ON THE MUCH LAMENTED DEATH OF
DR. SAMUEL JOHNSON.

POUR forth your tears, ye tender Muses,
pour;
For, oh! your favourite, Johnson, is no more.
Low is that head, and silent is that tongue,
On which the listening world with rapture hung.
See, where, all motionless, with folded hands,
Woe-struck, each pensive Son of Science
stands,
Crying,—What pity, as he heaves the sigh,
That such transcendent worth should ever die!
Pour forth your tears, ye tender Muses, pour;
For, oh! your favourite, Johnson, is no more.
With Genius' richest gift his mind en-dow'd,
Spurning the level of th' inglorious crowd,
Wing'd with sublimest thought, triumphant rose,
Springs, yet conceal'd, of knowledge to disclose.

I

Nor vainly curious turn'd his piercing eyes,
But truths he sought that make man greatly wise;

Bade Virtue's charms in loftiest numbers glow,
And frown'd on trembling Vice, her sternest Pour forth your tears, ye tender Muses,
pour;
For, oh! your peerless Johnson is no
O Chief renown'd of Britain's letter'd throng,
Prince of the critic, and the moral song,
O'er thy tear-sprinkled grave, by Honour
made,
Unfading laurels e'er shall throw their
With all the grace adorn'd that Art can give,
On Fame's immortal lists thy name shall live;
And, shining there, th' idea strong impart,
Of brightest intellect, and noblest heart.
Pour forth your streaming tears, sweet Muses,
pour;
For, oh! your God-like Johnson is no more.

The following elegant Tribute of Affection, by Mrs. SHERIDAN, for a departed Relation, whose public Talents and private Virtues were eminently conspicuous, cannot be unacceptable to our Readers.

V E R S E S
to the Memory of my beloved Sister
M A R I A L I N L E Y.

TWICE* hath the sorrowing Muse her tribute paid,
And the sad call of mourning Love obey'd;
Again in cypress wreaths she veils her lyre,
And milder grief her plaintive strains inspire;
Again she comes to soothe my lonely hours,
And strew th' untimely grave with weeping
flowers,
Sweet half-blown buds, cropt in their earliest bloom,
Fit emblems to adorn Maria's tomb;
The fair! the young Maria! she whose song Charm'd with mute rapture the admiring
throng,
Whose smiling loveliness all hearts subdu'd,
Whose gentle accents fond attention woo'd.
Mourn, Beauty, mourn! no more with wanton pride,
Boast your bright charms with orient crimson
Let sad Reflection Pleasure's dream supply,
And tremble in the tear that dims your eye.
Such charms on sweet Maria were bestow'd,
There Innocence and Health, united, glow'd;
So shone the soften'd lustre of her eyes,
Such were the dazzling beams of glad surprise.
Ye, too, whose gentler souls confess the power
Of heavenly harmony, HER loss deplore,

* "Alluding to the untimely deaths of my dear brothers, Thomas and Samuel."

Whose

Whose notes enchanting struck with magic art
 On all the soft vibrations of the heart ;
 Oh ! let your dying strains to Heaven be borne,
 And imitate the excellence you mourn ;
 So shall the angel spirit downward bend,
 And tow'rs the friends she lov'd her arms extend,
 Pitying the sorrows we are doom'd to bear,
 And vainly wishing us her bliss to share.
 While thus my tears with these sad numbers
 flow,
 Still fondly cherishing my pleasing woe ;
 While thus my lov'd Maria's form I trace,
 Her animated look, her native grace,
 I sooth the grief I wish not to subdue,
 And all her sweet perfections still renew.

MR. URBAN,
 THE following Ode was written by the late SAMUEL BRADBURY, Esq. who had been near forty years chief clerk and secretary to the board of trade. He was educated at Eton, and afterward removed to Wadham College, Oxford, where he took his degrees, and was distinguished as much for his private virtues as for his extensive knowledge. He was intended for the church, but could not be persuaded to take orders, though much pressed by the late Earl of Halifax, who offered to provide for him amply ;
 having scruples about the articles, that no temporal advantage could induce him to abandon. He died a few weeks before the abolition of the board of trade took place.

ODE TO VIRTUE.

COME, Heaven born maid ! with aspect
 sweet,
 Fair Virtue ! from thy awful seat,
 From that steep moun ain, whence descends
 A shining rill to cheer thy friends ;
 While, through the soltry wilds of life,
 Victorious over factious strife,
 Thou guid'st them, with indulgent hand,
 Securely to thy promis'd land.
 Come, to my ravish'd sight confess,
 In all thy native radiance drest,
 And, warbling thy immortal strain,
 Lead sprightly on thy fav'rite train,
 Content, and Peace, and Wisdom meek,
 And Health, the nymph with rosy cheek.
 But if no mortal eye must know
 Unveil'd that beauty's vivid glow,
 With which, near Heaven's imperial throne,
 Through endless ages thou hast shone ;
 O ! come, array'd, celestial fair !
 In my lov'd Delia's shape and air ;
 And while deluded thus I gaze,
 Through weary life's perplexing maze,
 O'er dreary tracts where Envy reigns,
 O'er Hate's inhospitable plains,
 In Siren Pleasure's faithless way,
 Where oft thy heedless vot'ries stray,
 With thy serene, thy steady light,
 Conduct my wandering footsteps right !
 Or rather let the soft deceit
 Soon disappear, however sweet ;

Soon let my Delia's real voice /
 Bid all my listening soul rejoice,
 With accents mild my doubts remove,
 And blessing down a mutual love !
 Then, Virtue ! then thy power exert,
 Pour all thy influence on my heart,
 From each debasing passion free,
 And make it worthy her and thee.

MR. URBAN, Sept. 11.
 IN June Mag. p. 412, you published the history of my three hares ; an epitaph, therefore, on one of them, as a suitable sequel to that narrative, you may possibly think not unworthy a place among the poetical compositions in your Magazine. W. C.

EPITAPH ON AN HARE.

HERE lies, whom hound did ne'er pursue,
 Nor swifter greyhound follow,
 Whose foot ne'er tainted morning dew,
 Nor ear heard huntsman's halloo.

Tiney, the surliest of his kind,
 Who, nurs'd with tender care,
 And to domestic bounds confin'd,
 Was yet a wild jack hare.

Though duly from my hand he took
 His pittance every night,
 He did it with a jealous look,
 And, when he could, would bite.

His diet was of wheaten bread,
 And milk, and oats, and straw ;
 Thistles, or lettuces instead ;
 And sand, to cleanse his maw.

On twigs of hawthorn he regal'd,
 Or pippins' russet peel ;
 And, when his juicier fallads fail'd,
 Slic'd carrot pleas'd him well.

A Turkey carpet was his lawn,
 Whereon he lov'd to bound,
 To skip and gambol like a fawn,
 And swing himself around.

His frisking was at evening hours,
 For then he lost his fear ;
 But most before approaching showers,
 Or when a storm drew near.

Eight years and five round rolling moons
 He thus saw steal away,
 Dozing out all his idle noons,
 And every night at play.

I kept him for old service sake,
 For he would not beguile
 My heart of thoughts that made it ach,
 And force me to a smile.

But now beneath this walnut shade
 He finds his long, last home ;
 And waits, in snug concealment laid,
 'Till gentler Puss shall come.

He, in his turn, must feel the shocks
 From which no care can save,
 And, partner once of Tiney's box,
 Be partner of his grave.

 THE

THE MANNERS OF THE AGE.
TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.
BY MR. ALLEN, OF LEWES.

OH, happy age! how blest! To eat, to drink,
To dress, to game, or any thing but think;
In pleasure's round life's tedious hours to waste,
Is the sole labour of a Man of Taste.
In these gay pastimes, youth, and hoary age,
The prince, the prelate, and the courtly page,
The lawyer, soldier, and the haughty lord,
The beau, the belle, all equally accord.
Vice governs all, with slavish mode their guide,
And fickle Fortune, often changing side.
Oh glorious times! fair Science droops her head,
The Arts too languish, and the Muse is dead.
Each æra's fam'd for some peculiar vice:
In ours 'tis feasting, dressing, cards, and dice.
Must I, for fashion's sake, with these engage?
All business leave, and join the general rage?
Feast, drink, and game, nocturnal vigils keep,
And all the useless day consign to sleep?
Must I, to please, my am'rous stories tell
To all the sex; and fly from belle to belle?
Must I, to gain respect in modish life,
Seduce a virgin, or my neighbour's wife?
Rather than this, of bounteous Heaven I'd crave
To waft me to some hermit's dreary cave.
How blest the man, who, far from noise and strife,
In sweet retirement leads a rural life!
No dupe to fashion, and no slave to fear;
Though few his friends, he finds those friends sincere;
In innocence his happy moments fly,
Prepar'd, alike, in peace to live and die.

T W I L I G H T.

BORNE on a flood of blazing light,
The sun led on the ardent day;
All nature hail'd the warm delight,
Yet sicken'd at the fervid ray.
To join the herds in shadowy rest,
The bleating flocks forsook the plain;
The lingering pulse of life oppress'd,
A languor felt through every vein.
Mild evening comes—a gentle breeze
Revives, to fan the winding stream:
Soft whispers die along the trees,
And light decays with gradual gleam.
As some coy nymph, of doubtful tread,
Bathful to meet a lover's gaze,
Still hesitating o'er the mead,
Not quite retires, yet hardly stays;
So light's last clothes, veil'd in dew,
Still bid the doubtful landscape rise;
Deep shades still deeper shades subdue,
Till night in darkness wraps the skies.

A. B.

TO A YOUNG LADY WHO WISHED NOT TO HEAR A FUNERAL BELL.

AND why not hear the sound of yonder bell?
Ah! why from serious thoughts for ever
It tolls a sober, awful, solemn knell,
A wish'd-for knell to immortality.
Think not, a round of Folly's mad career
Can always shield thee from Reflection's power:
The young, the fond, the rich, the gay, must fear,
Too long regardless of a dying hour.
Think not, the beauteous form which now
you wear,
That glow of crimson, those inspiring eyes,
Must linger ever here; they all declare,
They speak aloud their kindred to the skies.
Do not the hour, the day, the month, the year,
All in their course expire—but all renew?
All nature shows, alas! a prospect drear;
All nature shows there's woe in view.
Long lost in storms, do mariners repine
When the glad pilot distant land descry?
Ah! see them eager trace the solid line,
See their hopes kindle as the object rise.
And shall my fair, with brightest hopes in store,
Not once look up beyond this barren clod?
Shall she alone her destiny deplore,
Her anchor Heaven—and her pilot God?

Where lives my love, my only treasure.

CHORUS.

My girl so blest, by all carest,
What transport 'tis at eve to meet her!
My words are not with fiction dress'd,
When I with praises fondly greet her.

Not all the gifts that fortune brings,
Of titles, power, or sparkling treasure,
If Laura soar'd on falsehood's wings,
Would yield my soul a moment's pleasure.

With her, beneath some lowly cot,
I wish to spend each hour of leisure!
Then should life's cares be all forgot
That might infringe my heart-felt pleasure.

Then hear, ye Gods! my fervent prayer!
I ask but her!—not golden treasure!
Her smiles can sooth the brow of care!
Her charms bestow unequal'd pleasure!

PROCEEDINGS IN PARLIAMENT.

(CONCLUDED FROM P. 863.)

MR. H. Dundas rose, and, after a most affecting prefatory speech, moved, That leave be given to bring in a bill to repeal the act which confiscated the estates of certain persons therein mentioned, attainted of high treason; and to empower the Crown to restore them to the right heirs, under certain regulations and restrictions.

Mr. Fox approved of the measure, and hoped that the bill would extend to the case of Lord Newburgh*, head of the family of the Derwentwater estate, whose case was peculiarly hard, and merited attention.

Mr. Pitt acquiesced in the measure, and spoke of the justice and liberality of the intended bill in high terms of commendation.

Mr. Dempster spoke of it as a measure of true national policy. It would act as an incentive to repopulate the Highlands, which of late had been almost depopulated by emigrations. He added, that, with leave of the House, he would follow it by another bill for the encouragement of the fisheries.

Mr. Orde, Lord Frederick Campbell, and many others, spoke in commendation of the motion; and the House was unanimous in favour of it.

Tuesday, Aug. 3.

Mr. Dempster, as a previous step to an intended bill for the encouragement of the fisheries in Scotland, opened the way by submitting to the consideration of the House the propriety of a bill, which he had in contemplation, for abolishing some remains of vassalage which still prevailed in some parts of Scotland. Tenants in that country, he said, were obliged to work so many days in harvest, and other seasons, for their landlords, by which they were prevented from getting in their own harvest, or engaging in any other employment. This was a grievance in many respects, and particularly militated against the intention of Parliament in granting bounties for the encouragement of the fisheries. Now what he meant to propose, therefore, was, that, instead of work, tenants should be empowered to commute for a certain rent, which would at once relieve them from their vassalage, and add to the public service a number of useful hands that were now withheld by a very unconstitutional custom. He did not, he said, mean to press forward the bill during the present session, any otherwise than to have it brought in, read once, and printed; that it may be in readiness to be taken into consideration early in the next session, which he hoped the house would not oppose.

Marquess of Graham seconded the motion, and declared himself friendly to the principle of the bill.

Lord Frederick Campbell said, he knew of no vassalage in Scotland. It was a clause, in most leases, that the tenants should do certain work for their landlords; but this was not in consequence of vassalage, but of a mutual agreement between the landlord and tenant, which had been customary, it was true, from time immemorial, though there was nothing, he was sure, in his part of the country, that called for such a bill, to which he had many objections, though he would offer none now, but reserve them to the proper time.

Sir James Johnston approved of the object of the bill, but believed it would be hard to remove a number of customs in Scotland, which though they might appear to favour of vassalage and feudal tenures, were no other than the effects of local prejudices. There was, for instance, no law to prevent men from taking themselves wives from any part of the kingdom; but he was sure that custom, superior to any law, would prevent the Highlanders from marrying out of their own clan.—Leave was given to bring in the bill.

Mr. Thornton presented a petition from the holders of navy-bills, praying relief against the bill pending in the House, holding forth terms to them highly disadvantageous and injurious.—It was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House then resolved itself into a committee of ways and means, Mr. Gilbert in the chair.

Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, being of opinion, that the most effectual way of increasing the revenue, and preventing smuggling, would be, by lowering the duties on those articles that were the chief objects of smuggling, said, he had some propositions to submit to the committee to that effect: they related chiefly to the articles of distillery from corn and from melasses. The duties on the former, in 1778, produced between 5 and 60,000l. a year; since that year additional duties have been laid on, and the produce is now only 300,000l. a year. On the latter, the duty amounted to 34,000l. in London only; since that it had fallen next to nothing, it being only 1900l. in 1782. He proposed, therefore, that all the additional duties should be taken off, and certain regulations in the collection take place in their room. He likewise proposed purchasing the Fairintosh distillery, in the Highlands of Scotland, established by the Union exempt from taxation, that exemption being greatly abused. He proposed to lay the duties on the wash.

Lord North doubted whether that would answer, or whether a better mode might be devised.

Mr. Hussy did not think a compensation to the proprietor of the Fairintosh distillery necessary till his exemption from duties should be clearly proved. He was of opinion, that this right of exemption had been tried, and found to be in the Crown.

The Lord Advocate insisted, that no such question had ever been determined.

Mr.

* See p. 634.

M. H. Hefey was sure that such a question had been tried, though he could not just then recollect the particulars.

Mr Dundas believed, that, by the 6th act of the Union, all private rights were reserved; the Farrington interest was a private right consequently reserved. A question, indeed, had arisen, in 1711, and was then tried, whether it was, or was not, a private right; and the determination was in favour of the subject, against the Crown. The Treasury had now acquired it, and for 73 years the subject has been in quiet possession. It would, therefore, be very hard indeed now to call the right in question.

Mr. Eden produced a report from the Commissioners of Excise in Scotland, in which it appeared that Mr. late Chancellor Yorke, and the present Lord Chancellor, were both of opinion, that the right was not saved by the Union. It was true, indeed, that in the trial in 1711, some of the Barons of the Exchequer signed a certificate in favour of the subject, but the Chief was of a contrary opinion; and a question arose the doubt.

M. Dandya would not venture to oppose the present law authorities which had been created but he, for one, never entertained a doubt of its being private right. If any person had existed, surely in 73 years it would have been removed.

... I do not think that a mere acquittal, however long of time, conferred a benefit on the reputation of a court was, in this case, demonstrably flawed. The decision was open to being wrong, and, on a revision,

That a duty of 2d. a yard square be laid on all stuffs wholly made of cotton, woven in Great Britain, of the value of 2s. a yard.

Sir William Cunningham said, it was not true that the alteration had received the approbation of the trade. The most respectable traders in the North had within these ten minutes assured him of the contrary.

Mr. Rose stated, that the delegates from Lancashire, &c. had agreed to the new regulations; but, to be sure, on the account going down into the country, they had superseded their delegates, under pretence that they did not approve of any taxes whatever.

Mr. Kebley opposed the tax, as ruinous to the manufactures of Great Britain:

Mr. Pitt, upon enquiry, had been told, that the duty would by no means affect the cotton trade.

Mr. Dempster observed, that a formidable budget of taxes had indeed been modified so as to make them somewhat more palatable; but, he thought, if an additional tax were to be laid on our own manufactured cottons, an additional duty should likewise be laid on those manufactured in India.

Mr. PITCHER moved, That every bleacher and dyer of stuffs made of linen and cotton, or of stuffs wholly made of cotton, woven in Great Britain, shall pay annually for a licence

That there shall be a duty of three farthings a yard square on all printed, painted, stained, or dyed linen cloths, made in Great Britain, of hemp, except such linen cloths as shall be dyed of one colour.

Mr. Jay Campbell said, this would ruin the trade in Scotland; and so apprehensive were the linen manufacturers there of the consequences that they had made up their minds to sell w. som other branch of business.

Sir William Cunningham said, the Scotch manufacturers would all emigrate.

Mr. W. Putney observed, that, as the linen and cotton were rival trades, care should be taken to equalise the duties, so as not to give either the preference.

Mr Pitt said, he had endeavoured so to do.

Mrs. Dampfser said, the cotton branch could by a machine make 4000 strands at once, but the ingenuity of man had not yet contrived any method to make more than two threads from flax at one time. He thought the tax on linen had been given up, and he had so written to his constituents.

Mr. H. Blair said if the resolution for laying three farthing a yard on linen be agreed to, they may as well make a present of the trade to Ireland, for it could not be carried on in Scotland.

On the question being put, the committee divided, when the numbers were, Ayes 66, Nays 14.

Mr. Pitt then moved, That a duty of three half-half-pence a yard square be laid on the importation of all stuffs, made of or mixed with cotton, not printed, painted, or stained.

All the above resolutions were agreed to.

Aug. 5.

The House having resolved into a committee on the Post Office bill,

Aldm. Newsham observed, that the bill, as it then stood, was a great oppression upon commerce, as every bill of exchange, inclosed in a letter, was chargeable, which, being added to the stamp duty on bills, would make the amount an intolerable burthen. He wished a difference to be made between letters inclosed and bills.

Mr. Dampier too complained of another grievance in the Postage, as the bill now stood: a single letter, to or from London to Edinburgh, would pay only 7s.; but a letter from Edinburgh, that should travel 20 miles out of Scotland into England, would pay 8 pence.—No alteration was made in consequence of these observations; the blanks were filled up, and the House returned.

The order of the day was then read, for going into a committee on the Scots forfeited estates bill; and, a motion being made for the Speaker's leaving the chair,

Mr. Popham rose to oppose it. He was sorry, he said, that a bill of so much importance, as that of giving away the property of the public, had been brought forward at so late a period of the session, when there were scarce 40 members in the House. This was a measure the impropriety of which could only be equalled by the precipitancy with which it had been hurried through the House; for though no more than 48 hours had elapsed since it was brought in, it had made so rapid a progress as to be now ready to get into a committee. He therefore would recommend the farther consideration of it to be deferred till the next session.

Mr. Dundas was sorry that the Hon. Member was not present when the bill was first brought in. If he had heard the reasons for the measure, he was sure he would have given it no opposition. The mischiefs, which the bill was intended to remedy, must be prevented now, or it would be too late. The spirit of emigration, which threatened the Highlands of Scotland with desolation, was spreading in an alarming degree, and could only be stopped by passing the bill now before the House.

Marquess of Graham said, the necessity of putting a stop to the discontents of the people in the Highlands was very urgent.

Mr. Popham gave up the point.—The Speaker left the chair, the blanks were filled, and the bill passed without any further opposition.

Aug. 6.

The House in a committee of supply,

Sr. George Yung (secretary at War) moved, That the sum of 15,726l. be granted, for the purpose of paying the officers of the reduced regiments their full pay up to the 24th of December, 1784, which, he understood, would satisfy them.

Mr. Pitt seconded the motion.

Lord Blauclamp represented the case of those officers as extremely affecting, having purchased their commissions at a high price, under the idea that they were to be continued, and now they were to be placed among the first that were dismissed; he wished to know, therefore, whether the sum demanded was to be granted by way of compensation for their long and painful services, several of them of 30 years standing, or only for present subsistence. If for the former he would by no means agree to it; but if for the latter, still something further should be thought of, he had no objection to the motion.

Several Members of great weight in the House, and some officers of high rank in the army, represented the case of these four reduced regiments as peculiarly hard. And

Mr. Pitt coincided with those gentlemen in opinion; yet the circumstances of the country were such as warranted the reduction of the army, and private distresses must give way to public necessity; however, he was in hopes that some plan might be found out of employing them in future; but it would be premature in him to mention what that might be.

The question, on the motion, was then put, and agreed to.

Mr. Rose then moved for the sum of 9000l. for the payment of the commitments of accounts, and 7000l. for their secretaries, and for the trouble of adjusting the claims of the American sufferers, &c. &c. After which Mr. Speaker resumed the chair,

And the House instantly resolved itself into a committee of ways and means, when the petition from the holders of navy bills was taken into consideration. Mr. Thornson, who presented the petition, endeavoured to explain to the House the nature of that kind of traffic. It was, however, a kind of jobbing, which, depending entirely upon calculation, was little attended to, and less understood, by the far greater part of the House. He concluded, however, with moving, to refer the petition to the committee of supply, in which he was seconded by Mr. Adley.

Mr. Fox, as usual upon all such occasions, distinguished himself by the propriety of his remarks, and the accuracy of his deductions. He challenged the whole Treasury bench to stand up and confute any one of his arguments. On this occasion he triumphed over the feeble efforts of his opposers, and he made it very clearly clear to the bystanders in the House, that he was the ablest (if not the honestest) financier in Europe. He was indeed, a powerful advocate for the navy bill holders; though he did not exert the same zeal for the holders of annuities and be sure, while he could he left to be loaded by the Minister.

The question, on the motion, after an elaborate borate discussion, in which Mr. Thornton, Mr. Pitt, Mr. Fox, Lord Mahon, Lord North, Mr. Hammer, Mr. Hussey, Mr. Courtenay, and Mr. Rose, bore a part, being called for, and carried, the House resolved itself into a committee of supply, when the matter in question was, as it should seem, disposed of agreeably to all parties; but we profess ourselves totally ignorant of the mode.

Aug. 9.

The order of the day for the third reading of the horse-tax bill;

Mr. Pitt proposed, instead of taxing race-horses a guinea each time they start, and five guineas the winning horse, that a tax of two guineas each horse or mare, at first starting, should be the full tax for the year.

Lord Feilding was apprehensive that the tax on horses would have a bad effect, and operate as a bar to the breeding of horses that formerly were the pride and the boast of this country: he meant, he said, the large breed of black horses. To encourage breeding horses of that description he proposed an exemption, but, not having a motion for that purpose properly prepared, his purpose was defeated, and the bill was passed.

The order of the day, for the third reading of the bill for restoring the forfeited estates in Scotland, was read; when

Sir James Johnston hoped the estates were to be restored with all their feudal vassalage, as before their confiscation, appended to them.

Mr. Dundas replied that these estates, having lapsed to the crown, could not now be held by any other tenure than the laws of the land prescribed.

The bill was passed, and sent to the Lords.

The House going into a committee of ways and means;

Mr. Hussey objected to the allowing of interest on ordnance debentures, after being due fifteen months, as had been usual. The grounds of his objection arose from the advanced price which contractors generally set upon their contracts, not less than 30 per cent. more than the real value, owing to the uncertainty of the time of payment, with which the House had nothing to do.

Mr. Pitt, considering that the ordnance debt had been due three years, thought it but reasonable that some compensation should be made to persons who had given so long credit to government; he therefore would allow the holders interest for the same after the expiration of fifteen months, the usual time of credit.

Mr. Rose informed the House that he had a proposition to make of a very important nature. It had appeared, on the most uncontrovertible information, that great frauds were daily practised in the manufacture of soap and starch; and that those two articles were frequently made in cottages on commons, and in places at a distance from the residence of any officer of excise; by which means the revenue on soap and starch had decreased to an alarming degree. He proposed, therefore, to prevent persons from manufacturing soap and starch, any where but in market towns, on severe penalties.

Mr. Denham observed, that the putting a stop to persons settled in business from exercising their lawful calling, was a matter of too much importance to be brought on at the eve of a session. It ought to be considered with the most scrupulous attention.

Mr. Pitt assured the Hon. Member, that it was a measure of absolute necessity. The practice was got to such a head, that, if the bill should pass over to another session, the revenue would suffer more than 50,000*l.* loss by the delay.

Mr. Eden did not think that such a bill ought to be brought in within four days of prorogation: however, he wished to see the bill, which was ordered accordingly.

The smuggling bill, which had been once committed, and twice recommitted, was again sent to a committee. Some amendments of little moment were proposed, and agreed to; and the bill passed.

Aug. 10.

The House resolved itself into a committee of the whole House on the report of the commutation bill.

Mr. Jolliffe rose to oppose the bill, as totally inadequate to the end proposed. The smugglers, notwithstanding the circumstances of penalty and restraint, while other objects of smuggling, such as spirits and tobacco, were left them, would still find means of continuing their illicit commerce; the pretence, therefore, of meeting the smuggler on his own ground, by underselling him in the market, would be wholly frustrated. It is well known, that the foreign merchants are overstocked; that the smuggler can have teas of the very best quality at his own price; and that, while he has other articles to deal in, he will always find his account in underselling the fair trader. After endeavouring to make the bill appear nugatory as a preventive to smuggling, he next went to shew the price that was to be extorted from the people as a commutation for the part of the revenue which Government was to relinquish in order to try a hopeless experiment. Houses, he said, were to be taxed at a certainty, though the advantages the inhabitants were to reap were precarious. This, surely, was giving good coin for false and counterfeit money, which was, in fact, a species of Ministerial, if not Parliamentary, swindling.

Mr. Moysley objected to the bill, as an additional tax upon landholders, for upon them it would ultimately fall. They must either pay the tax themselves, or have their houses blinded and disfigured, and at last be obliged to let them to future tenants at an unuer-rent. Gentlemen, he said, did not know what they were doing when they were loading themselves and their tenants with such grievous burdens, burdens, to aggrandise the stock-holders of the East India Company.

Aldm. Newnham was sensible of the hardships that would arise from the tax; but he thought the abolition of smuggling worth the purchase.

Mr. Myers, Member for York, thought, at first, the commutation tax a good tax, but he now saw it in a very different light.

Sir Edward Ashley thought, that, as it was only by way of experiment, the tax should be temporary.

Mr. Eden was for recommitting the bill. He stated many cases where the proposed tax would bear hard, and little or no advantage accrue, to the payer. Schools, in particular. Old mansions occupied by farmers. Decayed houses, from 9 to 12 windows, occupied by poor tradesmen and labourers. He enumerated some other articles that wanted regulation in the bill; coffee-houses and tea-drinking-houses were fit objects of taxation, but he did not see their names in the bill.

Mr. Rose said, it was impossible to draw the line; every coffee-house was now a tavern, and every tavern a coffee-house.

Several other gentlemen spoke against the bill; and the question being loudly called for, the House divided—for the bill, 143; against it, 40.

The report was then read; and, when they came to the clause of laying three shillings on houses of seven windows,

Mr. Huffey said, it would depopulate the country; and moved to leave out the word three, and insert two in its stead.

Mr. Pitt said, that an alteration of one third would cause a great deficiency, and, as he was not prepared with taxes in lieu, he could not give it up.

Mr. Eden was of the same opinion.

The motion was put, and negatived; and the House proceeded with the report.

Aug. 11.

The order of the day for the second reading of the bill for allowing a draw-back on the exportation of iron, hemp, sail-cloth, and cordage, to the British colonies and United States of America.

Mr. Eden stated a compact between England and Ireland, which he thought would be violated by this measure, and wished the bill to be postponed till the Parliament of Ireland should meet, when both kingdoms might go hand in hand together.

Mr. Dundas obviated that objection, and it was agreed to commit the bill for to-morrow.

The House went into committee on the bill for lowering the duty on spirits and made wines (see p. 937), when the blank for the duty per gallon on the wash was filled up with the words five pence.

Aug. 12.

The order of the day, for going into a committee on the bill for registering the qualifications for killing game, being read,

Mr. Sheridan stated, that, in his opinion, the bill was unfit to go into a committee, as it was not drawn agreeably to the resolutions of the House.

Mr. Speaker agreed with the Hon. Member, that, if such a difference was discovered, the bill could not proceed a step farther, unless by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Pitt acknowledged, that, strictly speaking, the bill was not worded exactly as laid down by the resolutions of the House; but, in his opinion, the difficulty might be easily obviated by the insertion of only two or three words.

Mr. Sheridan did not mean, he said, to retard the progress of the bill; but insisted, that, if the alterations were not made, the bill would be nugatory, and might be thrown out on the third reading.

Mr. Pitt desired to know what the objections were, for he could not find them out.

Mr. Sheridan thought it not a little extraordinary that the Right Hon. Gentleman should not know what the defects were, and yet, but a few minutes before, he had declared that a very few words would supply them. He would, however, to save trouble, point them out. The resolutions went to oblige all qualified persons to take out a licence; but the bill extended the power to all persons to take out a licence to kill game; now certainly the Right Hon. Gentleman never meant that every person, on buying a licence, should have a right to kill game; if so, he had no objection; but certainly that was not the intention of the House.

Mr. Orde was of opinion, that the bill, being now only before the House with blanks, was incomplete, and might be altered without a new bill. This was agreed to.

The necessary alterations were made, and the bill committed.

The order of the day being read, for going into a committee on the hat bill;

Mr. Sheridan stated the hardship that a licence of ten shillings a year would bring upon little shop-keepers in the villages in the country, who perhaps paid only forty shillings a year rent, and sold hats among other things for which they must likewise take out licences. He insisted that these licences must operate to the ruin of all such petty shop-keepers, if not mitigated. That for hats he thought by far too much; and, instead of one pound for licences in market-towns, he proposed ten shillings, and instead of ten shillings in villages, five shillings. Licences for retailers in London and Westminster might stand as they did.

Mr. McDonald was clearly of Mr. Sheridan's opinion.

And Mr. Pitt saw the necessity of the reduction, and yielded to it.

The

The House was resumed, and adjourned.

Aug. 13.

The order of the day for receiving the report of the committee on the gold and silver plate bill, being read;

Aldm. Newnham objected to the mode of stamping at the Assay-office in the manner prescribed, which would, he said, materially affect the export trade. He said, plate was now stamped in the rough state, and, if weighed then, there would be one fifth loss to the manufacturer; and, if stamped when finished, it would deface the beauty, and spoil the sale.

Mr. Royle said, that a meeting of the trade had been held, and it had been agreed to stamp in the rough, and to allow a certain proportion for waste.

The report of the game bill was brought up, and

Mr. Sheridan pointed out some farther defects in the bill, which, he said, would operate only for the benefit of poachers. He related a humorous hypothetical conversation between a Lord of a Manor on his own ground, and a person licenced to kill game, on their insisting on shewing each other their credentials. He reprobated the bill; and added farther, that there never yet was an act passed relative to the game, and he believed there never would, that was not irreconcilable either with common sense or common justice.

Mr. Pitt observed, that he had this to say, that he had surmounted the Hon. Gentleman's main objection, and had added nothing to the harsh effect of the game laws. The amendments being read, and agreed to, the bill was ordered to be engrossed.

The civil list debt came next into debate, and produced much explanation, much altercation, and little satisfaction. It opened a series of state craft, practised by one Administration after another, till an end was put to the conversation by a motion for adjournment.

The third reading of the commutation bill being called for;

Mr. Wilberforce begged leave to add a clause, by way of rider, to empower dealers to return to the East India Company the chests of tea, purchased at former sales, which they might have in hand unopened, under certain regulations and restrictions.

Mr. Atkinson opposed this clause, as opening a door for at least 10,000 persons to exercise their ingenuity to cheat the Company, and defraud the revenue; besides giving the Directors of the Company a degree of trouble which they were by no means willing to undertake.

Mr. Pitt was of another opinion, and thought it inconsistent with common justice to force men to pay duties for tea, which in the fair course of trade they might have in possession, at the same time that their neighbours might have their teas without duties.

The clause was admitted.

Aug. 16.

Lord Maben rose, to inform the House, that a petition had been put into his hand, signed by a respectable number of the inhabitants of the county of Durham and the town of Berwick, stating, that the breed of dogs had greatly increased, and praying, that a tax might be laid upon dogs of all descriptions. His lordship moved, That the petition do lie upon the table, which was agreed to.

Mr. R. Le brought up the additional clause to the commutation bill, whereby it is provided, that the East India Company shall make an allowance to the purchasers of teas at their last sales (meaning the sales of the former year) conditionally, that the same shall be returned to them in the original packages, precisely in the same state in which they were purchased. Agreed; and that the clause be added as a rider.

Sums accounts, relative to the civil list debt, were called for by Mr. Sheridan; some of which were afterwards laid before the House; others were not made out.

The session ended; but this official dispute lies over to another session.

Aug. 20.

This day his Majesty came to the House of Peers; and, after giving the royal assent to several bills (see p. 635), closed the session by the following most gracious speech:

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"I cannot close this session of Parliament without returning you my warmest thanks for the eminent proofs you have given of your zealous and diligent attention to the public service.

"The happiest effects may be expected from the provisions which you have made for the better government of India, and from the institution of a tribunal so peculiarly adapted to the trial of offences committed in that distant country.

"I observe, with great satisfaction, the laws which you have passed for the preservation and improvement of the revenue. No exertions shall be wanting on my part to give them vigour and effect.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"The zeal and liberality with which you have provided for the exigencies of the public service, and the assistance which you have given me to prevent a growing arrear in the expences of my civil list, demand my particular thanks.

"I feel in common with you for the unavoidable burthens of my people.

"The importance of effectually supporting our national credit, after a long and exhausting war, can alone reconcile me to so painful a necessity. I trust, the same consideration will enable my faithful subjects to meet it, as they have uniformly done, with fortitude and patience.

"My

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"The definitive treaty which has been signed with the States General of The United Provinces, and the peace concluded in India, as well as the assurances which I receive from foreign powers, promise the continuance of a general tranquillity.

"I trust, therefore, that, after so laborious a session, it will not be found necessary to call you again together at a very early period.

"Many important objects, with respect to our trade and commerce, which could not now be provided for, will naturally require your attention after the recess; and such regulations will, I trust, be framed, after a full investigation, as shall be found best calculated to promote the wealth and prosperity of all the parts of the empire."

And afterwards the Lord Chancellor, by his Majesty's command, said:

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

It is his Majesty's royal will and pleasure that this Parliament be prorogued to Tuesday the 26th day of October next, to be then here holden; and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Tuesday the 26th day of October next.

Extract from "The Report of the Commissioners" appointed by the King of France to enquire into the Merits of Animal Magnetism as a Cure for Disorders. A new Discovery.

DR. Mesmer, a German physician, having, within the course of a few years, amassed large sums at Paris by pretending to cure diseases by animal magnetism, the King of France named a commission, consisting of four of the first physicians in Paris, and five of the most celebrated members of the Academy of Sciences, to enquire into the truth of these cures.

The report of the Gentlemen is now before us: they begin by giving an account of Dr. Mesmer's doctrine, as given by himself in a "Memoire sur la Decouverte du Magnetisme Animal."

"Animal magnetism is a fluid universally dispersed: it is the mean of a mutual influence betwixt celestial bodies, the earth, and animal bodies,—so continued as to admit of no vacuum—of a subtilty far beyond that of all other bodies whatever—capable of receiving, propagating, and communicating, all the impressions of motion; and susceptible of a flux and reflux.—The animal body is subjected to the influences of this agent, by means of the nerves, which are immediately affected by it. The human body has properties analagous to those of the magnet, it has also poles. The action and virtue of animal magnetism may be communicated from one body to other bodies, either animate or inanimate. It operates at a great distance, without the assistance of any intermediate body; is increased and reflected by mirrors; communicated, propagated, and increased by sound; and may be accumulated, concentrated, and transported. Though the fluid itself is universal, yet all animated bodies are not alike affected by it. On the contrary, there are some, though but very few in number, whose presence destroys all the effects of this fluid on other bodies.

"Animal magnetism cures nervous disorders immediately, and other disorders mediately. It assists and perfects the action of physic, provokes and directs salutary crises, brings the physician acquainted with every circumstance of every disorder of every person of every age, is never attended with bad consequences, and is, in short, an universal means of curing and preserving mankind." This is the Doctor's theory.

The Commissioners then tell us, that they repaired to the house of Mr. Deslon, who admits all Dr. Mesmer's principles, and performs cures after the same manner. He accordingly read them a paper, stating that there is but one nature, one disease, and one cure, which cure is animal magnetism. He then engaged, 1. To prove the existence of animal magnetism; 2. To communicate what he knew on the subject; and 3. To prove the utility of the discovery of animal magnetism in the cure of diseases. The Commissioners accordingly began their process by attending in the common room where patients are magnetised.

The apparatus in use, in the common magnetic room, consists of a circular platform, made of oak, and raised about a foot and a half from the ground. This platform is called the baquet; at the top of it there are a number of holes, in which there are iron rods with moveable joints for the purpose of applying them to any part of the body. The patients are formed into a circle round the platform, and each touches his iron rod, which he can apply to any part of his body he pleases; they are joined to one another by a cord passed round their bodies, and intended to increase the effect by communication. In the corner of the room is a piano forte, on which different airs, sometimes accompanied with a song, are played. Each of the persons who magnetise holds an iron rod in his hand, ten or twelve feet long. This rod, Mr. Deslon told the Commissioners, is the conductor of magnetism, which is to concentrate it in its point, and render its emanations more sensible. Sound is another conductor, and, in order to communicate the fluid to the piano forte, you need only approach the iron rod to it; the person who plays also furnishes some magnetism, which is transmitted to the patients, who are near, by sounds.

The interior part of the platform is so composed as to concentrate the magnetism in it; it is the great reservoir, from whence it diffuses itself by the branches of iron plunged in it. The Committee took care to satisfy themselves, by means of an electrometer, and an iron needle not touched with a magnet, that there was no magnet concealed, nor any electricity.

The patients receive the magnetical influx in all the following ways, i. e. by the iron, the cord, and the sound of the piano. They are also directly magnetised by the Doctor's finger, and the rod held in his hand. This is carried about the face, head, or diseased parts, always observing the direction of the poles. But they are chiefly magnetised by the application of the hands, and the pressure of the fingers on the hypochondria, and lower regions of the stomach.

The effects on the patients are various; some are not at all affected; others spit, cough, sweat, and feel extraordinary heats in different parts of the body; and many have very strong and extraordinary convulsions. These are catching, so that, when one has them, many more are immediately affected. Nothing can appear more singular than these to a man who sees them for the first time; besides violent screams, tears, laughter, hiccup, and spitting of blood, you see the patients looking out for particular people, smiling to one another, and endeavouring to soften the crisis; but the magnetiser governs them all; for, though apparently in a dose, a look or word from him will wake them, so that it is certain he has a very great command over them. Their convulsions are called crises; many women are affected by them, but very few men.

The Commissioners soon saw that they could do nothing to the purpose in this public way; and they very sensibly determined to make private experiments, the objects of which were, first, to know if there was such a thing as animal magnetism; and, secondly, to discover whether, supposing it to exist, it did any good. For it might exist, and yet do no good; but it could do no good, if it did not exist.

GENT. MAG. December, 1784.

With respect to its existence, nobody can feel or smell it; some, indeed, pretend to see it come out of the finger which conducts it, and to feel its passage when the finger is carried to the face, or cross the hand. But, in the former case, what they feel is the insensible transpiration which may be made visible by the microscope; and, in the second, a degree of heat and cold arising from the different temperatures of the finger and face. As to the smell, if ever there is any, it is only the smell of the heated iron, or that of the fingers. There remain then two ways of trying this remedy, either by its final effects in curing diseases, or by its effects immediately perceptible in the animal economy. Mr. Deslon recommended the former, but the physicians, knowing that accident may often cure diseases where remedies fail, determined to have recourse to the latter as the surest process.

1. They tried it, therefore, first on themselves, and felt nothing.

2. They then magnetised seven of Deslon's patients at Dr. Franklin's at Passy; four felt nothing; and three felt, or affected to feel, a little.

3. They next magnetised several persons in higher life, who could give a rational account of what they felt; and none of these felt any thing that deserves to be mentioned—meaning then to ascertain precisely the effect of imagination in the business.

4. At times they blindfolded some of the common people, and deceived them into thinking themselves magnetised; and at other times they magnetised them, without letting them know they did so. When the imagination was struck, the patients felt something; and, when it was not struck, they felt nothing at all.

5. Having been told that a magnetised tree would produce convulsions, they blindfolded a young man, and said they would lead him towards one. He did feel convulsions; but unluckily they came on when he was moved from the tree, and were strongest when he was at the greatest distance from it. Mr. Deslon said, this was owing to all trees being magnetic: but, if so, every body susceptible of magnetism would fall into convulsions on approaching a tree.

6. One woman, accustomed to feel convulsions from magnetism, felt them when nothing was done to her, owing to the impression that they would come on.

7. Another woman, accustomed to be rendered dumb by her magnetic doctor, was in the same manner rendered dumb by the commissioners; but it is very extraordinary, that this took place only on the bandage, which was at first upon her eyes, being taken off, and on the hand being drawn across the face exactly in the manner it had been drawn when she was magnetised before. The process of her struggling in vain to speak was visible, and lasted a minute; but we see that more

ences than one were to be affected before it could take place.

8. The sense most visibly affected is the sight. A woman, just come out of a crisis at Mr. Diston's, happening to catch the eye of one of his pupils who magnetised her, was fixed by it for three quarters of an hour. She could not get rid of this look for some time, but had it constantly before her for three days, sleeping and waking.

9. Imagination will make a crisis go off. A woman in convulsions, who was told she should no longer be magnetised, immediately recovered, though the operation went on as before.

From these facts the Commissaries reason thus:

10. It being proved that imagination acts in the private process, it will act more forcibly still in the public one; besides, the operator sometimes pressed strongly, and for a length of time, on different parts with his hands. The hypochondria and the pit of the stomach are the parts most commonly compressed; and it is certain in women, that by the pressure of the hypochondria the ovaries may be affected, &c. &c.

11. The facility with which emotions of the mind produce emotions of the body, and the sympathy by which convulsions are communicated from one to many, is notorious from several instances. Not to speak of general phenomena, such as panics, the uniform courage of an army, a general disposition to rebel, &c. &c. Marechal Vilarz tells us a curious story of a very sensible man in the Convent, who turned prophet on being spoken to by a prophetess, and conceived that from his union with her the Messiah was to come. In the year 1780, sixty girls, who were at sacrament at St. Roche's, caught convulsions from each other, and the accident frequently returned.

12. Finally, the touch, imitation, and imagination, are the three great causes of the effects attributed to magnetism. Mr. Diston seems to acknowledge the latter; but the Committee cannot agree with him, that so dangerous a remedy ought to be employed; for convulsions are a strong disorder in themselves, and, if suffered to be communicated in this manner, may extend to a whole city.

An authentic Copy of DR. JOHNSON'S WILL, extracted from the Prerogative Court of Canterbury.

IN the Name of God, Amen. I SAMUEL JOHNSON, being in full possession of my faculties, but fearing this night may put an end to my life, do ordain this my last will and testament. I bequeath to God a soul polluted with many sins, but I hope purified by repentance, and I trust redeemed by Jesus Christ. I leave 750l. in the hands of Bennet Langton, Esq. 300l. in the hands of Mr. Barclay and Mr. Perkins, brewers; 150l. in the hands of Dr. Percy, Bishop of Eromore;

1,000l. 3. per cent. annuities in the public funds, and 100l. now lying by me in ready money; all these beforementioned sums and property I leave, I say, to Sir Joshua Reynolds, Sir John Hawkins, and Doctor William Scott, of Doctors Commons, in trust for the following uses; that is to say, to pay to the representative of the late William Innys, bookseller, in St. Paul's Church-yard, the sum of 200l. to Mrs. White, my female servant, 100l. stock in the three per cent. annuities; the rest of the aforesaid sums of money and property, together with my books, plate, and household furniture, I leave to the beforementioned Sir Joshua Reynolds, Sir John Hawkins, and Doctor William Scott, also in trust, to be applied, after paying my debts, to the use of Francis Barber, my man servant, a negro, in such manner as they shall judge most fit and available to his benefit. And I appoint the aforesaid Sir Joshua Reynolds, Sir John Hawkins, and Doctor William Scott, sole executors of this my last will and testaments hereby revoking all former wills and testaments whatsoever. In witness whereof I hereunto subscribe my name, and affix my seal, this eighth day of December, 1784.

Signed, sealed, published, declared, and delivered, by the said testator, as, his last will and testament, in the presence of us, the word was being first inserted in the opposite page.

GEORGE STRANAE.

JOHN DES MOULINS.

BY way of codicil to my last will and testament, I Samuel Johnson give, devise, and bequeath, my messuage or tenement, situate at Lichfield, in the county of Stafford, with the appurtenances, in the tenure or occupation of Mrs. Bond, of Lichfield aforesaid, or of Mr. Hinchman, her under-tenant, to my executors, in trust, to sell and dispose of the same; and the money arising from such sale I give and bequeath as follows, viz. to Thomas and Benjamin, the sons of Fisher Johnson, late of Leicester, and ——— Whiting, daughter of Thomas Johnson, late of Coventry, and the grand daughter of the said Thomas Johnson, one full and equal fourth part each; but, in case there shall be more grand daughters than one of the said Thomas Johnson living at the time of my decease, I give and bequeath the part or share of that one to, and equally between, such grand daughters. I give and bequeath to the Rev. Mr. Rogers of Barkley, near Frome, in the county of Somerset, the sum of 100l. requesting him to apply the same towards the maintenance of Elizabeth Henre, a lunatic. I also give and bequeath to my godchildren, the son and daughter of Mauritius Low, painter, each of them 100l. of my stock in the three per cent. consolidated annuities, to be applied and disposed of, by and at the discretion of my executors, in the education or settlement in the world of my said legacies. Also, I give and bequeath to Sir John Hawkins, one of my executors, the Annales Ecclesiastici of Baronius, and Hollinshed's and Stowe's Chronicle, and also an octavo Common Prayer Book; to Bennet Langton, Esq. I give and bequeath my Polyglott Bible; to Sir Joshua Reynolds my great French Dictionary, by Martinere, and my own copy of my Folio English Dictionary of the last revision; to Doctor William Scott, one of my Executors, the Dictionnaire de Commerce, and Lectius's edition of the Greek Poets; to Mr. Windham, Poetæ Græci Heroici per Henricum Stephanum; to the Rev. Mr. Strahan, Vicar of Islington, in the county of Middlesex, Mill's Greek Testament, Beza's Greek Testament by Stephens, all my Latin Bibles, and my Greek Bible by Wechelius; to Dr. Heberden, Dr. Brocklesby, Dr. Butler, Mr. Cruikshanks the Surgeon who attended me, Mr. Holder my Apothecary, Gerard Hamilton Esq. Mrs. Gardiner, of Snow-hill, Mrs. Frances Reynolds, Mr. Houle, and the Rev. Mr. Houle his son, each a book at their election, to keep as a token of remembrance. I also give and bequeath to Mr. John Des Moulins 200l. consolidated three per cent. annuities; and to Mr. Saffres, the Italian Master, the sum of 5l. to be laid out in books of piety for his own use. And whereas the said Bennet Langton hath agreed, in consideration of the sum of 750l. mentioned in my Will to be in his hands, to grant and secure an annuity of 70l. payable during the life of me, and my servant Francis Barber, and the life of the survivor of us, to Mr. George Stubbs, in trust for us; my mind and will is, that, in case of my decease before the said agreement shall be perfected, the said sum 750l. and the bond for securing the said sum, shall go to the said Francis Barber. And I hereby give and bequeath to him the same in lieu of the bequest in his favour contained in my said Will. And I hereby empower my said executors to deduct and retain all expences that shall or may be incurred in the execution of my said Will, or of this Codicil thereto, out of such estate and effects as I shall die possessed of. All the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate and effects, I give and bequeath to my said executors, in trust, for the said Francis Barber, his executors and administrators. Witness my hand and seal, this 9th day of December, 1784.

Signed, sealed, published, declared, and delivered, by the said Samuel Johnson, as and for a Codicil to his last Will and Testament, in the presence of us, who in his presence, and at his request, and also in the presence of each other, have hereto subscribed our names as witnesses.

*John Copley.

Proved at London, with a Codicil, the 16th day of December, 1784, before the Worshipful George Harris, Doctor of Laws, and Surrogate, by the oath of Sir Joshua Reynolds, Knight, Sir John Hawkins, Knight, and William Scott, Doctor of Laws, the executors named in the Will, to whom administration was granted, having been first sworn duly to administer.

Dec. 18,	Henry Stevens,	} Deputy Registrars.
1784.	Geo. Gostling,
	John Grene,

For the following CEREMONIAL of Dr. JOHNSON'S Funeral, we are indebted to the kind Communication of Sir JOHN HAWKINS.

Hearse and six.

The Executors, viz. Sir Joshua Reynolds, Sir John Hawkins, and William Scott, LL.D. in a coach and four.

Eight coaches and four, containing the Literary Club, and others of the Doctor's friends, invited by the Executors; viz. Dr. Burney, Mr. Malone, Mr. Stevens, the Rev. Mr. Strahan, Mr. Ryland, Mr. Houle, Dr. Brocklesby, Mr. Cruikshanks, Mr. Nichols, Mr. Low, Mr. Paradise, General Paoli, Count Zenobio, Dr. Butler, Mr. Holder, Mr. Seward, Mr. Metcalf, Mr. Saffres, Mr. Des Moulins, the Rev. Mr. Butt, Dr. Horsley, Dr. Farmer, Dr. Wright [to whom may be added, Mr. Cooke (who was introduced by Dr. Brocklesby), and the Doctor's faithful servant, Francis Barber.]

Two coaches and four, containing the pallbearers, viz. Mr. Burke, Mr. Windham, Sir Charles Bunbury, Sir Joseph Banks, Mr. Colman, and Mr. Langton.

After these followed two mourning coaches and four, filled with gentlemen who, as volunteers, honoured the funeral with their attendance. These were the Rev. Mr. Houle, the Rev. Mr. East, Mr. Henderson, Mr. Mickle, Mr. Sharp, Mr. C. Burney, and Mr. G. Nicol.

Thirteen gentlemen's carriages closed the procession, which began soon after twelve, and reached the Abbey a little before one.

The corpse was met at the West door by the Prebendaries in their surplices and doctors' hoods; and the officers of the church, and attendants on the funeral, were then marshalled in the following order.

Two Vergers.

The Rev. Mr. Strahan The Rev. Mr. Butt.
THE BODY.

Sir Joshua Reynolds,
as chief mourner, and an Executor.
Sir John Hawkins and Dr. Scott, as executors.

The rest two and two.

The body then proceeded to the fourth cross, and, in view of the three executors, was deposited by the side of Mr. Garrick, with the feet opposite to the monument of Shakespeare.

FORBIGN

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

The war between the Emperor and the Dutch Republic, that has for some time past threatened the peace of Europe, begins now no longer to be dreaded. Those who have attentively marked the conduct of the Emperor since his exaltation to the Imperial Dignity, have beheld with great satisfaction his views directed to advance the glory of his empire, not by kindling the flames of war, and increasing the miseries of mankind, but by nobler and far more laudable pursuits, the extension of commerce, and the cultivation of useful arts.

His Imperial Majesty began his reign by securing his frontiers from the inroads of the Poles on one side, and from the encroachments of the Turks on the other; and, having accomplished these great objects without war, he next turned his thoughts to the improvement of his civil government, by encouraging liberal, and abolishing useles and burdensome institutions; reforming abuses, cherishing by his example sentiments of moderation, and eradicating as much as was possible that baneful spirit of intolerance that generally prevailed among the most enlightened part of his subjects. These prejudices in a great measure subdued, he saw nothing more wanting to render his people great and happy, than to introduce among them a spirit of industry and emulation; a desire of outdoing their neighbours in the cultivation of their soil, in their fabrics, and the perfection of their manufactures, and above all of attending to the enlargement of their marine, of which he every day saw more and more the importance.

These have hitherto been the leading features of his Imperial Majesty's reign; and it is manifestly in prosecution of this last part of his plan of reform, that the dormant claim of the navigation of the Scheldt has been lately revived.

Seeing, as he did, the principal nations round him tired of war, and earnestly desirous of maintaining peace; and seeing at the same time the feeble state of the Republic of Holland, deserted by her old and firm allies, and having no solid dependence on her new friends, divided among themselves, and incapable of making any effectual resistance; in this abject state of humiliation, it was natural for a wise Prince to endeavour to regain by pacific means what his predecessors in the empire had in ages past lost by bloody and unsuccessful wars. He therefore seized this critical moment to prefer his claim to the free navigation of the Scheldt; and he did it with a firmness which marks his character, and which left his opponents no time to deliberate. His demand was peremptory, and a refusal was to be considered as a declaration of war. Such was the origin of the present disputes: but the subsequent measures have proved, that the wisest plans are frequently defeated by the simplest means. It could hardly have been imagined that their High Mightinesses in their present situation would have braved the whole Imperial power, and, instead of obedience would have cast the first stone: but so it has happened; and this unexpected check has given time for cool reflection—The prize and the purchase will bear no comparison;—and his Imperial Majesty is too wise and too virtuous a prince to involve his empire, and of course all Europe, in a war, by which only a very small part of his subjects can receive any immediate advantage. His Majesty will however find his account in the enterprise. He will throw off the fetters that have long circumscribed the commerce of his subjects, and open to them the free navigation of the ocean to every part of the world. He will not be denied by pacific means the freedom of trading to the East and West Indies, from which his subjects had long been restricted by former treaties; and he will no doubt make the most of those ports, which he is in possession of to improve and enlarge his marine. Such, it is presumed, will be the issue of the present contest, as every state in Europe is interested to prevent a war, and none more than his Imperial Majesty.

Versailles, Dec. 12. The Emperor's answer is at length arrived; and, to the great joy of the friends of mankind, demonstrates a disposition for peace. This answer was brought hither by the ambassador Comte de Mercy.

Paris, Dec. 20. Carriers are daily arriving from Vienna, London, the Hague, and Berlin; those, who pretend to be informed by the proceedings of our cabinet, say, that the proposals for a compromise of the differences subsisting between the court of Vienna and the Republic, are accepted.

Vienna, Dec. 16. The King of Prussia has given notice to the princes of the empire, that he shall look upon it as an act of hostility on their parts, if they give permission to the Austrian troops to pass through their dominions, in their way to the borders of the Scheldt. This occasions great embarrassment.

Paris, Dec. 12. A stranger arrived last night at the hotel of Count de Mercy, the Imperial ambassador, who, it is undoubtedly true, was no other than the very Emperor Joseph himself. The purpose of his visit, says the writer, is obvious—'tis to prevent the signing the treaty now on the tapis from taking place. He has already had two conferences; and his stay will be short, as he is hourly expected at Brussels.

Warsaw, Oct. 27. The number of Nuncios, assembled at the Dyet of Grodno, amount to 128. The most important deliberations are on the following subjects, viz. 1. The regulations of the rights of the Dissidents. 2. The most exact determination of the expences of the Republic. 3. The arrangement of the limits with Austria, Russia, and Prussia.

Prussia. 3. A sketch of a new code of laws. 5. The exemption of the legislative power of the permanent council. 6. A regulation in favour of the committee of the Republic as well as that of the city of Dantzic. 7. The relief of the expelled Jews. 8. Alliances to regulate with foreign powers. 9. The affairs of the Duchy of Courland.

Vienna, Dec. 2. The late revolt of the Vallachians has thrown the neighbouring States into the greatest confusion. It is now some months since 400 of these people refused to work for their chiefs, and wanted to serve under the Emperor. His Imperial Majesty would not except their services; whereupon about 13,000 of them assembled, and have committed the greatest outrages on their nobles, having impaled some of their bailiffs, broke the arms and legs of others, and set fire to their houses: these ruffians have plundered and set fire to all the gentlemen's seats in the road, except those belonging to the Emperor. The damage done at Count Palby's castle is valued at 20,000 florins. Count de Fancy was obliged to make his escape from his castle in the uniform of one of his Hussars, to avoid the cruel death they had prepared for him. The rebels were no sooner informed of his escape than they set fire to his village. In another village they set fire to, they threw a young lady of sixteen into the flames, because they could not find her father. These misguided people do not seem to be at all displeased with the Emperor, but only with their own nobility. Baron Joseph de Torozkay was obliged to leave all he had to their mercy, and arrived at Colofwar with his wife and children. All the Counts, Barons, and most of the gentry, have left their estates, and retired to the towns.

By the latest accounts from Hormstadt, the rebels have agreed to a cessation of arms, on three conditions; first, a pardon; 2dly, better treatment from their superiors; 3dly, a freedom from vassalage; these granted, they proposed to separate, and return to their respective homes.

Brussels, Dec. 10. The important affairs of the state do not so wholly engross the attention of his Imperial Majesty, as to make him unmindful of his favorite object, the useful reform of religious houses. A circular letter is just sent to all the superiors of the mendicant friars in the Austrian Netherlands, enjoining them to give an account of all their convents, the names, ages, and functions of every individual in each; of the produce arising from alms; and an absolute prohibition from admitting novices, without the express consent of the governor.

ADVICES FROM THE EAST INDIES.

By the last packet from India many interesting advices have been received; but those that have been made public partake more of private than of public information. The dispatches from General Hastings have found their way only to those who have access to the cabinet, and to the secret committee of proprietors; but with the calamitous sufferings of those unhappy men who were prisoners to Tipoo Saib, their friends are now made fully acquainted.

The unfortunate captives at Bednore, whom the brave General Matthews was by superior numbers obliged to surrender on honourable terms of capitulation, were with himself most treacherously betrayed, and exposed to miseries and insults more grievous than even death itself. Being suffered to march out of the fort with drums beating and colours flying, in the front of which they were to lay down their arms, they instantly found themselves surrounded by three or four battalions of Sepoys with bayonets fixed, who, in direct violation of the articles of capitulation, made prisoners of the whole garrison, stripping them of their money and whatever they had of value, and confining them in chains, with a scanty allowance of rice and water for their subsistence. In this wretched situation they remained for several days, and when it became absolutely necessary to remove them up the country, they were chained in pairs, and marched during the scorching heat at the rate of 20 or 25 miles a day, without the least regard to those who were weak or ill; so that several officers as well as common men fell dead on the road with their burdens on their backs. When they halted to eat, it was in the open sun; nor were they suffered to stop to drink without a stroke on the back to quicken their draught. After 11 days painful march, linked man to man, and obliged to do all offices together, they at length arrived at their destined prisons, where they had their rusty irons knocked off from their wrists, and hoped to be released from chains, but to their mortifications were loaded with others ten times heavier on their legs.

In this deplorable manner they were obliged to lie on the bare ground, with nothing to subsist on but black rice and bad water. "Only picture to yourself, says Mr. Hubbard, secretary to General Matthews, the truly deplorable situation we were in, bearing the oppressive length of rude heavy irons, with all the horrors of a dungeon to dread. No relief if attacked by sickness; our bed the cold ground, with rats and other vermin in abundance; our fare coarse rice and water, and subject to the insults of black rascally Sepoys, who were continually tantalizing us with false reports, and adding to our distresses by brutal usage."

The Nabob, says the same writer, before we set out, had sent for the general and all the captains and principal officers, as we thought, to have better treatment, among whom a few subalterns squeezed themselves; but those were all privately murdered or publicly put to death. The general, who was confined at Seringapatam, Hyder's capital, was secretly poisoned, as were all those captains, town major, two commissaries, the pay-master, and all who went from us. And the general's brother, and a brave lieutenant, who accompanied him, were taken out of their beds, and had their throats cut. When the assassins came to administer the poison (composed of the milk of the cocoa-nut bush) they peremptorily persisted in refusing it, and it was by violence that it was forced down their throats. No prayers nor entreaties could prevail on the ruffians to stay the execution till further orders could be procured from the Nabob, but all expired together in the greatest agonies. This writer adds, that poor Mrs. Matthews is insane for the loss of her husband.

Another writer says, that previous to his capture the general had secured a large property which his lady had taken with her out of the reach of the Nabob; to make himself master of which, he had caused letters to be written in the name of the general, expressing his warmest acknowledgement for the kindness with which he was treated, and earnestly inviting her to come to him, with whom she might remain, as he was made to say, in perfect security. Those letters the general was obliged to sign; but failing in their effects, he then had recourse to threats, and at length had the brutality to order his threats to be carried, as above, into execution. The above particulars are all confirmed in other advices from Bombay and Madras.

But it was not against Tippoo Saib only, that the British prisoners had reason to complain. A vindictive proposition against the English, dishonourable to the character of a commander in chief, had determined M. Suffrein to retaliate upon the British prisoners in India the miseries which the French prisoners had suffered in America. The following extracts from authentic letters will justify the severity of this remark. The officers and sailors of the Hannibal having been landed at Cuddalore, though there were good accommodations for them in the fort, and plenty of vessels to carry them, according to the instructions of the French ministry, to the Mauritius, were surrendered to the troops of the Nabob. put in irons, and marched two by two without distinction to Chillambram, where they were fed on rice and water, and punished with stripes at the discretion of the lowest havildar.

In this situation the commissioned officers took occasion, in a letter directed to M. Suffrein, to complain of the rigour with which they were treated, sixty of them indiscriminately crowded into a miserable hole depending on the precarious supply of an arbitrary man; witnesses to scenes shocking to humanity, seamen expiring in the most wretched manner merely for want of assistance, and earnestly imploring relief.

To these remonstrances the answer was to this effect, "That it was Messrs. Hughes, Macartney, and Coote, they had to thank; had they listened to the proposals made by M. Duchemin and himself for a cartel, they would not have been at Chillambram, nor would he have been under the disagreeable necessity of placing them where they might incur the risque of being ill treated."

To a like remonstrance from Mr. Carthew lieutenant of the Hannibal, M. Suffrein more clearly explained himself. "It was never my intention," says he, "that the prisoners should be fed on rice and water—" "I was too much affected on firing at New York, 300 Frenchmen taken at the commencement of the war, crowded into a prison-ship, and dying of an epidemical diseases ever to imitate the example. Messrs Hughes, Coote, and Macartney, have to answer to God and their nation for the lives of men whom they cause miserably perish." Such were the evasive answers of M. Suffrein. How different in character from the amiable Matthews!

WEST INDIA ADVICES.

From Granada, that on the 2d of September they had a heavy fall of rain, accompanied with dreadful thunder and lightning, which set fire to the flag-staff in Fort Frederick, and the flames reaching the powder magazine, the barrels blew up with a terrible explosion.

A fleet of Spanish ships with troops on board were lately seen steering to the Mosquito shore, in order to drive out the British settlers, and to take possession of the settlement in the name of the K. of Spain, as these settlers were chiefly loyalists, their case is truly pitiable. Driven from their own country, they had sought an asylum where they thought never to have been disturbed, and where they had begun to cultivate a fruitful soil, that promised fair to recompense their labour; but should they now be driven out, there is hardly a spot upon earth where they can fix so much to their own advantage, and that of the parent state. The news from St Vincent's is exceedingly unpleasant; the Caribbees are in arms, and very likely to give as much trouble as in the year 1773, when they gave such a terror to the planters throughout the island; the garrison in the island is pretty strong, and as they have hitherto confined themselves to the mountains in the interior parts of the settlement, every means is taken to prevent them falling suddenly upon the inhabitants.

ADVICES FROM AMERICAN PROVINCES.

Boston, Oct. 20. A gentleman at New-York, excited by curiosity, made a journey lately to Acquakanooh, the residence of people known in this country by the name of Shaking Quakers. This congregation consists at present of about 90 persons under the care of a farmer at the place above-above-mentioned. When it happens that a profelyte is made; he is advised to convert his entire property into money, and deposit the same with the farmer, who engages to furnish a plentiful supply of provisions and such other accommodation as may be necessary: This essential preliminary settled, the pupils fall a shaking in what manner is most agreeable to them. Our correspondent was astonished at the dexterity with which they performed their parts; one woman, in particular, was such an adept as to be able to turn round on her heel a considerable time so swiftly, that it was somewhat difficult to discriminate the object. They are extremely averse to enter into conversation upon the principles of their novel and apparently absurd worship, but content themselves with declaring that they have all been very great sinners, and therefore it is that they mortify themselves by painful exercises.

From the complexion of the new members chosen for the ensuing Congress, we are convinced that a heavy duty will be laid on all merchandize imported here in British bottoms; and that those already laid on goods by our ships will be greatly lessened, or wholly taken off.

Philadelphia, Nov. 30. The House of Assembly for the province of Pennsylvania broke up abruptly without adjournment. The introduction of a bill for repealing the Test Act of 1777, by which act near one-half of the most opulent inhabitants of the province were deprived of the rights of citizens, and were by this act to be restored, had given great offence to the patriots, who contended, that it were contrary to the dictates of reason to allow those who in the day of trial had refused to enroll their names among the defenders of their country, to enjoy all the benefits and advantages of the late Glorious Revolution in common with those who had sacrificed every thing that was dear and valuable to purchase that invaluable blessing. On the other side it was said, that the constitution of the state, humanity, policy, and the principles of free government, all concurred in favour of a revision of the Test Laws, by which all those who were able would be restored to the capacity of embracing and supporting just and equal government as by law established; that the principle of liberty when properly felt inspires universal benevolence, and operates in unison with the spirit of Christianity, which breathes peace on earth and good-will to all men.

This reasoning, however, had no effect on the minority, who, impressed with a sense of the important consequences of present measures, and farther confirmed by the proceedings on the petition of Dr. Wm. Smith and the trustees of the College Academy and charitable school of Philadelphia, and that an insidious petition from the late proprietors, written with an apparent design to reconcile the minds of the people to the restoration of their property, if not to place the government again in their hands, had been respectfully noticed in the House and committed; observing likewise a mysterious persistence in the majority, and that they were no longer open to conviction; and recollecting at the same time that the constitution in desperate cases had provided a check, by a secession; they should therefore be wanting, they said, in respect to the good people of the state, if they did not adopt every constitutional measure to prevent evils which they foresaw, but could no otherwise remedy. They therefore left it to the community at large to determine, to whose impropriety of conduct is imputable this premature dissolution of the legislature. The Seceders were in number nineteen, who rose from their seats, and broke up the House, by rushing out of the Assembly Room in the most disorderly manner.

The petitions alluded to above, were;

1. A petition from the original owners of the college, &c. to be re-inflated in their just rights.
2. A petition from the descendants of Sir Wm. Penn, to be allowed a compensation for their territorial rights.

ADVICES FROM IRELAND.

Dublin, Dec. 1. The Attorney-General moved the Court of King's Bench, for a rule against three Magistrates of the county of Leitrim, for usurping a power contrary to law, as follows, viz.

The High Sheriff, in consequence of a requisition made to him, advertised a county meeting to choose Delegates to represent the county in national Congress; but on the day of meeting the Sheriff addressed the gentlemen, told them what they were about to do was illegal, and dissolved the meeting. Upon which the three gentlemen applied against, Justices of the Peace, took upon themselves to re-assemble the gentlemen of the county; and one of them took the chair, and proceeded to, and did elect Delegates to send to Congress. A conditional rule was granted.

Dublin, Nov. 30. Yesterday the High Sheriff of the county of Dublin received his sentence from the Court of King's Bench, to be imprisoned for one week, and to pay a fine of five marks for a similar offence.

Drogheda, Nov. 20. A considerable body of inhabitants having possessed themselves of the castle of Lagare, in the county of Meath, with an intention to prevent the High Sheriff from getting possession of the lands adjoining; it was found necessary to apply to the commanding-officer of the Artillery Corps belonging to the Drogheda Association, for assistance to dislodge them; they had already resisted the civil power, and set at defiance the Volunteers with small arms:

but

but, on seeing the Artillery corps take possession of a rising ground which commanded the castle, they thought proper to make their escape from the rear of the castle, without a gun being fired on either side. For this signal service the High Sheriff returned public thanks to the Artillery company, and gave a handsome entertainment to the officers who commanded it.

The smuggling of live cattle to the Continent is commenced in this kingdom; a vessel, supposed to be a smuggler, was lately chased into a little port, near the Old Head of Kinsale, by one of his Majesty's ships on that station, when her cargo turned out, instead of tea, brandy, &c. to be sheep, calves, and wool, for Normandy.

ADVICES FROM SCOTLAND.

Glasgow, Dec. 8. Four of the banditti, who have lately agreed to share the plunder of the four roads leading to this city, were lately secured by means of a blacksmith, a carter, and a mastiff dog. The villains, under pretence of being weary travellers, had gained admittance into the blacksmith's house, where they began without ceremony to pick the locks; and on being reprimanded by the blacksmith, they knocked him down; but the man recovering, and getting to the door, whistled his dog, and the carter fortunately hearing the cries of the family came seasonably to assist; and being soon reinforced by the neighbours, they all together overpowered the villains, bound, and secured them till a warrant was procured for committing them to prison. Soon after three soldiers were apprehended, and committed on a strong suspicion of being part of the same gang.

Edinburgh, Nov. 20. A servant of Mr. Penman of Easter Murden, near Kelso, in a fit of phrenzy, murdered his master's daughter, and beat and abused the mother and another child in a most cruel manner. On his examination, he said, the devil had been busy with him for some time, and he had twice intended to make away with himself, but had been prevented by a great black dog.

Edinburgh, Nov. 29. The commissioners of supply for this country have this day determined two appeals on the late window act in favour of the subject. One on the appeal of Lord Adam Gordon, who, being charged for his house of Preston-hall, tho' inhabited by no living creature, refused to pay. It was contended, that the only means of ascertaining whether houses were inhabited or not, was by their being furnished, which has invariably been the case with Preston-hall, and which till lately has been inhabited by servants who had the care of the same; and who, though removed by Lord Adam to an out-house adjoining, to elude the duty, still continued to light the fires, and open the windows, and air the house as heretofore. This, the surveyor contended, was sufficient in the eye of the law to subject Lord Adam to the spirit of the act, and quoted several decisions of the English Judges in point. In reply it was urged, that those decisions respected only the former act, but did by no means apply to the new one; which being imposed by way of commutation for duties remitted on tea, it would be absurd to be taxed for consuming tea, where no tea was ever drank. The commissioners were unanimous in their opinion, that Lord Adam was not taxable.

The other decision was in favour of Mr. Alvas, steward to the Duke of Buccleugh, who lived in a house belonging to the Duke. And as his Grace already paid for two houses, one in England, and another in Scotland, which was all the law required, it would be unjust to charge him with a third. The surveyor insisted, that, though the house was the Duke's, the furniture belonged to Mr. Alvas, and if that house was exempted, by parity of reasoning every house belonging to his Grace's estate might plead the same exemption. To which it was replied, that undoubtedly every house occupied by his Grace's actual servants was entitled to the same exemption; and so thought the commissioners.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Chester, Dec. 12. A thermometer exposed to the north aspect in a low situation in this city, on Sunday the 12th inst. at midnight, the mercury was at 10 degrees and a half, which was 21 degrees and a half below the freezing point. On Monday the 13th, at noon, it stood at 25 degrees.

At Clayhill in Kent, the thermometer about the middle of the Hill, at six in the evening of the 12th, was as low as 9 degrees and a half. At midnight, the thermometer was as low as 6 degrees near the top of the Hill. N. B. Clayhill is not remarkable for its height. It rises gradually from the Ravensbrook, near Bromley, on the East; and from Beckenham Brook on the West; and the summit is nearly the midway between both.

Newcastle, Dec. 18. The storm, which began on Monday forenoon, has done incredible damage to many of the stock farmers in the neighbourhood of Carlisle; several hundreds of black cattle and sheep have perished, and many more are missing.

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE.

Nov. 27.

The House of Mr. Powell of Buckingham street was broke open. The family was in the country, and only a young woman left in town, to take care of the house, who having a sweet-heart who occasionally slept in it for greater security, the fellow with others formed a plan for robbing it, and Saturday night was the time for carrying it into execution.—There were four of them concerned.

Anderson

Anderson the sweet-heart, Flint an old offender, one Simmons whom they drew in, and another, name unknown. Simmons knocked at the door with a letter, and Flint and the other rushed in; threw the maid down, and secured the door, while Anderson waited to receive the booty. Simmons stood over the maid, while Flint and his accomplices proceeded to rifle the house; but fortunately an acquaintance calling on the maid, and not getting ready admittance, suspected something amiss, and looking through a crevice in the window perceived a man with pistols guarding the maid. The alarm being given, Flint and the other made their escapes; but the door being secured against Simmons, and he swearing he would murder the maid if she did not conceal him, she placed him under a bed, but when a constable was brought, instantly delivered him up. Anderson was then taken with some goods upon him, and information was given of the rest.

Nov. 29.

The Prince of Wales sent a polite message to Gen. Sloper the evening before his departure (see p. 872) begging to see him at Carleton-House. The general waited on the Prince accordingly, when his Royal Highness congratulated him on his appointment, wished him a happy voyage, and presented him with an elegant gold-mounted sword, which he begged the General to wear as a mark of his esteem and friendship.

On Tuesday last, being St. Andrew's day, the Royal Society held their anniversary meeting at their apartments in Somerset-place, in the Strand, when the president, Sir Joseph Banks, Bart. in the name of the Society, presented the Gold medal (called Sir Godfrey Copley's) to Dr. Edward Waring, for his Paper, "on the Summation of Series, whose general Term (Z) is a determinate fraction of the distance from the first term of the Series." The President on this occasion delivered a short and elegant Speech on the subjects contained in Dr. Waring's paper.

Afterwards the Society proceeded to the choice of the Council and Officers for the ensuing year, when, on examining the ballots, it appeared that the following gentlemen were elected:

Of the old Council, Sir Jos. Banks, Bt. Tho. Aſtle, Esq. Ch. Blagden, M. D. Con. John Ld. Mulgrave; Sir Wm. Mulgrave, Bt. Henry Visc. Palmerston; Jos. Planta, Esq. Geo. John Earl Spencer; Wm. Watson, M. D. Sam. Wegg, Esq.

Of the new Council, Alex. Aubert, Esq. Henry Cavendish, Esq. John Hunter, Esq. Rd. Price Kirwan, Esq. Ch. Visc. Mahon; Rev. Rd. Price, LL. D. Maj. Gen. Wm. Roy; Mr. Jn. Smeaton; Mr. Wm. Wales; Rev. Francis Wollaston, LL. B.

And the officers were, Sir Jos. Banks, President; Ch. Blagden, M. D. Jos. Planta, Esq. Secretaries; Samuel Wegg, Esq. Treasurer.

Gen. T. MAO. December, 1784.

Afterwards the Members of the Society dined together as usual at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, in the Strand.

Nov. 30.

Mr. Blanchard having arrived at the Rhe-darium in Park-street Grosvenor-square about ten in the morning, the process of filling his balloon began about eleven, and about half past two was completed. The Prince of Wales, the Duke and Dutchess of Devonshire, and a very large party of Ladies and Gentlemen of distinction, were present. Mr. Blanchard and Dr. Jeffries an American Gentleman then took their seats, and the two last cords were held by the Dutchess and another Lady. Dr. Jeffries held a jack with 13 Stripes, and Mr. Blanchard an English ensign, with which they saluted the company at parting: the voyagers had made two attempts to ascend, but came down again; and it was near three in the afternoon, when Mr. Blanchard, by throwing out some ballast and plying his oars, cleared the adjoining buildings, and the balloon pursued its course over the metropolis, at a height which, if the Aero-statist meant it to gratify the curiosity of the town, he could not have regulated the machine to shew it to more advantage. The day was somewhat hazy in the lower regions; the atmosphere was serene at the height of the balloon, the motion of the sails and oars were clearly discernible so as to enable the friends of Mr. Blanchard to decide on the effect they evidently had in accelerating its motion; and in proof that they were right, they mention two small balloons let off the same time with the great one, which soon passed it, though they had neither sails nor oars to increase their speed. These proofs indeed were not adduced in point for the very purpose mentioned; but for another, the direct contrary, namely, to prove that Mr. Blanchard, with his sails and oars, could moderate the motion of his balloon, and had it so much at command that he could make it move faster and slower just as it suited the occasion; certainly a most fortunate discovery.

Dr. Jeffries, in a letter to a friend, gives the following very moderate account of the voyage:

"I write to you far, very far above the clouds: we have had a short, but most noble and enchanting voyage of 21 miles over Shooter's hill, &c. &c. and landed on the banks of the Thames, in the parish of Stone in Kent, within half a mile of Effex. Our motion was very rapid, and all our ballast exhausted."

WEDNESDAY, December 1.

A well-imagined fable appeared in the papers, not perhaps inferior to any of modern invention. A journeyman barber, who had long been jealous of his wife, but not being able to prove any breach of conjugal fidelity; by chance a young man came into his master's shop to be shaved, and, being full of gallantry, bragged of the favours he had received ceived the night before from a fine girl. The description he gave of her person corresponding exactly with that of the barber's wife, he made no more to do but cut the young man's throat.—Moral. This is meant as a caution to young sparks of the town, how they boast of the favours they receive of the fair sex while under the Barber's hands.

Friday 3.

A man much intoxicated with liquor calling for beer at the Red Lion publick house, in Basing-Lane, which the landlord refused to draw, he pulled out a knife, and stabbed him in the belly.

Sunday 5.

A large fleet, upwards of 150, sailed from Yarmouth roads. About four o'clock in the afternoon, a violent storm arose, with heavy rain, which separated the fleet: the gale increasing split all their sails into shivers, so that it was impossible to work the ships or keep them off the land, and many were obliged to cut away their masts. About midnight it blew a perfect hurricane, attended with a very heavy fall of hail and snow, which continued with unremitting fury till Tuesday noon, when it began to abate: but that night it blew again very hard till Wednesday at noon, when the wind became moderate.

Friday 7.

A cause was tried before Ld. Mansfield for the recovery of the value of a balloon burnt in Ld. Foley's garden, (see p. 711.) when a verdict was given for the defendant.

Friday 10.

Being the Anniversary of the Institution of the Royal Academy, a General Assembly of the Academicians was held at the Royal Academy, Somerset-Place, when the following premiums were declared and given, viz. A gold medal to Mr. Thomas Proctor, for the best historical picture in oil colours, the subject taken from Shakspeare's Tempest. A gold medal to Mr. Charles Rossi, for the best model of a bas-relief, the subject Venus conducting Helen to Paris. A gold medal to Mr. George Hatfield, for the best design in architecture, the subject plans, elevations, and sections of a national prison. Four silver medals for drawings of academy figures were given to Mr. Henry Singleton, Mr. John Ramberg, Mr. Alexander Monies, and Mr. Charles Hodges. Two silver medals for models of academy figures were given to Mr. John Alefounder and Mr. Charles Horwell. A silver medal for a drawing of architecture, being the west front with the spire of St. Martin's in the Fields, done from actual measurement, was given to Mr. John Bond.

The medals being all disposed of, the president delivered a most elegant and instructive discourse, of which notice will be taken in some future Magazine; after which the assembly then proceeded to elect the officers for the year ensuing. Sir Joshua Reynolds was elected president. Council: J. B. Cipriani, Esq. J. S. Copley, Esq. Rev. Mr. William Peters, Benjamin West, Esq. John Bacon, Esq. Sir William Chambers, Richard Cosway, Esq. Paul Sandby, Esq. Visitors: John Bacon, Esq. Edward Burch, Esq. Charles Catton, Esq. J. S. Copley, Esq. Benjamin West, Esq. James Barry, Esq. J. Bap. Cipriani, Esq. P. J. De Louthembourg, Esq. Jer. Meyer, Esq.

This day Capt. M'Kenzie was tried at the Old Bailey, for the murder of Kenneth Murray M'Kenzie, at Fort Morea on the Coast of Africa, by lashing to and blowing him from the mouth of a cannon, and found guilty on the clearest evidence; but, in consideration of the vile crew he had to command, and the motinous disposition of the deceased, the jury recommended him for mercy, and he has since had his sentence respited.

By a letter from Newcastle, the fall of snow was so great in that neighbourhood, that all the roads were completely blocked up, till labourers were procured to clear them for passengers, particularly the Great North Road between Felton and Alnwick, and Westward between Harlow-Hill and Hexham; at both of which the labourers were numerous: all trade was at a stand, not a waggon being able to arrive in town for several days: 'Tis added, that at sea the effects of the storms have been dreadful beyond description, all along the Coast being strewed with wrecks, and vessels on ground, so that from every part we hear of nothing but distress; not upon our own coasts only, but on those of the Baltic and the coasts of Flanders and France.

Part of a Letter from Alnwick. "There are 11 vessels on shore betwixt this and Cocket-Island, besides what are foundered, or gone to pieces among the rocks; the lives of the crews of the 11 are providentially saved. There are 15 ashore to the Northward of this, and 30 betwixt the Cocket and Gresswell Point."

At Blythe the English Hero came ashore. The crew, 10 in number, took to their boat, and all perished. They left two boys on board, one of whom went to prayers, and, when the storm abated, was found fast asleep in the cabin as if nothing had happened.

At the above place a poor man going along the Coast, saw a dead body laying, and in a pocket found 13l. in cash, when, taking particular notice of the body, he got it conveyed to the church-yard to be owned by his friends, and put the money into proper hands for their use.

Monday 12.

Came on to be tried before Lord Mansfield, and a Special Jury of London, an action brought by Miss Ann Smith, the daughter of a reputable tradesman at Oxford, against Mr. Adye, the son of a clothier in Gloucestershire, for breach of promise of marriage marriage. The acquaintance between the parties commenced when the defendant was a student at Oxford; and he continued a correspondence, with many promises of marriage, during five years, when he became acquainted with Miss Vines, whom he married. The disappointment affected the young lady so violently (whose character appeared to be irreproachable), that her life was despaired of several months. This fact was proved by Dr. Parsons, of Oxford. The Jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and 4000*l.* damages.

Wednesday 15.

Thomas Wood and George Browne were this day indicted at the Old Bailey for robbing Sir Thomas Davenport and his lady on the highway. They were both positively sworn to by Sir Thomas and his servants. And both as positively sworn to be at home and in their business at the time the robbery was sworn to be committed. The court and jury were unanimous in their verdict, Not Guilty.

Thursday 16.

Came on at the Old Bailey the trial of Count Durore, for firing a pistol loaded with ball at Huxley Sandon, Esq. at the Long-Acre Bagnio, Drury-Lane, when there appearing a flaw in the indictment, he was acquitted. There were several detainers lodged in Newgate against him for debt, which being paid, he was discharged.

Monday 20.

The Sessions at the Old Bailey, which began on the 15th, ended, when sentence of death was passed on 32 capital offenders; 43 were sentenced to be transported; 12 ordered to be kept to hard labour, some of whom to receive the correction of the house; 32 to be whipped and discharged; four to be whipped on the quays; five to be imprisoned in Newgate: and 28 to be discharged by proclamation. The above convicts, with 14 condemned last sessions, now make forty-six, a greater number than ever was known on the annals of Newgate. And, as the number of villainies of every kind encreases every day, surely it must awaken the feelings of our Legislature, to devise some method of suppressing the evil by a thorough reformation of the police of this country. And by devising a more dreadful punishment than death—Suppose, instead of death, they were to be condemned to work the mines for life, would not that deter them?

Wednesday 29.

Were executed the following malefactors, Richard Dodd, and Henry Moore, for sundrey robberies, James Treble, for a highway robbery, Wm Ryan for forging a sea-mans will, Wm. Coombes for returning from transportation, and George Hands, for being concerned with Treble in the above robbery.

Friday 31.

A letter from Lynn says, "We have received the melancholy account of upwards of 100 ships being driven on shore on the Yorkshire coast, during the late storms, and that a great many lives were lost, owing to the darkness of the night, and the heavy squalls of snow and hail, that scarce any boat could get clear of the wrecks.

Advices from Hull speak more favourably, and that many of the ships supposed to have been wrecked have since the storm been brought into their respective parts.

15. Mr. Langdon, to Miss Creswell, dau. of the late Charles C. esq; of the Post-office.

16. Mr. Corbett, of Friday-street, to Miss Rodick, of Wellingborough.

17. N. Collyer, esq; of the first reg. of dragoon guards, to Miss H. Rolfe.

18. By special licence, — Tobin, esq; of Pall-Mall, to Mrs. Macdonald.

19. Rev. Tho. Heberden, eldest son of Dr. H. to Miss Alatheia Hyde Wollaston, 2d dau. of the rev. Francis Wollaston.

DEATHS.

LATELY, Archibald Montgomery, esq; of Kingston, Jamaica. He was unfortunately drowned in attempting to ford Negril river in the parish of Westmorland.

Mr. Raffles, near 40 years one of the principal clerks in the Prerogative Office, Doctor's Commons.

Near Hawkhead, Lancashire, Matthew Jackson, aged 100 years; he was married a little 18 months ago.

At Abingdon, Berks, Mrs. Martha Curtis, in her 80th year.

At Petworth, Lieut. Dugdale, of marines.

At his house near Edenderry, King's County, Ireland, Dr. Richard Prescott, aged 111 years. He was, till the day of his death, able to walk many miles at a time, and even preferred it to riding; he was temperate, and during the course of so long a life enjoyed health uninterrupted.

At Staplehurst, Mr. W. Usborne, aged 85.

At Killarney, in Ireland, the right hon. Sir Henry Aylmer, baron of Balrath. The hon. and rev. John Aylmer, vicar of St. Alban's, Wood-street, is a near relation; we know not whether he is successor to the title.

In an advanced age, at Ferrybridge, Mr. Jeremiah Wainwright, late postmaster there.

At Nice, Capt. King, the companion and friend of the late celebrated Capt. Cook, and the excellent author of the 11th volume of the late Voyages.

Ob. 13. At Tenbury, co. Worc. Mrs. Mary Jeffries, widow, who had attained the age of 106 years, within 10 days. She was born in London, Oct. 12, 1678, and clearly remembered eight sovereigns. She was daughter to Mr. Grant, oculist to Queen Anne; and followed the practice of midwifery at Tenbury upwards of sixty years; and a few years since walked to Burford in Shropshire, and delivered a woman. She retained her faculties to the last, and a few days before her death was remarkably cheerful, amusing her friends with anecdotes about the Revolution, which she well remembered; and enjoyed a good state of health, except that about 50 years ago she was troubled with the colic; when she was advised to smoke tobacco, which she continued to do as long as she lived.

Ob. 28. At Bath, James Frampton, esq; of Moreton, co. Dorset, where his family had been seated before the time of Richard II. He married to his first wife, Mary, sole dau. and heiress of Joseph Houlton, of Farleigh castle, co. Somerset, esq; who died in 1762, and by whom he had the estate at Farleigh, worth 1200l. per annum, which now reverts to the Houltons. His second and surviving wife was Phillis, sole daughter and heiress of Samuel Byam, of Antigua, esq; and relict of Charlton Wollaston, M. D. by whom he has left issue a son, James, born 1773, and a dau. Mary, born 1774. Mr. F. rebuilt his mansion-house at Moreton in 1744, an elegant well-contrived mansion; of which, and of the beautiful monument which he erected to his first lady in the church there, of which he was patron, and which he rebuilt in 1733, engravings may be seen in Mr. Hutchins's Hist. of Dorset, vol. I. p. 148, a work which was eminently indebted to his munificent and friendly patronage.

11. The infant Don Carlos, eldest son of the Prince of Asturias.

18. W. Shew, of Inglewood, Berks, esq.

21. At his vicarage-house, at Finedon, co. Northampton, in the 58th year of his age, of a bilious fever, after a week's illness, the rev. James Affleck, regretted by his numerous family, his parishioners, and all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance.

A few months before, died Mr. Perkins*, organist, and master of the free-school, of that parish, and formerly one of the gentlemen of his Majesty's chapel. The organ at Finedon was built by Bernard Smith, commonly called Father Smith, who also built † those in the Temple church and St Paul's cathedral. We have the pleasure to learn, that the worthy patron has appointed Mr. P.'s daughter, Mrs. Miller, to succeed him, and has presented to the vicarage the rev. Mr. Cave, of Christ Church, Oxford, rector of Great Kibworth, co. Leicester, brother to the late, and uncle to the present, Sir Thomas Cave; and, from his passion for our national antiquities, we hope for the publication of the History of the County of Leicester, which has long been wished.

24. At his seat at Astrop, co. Northamp. John Willes, esq; eldest son of the late Lord Chief Justice Willes. He served many years in Parliament for the boroughs of Aylesbury and Banbury; and by his death the office of Filazer in the Common Pleas for the county of Middlesex becomes vacant.

29. At Camberwell, Mr. T. Smith, surgeon of St. Thomas's hospital.

29. At Enfield, after a lingering and complicated illness, in his 67th year, Mr. John

* Mr. Perkins's sister was wife of the late Dr. Dodd, and his father was a vergier of Durham cathedral, having been a domestic in the family of the rev. Sir John Dolben, one of the prebendaries.

† See Sir John Hawkins's History of Music, IV. 353—355.

Clarembault. His parents took refuge in England on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and his father carried on the profession of a merchant, till, meeting with misfortunes, by the imprudence of an elder son, who went to the East Indies, and died there, he retired with his wife to Enfield, where they both died, and were buried. His other son, the subject of this article, was sent to Leghorn, and afterwards taken into the accounting-house of Mr. Longuet, an eminent French merchant in Crosby-square, with whom he entered into partnership, and from whom he inherited an ample fortune. As this good success was the reward of industry and probity, so in Mr. C.'s hands it became a source of extensive and genuine benevolence, which, like the bounty of heaven, was showered alike on the evil and on the good. His loss will be severely felt, not only in his extensive parish, so burthened with poor, but in many surrounding parishes, whose poor were by it protected, and encouraged to change their situations. He has left one sister, considerably his senior, whose charities are not restrained by the paralytic disorder with which she has been for some time afflicted.

30. At Blackheath, Matthew Swanson, esq; aged 78, formerly a merchant.

At Hints, co. Stafford, aged 84, Mrs. Dorothy Chadwick. She was the grand-daughter of Sir T. Dolman, and lived upon an income of only 60l. per annum, until her 75th year, when, by the death of her brother, she became possessed of a fortune of 1500l. per annum. Her death was occasioned by a candle setting fire to her cap, while she was looking over some papers in a bureau, and in a room by herself. She tore off her cap, but not before the flames had unhappily spread over her; and as it was some time before her servants heard her, and came to her assistance, she was burnt in so dreadful a manner that she died after languishing a few days.

Dec. 2. At Christ Church, near Ipswich, rev. Claudius Fonnereau.

3. At Ludford, Herefordshire, Sir Francis Charlton, bart. formerly treasurer to the General Post Office. The title is extinct.

4. Suddenly, at his house in Brook-street, Grosvenor-square, Mr. Robert Gibley, fishmonger to his Majesty.

Mrs. Mary Howle, aged 95, a daughter of the late rev. Mr. Dutton, of Oxfordshire.

At his house in Grafton-street, William Gale, esq. He had been out in the morning, taking his usual ride, and came home to dress; soon after which he complained that he was ill, and survived but a few minutes.

5. At Sandwich, Kent, in her 90th year, Mrs. Judith Nelson, a widow lady.

6. At Hampton, in her 84th year, Mrs. Hare, relict of the late Bishop of Chichester.

In Coleman-street, aged 76, Mrs. Grisel Bowden, only surviving sister of the late Wm. B. esq; treasurer of St. Thomas's hospital, and a director of the Bank.

7. At Chester, John Lawton, esq; alderman of that city, and had passed the chair.

In his 71st year, at Great Berkhamstead, Herts, John Dorrien, esq;

9. Mrs. Jackson, relict of the late P. J. esq.

8. Mr. Francis, senior alderman of Marlborough, Wilts.

10. Mrs. Jacomb, relict of William J. solicitor of Laurence Pountney-hill.

Miss Rooke, eldest dau. of Lieut. Col. R.

11. At Edinburgh, Miss Mary Grant, dau. of the late Sir L. G. bart.

At the same place, Capt. Hugh Dalrymple.

12. At his house in Highbury-place, James Roberts, esq; solicitor to the city of London.

In his 69th year, Thomas Barclay, esq; a merchant, late of Charterhouse-squ.

12. In an advanced age, at Ashborne, Derbyshire, Brian Hodgson, esq.

13. A little before seven in the evening, without a pang, though long before oppressed with a complication of dreadful maladies, the great and good Dr. SAMUEL JOHNSON, the pride of English literature, and of human nature. Religion has lost her sincerest votary, and her firmest friend; Learning her greatest boast and ornament; Mankind their truest benefactor—their guide to happiness present and eternal. Never till now was the Sophoclean sentence of our sweet bard so aptly applied:

We ne'er shall look upon his like again!

Never on earth did one mortal body encompass such true greatness and such true goodness. The limits of our OBITUARY are too scanty to speak forth half his praise. Yet we may justly boast, that JOHNSON and SYLVANUS URBAN were the friendly companions of each other's life; and that one of his latest literary morsels was intended for our readers. (See p. 892.) This excellent person was born at Lichfield in 1709, where his baptism is recorded in St. Mary's register to have been performed on the 7th of September, and he is styled, "Samuel the son of Michael Johnson, gentleman." His father was a reputable bookseller in Lichfield, as the writings of the son have recorded, and as is well remembered by many now living. The house in which he was born is still remaining in good condition. In the earlier part of life he was an assistant to the famous Anthony Blackwall, in the grammar school of Market Bosworth (this must have been before he was 21 years old, as Blackwell died April 8, 1730.) Mr. Johnson was entered of Pembroke college, Oxford, Oct. 31, 1728; but left the university without taking any degree in the church. The biographer of Garrick fixes the beginning of the year 1735 as the period when he undertook, as a private tutor, to instruct Mr. Garrick and some other youths in the belles lettres. And our volume for the year 1736, p. 360, records him as advertising to board and teach young gentlemen in general the Latin and Greek languages at Edial. In March, 1737, he came to London; where he appears to have met with disappointments pointments which disgusted him with the town; for, in August, we find him desirous of returning again into his native country, to take upon himself the office of master of a charity-school, in Shropshire, then vacant, the salary of which was sixty pounds a year. But the statutes of the school requiring the person who should be elected to be a master of arts, this attempt seems to have been frustrated. A letter of Lord Gower on this occasion may be seen in vol. XLIX. p. 117. In 1740 he began to write the "Debates in the Senate of Lilliput;" and, after producing some poems, translations, and biographical works, which met with a good reception (particularly "London," the "Vanity of Human Wishes," and "The Life of Savage,") he brought forth "Irene," in 1749. This not meeting with the success he expected, he set about his "Dictionary." The execution of this plan cost him the labours of many years; but he was amply repaid by the fame he acquired. During the recess of this stupendous labour, he published his "Rambles." The reputation of these works gained him the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws in the university of Dublin college, which was soon after followed by the same degree from Oxford. To this succeeded his "Idlers." His next publication was that of the "Prince of Abyssinia," a beautiful little novel in the Eastern style, abounding with the most useful and moral maxims, suited to several conditions of life. Of his political works, which followed at distant intervals, the public are more divided about their merits: it is, however, but fair to presume, they were his candid opinions upon the subjects, and, as such, deserving of no censure from the judgement of impartiality. His last undertaking, "The Lives of the British Poets," would alone have been sufficient to immortalize his name amongst his countrymen, as it by far excels any thing executed upon a similar plan by foreigners; and though the critical remarks, in a few instances, incorporate a little too much with political opinions, their general excellence must always give them a deserved celebrity. It is said he was executing a second part of "The Prince of Abyssinia," and was in hopes to have finished it before his death; but, alas! what are the hopes of man! he was cut off from this and every other moral labour, in the 76th year of his age, to the loss of his friends and the world, whose unremitting friend he had ever been. During the last five or six days of his life he saw but few even of his most intimate friends. Every hour, that could be abstracted from his bodily pains and infirmities, was spent in prayer, and the warmest ejaculations; and in this pious, praise-worthy, and exemplary manner, he closed a long life, begun, continued, and ended in virtue. On the 15th, his body was opened, in the presence of some gentlemen of the faculty. The contents of the chest chiefly appeared in a sound state, but the cells and vessels at the extremity of the windpipe (or aspera arteria) were uncommonly enlarged; and the valves at the beginning of the arteries which go from the heart were in some degree ossified. The liver was schirrous, one of the lobes greatly decayed, and several encysted watery tumours found in the abdomen.—The ingenious editor of the "Biographica Dramatica," after bestowing many just encomiums on his genius, says, "it would be the highest injustice, were I not to observe, that nothing but that genius can possibly exceed the extent of his erudition, and it would be adding a greater injury to his still more valuable qualities, were we to stop here, since, together with the ablest Head, he seems possessed of the very best Heart at present existing. Every line, every sentiment, that issues from his pen, tends to the great centre of all his views, the promotion of virtue, religion, and humanity; nor are his actions less pointed towards the same great end. Benevolence, charity, and piety, are the most striking features in his character; and while his writings point out to us what a good man ought to be, his own conduct sets us an example of what he is."

14. At Scarborough, in his 74th year, Mr. Thomas Malling, a ship owner.

17. At Edmonton, Mr. Thomas Auther, lately of Great St. Helen's, insurance-broker.

Advanced in years, at his house in Highgate, George Hayter, esq; one of the Directors of the Bank of England, and brother to the late Lord Bp. of London.

18. At Osborn's hotel, Adelphi, Sir John Chichester, bart. of Youlston, co. Devon, of which county he was high sheriff in 1754; and in which county he diffused the blessings of a liberal fortune with an unsparing hand; his attachment to literature being excelled only by his humanity. He is succeeded in title and estate by his only son, now Sir John Chichester, bart.

20. Rev. Tho. Barnard, fellow of Eton college, brother to the late provost, and vicar of Maple Derham, Oxfordsh.

Mrs. Grignion, relict of the late Mr. T. G. watchmaker, in Great Russell-street.

John Boddington, esq; late secretary to the board of ordnance.

21. Mr. Francis Gentleman, well known a few years ago as an actor and dramatic writer. He was born in York-street, Dublin, Oct. 23, 1728, and received his education in that city, where he was school-fellow with the late Mr. Mossop. At the age of 15, his father purchased him a lieutenancy in the same regiment wherein himself was major; but making an exchange to a new-raised company, he was dismissed the service by his regiment being reduced at the conclusion of the peace in 1748. On this event he indulged his inclination for the stage, and accordingly appeared at Smock-alley, in the character of Aboan in "Oroonoko." Notwithstanding an unconfidential figure, and uncommon timidity, he succeeded beyond his most sanguine expectations; but having some property, and hearing that a legacy had been left him by a relation, he determined to come to London, where he dissipated the little fortune he possessed. He then engaged to perform at the theatre at Bath, thence he went to Edinburgh, and afterwards performed in several companies at Manchester, Liverpool, Chester, and other places. Growing tired of a public life, he settled at Malton, co. York, where he married, and had some expectation of being provided for by the Marquis of Granby, to whom he was recommended by a gentleman who had entertained a friendship for his father. With this hope he removed to London, but soon had the mortification to find all his prospects clouded by the sudden death of his patron. In 1770 he performed at the Haymarket with Foote, and continued with him three seasons, till a time of peculiar embarrassment to the manager. He next engaged at the theatre in Crow-street; but, being afflicted with a rheumatic disorder, he never appeared with any success afterwards; and for the last seven years of his life struggled under sickness and want, to a degree of uncommon misery. He was author of 11 dramatic pieces.

25. In Red-lion-street, Clerkenwell, Mr. Wm. Wildman, formerly an eminent butcher and salesman, and since well known to the gentlemen of the turf. His eldest son was apprenticed to his father's original business; but on his death comes into a considerable fortune. His daughter Theophila, relict of the late Mr. Green, was remarried, in 1781, to John Schreiber, esq; who comes of age early next year.

Mr. URBAN, Settle, Yorksh. Nov. 23.

I T is much to be regretted that the great protoparent of antiquaries did not visit, in his extensive excursions, this part of Craven, in which are many curious Antiquities that are yet buried in oblivion, especially some of them, which, it must be acknowledged, are so reclusive as to admit of no speculation from our modern Tourists. I therefore once more give your readers what may excite the attention of an abler pen.

The Sepulchral Barrow has upon all occasions awakened the curiosity of the antiquary and the public in general, which may be witnessed from the many spectators present upon opening those venerable reliques. A kind of respectful veneration naturally inspires even the ignorant rustic during the operation. The rev. Mr. Hutchins, in his History of Dorsetshire, pleasingly remarks, " Thus, we see, all nations, however " differing in language, customs, or " manners, shewed a religious regard " for their dead. The venerable
" Druid, the civilised Roman, the bar" barous Dane, alike observed the rites
" of sepulture; whether deposited un" der the lofty pyramid, mixed with " their mother earth, or reduced to a " handful of ashes, covered with a " heap of turf *, the deceased alike
" employed the pious care of their sur" viving friends, who wept over and " buried them. And these rites,
" founded in nature, were supported

" for the encouragement of the living,
" not with a view of benefiting the
" dead."

But the Sepulchral Tumuli frequently when searched and examined with the nicest accuracy, rather confuse and embarrass the searchers, unless the appearance of coins, instruments, trinkets, or other national appurtenances, clear the difficulty. This evidently proceeds from the exact similitude between those of the four early nations. Indeed it has with some degree of propriety been urged, that the two latter, the Danes and Saxons, left off the custom of burning their dead immediately after their leaving their own countries: and, were it not asserted by such reputable and judicious authors, it appears rather improbable, on considering that domestic or national customs are so riveted and unalterable, that, though they may appear evidently ridiculous, it is impossible for many ages to root them out. It hath also been observed, that the Romans and Britons always burnt their dead; but it is certain that they did not always (though they might in general), since it is beyond dispute that entire skeletons, and perfect bones, of Roman Generals have been found.

* Weever, in his Ancient Funeral Monuments, p. 6, says, this was the custom of our Saxon ancestors; but he does not remark whether they burnt their dead or not, which it is probable they did not:—neither did they always form their tumuli of earth.

Though these reasons may go far to resolve the many confused opinions and doubts formed, yet they will not altogether suffice. An ingenious author, speaking upon this subject, remarks, "That this way of burying under tumuli was so universal, that it is not easy to decide by what particular nation any barrow was erected, unless some criterion within it determine the uncertainty. Thus, we may form some conjecture from the materials and workmanship of the urn, the cell that contains it, or from coins, or instruments of war, or domestic life, which may accompany the bones: but where these, or such like matters, are wanting, conjectures are vain." He then argues with the similar reasons that have been given concerning the Danes and Saxons, and are also originally hinted by Camden, or his learned annotator, and, if I mistake not, by a correspondent in some of the early publications in the Gentleman's Magazine, that universal Antiquarian Repository.

Though the descriptive part of this letter may appear long in introducing, and the above subject be considered as tedious; yet I thought it proper to give some brief reasons respecting its real intention, which is no other than to request the opinion of some of the literati upon this head, before I proceed to describe the tumulus, which, I must acknowledge, puzzles this neighbourhood with respect to its original erection, and to what peculiar people it owed its existence. This barrow, or tumulus, stands in an elevated situation, upon a mountain, above the hamlet of Stackhouse*, and may be discerned at a great distance. It is known in the country by the name of The Apron full of Stones, from a ridiculous tradition, that the Devil flying over the hill to build a bridge near Kirkby Lonsdale, in Westmorland, his apron-string broke, and he dropped this vast heapt. Some other curious legendary tales are told also on this occasion.

The form of this vast mass is circular, or rather orbicular; the height, by computation on the spot, about nine or ten feet. It is composed of an incredible quantity of stones, piled in such a manner as to rest upon each other's basis, and strengthened by its conic form; it rises upwards in this curious shape. Those stones that form the outside of the work are so small that a soldier could carry them; and since it has been argued that such a monstrous work as this would not be attempted by any nation, but was natural, the largeness of the tumulus may easily be accounted for, since they were annually increased out of reverence, as Mason evinces in his Caractacus, where he introduces him soliloquizing on his son Arviragus's body:

————— Posterity

Shall to thy tomb with annual reverence bring

Sepulchral stones, and pile them to the clouds.

This barrow hath been opened many years ago, and it is represented in the plate (fig. 2.) in the state in which it hath appeared till lately. Some old people in the neighbourhood remember its being entirely complete, and having a very flat top. It was usual, in finishing these works, to lay a flat stone at the top. The people that opened it left their intention unfinished, only throwing down the lid of the stone coffin, and one or two of the sides; and, meeting with nothing worth digging for, they left it. Upon examining it in this state, before its being entirely disfigured in the last attempt, I found several human bones scattered up and down therein, amongst which I selected the patellæ of the knee, the vertebrae of the spine, part of the jaw, and several teeth. Round the area is a wall or rampart, of the same materials as the outside, its height from the interior part about two feet, irregularly ranged with fissured remnants. In the centre of the cavity or area is the above chest, consisting of several huge stones of vast magnitude and density, fixed firmly into the ground, which supported a lid of equal size, though it is now thrown off the top. In this chest are partitions, for what purpose is not known, unless each space was allotted to its particular relique or body. In the partitions and sides of the coffin is a kind of hole in the edge, with a rude mold. Not many weeks ago, the curiosity of some of the neighbourhood was excited to investigate this stupendous work of art, and accordingly labourers were hired, when, upon searching a day (yet not half the work done), a human skeleton was found.

* Stackhouse was originally an appendage to Furness abbey, co. Lanc.

in due proportion, and in a fine state of preservation, excepting the skull and one of the limbs, which were moved out of their place by the workmen's tools. A small circular piece of ivory, and the tusk of an unknown beast, supposed to be of the hog genus, was also found; but no ashes, urns, coins, or instruments, were discovered. There is a tradition (if mere tradition may be relied upon) that this was raised over the body of some of the Danes slain in the general massacre of that nation. However, from collecting all circumstances, as there is no appearance of ashes, it is supposed to belong to them or the Saxons. This is, however, what I wish to be acquainted with. Such a conspicuous work must certainly be erected to the manes of some chiefs: though there is no ground to support its origin but a mere tradition. The tumuli of the Romans and Britons have frequently a black friable earth round their foundation; but this has not, neither is there any appearance of the operation of fire in its cavity. In the Archæologia, vol. III. art. xxviii. an extract of a letter from the rev. George Low, mentions the opening of one of the numerous tumuli in the Links of Skail in the Orkney Isles, in which was found a well-preserved skeleton, within a coffin or chest composed of four stones, covered by a fifth. He observes, "little can be said as to the antiquity of this tumulus, only that it was made before the introduction of Christianity." The insertion of this extract is only meant to compare it with this, and to assert the original reasons. And as the present century can honestly boast of a greater fund of antiquarian knowledge than any of the preceding ones, and this noble science, which, in the days of ignorance and superstition, used to be considered as despicable and ridiculous, is now esteemed not only honourable, but altogether useful and necessary, being ornamented by the labours of genius: thence, in this enlightened age, may the adepts in antiquity have their doubts resolved, and the ignorant meet not only satisfaction, but pleasure and instruction.

P. S. In a former letter of mine, p. 259, Saukland has been misprinted Sunderland. Upon an excursion to Old Ford, near London, not long ago, I saw the remains of an old palace, said to have been built by King John.

An account of this, or a drawing, would be gratefully received, since no author mentions it. W. F.

MR. URBAN.

YOUR Obituary for November last has recorded two sudden deaths. To one you have annexed something of antidote, and perhaps well. The other is palliated with much specious reasoning, and this argument, multi idem fecerunt, et boni. But are you sure that these boni were Christiani? Nothing is more equivocal than the present use of the term good. If it holds up a man in some degree of reputation, and makes him agreeable to his neighbours, we look no further to what it conceals from them or himself. An honest-hearted fellow, a worthy member, a good soul, a generous fellow, a good sort of a man, and many other synonyms, recommend men, in modern society, more than deep reasoning and philosophic reflection. The round of pleasure and enjoyment, and the talent for acquitting a man's self well in it, are the recommendation to respect and esteem with superficial minds. But put a check to that round of pleasure and enjoyment, however innocent and well meant, and place these good men in circumstances of distress, from whatever cause, voluntary or involuntary; and forwant of the self-possessing principle, and the resources which a truly good man must find in himself, a certain dispiritedness or impatience will ensue, which the charity of the present age thinks it right to deem a temporary madness, and sets it up as an apology for every violent exertion, every deed of mischief done to the party's self, or those about him. There may be reasons, in the eye of the coroner, or the family, why a rich felo de se should be brought in a lunatic, while a poor wretch, who has sinned against less light and advantages, has a stake driven through his body in a quatre-vois. "And the more pity it is," as the clown says, "that great folk should have countenance in this world to 'drown or hang themselves more than every Christian.'" But let us not push the apology too far, lest, in the present tenderness for guilt, which pleads for an abatement of capital punishments, we proceed to palliate robbery and fraud of every kind, and even murder itself, with the plea of sudden impulse, and transport of passion; and

skreen premeditated villany and malice aforethought, under lunacy.

Let not the disappointed passion of a giddy girl, the extravagant credit of a merchant, who launches the fortunes of a whole family on speculation, the loss of a lottery chance, or a few convivial friends, or the delusive dream of over-stretched commerce, either in America or 'Change-alley, change the impartial sentiments of unjustifiable suicide. Put this question home to every unhappy man's breast: Can he get rid of himself by thus getting rid of his present existence? or, if that temporary is exchanged for an eternal existence, is he sure that the passions, which distract him in his last moments, will not follow him to "that undiscovered country" where he can never fly from them? H. O. C.

MR. URBAN, High Wycombe, Dec. 6.
IN your Obituary for last month [November] I met with the sudden death of a Miss Glover. You have mentioned a circumstance relating to it, which you think proper to be made known, viz. "That The Sorrows of Werter lay under her pillow*:" and I, never having seen the book, was induced to give it a reading. I perfectly agree with you, that it is a pernicious book: and if you judge the following reflections, put down after the perusal, calculated in any degree to obviate the evil tendency of that work, I beg you will oblige your constant reader and occasional correspondent by giving them a place in your various and useful miscellany.

The idea of God, admitted by all who acknowledge his existence, is the idea of a Perfect Being.

Revelation teaches us that God stands in the relation of a Father to his human creatures. "Though Abraham be ignorant of us," saith the Prophet, "and Israel acknowledge us not, doubtless Thou art our Father. We all are the work of Thy hands." The Apostle likewise asserts that we are the offspring of the Divinity. And Christ Himself has commanded, "When ye pray, say, Our Father, &c."

All true Theists are agreed that the world is governed by the Providence of God, and that he distributes rewards and punishments to those who are the proper subjects of them. Let us then enquire what is the design of punishment in human governments: all wise and good men will say it cannot be revenge. And I believe they will say further, that, at least, one end is the prevention of crimes. But will they not also allow, that, if a government were perfect, its object would be not merely the prevention of crimes, but the reformation of the criminal? Now who, that believes in God, will dispute the perfection of his government? And, if not, what is the natural inference?

If we consider the Deity under the character of a Parent, must we not own that one man is as truly his offspring as another? And what may one reasonably look for at the hands of a good parent? Will not that parent naturally provide such an education for his child as shall secure (if possible) the child's improvement and happiness? And is not this a thing very possible for the Heavenly Father to do in behalf of all his human offspring? With regard to those that love God, we are told, "all things shall work together for their good." If, then, it please God, why may not all things work together for the good of all? Is there any thing absurd or unnatural in the supposition? Or, on the other hand, doth it not very well correspond with the Divine Character, such as we have collected it from reason and revelation? Doth it, moreover, correspond at all with that Character to create beings for misery? But, if we allow that they are finally miserable, can we avoid allowing that they were made for that very purpose, unless we grant that the Divine intentions have been frustrated? And, if this be admitted, where is the perfection of the Deity? We remember, however, to have been told, "The counsel of the Lord standeth for ever; the thoughts of heart to all generations." If any should think that the goodness of God intending, and in his own good time effecting, UNIVERSAL HAPPINESS, encourages them to licentiousness, instead of leading them to repent—it is possible that their repentance may be result of a severe discipline,—how severe, God only knows. It is enough for us to know that no unnecessary severity shall ever take place under the Divine Administration; and that even they who suffer most shall, in the end, confess it was good for them to have been afflicted. I rejoice to find the following expressions drop from the pen of Dr. Stennet *: "God is love. His moral "perfections are all of them so many "different modifications of Love." I rejoice, because they so well express what I apprehend to be the truest and most perfect idea of God. And from hence it follows, that the most gloomy dispensations of Providence proceed from the most benevolent intentions, as will appear in due time. The light in which we should view all the calamities of the world, and all calamity whatever, is so happily represented in the Epistle to the Hebrews, that I cannot forbear transcribing the passage: "We have had fathers of our flesh, "who corrected us, and we gave them "reverence: shall we not much rather "be in subjection to the Father of Spi- "rits†, and live? For they verily, "for a few days, chastened us after "their own pleasure; but the for our "profit, that we might be partakers of "his holiness."

* A similar circumstance attended the sudden death of a Dutch officer, as related not long since in one of Mary's Reviews.

By the Law of Nature (which is God's Law) it is ordained that he who believes and confides in the Fatherly Goodness of his Maker, shall have peace in the midst of calamity: but he that atheistically censures and quarrels with the Divine Government, must inevitably be miserable till he become better minded.

How amiable that complacency in the mind of him who devoutly worships the Everlasting Father, and rejoices to imitate that Good Being whom he worships!

How shocking the gloomy and violent passions that agitate and torment the mind of a Werter! And how different the exit of such characters from the stage of this mortal life! "Mark "the perfect man, and behold the up- "right, for the end of that man is "peace!" THEOPHILUS.

MR. URBAN,

I HAVE read, with real concern, Dr. Priestley's answer to Dr. Horsley's Letters. It is the most impudent and unwarrantable attack on the established religion of this country, and the most insolent violation of toleration, under a free government, I ever met with. It breathes the precise spirit of those who turned the kingdom upside down in the last century. Great bodies of men do not soon change their opinions; most dissenters are still Calvinists. After Dr. Priestley has said this, does he think he can so easily alter them? Is there then no real difference between the toleration of private and of public opinions? Is every pretender to a more enlightened view of religious controversy to compel his neighbour's assent to it, whether he can convince him, or not? and is Dr. Priestley, because he has drawn together a congregation in a commercial town, where religion always sits easiest on the mind, and gain is godliness, to insist that the Unitarians should take the lead in church and state? and will he give security (or has he the modesty to suppose it will not be required) that he and his party, when uppermost, will not persecute in their turns with the same inveteracy that actuated the several sects in the beginning of Christianity, when it became the established religion? Doubtless Dr. Priestley, if he has ever read the Apocalypse, fancies himself one of the two witnesses who are to be overcome and slain by the beast, and lie in the street of the great city, which spiritually is called Sodom, or Egypt. He courts the crown of martyrdom; and, when all other modes of opposition fail, threatens, like other discontented spirits, to recede still further from Babylon, both the great and little, as a last resource.

But with what face does Dr. Priestley appeal to the sense of the people at large as a test of the doctrines in different ages? Is he so unlearned in ecclesiastical history, or in that of the Lower Empire, that he needs be told what interest the populace took in the Arian and Athanasian disputes alternately; as much as in the factions of the Circus? How, but from history, is the fashionable tenet of the age to be collected? But where shall we find the history of the common people? Are not their faith, their politics, and their manners, interwoven with those of their more enlightened and philosophic superiors? Do not our modern sceptics appeal for the light of nature to the common sense of mankind, in the same page in which they tell us they themselves are the light of the world, and that common understandings can comprehend no system but what they hold out to them?

To

* Discourses on Domestic Duties, p. 41.

† This contrasted phrase seems evidently to denote the relation of the Deity to all mankind.

Supplement to GENT. MAG. for 1784.

To cut the matter short—will Dr. Priestley submit his philosophy to the mob who drew Mr. Sadler about the streets of Oxford, and compelled the inhabitants to illuminate their windows in his honour? or his materialism to the rabble of criminals who shelter their crimes under a persuasion that their souls expire at the gallows?

Thus it is that enthusiasts of every class insult common sense; and free-thinkers, in every age, delude the generality, who never think at all.

Thus also it is, that a rational dissenter has, in a recent melancholy instance, degraded himself below the level of an irrational creature *. Q. P.

MR. URBAN,

DR. JORTIN'S Life of Erasmus, p. 4, informs us, that Erasmus was sensible, at least, he ought to have taken the name of Erasmus, and not Erasmus. He had been a Regular Canon, and in all probability not unacquainted with the name of the Romish Saint Erasmus†, who has an office in the Breviary, June 2. This, I should think, occasioned his grammatical mistake: my manuscript legend of him, in English metre, mentions the Saint's guts being at length wound out upon a spit: for the Emperor's orders are,

Kytt ye with a knyff hys body all aboutt,
That all hys gutts at his navyll may cum outt,

And wynd hem upon a long spyttie,
And latt hym than doe all hys profytte.

* "There is a spirit," says an excellent advocate for Christianity, "which seems to be always discontented till its wildest claims are allowed, and which, having been turbulent under injudicious restraint, becomes tyrannical when in possession of usurped authority." White's Bampton Lectures, p. 21.

† In the church of St. Anne Black Friers, London, was an image of St. Erasmus, before which one Rich. Billesden thought it, perhaps, some benefit to his soul to be buried. In whose last will, made February, 16, 1492, he willed to be buried in the body of the church of the Freris Prechours of Lond. before the image of St. Erasmus, that on the North side of the church, as nigh unto the wall there as may be, &c. "That mine executors provyde and ordeyne for a clenly tombe of marbil to be made and set in the wal therein, where my body shal be buried if it may be conveniently suffered to be done by the assent of the Priour of the said place, &c." See Strype's London, 1720, book III. p. 183. Ecc.

And in an illumination in a manuscript Manual of Prayers, which I have, there is a representation of this horrible scene, p. 69; but the Breviary does not notice this species of torment, saying only in general, insignem martyris palmam adeptus est; and indeed this mode of death is usually assigned to St. Amphibalus. See Gent. Mag. vol. XXIX. p. 267; or Mr. Thorpe, in Registrum Roff. p. 1047. Quære, however, as Erasmus was a Bishop, and the Saint's figure, in the representation in the Magazine, has a mitre, whether this particular legend may not rather belong to St. Erasmus, than to Amphibalus? It is something extraordinary, that the legend of St. Erasmus should appear in the Breviary, and neither in Jacobus de Voragine, nor Caxton: it occurs, however, in Usuardus, Ribaldeneira, and Mr. Butler, but without the story of the guts: and indeed Mr. Butler, in his plate of the instruments of torment, vol. 1. does not notice this species of punishment. MR. URBAN,

THE very laudable exertions of the Quakers in this country, and of a set of real patriots in America, for abolishing the custom of slavery, having turned the attention of the public towards that interesting object, I hope you will be so kind as to give room in your Magazine for the following account of the manner in which slaves were used at Rome; as it may serve to shew what shocking acts of tyranny and wanton cruelty are liable to take place daily and almost universally, when so horrid a law is allowed to exist as makes it possible for one man to be the property of another. This account is extracted from Mr. De Lolme's Memorials of Human Superstition.

THIS absolute dominion possessed by Masters over the persons of their Slaves, led them to use singular severity in the government of them. So frequently were flagellations the lot of Slaves, that appellations and words of reproach drawn from that kind of punishment, were commonly used to denominate them; and expressions of this kind occur in the politest writers: thus, we find in the plays of Terence, an author particularly celebrated for his politeness and strict observance of decorum, Slaves frequently called by the words Verberones, Flagriones, or others to the same effect.

As for Plautus, who had been the servant of a baker, and who was much acquainted with every thing that related to Slaves,

Slaves, and their flagellations in particular, he has filled his scenes with nick-names of Slaves, drawn from this latter circumstance; and they are almost continually, in his plays, called flagritribæ (à verbis flagrum et terere), plagipatidæ, ulmitribæ &c. and also bucodæ and restiones, words which signify those who are used to be beaten with ox-leather thongs, or with ropes.

Sometimes the flagellations of Slaves, or the fear they entertained of incurring them, served Plautus as incidents for the conduct of his plots; thus, in his Epidicus, a Slave, who is the principal character in the play, concludes, upon a certain occasion, that his Master has discovered his whole scheme, because he spied him, in the morning, purchasing a new scourge at the shop in which they were sold. The same flagellations, in general, have moreover been an inexhaustible fund of pleasantry for Plautus. In one place, for instance, a Slave, intending to laugh at a Fellow-slave, asks him how much he thinks he weighs when he is suspended naked by his hands to the beam, with an hundred weight (centupondium) tied to his feet; which was a precaution taken, as commentators inform us, in order to prevent the Slave who was flagellated from kicking the man (Virgator) whose office it was to perform the operation. And in another place, Plautus, alluding to the thongs of ox-leather with which whips were commonly made, introduces a Slave engaged in deep reflection on the surprising circumstance of “dead bullocks that make incursions upon living men:”

Vivos homines mortui incursant boves!

The uncontrouled power of inflicting punishment on their Slaves, enjoyed by Masters in Rome, was at last abused by them to the greatest degree. Besides all the common instruments mentioned above, and as if the terribile flagellum had not been of itself sufficiently so, new contrivances were used to render it a still more cruel weapon; and the thongs with which that kind of scourge was made, were frequently armed with nails, or small hard bones. They would also fasten small leaden weights to those thongs: hence scourges were sometimes called astragala, as Hesychius relates, from the name of those kinds of weights which the Ancients used to wear hanging about their shoes. The smallest faults committed in their families by Slaves, such as breaking glasses, or seasoning dishes too much, exposed them to be delivered up to the executioner; and it was even no unusual thing for Masters (as we may judge from Trimalcion's entertainment in the satire of Petronius) to order such of their Slaves, as had been guilty of faults of the above kind, to be stripped, and whipped in the presence of their guests, when they happened to entertain any at their houses.

Women in particular seem to have abused this power of flagellation in a strange manner; which caused express provisions to be made, at different times, in order to restrain them. It was often sufficient to induce the Roman ladies to cause their Slaves to be whipped, that they were dissatisfied with the present state of their own charms; or, as Juvénal expresses it, that their nose displeased them: and when they happened to fancy themselves neglected by their husbands, then indeed their Slaves fared badly. This latter observation of Juvénal, Dryden, in his translation of that author's Satires, has expressed by the following lines:

“For if o'er night the husband has been “slack,
“Or counterfeited sleep, or turn'd his “back, “Next day, be sure, the servants go to “wrack.”

The wantonness of power was carried still farther by the Roman ladies, if we may credit the same Juvénal. It was a customary thing with several among them, when they proposed to have their hair dressed both with nicety and expedition, to have the dressing maid, who was charged with that care, stripped naked to the waist, ready for flagellation in case she became guilty of any fault or mistake in performing her task. The following is the passage in Juvénal on that subject: “For if she has determined to be dressed more nicely than usual, and is in haste, being expected in the public gardens, the unfortunate Pro- has then dressed her head, with her own hair in the utmost disorder, and her shoulders and breasts bare. Why is that ringlet too high?—The leather thongs instantly punish the crime of a hair, and an ill-shaped curl.”

Nam si constituit soliloque decentius optat Ornari et properat, jamque expectatur in hortis,

Componit crinem, laceratis ipsa capillis, Nuda humeros, Pectus infelix, nudisque mam- illis:

*Altior hic quare cincinnus? tauras punit
Continuè flexi crimen, facinusque capilli.*

These abuses which Masters, in Rome, made of the power they possessed over their Slaves, were at last carried by them to such a pitch, either by making them wantonly suffer death, or torturing them in numberless different ways, that, in the beginning of the reign of the Emperors, it was found necessary to restrain their licence.

Under the reign of Claudius (for it is not clear whether any provision to that effect was made under Augustus) it was ordained that Masters, who forsook their Slaves when sick, should lose all right over them, in case they recovered; and that those who should deliberately put them to death, should be banished from Rome.

Under the Emperor Adrian, the cruelties exercised by Umbricia, a Roman lady, over her female Slaves, caused new laws to be made on that subject, as well as the former ones ones to be put in force; and Umbricia was, by a rescript of the Emperor, banished for five years (l. 2. in fine. Dig. L. I. t. 6.)

New laws to the same ends were likewise made under the following Emperors, among which Civilians make particular mention of a constitution of Antoninus Pius (Divus Pius); and, in subsequent times, the Church likewise employed its authority to prevent the like excesses, as we may see from the canon above-recited (Si quæ domina, &c.), which was framed in the Council held at Elvira, a small town in Spain that has been since destroyed. But the disorder was of such a nature as not to be cured so long as the custom itself of slavery was allowed to subsist; and it has been remedied, at last, only by the thorough abolition of an usage which was a continual insult to humanity: an advantage for which we are certainly indebted to the establishment of Christianity, whatever evils certain writers may, on the other hand, reproach it with having occasioned.

MR. URBAN,

I TAKE the liberty to send you an extract from a manuscript, in my possession, intituled, "An Abstract of the Reign of K. Charles the First;" in which the author continues his narrative by way of digression till the year 1662. The manuscript is exceedingly curious, not merely because the writer was an eye-witness of the transactions he records, "et quorum pars magna fuit, quæque ipse miserrimæ vidit;" but also for the neatness of the penmanship, and the accuracy, I may say the elegance, of the drawings, in which the most remarkable things and personages, that occur in the narrative, are delineated in the margin. The extract I am going to present to you has also its drawing, and the bodies, hanging on the gallows, (Tyburn), are marked with their respective initials I. B. C. Manuscript, p. 26. "The Queen and the Princess embarked for France the 25th, on which day the solemn league and covenant was rescinded in Scotland; and the 30th of January, being that day twelve years from the death of the King, the odious carcasses of O. Cromwell, Major Gen. Ireton, and Bradshaw, were drawn in sledges to Tyburne, when they hung by the neck from morning till 4 in the afternoon. Cromwell in green scar-cloth, very fresh embalmed. Ireton, having been buried long, hung like a dried rat, yet corrupted about the fundament. Bradshaw in his winding sheet, the fingers of his right hand and his nose perisht, having wet the sheet through. The rest very perfect, inso-much that I knew his face when the hangman, after cutting off his head, held it up. Of his toes I had five or six in my hand, which the prentices had cut off. Their bodies were thrown into a hole under the gallows, and their heads were set up on the south end of Westminster Hall."

Here is another drawing of Westminster-hall, &c. In a note it is said, "Cromwell died September 3, 1658; Ireton, November 9, 1651; Bradshaw, October 31, 1659."

Yours, &c.

MR. URBAN,

AN example of amiable virtue, such as Mr. Davis's is represented to be, claims esteem and reverence. I may be thought arrogant when I say, I respect truth more. Friendship, unwilling to discover blemishes in the object it admires, often passes by defects which to another eye are eminently visible; and, perhaps, did no further consequences follow, the world might well pardon the delusion which sets human nature in a fairer light. But when, to make way for the establishment of a favourite, a more illustrious character must be pulled down, it may be allowed to plead the cause of insulted genius.—I beg leave, through the channel of your valuable miscellany, to enter my protest against the insinuations of an unknown writer, who has endeavoured to build up the reputation of Mr. Davis on the ruin of Mr. Gibbon. Had the fatal "Examination," of which your correspondent seems to speak so highly, been never seen, I am inclined to think that, with many, the abilities of its author might have been still thought worthy of his encomium. But, contrary to the opinion of your correspondent, (from whom if I differ, I hope to differ with temper and reason) I cannot help esteeming the "laboured and artful vindication" as an additional and splendid proof of the talents and erudition of its admirable author. The very face of that Examination carries strong marks of its being the production of a vain young man, confined and illiberal in his notions of religion and philosophy, and flattered into print by friends less knowing than himself: and yet, from what I have heard of Mr. Davis, I am very far from thinking ill of the original powers of of understanding which nature gave him. The fondness of a young author for his first work may have drawn him into a measure from which cooler consideration would have restrained him, till, perhaps, it was not easy to retreat without hurting that species of false honour by which we are too apt to be guided. But I am more sorry to see, in your correspondent, prejudice mastering reason, and establishing absurdity. Mr. Davis's book, however, contains some few remarks which bear hard upon Mr. Gibbon's particular deductions, or general principles, of which I have endeavoured to point out the most conclusive. With how much success, must depend on you to judge.

Mr. Gibbon has indeed cleared up this point.

In this passage, among much tolerable criticism, will be found several instances of strange misapprehension.

129. Mosheim - - - viii.

In p. 156, Mr. Davis has pointed out several inconsistencies in Mr. Gibbon's reasoning, which are of some importance.

I believe the passages I have above referred to will direct the reader to every objection of consequence which applies to Mr. Gibbon's History. Should any of your correspondents think otherwise, I should be glad to be shewn my error. I endeavour to seek Truth wherever I am likely to find her; nor should I be displeased to throw another argument of weight into a scale which nevertheless preponderates already.

If, in the verses alluded to by Vindex, I have made use of epithets inconsistent with my professions or design, I am sorry to have departed so far from the principles by which I have hitherto attempted to regulate my conduct. I have some idea that I can judge in matters of religion with tolerable impartiality; but I am very far from thinking myself infallible in my judgement. What I mean to blame is not the zeal with which opinions are maintained, but the acrimony with which controversies are too often carried on, till they degenerate into personal abuse. That Mr. Gibbon is what some of his enemies have made him out, I never will believe. The learned Historian of the Roman Empire is as honourable as he is intelligent: I will say the same of Dr. Priestley, whose talents I admire, and whose piety I venerate.

MR. URBAN,

YOUR correspondent W. & D. p. 246, may find the word Reciprocity made use of by Mr. Hargrave, in a note, at the bottom of p. 82, b. of his new edition of Coke upon Littleton, which part was printed off long before either of the events mentioned by your correspondent happened. Perhaps the Westminster Scrutiny may be the means of enriching our barren language still more.

Please to inform your correspondent p. 652, that in the library of the late Mr. R. Way, of Carey-street, Lincoln's-Inn-fields, there was a manuscript "Treatise on Uses," said to be the work of Mr. Pigot. I wish some of the law booksellers would endeavour to rescue it from oblivion, and favour the public with a correct edition of it. The other Treatise of Mr. Pigott is confined to Recoveries only, and does not at all intermeddle with the doctrine of Fines: the first edition of this Treatise was published in 1739, and consequently posthumous; the second, and last, was published in 1770, by the late Serjeant Wilson, with corrections and additional cases, as the title-page informs us, without which information it would have been rather a difficult matter to have discovered the corrections. There has only been one edition of the Precedents, viz. in 1739, that in 1742 being nothing more than a new title-page.

I wish such of your correspondents as are able to communicate any Biographical Anecdotes relative to that very eminent Conveyancer, the late James Booth, Esq. would favour the public therewith, through the channel of your Magazine.

MR. URBAN,

IN a very curious old book, intituled "A Compendyouse Treatise * Dialogue of Dives and Pauper, fructu-
"only treatynge upon the Ten Com-
"maundements;" printed at London, in 4to, by Richard Pynson, anno 1498, I find the following remarkable story:

"We rede that in Englande was a Kynge that had a concubyne, whos name was Rose, and for hyr greate bewte he cleped hir Rose amounde, Rosa mundi, that is to saye, Rose of the worlde. For him thought that she passed al wyemen in bewtye. It bitel that she died and was buried whyle the Kynge was absent. And whanne he came agen, for grate loue that he had to hyr, he wolde se the body in the graue. And whanne the graue was openned, there sate on orrible tode upon her brest bytwene hir teetyes, and a foule adder begirt hir body aboute in the midle. And she stauke so that the Kyng, ne nou other, might stonde to se that orrible sight. Thanne the Kynge dyde shette agen the graue, and dyde wryte therse two veersis upon the graue:

Hic jacet in tumba Rosa mundi, non Rosa munda;

Non redolet, sed olet, quæ redolet solent."

I wish much to know whether this circumstance is mentioned by any of our old Historians.

PHOSPHORUS.

MR. URBAN,

Nov. 28.

PLEASE to insert the following reply to your correspondent P. B. C.'s remarks on my observations on the Holly and the Beech, which will, at least on my part, close the controversy, that I fear takes up too much room in your valuable collection.

My reason (p. 661) for thinking the Holly indigenous is, that it is found growing most plentifully in uncultivated places, which is not the case with our other evergreen trees. What shall we do with that kind of Holly which bears yellow berries, and is always fruitful, even when raised from berries, as I have been very credibly informed, and consequently belongs strictly to the class Tetrandria? Must this remain, and be separated from the other sort, or must it be misplaced in the class Polygamia, with the red-berried, where it by no means ought to be, and where it would never be found by an enquirer?

P. B. C. does not do Gerard and Parkinson justice in saying, that he knows not any other mode of finding the Holly but by turning patiently over the leaves, or looking in the index; they both have arrangements: Gerard has divided his Historie of Plants into three books, in the last of which, trees and shrubs are included. Parkinson has no less than seventeen tribes, the sixteenth of which treats of trees and shrubs only; so that there is no occasion to look through the whole of either Herbal. How a person, who is ignorant of its name, could find the Holly by looking in an index, I am much at a loss to discover.

When I asserted that the Holly was dioicous, your correspondent replied, it is not dioicous: both these terms certainly have the same derivation, but the inventor seems to keep them apart, and applies the term dioicous only to those irregular plants that, I had almost said, do not accord with his system, and frequently uses it as a trivial, such as Lychnis dioica, Urtica dioica, Clematis dioica, Carex dioica; Linnæus calls Ilex Aquifolium, the Holly, Polygama dioica, in his Systema Naturæ, tom. II. edit. 12, Holmiæ, 1767. If I have mistaken these two terms, I wish the gentleman would give a better explanation of them. Plants of this character, a writer, less studious of system than Linnæus, would have been contented to have placed in an appendix, as Ray and others have done with the plants that did not conform to their methods of arrangement. Not that I would be understood to reflect on the illustrious Swede; for every human system must necessarily have its incoherent and imperfect parts, one of which your correspondent's favourite class Polygamia certainly is. Of this Linnæus was so sensible, that, in his latest publication, he was desirous of discarding it entirely from his system. "In classificatione unicum institui mutationem, excludendo Polygamiam, nimirum progressu temporis experientia docuit, illam classem potius damnam quam utilitatem attulisse methodo." "I have made only one alteration in my method of classing plants, which is, that I have excluded the class Polygamia, because experience has in a course of years convinced me, that this class has done more mischief than good to my system." Linnæi Præf. Supplement. Plant. System. Vegetab. Brunsvigæ, 1781.

Your correspondent P. B. C. (pp. 656, 727) can hardly suppose that the par-

* The same book was "emprynted by Wynken de Worde, 1496."

passages in Virgil, which mention the Fagus, were not examined before other authors were consulted concerning the identity of that tree. Of the passages produced, he very properly gives up two, for the first is copied from Theocritus and the other from Homer; and what little foundation he has for asserting that the rest "clearly point it out" to be the Beech, the following remarks will shew.

It will be full time enough to determine whether the wood of the Beech is better than the Fagus to turn into cups, when we are certain what kind of Oak the Fagus of Virgil was.

While this uncertainty remains, nothing decisive can be deduced concerning the preference of the Beech to the Fagus in building a plough. But it may be observed, that the plough of Hesiod, which Virgil copied, has certainly no Beech in it:

"Δαφνὴς δ' ἢ πῖλινος ἀκνῖατοῖς ἰστῶσιν
"Δρυὶς ἔλκεμα πρίνου γυνή."

Works and Days, v. 433.

"The most durable plough-shafts are made of the Bay-tree, or of the Elm; the body, of the Oak; and the share, of the evergreen Oak." Neither would a modern ploughwright think of using Beech, if he could procure Ash or Elm.—

"In viridi nuper quæ cortice fagi
"Carmina descripsi." ECL. V. 13.

"For writing on the bark." By this P. B. C. seems to think, with Martyn, in his edition of the Eclogues, that cortice fagi implies writing on the dried barks of trees, as a substitute for paper. But the word viridi might have reminded him of the following passage:

"Tenerisque meos incidere amores
"Arboribus; crescent illæ, crescentis a-
"mores." ECL. X. 53.

Which certainly means carving on the barks of standing trees, a custom much more in the pastoral manner than the other: and why may not the bark of the Fagus be as proper for engraving the song of Mopsus, which begins at the 30th verse, and ends at the 44th, as the bark of the Beech?

"Post valido nitens sub pondere FAGINUS
"axis

"Instrepat, et junctos temo trahat æreus
"orbes." GEORG. III. 172.

Supposing that Virgil may be depended on for the identical trees of which his plough is made, yet we can trust very little to a writer who annexed a "brazen pole" (æreus temo) to his wain: for if we could allow this part really to have been of metal, while the axle-tree was of wood, it certainly would have been made of iron; as Lucretius, who wrote several years before Virgil, mentions brass, i. e. copper (æs), having been superseded by iron, before his time, for the purposes of war and agriculture:

"Inde minutatim processit ferreus ensis,
"Versaque in opprobrium species est falcis
"ahenæ,

"Et ferro cæpere solum proscindera terræ." V. 1299.

But the brazen pole of Virgil's wain is full as imaginary as the brazen axle-tree of Neptune's car, or the silver pole, or shaft, of Juno's chariot, in the Iliad. I have not the least doubt but in this passage, where the poet takes such licence, that if ulmeus, fraxineus, iligneus, or querneus, would have suited better, they would have been inserted without the least scruple. It may also be remarked, that Beech is the most improper wood to carry the heavy load here described, not only from its soft and brittle texture, but also from its being more subject than any other sort of tree to be worm-eaten, and destroyed by the Ptini, in a very short time; and it is reasonable to suppose, that the warm climate of Italy is not less infested by these insects than our own. This objection holds good also against the Beech being used for plough-timber. Our cartwrights would prefer Oak, Ash, or Elm, to it for an axle-tree; and hornbeam is stronger than either of them. Of so little validity is the gentleman's assertion that faginus axis must signify an axle-tree made of the Beech, and not of the Oak Fagus. But, to close the whole, this passage of Virgil happens to be a literal translation of the following sentence in Homer, and, I think, no person will be so hardy as to assert, that the Φαῖος of the Grecian writer was not an Oak:

"Μετὰ δ' ἑζαχὶ ΦΗΓΙΝΟΣ ἄξιν
"Βεβόσωνν." IL. V. 838.

"Valido—sub pondere faginus axis
"Instrepat." VIRGIL.

"The axle-tree made of the Fagus
"creaked with the great weight."

I could wish that this gentleman, instead of remarking on my hasty strictures, would give us his own observations on some particular animals, trees, or plants, which I am certain would be

be very well received; for I think a discerning friend, who lately despatched P. B. C. to me, is not mistaken, when he mentioned the name of a respectable Professor. The generality of writers, in the various branches of natural history, have taken so large a field, that they have been obliged to give us much from others, and little of their own. Scopoli is much in the right when he says, that writers on a single subject afford the best information; "Monographi præstantissimi:" of which we have a remarkable example in the account of the Cedar of Libanus. (Gent. Mag. vol. XLIX. p. 138.)—Had this signature of P. B. C. been explained to me sooner, I should certainly have put fewer questions to your correspondent, whose able defence of Linnæus must give satisfaction to every one who is acquainted with the system of that truly great man, which will always be held in esteem and veneration by those who understand it.

MR. URBAN, Oxford, Dec. 24.
WE now have the satisfaction to read, what with pleasure we heard delivered from the pulpit, Mr. Professor White's Bampton Lectures. He often fixed the attention of his audience with discourses of more than an hour in length, while his able defence, and comprehensive views, of the truth, were delivered in language of the most easy and simple elegance, to which few writers have so happily succeeded. While he boldly attacked, and successfully refuted, the cold scepticism of Hume, the artful insinuations of Gibbon, and the unqualified assertions of Priestley *, he displays a benevolence of heart, which Bigotry has not found; and a comprehension of mind, which Superstition has not fettered. With these discourses, besides his large treasures of Oriental learning, to recommend him to the patronage of the great, it surely cannot be long before a distinguished father in the church will bestow on him a substantial mark of his favour.

May the idea be suggested in this humble manner to the three great law Lords, who are appointed the Trustees to Bishop Warburton's lectureship at Lincoln's-Inn, that from the elegance of his genius, the extent of his learning, and the peculiar heat of his studies, there is not a more proper person in the kingdom, to whom they could commit that distinguished post, and who is so well able to answer the intention of the learned Bishop, and to give satisfaction to the judicious Trustees?

ACADEMICAL

MR. URBAN,
YOUR correspondent W. & D. in November Magazine, p. 806, supposes the learned Countess of Conway to have outlived her husband, and to have afterwards married the Earl of Mulgrave; but it appears by the last edition of Collins's Peerage, vol. III. p. 282, that Anne youngest daughter of Sir Heneage Finch, Knt. Recorder of London, and sister to Heneage the first Earl of Nottingham of this family, as also to Sir John Finch, Ambassador to Turkey, was married to Edward Viscount Conway, (afterwards created Earl of Conway, viz. December 8, 31 Car. II. 1678,) and that she died at Ragland, in Warwickshire, Feb. 23, 1678, and was by the famous Van Helmont preserved in spirits of wine, with a glass over her face, in her coffin, above ground, that her Lord, who was in Ireland when she died, might see her before her interment, which was at Arrow, in Warwickshire, April 17, 1679.

As an acknowledgment of the pleasure I have received from W. & D.'s account of this learned lady, I have endeavoured to point out the Earl of Conway's other wives, for I find he had three in all, though but two are mentioned in any printed account I have seen of that family: his second wife was Elizabeth daughter of George Lord Delamere; and his third, Ursula daughter of George Stawell, Esq. ancestor to the Lords Stawell: she survived him, and was remarried to John Sheffield Earl of Mulgrave, afterwards created Duke of Buckinghamshire. The Earl of Conway dying without issue, his titles became extinct, and his estates went to a younger branch of the Seymour family, from whence the present Earl of Hertford is descended.

Yours, &c.

MR. URBAN, Acton, Dec. 14.
YOU will probably be so indulgent as to spare room for some further particulars of the illustrious Anne Viscountess countess Conway, and an account of a memorial, in the church here, of Catherine Viscountess Conway, whom an acquaintance of yours supposed to be the learned lady enquired after.

The former had from her youth a timely sense and relish of Christianity. In a letter of Dr. Henry More to her, answering some important queries, he observed, that her education had been such, that it was likely she had the ordinary articles of the Christian religion more punctually and readily in her mind, than himself. The queries were occasioned by her reading his poem on the pre-existence of the soul. Some of his learned treatises were owing to her desire and instigation particularly his "Conjectura Cabbalistica," [Conjectures about Jewish Traditions, or some Divine Mysteries;] and, "Philosophiæ Teutonicæ Censura," [Censure of the obscure Writings of Jacob Behmen, which the late Rev. William Law republished, and recommended as being divinely inspired!] The Doctor then gives a great character of her, in an Epistle Dedicatory before his "Antidote against Atheism," and after her death, in his Preface to some Religious Remains of hers, once intended to be made public. These fragments, which she never had opportunity to revise, were obscurely written in a paper-book, with a black-lead pencil, towards the end of her long and tedious pains and sickness. In the Preface the Doctor expresses his admiration of the singular natural parts which God had bestowed upon her, besides those acquired accomplishments in all manner of knowledge, as well natural as divine. Though she had a continuance of pain perpetual upon her, such as would have proved insufferable to others, yet her understanding had the greatest facility imaginable for any either physical, metaphysical, or mathematical speculations.

When she came abroad, he never observed her making any ostentation of her knowledge, or so much as any discovery of it, upon ever so fair an opportunity; according to that saying, written on the inside of her paper-book, "Ignorance is better than Pride." Those Christian graces, that shone in her during this close pursuit of truth and knowledge, might justly seem to obscure the lustre of her other accomplishments. He could witness, from thirty years experience of, or acquaintance with, her, that her conversation was always with meekness, kindness, and discretion, even to those that had not fairly, if not provokingly, behaved to her in their pretended friendship; and that she was ready to put a good sense upon the actions of others, though strangers, when their credit was diminished by a proud and envious tongue. Her extraordinary dearness to her nearest relations and friends need not be wondered at, considering her care and provident solicitude for them, in a manner to her very last breath (as Fr. Mer. Helmont could witness, who was present with her when she died), as if she had been appointed by God their common good genius or tutelar angel.

Of this eminent personage Dr. More farther observes, towards the end of his long Preface, that of her comforts and refreshments after some of her greatest agonies, and of her strange foresight of things future, he might make mention, but held it less necessary.

The memorial of the other Lady Conway is in the Chancel here. The inscription is very long. One wished some time ago to read it: but the monument seemed too high, and the letters too much effaced. However, on getting up lately very near it, and a close inspection of it, the whole was read, in consequence of the enquiry in your October Magazine. It appeared not that she was buried here. Her annual benefactions to the poor of this parish, of some others, and of a Dutch congregation in London, are recorded. A transcript will be made when the weather is warm. The publication of it perhaps will be useful: it is intended for one of your Monthly Miscellanies. The memorial of her there will be legible every where, and durable indeed: your work may outlast her monument. It is remarkable, that the Dutch were not unconcerned in both our Viscountesses Conway, considering the benefaction of Catherine to, and the publication of Anne's Philosophical Essay by, them *.

In writing of the noble Conway family, it may be serviceable to the good and glorious cause of Religion and Virtue, not only to commemorate the dead, but also to pay sincere respect to the living. Your correspondent, when residing near Ragley, was well assured of, and had once an agreeable opportunity of observing, Lord Conway, now Earl of Hertford, and his Lady's regular and religious behaviour. They constantly came down from Ragley to their parish church at Arrow, to discharge their bounden duty to, by joining in the public worship of, the Lord of Lords, and King of Kings.

EUTHELIUS.

MR. URBAN, Hamstcrley, Dec. 17.
MY absence from this place, to which the Gentleman's Magazines are always sent, has prevented me from reading and answering two queries relative to "Swinburne's Travels in Spain and Sicily." In p. 272 your correspondent wishes to have a contradiction cleared up, which it is certainly easy to do; for if he will turn to the "Letter," p. 230, he will find the text run thus: "But none enlist as soldiers." You have printed it wrong in your Magazine for February.

In answer to another correspondent's queries about the meaning of the word moscie, (p. 435,) and the seeming contradiction in the account of the Tarentine sheep; the author had his information on the spot, and afterwards conversed frequently on the subject with a very intelligent observer, the writer of notes upon Aquin's "Deliciæ Tarentinæ." The meaning of particular words varies according to the provinces of Italy, but dictionaries concern the Tuscan idiom or dialect only. Moscie, Corfagne, Canolle, Rozze, are all now generical distinctions, given by the Puglian shepherds to the rough, ill-favoured, black breed of sheep: this wool is bad, and like hair; but their flesh is good, and savoury. Is not that the case with us? We have very fine mutton from sheep that give very little wool, and that of an inferior quality.—The sheep that give the best Spanish wool, have not, if I recollect right, the best tasted flesh. Mr. S. must feel himself highly honoured by this correspondent's polite compliment, and must esteem the praises of the learned and well-informed gentlemen, who use your Magazine as the repository for their observations, the most pleasing recompence for his labours.

A Roman altar was lately found at Ebbeschester, in this neighbourhood, and is now in my possession. I have endeavoured to explain it, but am not perfectly satisfied with my own reading. I shall be happy to have the opinion of more learned antiquaries; and hope a copy of the inscription will for that purpose be soon admitted into your useful work. [See the Plate, fig. 3.] The characters of the three first lines are very plain; the first and last letters of the fourth line less so; and the latter end of the fifth line more defaced. PONCUTRUS.

†† The first figure in our plate is an exact representation of the four sides of an old wooden sheath, of curious Dutch workmanship, in the possession of Craven Ord, Esq. F.A.S. which he purchased at the sale of the late George Scott, Esq.

MR. URBAN, Dec. 30.
YOUR Magazine being confessedly a Repository for all sorts of curiosities, and especially of antiquities, a short descriptive account of a few, in my possession, cannot fail to be acceptable to all those of your numerous readers, and many there are, who have Virtù enough to be entertained with such matters, and will contribute to form a small addition to your extensive collection of this kind; and I am the rather induced to communicate to the public, by the channel of your useful Magazine, the following curiosities, on account of those which have been transmitted to you by Mr. Greene of Lichfield, being at all times so favourably received.

The first (see the Plate, fig. 4) is a golden fibula, or breast buckle, in exceeding fine preservation; its shape is circular, and of the size and dimensions of the fac-simile herewith sent: the back side is flat, and without ornament. On the rim of the fore side is the very singular and remarkable legend Non detur Petenti. How to apply this inscription with precision to the real meaning it was intended to convey, seems a matter of no small difficulty.—The weight of the fibula is about sixty grains.

The brass or copper piece (fig. 5) is a Saxon styca of one of the Kings of Northumberland; I say of Northumberland, because it has not been hitherto discovered that this species of coin was minted in any other kingdom during the Heptarchy. There are letters enough sufficiently visible and distinct to denote it to belong to the regal, and not to the prelatical, series; but I dare not with any any degree of confidence pretend to appropriate the same to any one of them in particular: nor is the legend on the reverse, containing, as is supposed, the moneyer or mintmaster's name, of easier interpretation.

The other (fig 6) is a fragment or piece of sculpture in ivory, found several years ago, with a quantity of ancient gold coin, in taking down a house in Norgate, Wakefield. The design, so far as one can judge from the fragment, appears to be well executed, as the subject is ludicrous: it seems, however, in my opinion, to be, beyond the possibility of a doubt, of monastic workmanship. And as monasteries, hospitals, &c. were, while they continued, places of entertainment, whereto paupers and others, both saints and sinners, resorted in their pilgrimages, the design of the upper figure dropping a crust of bread, or other food, into the mouth of the gaping one below, may be an allusion to some very extraordinary accident which furnished the occasion. Indeed the under figure bears not the countenance or complexion of a thin, meagre, chop-fallen, emaciated person, but of a sleek, plump, fat one, lay or ecclesiastic; and his posture or attitude, in the act of receiving the morsel, is very strange and uncommon. Those who are conversant in popish legends, can very probably help one to the story which this piece of sculpture is intended to represent. An insertion of this will oblige your new correspondent F. R. SCARISBING.

DEATH, say these Doctors, has put an end to the blasphemies of that writer, so celebrated for his uncommon talents, so culpable on account of the detestable use he made of them; of that famous man, who, in the sight of all Europe, spent his whole life in defending and propagating impiety. As a philosopher, rash, and without principles; as a poet, licentious and dissolute; as an historian, void of judgement and good faith; laying claim to all the sciences, without going deep into any; eager to degrade all merit that stood in his own way; and prostituting his talents and his labours, during the course of his long life, for the purpose of becoming the oracle and idol of his age. He knew well the power of ridicule over the greater part of mankind; and he failed not to avail himself of so useful a weapon, in order to seduce weak minds. He knew well, that most readers are incapable of discussion, of serious examination and reflection; and that every thing which serves to deliver them from the terrors of a religion which puts a restraint on the passions, is received with eagerness and applause. Hence the impieties he uttered are seasoned with some sacrilegious jest; hence he spared not the sharpest satire; and if he undertook to subvert the doctrines of our religion, disfigured them by the ridicule thrown upon them. Or, does he seek to destroy the immortality of the soul, the foundations of morality, and the rewards and punishments of a future life; he recurs not to reasoning; he assumes the tone of raillery and irony; he tries to excite laughter; he turns every thing to a jest. It matters not that he advances absurdities, that he often contradicts himself, and deserves no credit; nothing stops him, if he can procure himself readers. In short, he employs against religion the most dissolute libertinism, and the depravity of the most corrupt heart.

GIVE me leave to inclose you an exact drawing (See the Plate, fig. 7) of a gold concave ring, the inscription on which has puzzled many antiquaries. It was ploughed up in Mendlesham, in the county of Suffolk, in 1758, near the palace, by tradition, of one of the Kings

Kings of the Heptarchy: near which place, it is said, a silver crown of considerable weight was long since found. You will oblige me much by giving it a place in your Magazine, in hope some of your learned readers may be able to decypher it. It is in value about eight shillings; the inscription is supposed to be in the Runic or Slavonian language.

MR. URBAN,

GRAY made use of this expression in one of his Poems, "Weave the Warp, and weave the Woof;" to the propriety of which Dr. SAMUEL JOHNSON, in his life of that Poet, very justly objected; but he was not equally fortunate in his correction of the passage, having asserted that the Web, or Piece, is formed by the Warp's being thrown across the Woof, whereas it is the Woof's being thrown across the Warp which forms the manufacture.—Such an error, though a trivial one, ought not perhaps to remain unobserved, and consequently uncorrected.

M. C. of Low Leyton, on occasion of the memorandum, in our LIII^d volume, of Mr. Rowe-Mores, says, our correspondent "has mistaken his professional character. He was not in orders, though, from his education, and affectation of that character, he was often thought to be so. He served the office of churchwarden of this parish in the year 1775."—But, if M. C. will take the trouble to consult the Anecdotes of Mr. Bowyer, p. 314, he will find the whole matter elucidated, and that his friend Mr. M. was actually in Roman Catholic orders.

In the same volume, T. C. of Mon-trose will find a satisfactory account of Mr. Heath of Exeter.

W. M. informs us, that Roger Crabb died in the year 1680, aged 60, and is buried in the church yard of St. Dunstan, Stepney, where his tomb is distinguished by the people under the title of that of The Pilgrim.—We wish this correspondent would inform us whether this church-yard is levelled, as an advertisement from the church-wardens in the daily papers, in the course of this year, seemed to threaten.

Mr. Keene's letter to the D. of Whar-ton has already appeared in the Gent. Mag. vol. L. p. 366.

At the late Sessions at the Old Bailey, three of the most remarkable Criminal Causes came on to be tried that have ever been remembered at one Sessions. Such an unusual addition of Materials to the Month, with others which cannot be omitted, has made a Supplement to the present Year, though not intended, absolutely necessary.

1. KENNETH MACKENZIE.

KENNETH MACKENZIE was indicted by the name of Kenneth Mackenzie, late of London, Esq. for that he, on the 4th of August, in the 22d year of his present Majesty's reign, at Fort Mores, on the coast of Africa, in and upon Kenneth Murray Mackenzie did make an assault; and that he, with a certain great gun, called a cannon, then and there charged with gunpowder and iron ball, did discharge and shoot off, to and against the said Kenneth Murray Mackenzie, and with the said iron ball wilfully did strike, penetrate, and wound the said Kenneth Murray Mackenzie, giving him one mortal wound in the belly, of which he then and there instantly died.

Mr. Fielding, counsel for the prosecution, opened the indictment, and Mr. Attorney General stated the case: That the prisoner at the bar went out, about the beginning of the year 1782, captain of an independent company to act against the Dutch on the coast of Africa: That he was there appointed commander of a fort called Fort Mores, where the unfortunate deceased was for some offence or other confined a prisoner; and fearing the consequence of the discipline which the prisoner might inflict, prevailed upon the sentry to let him escape, and he took shelter in a town adjoining to the fort, called the Black Town. The prisoner, enraged at hearing of the man's escape, ordered the sentry to be most severely whipped, the guns to be charged and pointed against the town, threatening the inhabitants, by a message from the fort, that if they did not immediately restore the deceased, he would lay their town in ashes. This message had the desired effect, the blacks did the next morning bring back the deceased, and deliver him to the custody of the prisoner, who ordered him to prepare for instant death. The poor man, without any further trial, was ordered to be tied to a hand-spike, and there told his doom, to be blown into the air; and, while in that situation, he turned round and said to his comrade who held a lighted torch ready to set fire to the cannon that was to be the instrument of execution, Plunket, (that was the fellow's name,) you will not kill me, will you? Yes, said the other, I will, if my master bids me. This circumstance, said the Attorney General, shews the great degree of power which the prisoner at the bar must have had over his garrison, when the people who composed it could see an execution performed without trial, and without any legal condemnation, by a mode wholly unheard of in any European country, and which, he hoped, would never more be adopted in any country. He forebore, he said, to aggravate the offence; it would admit of no aggravation: he therefore should proceed to call the witnesses.

The first who was called was John Jones, a passenger on board an ordnance storeship: but the evidence of this man, being chiefly hearsay, was set aside. The most material witness was John Mortimer, a private man belonging to Capt. Mackenzie's company, who, being interrogated, said that he knew the deceased Kenneth Murray Mackenzie at Fort Mores, and that he was a prisoner at large there, and that he and the prisoner at the bar had some falling out, he could not tell upon what account; but that the deceased Murray one morning got out of the garrison; (Philip Brooks, the sentry, let him out.) And he heard Capt. Mackenzie say to serjeant Andrews, Go and fetch up that old rascal Brooks, for I will flog him to death, by G—. Then Capt. Mackenzie ordered the Serj. to write a pass for the witness, one W. Copeland, and another soldier, to go in search of the prisoner; they did go, but not so far as was ordered, for fear of being taken prisoners; so they came back without finding him, and told the prisoner they could not find Murray.

Being asked, If Fort Mores was near the Black Town? said, It is close to it. They went through the town, he said, but did not search for him there—they returned about three in the afternoon. The Captain said, if you cannot find him, load the guns, and fire into the town. Two six-pounders were fired into the town, and some of the Blacks came to know the occasion. Being interrogated, said, next morning they heard a noise a little after five, and coming to look about, saw the deceased, with at least 3000 Blacks, if ever there was a man in the world, and the deceased was in the middle. This was on a Sunday. The deceased was brought into the court belonging to the fort; and the prisoner charged Serj. Copeland to tell him that he had not an hour to live. The prisoner then ordered two sponges and a worm to be lashed to the embrasures, and a gun to be hauled in; and Copeland was ordered to fetch up the deceased. As he was coming past the door where he used to be he said, Don't let me go any farther till I alter my station; if I am going to be shot like a dog, let me be shot like a man; he pulled off his gentleman's coat, and put on a grenadier's coat. Being brought to the battlements, he desired to speak with the Captain: the Captain, said he would not bear a word from him, for he was a traitor to his King and Country. Accordingly, says he to all the men that were there (about thirty), Soldiers, lay hold, and do your duty; they accordingly did lay hold, and brought him to the gun, tied his hands with one piece of the rope, rope, and his two legs with the other two pieces to the gun; his hands were then stretched out across the sponge and worm. The Captain ordered the soldiers to fetch a cap; but, there being none, he went and fetched his own. The deceased said to Copeland, For God's sake, beg for one half hour to say my prayers. The witness said, he heard the prisoner answer Copeland, No, you rascal, if any man speaks a word in his favour, I will blow his brains out immediately; he had then a pistol in his hand—but there was a little of the burial service of the dead read to him and the Lord's prayer; when the prisoner said, He shall have no more time given him, pull the prayer book away immediately, and pull the cap over his eyes. Then the deceased said, Oh tyrant! tyrant! now you are going to have your will of me, what you have wanted many a long day. As the man was putting the cap over his eyes, which took up some time, his head being too big for it, the deceased cried out, Oh God, have mercy upon me! Then he said, Good bye to you all, comrades, and God bless you all. Another word he said, Remember the last syllable I am going to speak: I went down to the Black fellow at the gate, to get a little brandy; I drank it, went down to the garden, to take a walk; I sat down, and fell fast asleep: when I awoke at dark, and was coming to the fort, the Blacks surrounded me, confined me all night, and surrendered me this morning. The prisoner waved his hand as a signal, Plunket touched the gun with a lighted stick, and the deceased was blown over the wall, torn all to pieces. The witness said, he saw his remains afterwards, which the men picked up, and buried.

The Court asked, if Plunket was to appear? It was answered, Plunket was dead.

On Mortimer's cross-examination by the prisoner's counsel, being asked if he never had heard any conversation between the deceased Murray and any of the other soldiers of the garrison, said, Never otherwise than this: I was in a room that had a hole in it; he, being a gentleman, thought himself above me; so, if any body came to him, I used to walk out. A day or two after Murray was shot, Capt. Mackenzie came below: there were a good many men of us below. Well, my lads, says he, if I had not done this what I have done, you, and all of us, would have been dead long enough before this.

Q. You said the garrison consisted of about thirty: were they soldiers?—They were some of all sorts: some from the Savoy, some from the hulks, and some were volunteers.

Q. Would there have been any difficulty in confining a man in Morea castle?—No! When the man was shot, there were two men in the slave-hole, but it would have held more.

Q. You said, Brooks was whipped for suffering the deceased to escape; how many lashes might he have had?—It was computed (nobody could count them) that he had 1500, or more.

Q. Might not the prisoner have been tried by a court martial?—There were no King's officers, to try him.

Q. How is the slave-hole secured?—There were three doors: the outer door had a bar and a padlock.

Q. How many convicts had you at that time?—About two convicts to one volunteer.

Q. Did you not hear that the convicts meant to murder Captain Mackenzie?—I did hear that.

Q. What do you know of any conspiracy?—I never heard, so help me God, only since I have been in England.

Job Cooper sworn.

He saw the man tied up at the muzzle of the gun, and saw the carcass after it was shot away. He was the man that went and fetched the prayer book for him before he was shot. He heard Murray Mackenzie, a couple of days before the affair happened, come out of his room door, and say, Now is the time; let us do him out and out. He was then talking to one Serj. Andrews, a convict; who is since dead. The witness was very uneasy, and told the Captain. Being asked as to the situation of the fort, said, The greatest number were Convicts. Being asked if there was any danger of a mutiny, said, a great many deserted.

Q. If the deceased and his comrades had deserted, would the fort have been in danger?—Most certainly, had it not been peaceable times.

Attorney General. Was not you examined respecting a charge against Captain Mackenzie?—Yes. Did you say a word of this before?—I never was asked, and did not think of it.

Philip Brooks sworn.

He was sentinel at the gate of Fort Morea when Murray Mackenzie made his escape, and, as it was computed by the men, received fifteen hundred lashes by way of punishment. Being asked by the prisoner's counsel if he remembered any papers, signed by the soldiers, relative to the execution of Mackenzie, said, Never at that time: there was a paper afterwards, but he knew not the contents.

Court. Did not you before that time know of a conspiracy to seize the Captain?—Never: but before the man was shot, he heard the convicts say, who were in a cluster together, Now is the time, let us hustle him; now is the time, let us do him. Being asked if he told the Captain this before the man was executed, his answer was, No. Being asked, if Murray Mackenzie was among the group?—To be sure he was.

Being asked, by the Attorney General if he had been called upon by any body since he came to town, said, He had drunk with a gentleman at the White Horse. What did he want with you?—The prisoner's counsel objected to this.

Daniel

Daniel Monro sworn.

He reported a conversation between him and Job Cooper, some months after the execution of the deceased, when Cooper told him, that he being ill, and lying down at the Serjeant's door upon a mat, some time before the execution of Murray Mackenzie, he heard Serjeant Murray and Serjeant Andrews say, D——him, I have a brace of pistols that will do for him:—and if they will not do for him, says the other, I have got a sword. Cooper further told him that he had acquainted the Captain with it, and that the Captain, out of bodily fear, had walked all night upon the rampart with a pistol in his hand. Mr. Monro was then asked, by the Attorney General, if he was not the gentleman who had taken Cooper to the White Horse the other day?—He had seen him there. He was then asked, if he meant to swear that Cooper told him, at that time, that he heard Murray say he had got a brace of pistols, and, if that would not do, the other had a sword? His answer was, I swear he did say so then.

Job Cooper called up again.

Being interrogated by the counsel for the prosecution, what were the words he told Monro he heard, when lying on a mat before Murray's door, said, the words were these: Now is the time, I will do him out and out. Being asked farther, if ever he did hear Andrews say to Murray, or Murray say to Andrews, I have a brace of pistols, and if they will not do for him, I have a sword, or any thing like that? His answer was, To the best of my knowledge, I did not.

Serjeant Coupland sworn.

He knew the deceased at Fort Morea—the whole garrison approved of his execution, and signed a paper in justification of the Captain's conduct. [This paper was produced in Court, and the witness's name stood at the head; but he did not see it signed, and it was not admitted as evidence.] Coupland said farther, that Murray had acted as Adjutant; that he had deserted three times, but had never acted as Adjutant after his first desertion.

Thomas Mapley sworn.

He was Adjutant at Fort Morea, and lived in the same room with the deceased Murray Mackenzie, who had often wished to desert, and to take him and the rest of his comrades with him. Murray said, he had a friend at the Mines Town (a Dutch settlement). He frequently threatened to destroy the prisoner, and had determined to desert, having sent all his clothes by a Black man, to take them to a Dutch fort. Being asked, if his cloaths were gone, how his grenadier's coat came to be left behind? and whether he was executed in his own cloaths, or those of any other man? the prisoner interposed, and said he could account for that; the Black man, who carried away the cloaths, was the person who had apprized him of the conspiracy; and, if it had not been for that, he had not then been in court.

The counsel for the prisoner then called gentlemen to his character.

General Townshend gave him the character of a good officer: that his company chiefly consisted of convicts, owing to the necessity of the service; that they remained some time in the river; and that the reports which he constantly received from the prisoner, were very much to his own credit and the General's satisfaction.

Captain Lane sworn.

He had known the prisoner eight months, four months of which he was under his immediate command. There never was a more desperate crew than that which he took aboard with him. It was his opinion, and he often mentioned it to General Townshend, that they never would let him get to Africa.

Here the counsel for the prosecution thought it unnecessary to trouble the Court with any more witnesses; and the Court was proceeding to sum up the evidence, when the prisoner informed the Court, that the two principal witnesses against him (viz. Mortimer and Cooper), on or about the 4th of September last, came to him in Newgate and one of them (meaning Mortimer), with the most horrid imprecations, called upon Almighty God to d—n him, if he did not hang him [the prisoner], unless he gave him one hundred pounds.

This fact the prisoner pretty well established; and it came out that Mortimer had, the day before the trial, been introduced to the prisoner in Newgate, with whom he had had some conversation; and Mortimer, being called, owned that, if a hundred pounds had been tendered to him, he would have taken it, but would have spoken the truth, and pocketed the money. This, however, did not seem to have much weight with the Court; and the Judge proceeded to sum up the evidence, which he did with much candour.

Of the execution of the deceased by order of the prisoner, he said, there remained not the least doubt. But there were two points for the Jury to consider respecting that execution, namely, whether it might or might not be agreeable to the principles of martial law, or, whether it might not be justified on the principle of self-defence, and for the protection of his Majesty's fort and garrison. As to the first point, that of martial law, the Judge said, he could not see how that could avail the prisoner, for he had not taken one step in conformity to it; for supposing the power of life to have been lodged in this single officer, he had not taken one legal step. he had not summoned the man properly before him, to hear what he had to say, or called upon him to make his defence, or to explain the motives for his conduct; but had immediately ordered him to be had to the mouth of a cannon, and blown off, a kind of punishment which may have been practised in Asia, but could not be warranted by any any law of this country; the prisoner therefore cannot justify himself by the martial law.

As to the other point, how far this execution might be necessary for self-defence and the protection of his Majesty's fort and garrison, that plea seems to carry more weight; his situation was critical; the men that he commanded, according to the description given of them by Gen. Townshend and Capt. Lane, were a set of desperate fellows; that there was a conspiracy among them, to do the prisoner, or to do him out and out, is proved by three witnesses; if therefore you think this is true, and that there was an absolute necessity to make such an example, this in some measure may justify the act itself; for supposing the case of a Captain sailing to the coast of Africa with a company of convicts, and a mutiny among them had taken place, or was suspected; and one more daring than the rest appeared to be at the head of it: in such case, should the Captain have called for that man up, and have shot him dead, perhaps it would have been thought self-defence, and the Capt. would have been justified; and upon that ground, if you think the prisoner's life, and the protection of his Majesty's fort and garrison, depended on the execution of the man in the manner you have heard in evidence, you will acquit the prisoner. As to the mode of execution, it is only severe in appearance, for perhaps there cannot possibly be an easier death devised, as the whole human frame is dissolved in a moment.

The Jury went out, and, after two hours consultation, brought in their verdict, Guilty of the wilful murder; but, in consideration of the desperate crew the Captain had to command, they wish to recommend him to his Majesty's mercy.

The Recorder, in pronouncing the sentence was very pathetic. He reminded the prisoner of the abuse of that power with which he was entrusted, to hurry, by a violent and hasty order, in a new and unprecedented manner, an unfortunate wretch into eternity, untried, unheard, unprepared; that he had, of himself, taken upon himself to do that which even his Royal Master could not lawfully have done; and that the crime which he had committed had appeared, in the eyes of a very attentive and merciful Jury, deserving the verdict which they have decided upon.

Extract of a Letter from a Person who was saved when the Antelope India Packet, Capt. Wilson, was cast away upon a Rock in the South Seas, in August 1783.

I HAVE unfortunately been one of the fifty who have suffered an unparalleled shipwreck, on a savage coast in the South Seas, on the 10th of August, 1783. At midnight, the ship Antelope, under a pressingsail, struck on a reef of rocks, five leagues distant from the land, called Paline. Her dangerous situation instantly put us under the necessity of hazarding our lives on shore to the mercy of the savages. It pleased God we landed safe the following evening, with the loss of only one man, on a small uninhabited island, some little distance from the main. Three days after we had secreted ourselves in a small cave, the natives discovered us, and at first intended to make us their slaves, as we saw they had done some Malays from a pirate snow, wrecked on the same rocks ten months previous to our disaster; but seeing the muskets we had brought, and knowing them to be our protection, from the report the Malays had given of their use and execution when in English hands, they were fearful of attacking us. On the 5th day their King brought near 2000 men in arms. He secreted the major part of them at the back of the island, and entered the cove with about 700 unarmed. After a few hours stay in great admiration (having never before seen white men), he returned to the back of the island for the night, leaving many of his subjects with us, who alarmed us the whole night with their war songs.

Next morning he entered the cove with some of his people to make the attack; in about an hour he took to his canoe in haste, at the same time we saw many coming thro' the woods. We now expected the war-hoop to be given; every Englishman was ready with his musquet, and the Chinese with cutlass and pikes in military order—this struck them with terror how to proceed. The King harangued a long time to his people, then paddled out of the cove, and sent for Capt. Wilson, demanding to know if we were friends or enemies; this was answered friends—then you must go to war against our enemies, who are more numerous than we are, or take the chance of war with us. It was well known that we were entirely in the King's power, and could not water without his permission; that he might besiege the island, and make us glad to surrender; therefore the issue of a consultation was to acquaint him that we would take up arms against his enemies; and we engaged in four horrid actions, in which a vast number of poor souls were killed. Our King fortunately gained every battle, and, before we left the island, the whole country was subject to his government.

Their wars are truly bloody; they fight with darts and spears thrown by a sling, and do great execution, engage a tide, and give no quarter; and several of the enemy were taken prisoners, and put to death immediately in a most cruel manner. I will only give instances of two; the first had his arm chopped off at his elbow with a hatchet, and beat about the head with it till he died, and was then paddled along shore to shew others their fate. The other, a man of family, called a Roupack, wore a white polished bone on his wrist (a mark of rank): this bone they attempted to take off, which he resisted, by expanding his fingers; they then chopped off off his hand at the wrist, and the bone was worn by the person who committed the act, and he was promoted to the rank to which the prisoner was entitled. After his body was pierced through in several places with a sword of iron-wood, they cut off his head, tied it to a bamboo, and placed it in the King's palace.

After the first victory the King granted us leave to build a vessel with the tools we had saved for that purpose to carry us to China, our desired port, but always to be ready to go to war when he demanded it. In thirteen weeks after our misfortune, we completely built a schooner, which, by great providence, carried us safe to Macao, a Portuguese settlement near China, in 18 days, a very quick passage; there she was sold for 700 dollars at public outcry, which was divided amongst the crew. The Walpole Indiaman arrived here soon afterwards, and conveyed us to China. We suffered greatly during our fatigue, for want of provisions, existing on a short allowance of boiled rice and water, dreadful in a climate so near the equator. Had any accident attended the launch of our schooner, we must have remained on the island with the King; for what tools we had kept from the Indians were now rendered useless, and our provisions expended. The great contrivance hit on to complete such a vessel, and management of the crew, do much honour to our Commander, who is an ingenious, enterprising, and worthy, man. Our conferences with the King, till we acquired the language, was by our linguist in Malay to the King's Malay slaves. The King much wishes to establish the English customs among his people, and has sent one of his family to England with us, who is now arrived by the Morse Indiaman, and lives at the Captain's house at Rotherhithe. One Englishman remains till this young Chief returns.

MR. URBAN,

Hinckley, Jan. 4.

YOUR Review of the Philosophical Transactions (G. Mag. vol. LIII. p. 857), having induced me to consider the effects of lightning on the poor-house at Heckingham, permit me to offer a few observations upon that subject.

It appears from the printed account that this house of industry was situated on a rising ground; massy buildings approach the clouds, and by their attraction may the sooner be within striking distance. It appears also, from the committee appointed to examine the poor-house, that it was furnished with eight conductors, and that these pointed iron rods were much corroded and covered with a thick coat of rust. This would greatly hinder the purposes for which they were intended; as we may observe in experiments at the electrical machine, that after great explosions, the polish or bright part where the stroke is made is clouded by the explosion, and in nice experiments required to be restored; therefore the coat of rust inclosing the iron rods would in a great measure hinder their effects as attractors. To attract and draw down a constant stream of lightning from a thunder-cloud, &c. it seems necessary that each rod should be furnished with one or more points, and that they should be sharp and as free from rust as possible; for should they be blunted by rust otherwise, then, instead of a regular stream, we may expect strokes when the cloud is within striking distance. That points will draw at a much greater distance than blunted metal or balls seems very evident; for, from the prime conductor, in a dark room, we may observe a point draw at a much greater distance than a knob or ball, though it should be of no more than one-tenth of an inch in diameter. It appears also that the conductors or rods were conveyed under ground, into the drains appointed for carrying off water, &c. and lodged on the brickwork, and their extremities communicating with air. I should think water or moist earth much better, be the clouds in a negative or positive state, as we find dry brick but a bad conductor.

Yours, &c.

Playhouse Anecdote, which is no otherwise interesting, than as it may serve hereafter to show with what Violence the Introduction of a Soldier, into an English Theatre, to the assistance of the civil power, was resented by the whole Audience.

A LADY and gentleman, both young and elegant in their appearance, stepped into a front row in the green boxes, where a servant was keeping places for his master. When the gentleman came with his company, the box-keeper civilly begged the couple to yield the seat; but the lady, who by her dialect appeared to be a Caledonian, said she would not remove, as the servant told her he was keeping only one place for his master, and there was a seat reserved for him. The box-keeper told her, this was a mistake, as the row was kept; and the gentleman being preremptory to have his places, the keeper said he hoped they would not drive him to the necessity of making them forcibly withdraw. The lady was positive, and a constable was sent for, who laying hold of the husband, the lady gave him a blow, which, in the phrase of boxing, was literally a black eye. The constable retreated, and brought in a soldier. The matter now became serious: the lady placed her husband behind her, and declared that no man should strike him, and that since they used these means they would not yield. The soldier struck both the gentleman and lady, but he was himself thrust out of the house by the company. In the end, however, the lady and gentleman were dragged out by superior and collective strength. The lady's cloak, head-dress, gown, and every thing, were first torn from her shoulders, and and she was conveyed to the Lobby spent with fatigue, but not subdued in spirit. The proper company then took their places, and Mr. Davies came on to speak the Prologue; but the house rose into a general clamour, and he was forced to retire. Mr. Lewis came on, and endeavoured to quiet the disturbance by explaining the matter to the house—that is, by telling them that the lady and gentleman who had usurped the places previously engaged were taken out, and that the proper company being now in the seats, he hoped the house would suffer the play to proceed. The house exclaimed, that that was not the cause of their discontent—it was the appearance of a soldier to which they objected, and because that soldier had struck the lady. Mr. Lewis retired—Mr. Davies tried again to speak the Prologue, and was driven off—They then strove to begin the play without the Prologue, and Miss Younge came forward, and after some minutes was suffered to speak—She begged that they might understand the house. What was the offence, and to what did the audience object? A gentleman from the side-boxes said, “Our complaint is shortly this, that with your French play [“Follies of a Day,” translated by Mr. Holcroft], you are introducing French manners. This is an English theatre, and we will suffer no soldiers to be employed here. The intruders should have been withdrawn by the servants of the house.”—Miss Younge and Mr. Bonner were obliged to retire. After some time Mr. Davies came on again, and was again driven off. Mr. Lewis then advanced, and said, “Gentlemen, As far as I can collect the sense of the house, you complain that a soldier should have been introduced to settle the disturbance. Is that your complaint?” The Pit and Boxes declared, that that was their only offence. “Then (continues Mr. Lewis) I do assure you that the soldier was indiscreetly brought in by the peace-officer without the orders, and without the knowledge, of any person engaged in the official management of the theatre. We disclaim all share in the act; we are very sorry that it has happened, and we hope you will believe that we shall never countenance the introduction of soldiery to this house.”

This address was received with great pleasure; and when Mr. Davies came on, to shew that their quarrel was not with him, they welcomed him with reiterated applause; and the play went on without interruption.

MR. URBAN,

THE method of obtaining liberty, in this country, to change or alter names, is either by act of parliament, or by grant under the King's sign manual; and took place, I believe, not long before the Revolution, but is now become so general, that it is an historical event in almost every family in the kingdom, and seems as necessary to be known as births, marriages, death, &c. When done by virtue of the King's sign manual, it is always published in the London Gazette; and I fancy an account thereof from time to time, inserted in your Magazine, would oblige many of your readers, as well as

MR. TYERS informs us, that Dr. Johnson “saw better with one eye than the other,” but forbears to account for this unequal ability in his organs of sight. I beg leave therefore at once to supply our Rhapsodist's deficiency, and confirm his valuable anecdote by assuring him his late friend had, for many years, lost one of his eyes, and consequently could only see with its companion. He himself did not recollect the exact period when he became acquainted with this visual defect, which (as it happened through no external violence) might, for some time, have escaped even his own observation. When one eye, however, is extinguished, the other may be regarded as its heir at law, inheriting the powers of a departed relation—unus sese armat utroque. This scrap from Strada is not much to the purpose, but Mr. Tyers loves a quotation.

VOLUME LV.

For the YEAR MDCCLXXXV.

PART THE FIRST.

PRODESSE & DELECTARE

E PLURIBUS UNUM.

By SYLVANUS URBAN, Gent.

L O N D O N:

Printed by JOHN NICHOLS, for DAVID HENRY, late of St. John's Gate; and sold by ELIZ. NEWBERRY, the Corner of St. Paul's Church- Yard, Ludgate-Street. 1785.

Instruments to fulfil the great Scheme of Providence, is certainly ill founded. If Eniomet will review the Subject, and reduce his Observations to a moderate Length, they shall be inserted.—Hermes against Scepticism and Infidelity, in quoting Julian, has called to his Assistance a feeble Support. That Emperor never acknowledged the Divinity of Christ, though he may be said to yield to the irresistible Force of his Precepts.—M. Lemoine's Queries concerning the Ascension of Elijah are shrewd. "If his Mantle fell, why fell not the Rest of his Garments?" Is Elijah dead or living? If dead, what became of his Body and Cloaths? If living, where and in what Place is he resident?" By the Tenor of twelve such Queries M. Lemoine seems to doubt the Reality of the whole Story. If Elijah was a Magician, which these Queries seem to imply, he certainly was one of the first Quality.—Senex's String of Biographical Characters may be narrowed. Some Account of Thomas Johnson the Herbalist; Charles Hayes the Chronologist, Alexander Cruden the Corrector, Peter Porret and Emanuel Swedenburg, celebrated Mystics, and of John Swinton the Orientalist, would be highly acceptable, no doubt, to the Public.—B. R.'s Remarks on the State of Learning in England till the Fourteenth Century, if warranted, would be of itself a full Confirmation of Rowley's Ignorance in the Greek Language, and consequently decisive on the Question of his not being the Author of the Battle of Hastings; but, as that Point has been given up, the bare Mention of B. R.'s Part in that Controversy may suffice.—The Armorial Bearings in the Chancel of Danbury Church in Essex, of which no Notice is taken in Morant's History of that County, as they may be esteemed curious by some of our Readers, shall be inserted.—The Scribleriad, No IX. is fraught with the Researches of a contemplative Mind, narrowed only for Want of Opportunities to enlarge the Field of Knowledge, of which the Author seems in ardent Pursuit. There is one Observation, on the Productions of the Torrid Zone, which we do not remember to have seen warranted, and that is, that the Trunks of the Calabash Tree are frequently Eighty Feet in Circumference!—An Old Yeoman thinks it extraordinary that a Man of independent Fortune and liberal Education should be censured (see Vol. LIV. p. 812.) for assuming the Title of MR. when Taylors, Hair-dressers, Dancing-masters, and Chimney-sweepers, set up their Carriages, and assume the Title of ESQUIRE, though some of them can scarcely write or read. He observes, that Carriages and Squireships are now joined together like Man and Wife; and though Folly has joined them together, yet Reason and Propriety cannot put them asunder. This Old Yeoman is a strong Advocate for Sunday Schools, as indeed what good Man is not!—A Lancashire Parish Priest is one of those, he says, who confesses himself no great Friend to Systematical Confessions of Faith, and Multiplication of Creeds, which, he thinks, have been of no great Service to the Cause of pure and undefiled Religion. Of the Three Creeds of the Church of England, he wishes it were well rid of One of them [the Athanasian], as the thinking Part of both Clergy and Laity join in wishing it expunged from the Book of Common Prayer.—A Psalm-Singer, but no Republican, is much offended, as he justly may, with the Charge that "Psalm-singing and Republicanism naturally go together." If so, he thinks the watchful Guardians of our civil and religious Liberties should by all Means annihilate every Species of Church Music, from the devotional Chaunting in our Cathedrals down to the sleepy Drawling of our Country Churches.—H. H. is an Advocate for the Admission of all, who, by their Learning, their Abilities, their moral Character, and their Motives, are qualified, into Holy Orders; and that no civil Employment, whether Servers of Ale, or Helpers at an Inn, should exclude them, when so qualified, from ministering in the Temple to Holy Things. (See an Address to the Lord Bishop of Chester, Vol. LII. p. 296.)—N— contends, that 1 Tim. vi. 6, ought to have been rendered, "Godliness with a Competency is great Gain." This he supports as well by the natural Meaning of the Word εὐταξία, as by a narrow Inspection of the Context. This Writer is well read in Scripture, but rather too prolix for a limited Miscellany, where every Writer of equal Merit has a Claim to a share of the Room.

X. Y. Z. and the other Friends, who enquire after our RE-PUBLICATION, may be assured it is only postponed, not broken off. The Perfidy of knavish Servants, who stole, and sold for Waste Paper, what will cost much Time and Expence to prepare again for the Public. has unavoidably occasioned a longer Interruption than we could possibly foresee. Nor is the GENERAL INDEX by any Means forgotten.

T H E

Gentleman's Magazine;

For JANUARY, 1785.

BEING THE FIRST NUMBER OF VOL. LV. PART I.

MR. URBAN,

Jan. 4.

THE early part of Dr. Johnson's literary life is acknowledged to be that which would be most generally curious, and of which it is to be feared the means of information are the most scanty. In some degree to supply this desideratum, I send you eight of his letters, written in that period, to his firm friend and early patron the original projector of The Gentleman's Magazine; and shall be happy if they are the means of bringing forward any similar communications from such of your very early correspondents as have survived their contemporary friend. The Rev. Mr. Moses Browne, the pious writer of the Sunday Thoughts; the learned antiquary Paul Gemesse (who still adorns your pages as T. Row); the excellent Miss Carter, whom he celebrated in a Greek epigram *To Eliza; and some other of your original contributors, may possibly condescend "to fill "a column" with their tribute to the memory of an old associate. The propriety of such communications to the periodical work which his own masterly hand so frequently adorned must be obvious.

One little circumstance, which has nowhere yet appeared in print, I can relate to you on the best authority. In 1736 Dr. J. had a particular inclination to have been engaged as an assistant to the Rev. Mr. Budworth, then head master of the Grammar-school at Brewood in Staffordshire, "an excellent person, "who possessed every talent of a perfect "instructor of youth, in a degree which," [to use the words of one of the brightest ornaments of literature †,] "has been "rarely found in any of that profession "since the days of Quintilian." Mr. Budworth, "who was less known in his "life-time, from that obscure situation "to which the caprice of fortune oft "condemns the most accomplished characters, than his highest merit deserved," had been bred under Mr. Blackwell at Market Bosworth, where Johnson was some time an usher; which might naturally lead to the application. Mr. Budworth was certainly no stranger to the learning or abilities of Johnson; as he more than once lamented his having been under the necessity of declining the engagement, from an apprehension that the paralytic affection, under which our great Philologist laboured through life, might become the object of imitation or of ridicule, among his pupils.

Yours, &c. J. NICHOLS.

I. SIR,

Nov. 25, 1734.

AS you appear no less sensible than your readers of the defects of your Poetical Article, you will not be displeased, if, in order to the improvement of it, I communicate to you the sentiments of a person, who will undertake on reasonable terms sometimes to fill a column.

His opinion is, that the publick won't not give you a bad reception, if, beside

* See Gent. Mag. vol. VIII. p. 210; and see hereafter, p. 5. N.

† See the Dedication to Bp. Hurd's edition of "Horace's Epistles to the Pisos, &c." ed. 1766, p. vii. Some further account of Mr. Budworth, who died in 1745, would be an acceptable communication to the learned world. N.

the current wit of the month, which a critical examination would generally reduce to a narrow compass, you admitted not only poems, inscriptions, &c. never printed before, which he will sometimes supply you with; but likewise short literary dissertations in Latin or English, critical remarks on authors ancient or modern, forgotten poems that deserve revival, or loose pieces, like Floyer's, worth preserving. By this method your literary article, for so it might be called, will, he thinks, be better recommended to the public, than by low jests, awkward buffoonery, or the dull scurrilities of either party.

If such a correspondence will be agreeable to you, be pleased to inform me in two posts*, what the conditions are on which you shall expect it. Your late offer† gives me no reason to distrust your generosity. If you engage in any literary projects besides this paper, I have other designs to impart, if I could be secure from having others reap the advantage of what I should hint.

Your letter, by being directed to S. Smith, to be left at the Castle in Birmingham, Warwickshire, will reach

Your humble servant.

2. Greenwich, next Door to the Golden Heart, Church-street, July 12, 1737.

SIR,

HAVING observed in your papers very uncommon offers of encouragement to men of letters, I have chosen, being a stranger in London, to communicate to you the following design, which, I hope, if you join in it, will be of advantage to both of us.

The History of the Council of Trent having been lately translated into French, and published with large Notes by Dr. Le Courayer, the reputation of that book is so much revived in England, that, it is presumed, a new translation of it from the Italian, together with Le Courayer's Notes from the French, could not fall of a favourable reception.

If it be answered, that the History is already in English; it must be remembered, that there was the same objection against Le Courayer's undertaking, with this disadvantage, that the French had a version by one of their best translators, whereas you cannot read three pages of the ~~English~~ History without discovering that the style is capable of great improvements; but whether those improvements are to be expected from this attempt, you must judge from the specimen, which, if you approve the proposal, I shall submit to your examination.

Suppose the merit of the versions equal, we may hope that the addition of the Notes will turn the balance in our favour, considering the reputation of the Annotator.

Be pleased to favour me with a speedy answer, if you are not willing to engage in this scheme; and appoint me a day to wait upon you, if you are. I am, Sir, your humble servant, SAM. JOHNSON.
3. No 6, Castle-street. Wednesday Morning,

~~SIR,~~ [No date. 1738.]

WHEN I took the liberty of writing to you a few days ago, I did not expect a repetition of the same pleasure so soon; for a pleasure I shall always think it to converse in any manner with an ingenious and candid man; but having the inclosed poem in my hands to dispose of for the benefit of the author (of whose abilities I shall say nothing, since I fear you his performance), I believed I could not procure more advantageous terms from any person than from you, who have so much distinguished yourself by your generous encouragement of poetry; and whose judgement of that art nothing but your commendation of my trifles can give me any occasion to call in question. I do not doubt but you will look over this poem with another eye, and reward it in a different manner, from a mercenary bookseller, who counts the lines he is to purchase, and considers nothing but the bulk. I cannot help taking notice, that, besides what the author may hope for on account of his abilities, he has likewise another claim to your regard, as he lies at present under very disadvantageous circumstances of fortune. I beg therefore that you will favour me with a letter to-morrow, that I may know what you can afford to allow him, that he may either part with it to you, or find out (which I do not expect) some other way more to his satisfaction.

I have only to add, that as I am sensible I have transcribed it very coarsely, which, after having altered it, I was obliged to do, I will, if you please to trans-split the sheets from the press, correct it for you; and will take the trouble of altering any stroke of satire which you may dislike.

By exerting on this occasion your usual generosity, you will not only encourage learning, and relieve distress, but (though it be in comparison of the other motives of very small account) oblige in a very sensible manner, Sir, your very humble servant, SAM. JOHNSON.

4. SIR, [No date.]

I WAITED on you to take the copy to Doddsley's: as I remember the number of lines which it contains, it will be longer than Eugenio†, with the quotations, which must be subjoined at the bottom of the page, part of the beauty of the performance (if any beauty he allowed it) consisting in adapting Juvenal's sentiments to modern facts and persons. It will, with those additions, very conveniently make five sheets. And since the expence will be no more, I shall contentedly insure it, as I mentioned in my last. If it be not therefore gone to Doddsley's, I beg it may be sent me by the penny-post, that I may have it in the evening. I have composed a Greek Epigram to Eliza, and think she ought to be celebrated in as many different languages as Lewis le Grand. Pray send me word when you will begin upon the Poem, for it is a long way to walk. I would leave my Epigram, but have not day-light to transcribe it. I am, Sir, yours, &c.

SAM. JOHNSON.

5. SIR, [No date.]

I AM extremely obliged by your kind letter, and will not fail to attend you to-morrow with Irene, who looks upon you as one of her best friends.

I was to day with Mr. Doddsley, who declares very warmly in favour of the paper you sent him, which he desires to have a share in, it being, as he says, a creditable thing to be concerned in. I knew not what answer to make till I had consulted you, nor what to demand on the Author's part, but am very willing that, if you please, he should have a part in it, as he will undoubtedly be more diligent to disperse and promote it. If you can send me word to-morrow what I shall say to him, I will settle matters, and bring the Poem with me for the press, which, as the town empties, we cannot be too quick with. I am, Sir, yours, &c.

SAM. JOHNSON.

6. SIR, Wednesday.

I DID not care to detain your servant while I wrote an answer to your letter, in which you seem to insinuate that I had promised more than I am ready to perform. If I have raised your expectations by any thing that may have escaped my memory, I am sorry; and if you remind me of it, shall thank you for the favour. If I made fewer alterations than usual in the Debates‡, it was only because there appeared, and still appears to be, less need of alteration. The verses to Lady Firebrace may be had when you please, for you know that such a subject neither

* The poem, of satire, mentioned in this and the following letters, must doubtless have been our author's own "London," which was published by R. Doddsley in May 1738, and is recorded in our vol. VIII. p. 269, as "being remarkable for having got to the second edition in the space of a week." N.

† This letter must have been written in April 1738, as appears from an accidental memorandum on the back of it, and from the epigram to Eliza [Miss Carter], which was printed in that month's Magazine, p. 210, both in Greek and Latin. The three following letters were also written in 1738. N.

‡ "Eugenio, a Virtuoso and Happy Life, inscribed to Mr. Pope," published by Doddsley in April 1737. The author of this poem, a work by no means destitute of public spirit, and which had had the advantage of being corrected by Dean Swift (see the Supplement to his Works, vol. II. sm. 8vo, p. 459.) was Mr. Beach, a wine-merchant at Wrexham, in Denbighshire, a man of learning, of great humanity, of an easy fortune, and much respected. He is said by some to have entertained very blameable notions in religion; but this appears rather to be conjecture than a well-established fact. It is certain he was at times grievously afflicted with a terrible disorder in his head, to which his friends ascribed his melancholy exit. On the 17th of May, 1737, in less than a month after the publication of his poem, he cut his throat with such shocking resolution, that it was reported his head was almost severed from his body. This shocking catastrophe is thus mentioned by Abp. Herring (then Bp. of Bangor), in one of his Letters to Mr. Duncombe, p. 54. The verses you sent me are very sensible and touching: and the sentiments in them, I doubt not, exhilarated the blood for some time, and suspended the black execution; but his distemper, it may be said, got the better, and carried him off at last. I would willingly put the best construction upon these melancholy accidents, and thus leave the sufferers to the Father of Mercies." And an "Epilogue to Cato, for the Scholars at Wrexham, 1735," shews how much better Mr. Beach could think than act. N. § Those in the Senate of Lilibur. N.

down when you please to send, in which I do not recollect that you desired any alterations to be made.

An answer to another query I am very willing to write, and had consulted with you about it last night if there had been time; for I think it the most proper way of inviting such a correspondence as may be an advantage to the paper, not a load upon it.

As to the Prize Verses, a backwardness to determine their degrees of merit is not peculiar to me. You may, if you please, still have what I can say; but I shall engage with little spirit in an affair, which I shall hardly end to my own satisfaction, and certainly not to the satisfaction of the parties concerned‡.

As to Father Paul §, I have not yet been just to my Proposal, but have met with impediments, which, I hope, are now at an end; and if you find the progress hereafter not such as you have a right to expect, you can easily stimulate a negligent translator.

If any or all these have contributed to your discontent, I will endeavour to remove it; and desire you to propose the question to which you wish for an answer. I am, Sir, your humble servant,
SAM. JOHNSON.

7. DEAR SIR, [No date.]

I AM pretty much of your opinion, that the Commentary cannot be prosecuted with any appearance of success;
for as the names of the authors concerned are of more weight in the performance than its own intrinsic merit,
the publick will be soon satisfied with it.
And I think the Examen should be pushed forward with the utmost expedition. Thus, "This day, &c. An Examen of Mr. Pope's Essay, &c. containing a succinct Account of the Philosophy of Mr. Leibnitz on the System of the Fatalists, with a Confutation of their Opinions, and an Illustration of the Doctrine of Free-will ||;" [with what else you think proper].

This lady was Bridget 3d daughter of Philip Bacon, esq; of Ipswich, and relict of Philip Evers, esq; of that town. She became the second wife of Sir Cordell Firebrace, the last baronet of that name (to whom she brought a fortune of 25,000*l*.) July 26, 1737. Being again left a widow in 1759, she was a third time married, April, 7, 1762, to William Campbell, esq; uncle to the present duke of Argyle; and died July 3, 1782. N.

and Notes Theological, Historical, and Critical, from the French Edition of Dr. Le Cuy-rayer. To which are added, Observations on the History and Notes; and Illustrations from various Authors; both printed and manuscript. By S. Johnson. 1. The work will consist of two hundred sheets, and be two volumes in quarto, printed on good paper and let-

It will, above all, be necessary to take notice, that it is a thing distinct from the Commentary.

I was so far from imagining they stood still*, that I conceived them to have a good deal beforehand, and therefore was less anxious in providing them more. But if ever they stand still on my account, it must doubtless be charged to me; and whatever else shall be reasonable, I shall not oppose; but beg a suspension of judgment till morning, when I must intreat you to send me a dozen proposals, and you shall then have copy to spare. I am, Sir, yours, impransus,

SAM. JOHNSON.

Pray muster up the Proposals if you can, or let the boy recall them from the booksellers.

S. DEAR SIR, [No date.]

You may remember I have formerly talked with you about a Military Dictionary. The eldest Mr. Macbean, who was with Mr. Chambers, has very good materials for such a work, which I have seen, and will do it at a very low rate. I think the terms of War and Navigation might be comprised with good explanations in one 8vo Pica, which he is willing to do for twelve shillings a sheet, to be made up a guinea at the second impression. If you think on it, I will wait on you with him.

I am, Sir, your humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.

Pray lend me Topfel on Animals.

MR. URBAN,

Jan. 16.

YOUR Magazine has long been the literary storehouse for authentic fragments of eminent personages. In that view, you receive the following letters from Dr. Johnson to Dr. Birch. (to whom he addressed a Greek epigram in the Gent. Mag. vol. VIII. p. 654.) They are transcribed from the originals in the British Museum.

Yours, &c.

EUGENIO.

1. SIR, Thursday, Sept. 29, 1743.

I HOPE you will excuse me for troubling you on an occasion on which I know not whom else I can apply to; I am at a loss for the Lives and Characters of Earl Stanhope, the two Craggs, and the Minister Sunderland; and beg that you will inform [me] where I may find them, and send any pamphlets, &c. relating to them to Mr. Cave, to be perused for a few days by, Sir, your most humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.

2. SIR, Gough-square, May 12, 1750.

KNOWING that you are now preparing to favour the public with a new edition of Raleigh's miscellaneous pieces, I have taken the liberty to send you a Manuscript, which fell by chance within my notice. I perceive no proofs of forgery in my examination of it; and the owner tells me, that, as he has heard, the hand-writing is Sir Walter's: If you should find reason to conclude it genuine, it will be a kindness to the owner, a blind person †, to recommend it to the booksellers. I am, Sir, your most humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.

3. SIR, Nov. 4, 1752.

I BEG the favour that if you have any Catalogue by you, such as the Bibl. Thuaniana, or any other of value, that you will lend it for a few days to, Sir, your most humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.

If you leave it out, directed, he will call for it.

Examination of Mr. Pope's Essay on Man; containing a succinct View of the System of the Fatalists, and a Confutation of their Opinions; with an Illustration of the Doctrine of Free-will, and an Enquiry what View Mr. Pope might have in touching upon the Leibnitzian Philosophy and Fatalism. By Mr. Crousaz, Professor of Philosophy and Mathematicks at Lausanne, &c. Printed for A. Dodd, without Temple Bar, and sold by the Booksellers." See Gent. Mag. vol. VIII. pp. 608. 664. N.

"Crousaz was a professor of Switzerland, eminent for his treatise of Logick, and his Examen de Pyrronisme, and, however little known or regarded here, was no mean antagonist. His mind was one of those in which Philosophy and Piety are happily united. He was accustomed to argument and disquisition, and perhaps was grown too desirous of detecting faults; but his intentions were always right, his opinions were solid, and his religion pure. His incessant vigilance for the promotion of Piety disposed him to look with distrust upon all metaphysical systems of Theology, and all schemes of virtue and happiness purely rational; and therefore it was not long before he was persuaded that the positions of Pope, as they terminated for the most part in natural religion, were intended to draw mankind away from revelation, and to represent the whole course of things as a necessary concatenation of indissoluble fatality; and it is undeniable, that in many passages a religious eye may easily discover expressions not very favourable to morals, or to liberty." 6. SIR, March 29, 1755.
I HAVE sent some parts of my Dictionary; such as were at hand, for your inspection. The favour which I beg is, that if you do not like them you will say nothing. I am, Sir, your most affectionate humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.

7. To Mr. SAMUEL JOHNSON.
SIR, Norfolk Street, Apr. 3, 1755.
THE part of your Dictionary which you have favoured me with the sight of has given me such an idea of the whole, that I most sincerely congratulate the publick upon the acquisition of a work long wanted, and now executed with an industry, accuracy, and judgment, equal to the importance of the subject. You might perhaps have chosen one in which your genius would have appeared to more advantage; but you could not have fixed upon any other in which your labours would have done such substantial service to the present age and to posterity. I am glad that your health has supported the application necessary to the performance of so vast a task; and can undertake to promise you as one (though perhaps the only) steward of it, the approbation and thanks of every well-wisher to the honour of the English language. I am, with the greatest regard, Sir, your most faithful and most affectionate humble servant,

THO. BIRCH.

8. SIR, Saturday, Nov. 8, 1755.

MR. JOHNSON returns Dr. Birch's thanks for his book, which sickness has obliged him to keep beyond the time intended; and desires his acceptance of the Life of Sir Thomas Browne, by way [of] interest for the loan.

10. SIR, June 9, 1756.
HAVING obtained from Mr. Garrick a benefit for a gentlewoman† of learning, distressed by blindness, almost the only casualty that could have distressed her; I beg leave to trouble you, among my other friends, with some of her tickets. Your benevolence is well known, and was, I believe, never exerted on a more laudable occasion. I am, Sir, your most humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.

11. SIR, June 22, 1756.
BEING, as you will find by the Proposal; engaged in a work which requires the concurrence of my friends‡ to make it of much benefit to me, I have taken the liberty of recommending six receipts to your care, and do not doubt of your endeavour to dispose of them.

I have likewise a further favour to beg. I know you have been long a curious collector of books. If, therefore, you have any of the contemporaries or ancestors of Shakespeare, it will be of great use to lend me them for a short time; my stock of those authors is yet but curia supellex. I am, Sir, your obliged humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.

ORIGINAL LETTERS of DR. JOHNSON.

1. In the Life of Waller, Mr. Nichols will find a reference to the Parliamentary History, from which a long quotation is to be inserted. If Mr. Nichols cannot easily find the book, Mr. Johnson will send it from Streatham.

Clarendon is here returned.

2. You have now all Cowley. I have been drawn to a great length; but Cowley or [and] Waller never had any critical examination before. I am very far advanced in Dryden, who will be long too. The next great Life I purpose to be Milton's.

It will be kind if you will gather the Lives of Denham, Butler, and Waller, and bind them in half-binding in a small volume, and let me have it to shew my friends, as soon as may be. I sincerely hope the press shall stand no more*.

July 27, 1778. SAM. JOHNSON.

3. You have now the Life of Dryden, and you see it is very long. It must, however, have an Appendix. 1. The invocation to the Georgicks, from Milbourne. (This in the small print.) 2. Dryden's Remarks on Rymer; which are ready transcribed. 3. Dryden's letter, from Lambeth; which is promised me.

Aug. 1778.

4. Mr. Johnson will hope for Mr. Nichols's company to tea, about six this afternoon, to talk of the Index, and settle the terms.—Monday.

5. I am very well contented that the Index is settled; for though the price is low, it is not penurious. Mr. M. having been for some time out of business, is in some little perplexities, from which twelve guineas will set him free. This, we hope, you will advance; and, during the continuance of the work subject to your inspection, he desires a weekly payment of sixteen shillings, the rest to remain till it is completed.

Nov. 26, 1778. SAM. JOHNSON.

6. Mr. Johnson purposes to make his next attempt upon Prior, at least to consider him very soon; and desires that some volumes published of his papers, in two vols. 8vo. may be procured.

7. The Turtle and Sparrow can be but a Fable†. The Conversation I never read.

8. By some accident, I laid your note upon Duke up so safely that I cannot find it. Your informations have been of great use to me. I must beg it again; with another list of our authors, for I have laid that with the other. I have sent Stepney's Epitaph. Let me have the revises as soon as can be. [Dec. 1778.]

9. I have sent Philips, with his epitaphs to be inserted. The fragment of a Preface is hardly worth the impression but that we may seem to do something. It may be added to the Life of Philips. The Latin page is to be added to the Life of Smith. I shall be at home, to revise the two sheets of Milton.

March 1, 1779. SAM. JOHNSON.

* The first life that was begun at the press was that of Cowley, in December 1777. The progress made in July 1778 appears above. Butler was the life in which the Doctor at that time more particularly prided himself. Milton was begun in January 1779, and finished in six weeks.

† This refers to a hint given him in consequence of what is said in the Life of Prior, vol. III. p. 29. that of his "Tales there are only four."

10. Please to get me the last edition of Hughes's Letters; and try to get Dennis upon Blackmore, and upon Cato, and any thing of the same writer against Pope. Our materials are defective.

As Waller professed to have imitated Fairfax, do you think a few pages of Fairfax would enrich *our edition? Few readers have seen it, and it may please them †. But it is not necessary.

May 2, 1779. SAM. JOHNSON.

11. In examining this book, I find it necessary to add to the Life the Preface to the British Enchanters; and you may add, if you will, the notes on Unnatural Flights. I am, Sir, &c.—Friday.

12. There is a copy of verses by Fenton on the first Fit of the Gout, in Pope's Miscellanies, and, I think, in the last volumes of Dryden. In Pope's I am sure.

13. J. N. to Dr. J. "The Verses on the Gout are printed (from Fenton's Collection) in the Select Collection, 1780, vol. III. p. 177‡; but shall be copied if Dr. J. thinks proper. From the same publication of Fenton, J. N. has copied some other Poems of Fenton, herewith sent; which Dr. J. may like to see. He may depend on the Anecdotes of Fenton."

14. Ans. w. "I should have given Fenton's birth to Shelton § in Staffordshire, but that I am afraid there is no such place. The rest I have, except his Secretaryship, of which I know not what to make. When Lord Orrery was in an office, Lewis was his Secretary, Lewis lived in my time; I knew him. The Gout Verses were always given to Fenton, when I was young, and he was living. Lord Orrery told me that Fenton was his Tutor; but never thought he was his Father's Secretary ||. Pray let me see the Oxford and Cambridge [Verses], &c. [1707.] If you are sure it was published by Fenton, I shall take notice of it."

15. Mr. Johnson desires Mr. Nichols to send him Ruffhead's Life of Pope, Pope's Works, Swift's Works with Dr.

Hawkesworth's Life, Lyttelton's Works; and with these he hopes to have done. The first to be got is Lyttelton.

16. Mr. Johnson, being now at home, desires the last leaves of the Criticism on Pope's Epitaphs, and he will correct them. Mr. N. is intreated to save the proof sheets of Pope, because they are promised to a Lady ††, who desires to have them.

17. In reading Rowe in your edition, which is very impudently called mine †‡, I observed a little piece unnaturally and odiously obscene. I was offended, but was still more offended when I could not find it in Rowe's genuine volumes §§. To admit it, had been wrong; to interpolate it, is surely worse. If I had known of such a piece in the whole collection, I should have been angry. What can be done?

18. Mr. Johnson is obliged to Mr. Nichols for his communication |||, and must have Hammond again. Mr. Johnson would be glad of Blackmore's Essays for a few days.—May 24, 1780.

19. I have been out of order, but by bleeding and physic think I am better, and can go again to work. Your note on Broome  will do me much good. Can you give me a few dates for A. Philips? I wrote to Cambridge about them, but have had no answer.—June 16, 1780.

20. Dr. Warton tells me, that Collins's first piece ††† is in the Gent. Mag. for August 1739. In August there is no such thing. Amasius was at that time the poetical name of Dr. Swan, who translated Sydenham. Where to find Collins, I know not. I think I must make some short addition to Thomson's sheet, but will send it to-day.

21. This Life of Dr. Young was written by a friend of his son [Mr. Croft]. What is crossed with black is expunged by the author, what is crossed with red is expunged by me. If you find any thing more that can be well omitted, I shall not be sorry to see it yet shorter.

* This expression and a similar one in N^o 5. are thus marked, to prepare the reader for what is thrown out in N^o 17. where your edition refers, as these do, to that published by the body of booksellers in 68 volumes from a list repeatedly corrected by himself.

22. I expected to have found a Life of Lord Lyttelton prefixed to his works. Is there not one before the quarto edition? I think there is; if not, I am, with respect to him, quite aground.—Aug. 16.

23. I think you never need send back the revises unless something important occurs. Little things, if I omit them, you will do me the favour of setting right yourself. Our post is awkward, as you will find, and I fancy you will find it best to send two sheets at once.

Brighthelmston, Oct. 26, 1780.

27. My desire being to complete the sets of Lives which I have formerly presented to my friends, I have occasion for a few of the first volumes; of which, by some misapprehension, I have received a great number, which I desire to exchange for the latter volumes. I wish success to the new edition. Please to deliver to Mr. Steevens a complete set of the Lives in 12mo.—June 10, 1781.

28. Mr. Johnson, being much out of order, sent in search of the book, but it is not found. He will, if he is better, look himself diligently to-morrow. He thanks Mr. Nichols for all his favours.

Dec. 26, 1781.

29. Dear Sir, You somehow forgot the advertisement for the new edition. It was not inclosed. Of Gay's Letters † I see not that any use can be made, for they give no information of any thing. That he was a member of the Philosophical Society is something, but surely he could be but a corresponding member. However, not having his Life here, I know not how to put it in, and it is of little importance.

What will the Booksellers give me for this new edition? I know not what to ask. I would have 24 sets bound in plain calf, and figured with the number of the volumes. For the rest, they may please themselves. Oct. 28, 1782.

30. This is all that I can think on ‡, therefore send it to the press, and fare it well.

SAM. JOHNSON.

MR. URBAN,

THE discourses of the President of the Royal Academy not only display a profound knowledge of professional theory, but also contain many general incidental principles of all the finer arts. The student of poetry or eloquence may derive from them almost equal instruction with the painter. It is therefore with the greatest hesitation I venture to examine the justness of a decision made by so accurate an observer of human nature.

In the discourse delivered Dec. 10, 1772, he cautions the young artist against aiming at the union of contradictory excellences, which must necessarily be mutually exclusive of each other. He then censures some persons who have been fond of describing the expression of mixt passions, which they fancied to exist in some favourite work. Such expression he pronounces to be out of the reach of art; and only ascribed to such works by persons, who not being of the profession know not what can or cannot be done.

What Sir Joshua Reynolds declares to be beyond the reach of art, it is indeed hardiness not to admit as impracticable; yet as the question does not turn on the technical skill of a painter so much as on the powers of the human countenance, it may not be improper to discuss it.

I must first observe, that the examples of false judgement taken by the President from Pliny relate to fixed, habitual, characteristic qualities, not to passions occasionally exerted.

But to come near to the question: Can it be doubted, that every indication of inward emotion which the countenance is capable of assuming, the pencil of the painter can imitate on the canvas?

If this maxim be incontrovertible, as I think it is, we have only to enquire, whether in fact the countenance ever expresses a mixture of emotions? While the soul is affected by any passion, if it be assailed by another of a different or discordant nature, the former will either give way, or contend for predominance. In the first case, there will be a moment of fluctuation, during which the expression will be uncertain; that of the former not being totally effaced, nor the other yet exclusively ascendant. Thus the lover in Lucretius viewing his mistress in vulnæ videt vestigia rictus. This transient interval resembles those points of time so happily seized by Ovid in the Metamorphoses before the entire recess of the first form or consummation of the new one. Though the painter's art, confined to a single instant, could not delineate the rapid train of passions, which dimin'd the face of Satan on the view of Eden, and thrice chang'd with pale ire, envy, and despair; yet were he even to select the moment, when his griev'd look he fixed sad, still it must be Satanic sadness, tinged with deep malice and revenge. I could almost conceive, that as the sculptor in the station of a statue can imply its being in actual motion, so the magic of the painter can suggest to us, how transient the emotion expressed is intended to be. If the first impressed passion be firm enough to contend for superiority with that superinduced, does not experience prove, that the features wear a form very different from that which either passion single would impress? Does not the expression participate of the character of each? Is there no difference, but in degree, between the aspect of a man oppressed by fear, and of one disturbed by complexional timidity, yet supported against its influence by rational self-discipline? The countenance of Coriolanus, during the supplication of his mother and wife, must have passed through a series of expressions from that of an assumed cold stateliness, with which he covered his feelings, till when overpowered by natural affection his eyes did sweat compassion. Through the whole of this conflict at no time did his countenance indicate an unmixed emotion, and even at the concluding triumph of filial duty, the great interpreter of nature hath represented him distracted almost to agony:

* Another was made. † To the Spalding Society. See them in Brit. Top. Brit. N.º XX.

‡ The advertisement prefixed to the second edition in 8vo.

Oh, my mother, mother! oh!
You have won a happy victory to Rome:
But for your son——Believe it, oh, believe it——
Must dangerously you have with him prevail'd,
If not most mortal to him. But let it come.

Andromache δαιμονίου γήλαστος (6 Iliad, 484.) readily occurs as a beautiful illustration of the power of the countenance to express blended feelings*; it does not however appear to me to come so near the essence of this question as to be competent to support the decision of it. A variety of lost images rushed at once upon the mind of Andromache; her heart was melted with a recollection of the many tender circumstances that form the aggregate of domestic happiness; and Hector's perilous station excited a fear of losing him who supported this happiness; the little incident of infant terror quickened this mass of tenderness; yet these several emotions, being of a kindred nature, easily coalesce into one united charity. Mingled tears and smiles are often marks of the affectionate feeling, though on most occasions they denote contrary passions.

Perhaps the following may be a more apposite instance: Junius Brutus is graphically described by Livy as presiding at the capital punishment of his sons, whom he had condemned to die; et qui spectator erat amovendus, cum ipsum fortuna exactorem supplicii dedit quum inter omne tempus pater, vultus et us ejus spectaculo esset But what appearance in the countenance of Brutus so strongly interested the attention of the beholders? They surely saw something more than the expression of a father's heart wounded by the sufferings of his sons. They traced a severe internal conflict; they observed visibly characterized in his face the vigorous but ineffectual efforts of nature to burst the restraints with which stern republican justice had fettered her yearnings; eminente patrio animo inter publicæ pæne ministerium.

Were the great master, who harrowed our souls with sympathy for the woes of Ugolino, to delineate this awful scene, the power of his pencil would prove, that in one instance his decision had been ill-founded. RAPOTENSIS.

MR. URBAN,

ONE of the articles in the much-canvassed book called "Rowley's Poems," is intitled, "The Account of W. Canynge's Feast;" and, to the best of my remembrance, the word Account was offered as an objection to the antiquity of that little historical paper, it being confidently asserted, that thus early the word was merely applied to numbers and calculation. But this is a mistake, for the word is to be met with used in a more extended sense by Caxton in the Introduction to the translation of Tully of old age by Wylliam de Wyrcestre, printed in 1481. "Sir Johan Faldstoff," he tells us, "was governour of the duchye of Angeou and the countee of Mayne; captaigne of many townys, castellys, and fortressys in the sayd Royame of France, having the charge of sauvgarde of them dyverse yeres; occupyeng and rewlynge thre hundred speres, and the bowes accustomed thenne, and yeldyng good account of the forsayd townes, castellys, and fortressys to the feyd kynges, &c." BIOGRAPHICAL MEMOIRS OF FRANK NICHOLLS, M.D.

DR. Frank Nicholls was born in London, in the year 1699. His father was a barrister at law. Both his parents were of good families in Cornwall. They had two other sons and a daughter. The eldest son, William, was bred a merchant, but never pursued business. The youngest son and the daughter both died young.

Frank, after receiving the first rudiments of his education at a private school in the country, where his docility and sweetness of temper endeared him equally to his master and his school-fellows, was in a few years removed to Westminster, and from thence to Oxford, where he was admitted a commoner (or sojourner) of Exeter College, under the tuition of Mr. John Haviland, on March 4, 1714. There he applied himself diligently to all the usual academical studies, but particularly to natural philosophy and polite literature, of which the fruits were most conspicuous in his subsequent lectures on physiology. After reading a few books on anatomy, in order to perfect himself in the nomenclature of the animal parts then adopted, he engaged in dissections, and then devoted himself to the study of nature, perfectly free, and unbiassed by the opinions of others.

On his being chosen Reader of Anatomy in that University, he employed his utmost attention to elevate and illustrate a science, which in this country had been long depressed and neglected, and by quitting the beaten track of former lecturers, and minutely investigating the texture of every bowel, the nature and order of every vessel, &c. he gained a high and a just reputation. He did not then reside at Oxford, but, when he had finished his lectures, used to repair to London, the place of his abode, where he had determined to settle. He had once an intention of fixing in Cornwall, and for a short time practised there with great reputation; but being soon tired of the fatigues attendant on that profession in the country, he returned to London, bringing back with him a great insight, acquired by diligent observation, into the nature of the miliary* fever, which was attended with the most salutary effects in his subsequent practice at London.

* So called from the eruptions resembling large millet-seed.

About this time he resolved to visit the Continent, partly with a view of acquiring the knowledge of men, manners, and languages, but chiefly to acquaint himself with the opinions of foreign naturalists on his favourite study. At Paris, by conversing freely with the learned, he soon recommended himself to their notice and esteem. Winslow's was the only good system of physiology at that time known in France, and Morgagni's and Santorini's of Venice in Italy, which also Dr. Nicholls soon after visited. On his return to England, he repeated his physiological lectures in London, which were much frequented, not only by students from both the Universities, but also by many surgeons, apothecaries, and others. Soon after, his new and successful treatment of the miliary fever, then very prevalent in the Southern parts of England, added much to his reputation. In 1725, at a meeting of the Royal Society, he gave his opinion on the nature of Aneurisms*, in which he dissented from Dr. Freind, in his History of Physic.

At the beginning of the year 1728 he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, to which he afterwards communicated the description of an uncommon disorder (published in the Transactions) viz. a polypus resembling a branch of the pulmonary vein (for which Tulpus has strangely mistaken it) coughed up by an asthmatic person. [He also made Observations (in the same volume of the Transactions) on a treatise by M. Helvetius, of Paris, on the Lungs.]—Towards the end of the year 1729, he took the degree of M. D. at Oxford.—At his return to London he underwent an examination by the President and Censors of the College of Physicians, previous to his being admitted a candidate, which every practitioner must be a year before he can apply to be chosen a fellow. Dr. Nicholls was chosen into the College on June 26, 1732, and, two years after, being elected Gullonian Reader of Pathology, he made the structure of the heart, and the circulation of the blood, the subject of his lectures.—In 1736, at the request of the President,

* A disease in the arteries, in which, either by a preternatural weakness of any part of them, they become excessively dilated, or by a wound through their coats, the blood is extravasated amongst the adjacent cavities. Sharp.—In the orifice there was a throbbing of the arterial blood, as in an aneurism. Herman.

he again read the Gullstonian lecture, taking for his subject those parts of the human body which serve for the secretion and discharge of the urine, and the causes, symptoms, and cure of the diseases occasioned by the stone.—In 1739 he delivered the anniversary Harveian oration.—In 1743 he married Elizabeth, youngest daughter of the celebrated Dr. Mead, by whom he had five children, two of whom died young. Two sons and a daughter survived him. [The eldest son, John Nicholls, Esq. of Goring, Oxfordshire, and Ockley, Surrey, is member in the present parliament (as he was also in the last) for Blechingley. He married a grand-daughter of Bp. Gibson.]—In 1748 Dr. Nicholls undertook the office of Chirurgical Lecturer, beginning with a learned and elegant Dissertation on the Anima Medica *. About this time, on the death of Dr. John Cuninghame, one of the Elects of the College, Dr. Abraham Hall was chosen to succeed him, in preference to our author, who was his senior, without any apparent reason. With a just resentment, he immediately resigned the office of Chirurgical Lecturer, and never afterwards attended the meetings of the Fellows, except when business of the utmost importance was in agitation.

[In 1751 he took some revenge in an anonymous pamphlet, intitled, “The Petition of the Unborn Babes to the Censors of the Royal College of Physicians of London,” in which Dr. Nesbitt [Pocus], Dr. Maule [Maulus], Dr. Barrowby [Barbone], principally, and Sir William [Browne], Sir Edward [Hulse], and the Scots, incidentally, are the objects of his satire.]

In 1753, on the death of Sir Hans Sloane, Bart. in his 94th year, Dr. Nicholls was appointed to succeed him as one of the King’s physicians, and held that office till the death of his royal master in 1760, when this most skilful physician was superseded to make way for one† who, not long before, had been an army surgeon, of the lowest class. By this exchange the upstart rose to dignity and riches.

*Quales ex humili magna ad fastigia pergam
Extollit quoties voluit Fortuna jecari.*

The offer of a pension, which, it was suggested, he might have had if he would ask it, Dr. Nicholls rejected with disdain.

* On Dr. Stahl’s system. See Dr. Cullen’s Preface to his “First Lines of Physic,” p. xli. &c.

† Sir W. D.

The causes, &c. of the uncommon disorder of which the late King died, viz. a rupture of the right ventricle of the heart, our author explained in a letter to the Earl of Macclesfield, president of the Royal Society, which was published in the Philosophical Transactions, vol. L. *

[In 1772, to a second edition of his treatise De Anima Medica he added a dissertation* De motu cordis et sanguinis, in homine nato et non nato, inscribed to his learned friend and coadjutor the late Dr. Lawrence.]

Tired at length of London, and also desirous of superintending the education of his son, he removed to Oxford, where he had spent, most agreeably, some years in his youth. [It is remarkable that he resided in the house that had been occupied by Bp. Berkeley, and for the same purpose.] But when the study of the law recalled Mr. Nicholls to London, he took a house at Epsom, where he passed the remainder of his life in a literary retirement, not inattentive to natural philosophy, especially the cultivation of grain, and the improvement of barren soils, and contemplating also with admiration the internal nature of plants, as taught by Linnæus.

His constitution never was robust. In his youth, at Oxford, he was with difficulty recovered from a dangerous fever by the skill of Doctors Frampton and Frewen; and afterwards at London he had often been afflicted with a catarrh, and an inveterate asthmatic cough, which, returning with great violence at the beginning of the year 1778, deprived the world of this valuable man on January 7, in the eightieth year of his age.

Dr. Lawrence, late President of the College of Physicians, who gratefully ascribed all his physiological and medical knowledge to his precepts, and who, while he lived, loved him as a brother, and revered him as a parent, two years after printed, and gave to his friends, a few copies of an elegant Latin Life †

MR. URBAN, Tetjuschi, Sept. 1, 1784.

AS I perceive a number of your correspondents delight in the study of antiquities, I send you an account of some I have picked up in my travels.— If you esteem it a favour*, you owe it to the accident of my meeting with some numbers of your Magazine at the house of a German officer at Simbirsk, who understands English, and interests himself in our manners and pursuits. Indeed I have found them in several other parts, where one would have least expected them; and you have a right, if any man, to say, Quæ regio in terris nostris non plena laboris? If the engravings are executed with accuracy from the drawings I herewith transmit, and the narrative faithfully given, I may be occasionally induced to send you more, as often as my warfare in this world, which is very various, will allow me avocation.

Tetjuschi, in the stadthalterschaft, or vicerealty, of Simbirsk, is in itself but a miserable spot. It is 97 versts, on the high road, from the town of Simbirsk, near the high grounds. The soil is of fine chalk, and on one side of it are deep cliffs cut in the shore of the Volga. The river not being near so broad as at Simbirsk, the ice had been long passable for carriages when I arrived here, though further downwards there were still many places open. This was about the beginning of the month of December. They reckon it 20 versts from the ferry to Tetjuschi to the N. E. part of the village of Bolgari, which is built on the ruins of the old town of Brixchimof, the ancient capital of Bulgaria. The way runs partly through low grounds, which the Volga usually overflows, containing here and there some little lakes, that abound with fish, and partly through forests of pine trees, with a few birch trees intermixed, by which the village itself is almost surrounded.

Bolgari stands pretty high, by the side of a moor bestrewed with bushes and underwood. One cannot help wondering, that so considerable and so populous a town as Bolgari appears to have been, should have its situation in so bad a place with regard to water, which can be had no otherwise than by means of wells dug to a great depth, from which the place, at this time, is wholly supplied. The Volga is at least 9 versts distant, in a right line. And, though the low grounds appear to run northward from the village to that river, yet it is not at all probable that it formerly had its course nearer the town.

The present village consists of above 100 huts, and is, like all other monastic land, appropriated by the crown. It is about 90 versts from Kazan. Towards the South is pretty flat and even ground, surrounded with pines and some birch, agreeably mixed. The plain, which is now tolerably well cultivated and fruitful, is the very spot on which the old town stood.

This field is surrounded with a wall and ditch, which, notwithstanding its decay, is still, in many places, 3 fathoms wide.

This intrenchment has the form of an irregular half-oval, terminated by the declivity along which the present huts are built, and is at least six versts in length. Within the fortified spot is a deep dry cavern, situated at the east end of the village, and has all the appearance of being a natural one.

The greatest part of the remains of the old buildings are within the walls. The most remarkable of them I shall describe as particularly as the severe cold and the snow upon the ground would allow me.

At the east end of the present village is a monastic enclosure, with some wooden buildings, and a handsome stone church. Within this inclosure, which bears the name of Uspenskoi, are a considerable number of these remains. The principal of which is a tower, or misguir, which is of well wrought quarry stone, about twelve fathoms high, built in the manner and proportions of figure A in the drawing, and is yet in good preservation. There are 72 winding steps, which lead to the top, each of them about a Paris foot high.

These

* That we do "esteem it a favour," our friendly correspondent will see by its being so early inserted; which is done, we will assure him, without the most distant view to "the bear-skin boots," or "the passilla," or "the sweet kloukva quass," or "the ca-war," he so liberally promises.—The inviolable rule of this Magazine is, never to receive a bribe for what is either inserted or omitted,

These steps are in complete repair. The tower is covered with a wooden roof, in the inside of which is newly cut an Arabic inscription.

A doorway is in the South side, with a strong iron hook, whereon a door has formerly hung. Here and there are small holes, through which the light is admitted to the stairs. Close to this tower are the remains of a strong piece of stone-work, with thick solid corners. It may have been a kind of fortress, or perhaps a large oratory. This piece of masonry is composed of irregular hewn stones, among which are chalk stones, sand stones, pebbles, and all the kinds of gyps stones that are found on the high shores of the Volga. The tower stands at the N. W. corner of the square. On the east of it still remains a small vaulted Tartar oratory, which is likewise of irregular, but durable, stones. The under part is square, but the upper octagon, whose circumference may be about five fathoms. This has been much repaired, and is now made into a Christian chapel, dedicated to St. Nicholas Chudatvoretz, or the wonder-worker. The entrance is on the west side, and the light-hole on the south.

In another part of the same monastic inclosure are the remains of an old edifice, now converted into the cells of the monastery.

The rest of the ancient buildings, of which there are several in a tolerable state of perfection, are dispersed about the inclosure, together with a number of old foundations, crumbled walls, and pieces of habitations. There is likewise, on the outside of the intrenchment, towards the west, a pretty considerable stone edifice, which the peasants, for what reason I know not, call Greckskaia Polara, or, The Greek House.

Amongst other buildings, moderately entire, another tower strikes the eye, at the distance of about 50 fathoms south-west from the monastery. It is in nothing different from the afore mentioned, otherwise than by being thicker, and only about nine fathoms high. Not far from this are the foundations of some pretty capacious buildings, amongst which may perhaps be reckoned the oratory appertaining to the monastery.

About 80 fathoms farther southwards is a small square durable edifice, of quarry stone, whose vault, however, on one side is fallen in. This is the figure marked B. Its entrance is on the west side, and has a small window on the south. Two niches, close to one another, are in the western wall, within side, on each hand of the entrance, and two others in the north and south walls, something farther asunder. If I might be allowed to conjecture, I should suppose this has likewise been an oratory.

More important and extensive has been a building on the south side of the village, and right in the middle of the confines of the town, surrounded by the foundations of many considerable erections. The peculiar manner of its construction is worthy of description, but it is hardly possible to guess for what purpose it has been raised. The figure of it is denoted by the letter C.

The boors call it The Hall of Justice; and I have no more reason than they for calling it any thing else. The abutments on each side have never been higher than to the bottom of the door, and seem to have served to no other purpose than as supports to an entrance. There are three of them on the east side, two larger on the south, and one long one on the west.

At the north-west corner is an oblong square foundation, which only touches it by the corner. And on the north side of the main building, where the entrance is, there appears no trace of any adjoining room.

From this building, about 100 fathoms directly south, is another considerable, and pretty well preserved, edifice, whose architecture is still more singular. The inner part, particularly, is so extraordinary, that I took a plan of it, which I am obliged to subjoin, to give you and your readers an accurate idea of it; and which the explanation of the subject absolutely demands. The north narrow part of it, and likewise the porch, is built on a foundation of chalk-stone, run up with large Tartar tiles, of which the different apartments of the whole building consist. D is the building as it appears, and E the ground plot*.

The porch has several small niches in the wall, which, by a cross-wall, is formed into a square-lobby, or antehall, and an oblong chamber. This latter leads into the body of the building, which has no other passage. The edifice, except the pinnacle, is of smooth stones, near an arshine long, above half an arshine broad, and a span thick. The largest room is walled through as high as the vaults, so as to form four separate square rooms, into each of which is left a separate corner entrance, that receives the light by means of a great vaulted cupola, which, in the middle point, has an octogon opening, and on each side a small window. Round this great cupola are four others of the like kind, right over the corner rooms, by which, by a similar octogon opening in the middle point, they are all lighted. These cupolas from within look somewhat like ovals, with traces of stucco ornaments, which are likewise to be found in the large middle cupola. The corner rooms are regular squares. A remarkable circumstance in them is, that the entrance is not in any of the stone walls, but right in one corner of each of the middle partitions.

At the south end of this building are three rooms, from which that to the east has no other way than one broken through the south corner department of the middle room. Into this great middle one is a passage by a door through the transverse piece of the middle room.—The western one, which, with its western wall, runs out about a fathom beyond the width of the whole building, has no connection with it and the middle-room, but has a separate entrance from the outside, like the oratory of the Khan's monument at Kazimof, which I believe I shall send you at another opportunity. Under the building is a vault, to which is a descent, as to the vault at Kazimof. This vault, however, has an opening broke through to the south adjoining room, but so shattered that I could not get into it. Yet, from the wooden fragments and furniture of coffins which were strewed about, I conclude it must have been a receptacle for the dead. And, upon the whole, I am led to conjecture, that this building, as well as those in Taschkent, has served, partly as a burying-place, and partly as a school.

I found a great number of old monuments at Bolgari, mostly with Arabian, but some also with Armenian, inscriptions. Many are taken into the foundation of the Uspenskoï monastery, and many more lie scattered on the ground. These stones are of different magnitudes, in form like those at Kazimof, and nearly of the same size. Her Imperial Majesty, whose love for the sciences lets no opportunity escape for promoting them, has not only ordered exact copies to be taken, but also translations to be made of all these epitaphs. Forty-nine of them are already translated; of which no fewer than twenty-two are of the year of the Hegira 623. So that it is thought there must have been a plague, or some other endemial disease, at that time in the city. The rest are of different dates. From whence it appears, that the Arabs were here only from the year of the Hegira 619 to 742, an interval of no more than 123 years; during which Batu Khan, before his attack upon the West, must have reigned in this place.

One of the inscriptions is as follows:

ALLA IS THE LIVING AND IMMORTAL GOD. THIS IS THE TOMB OF THE MIGHTY IN POWER AMONG THE MIGHTY IN POWER OF THE MUS-SULMAN FAITH; THE MOST PIOUS COMMANDER AND PATRIARCH WHOM DEATH HATH SNATCHED AWAY FROM THE WORLD. HE WAS BORN IN THE PROVINCE OF SHIRVAN. MAY THE LORD GOD GRANT HIM THE FULLNESS OF BLESSINGS, MERCY, AND THE PARDON OF ALL HIS SINS IN THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN, ACCORDING TO HIS INEXHAUSTIBLE GOODNESS!

The year in which this stone was laid is so totally effaced as to be undecypherable.

Another of these inscriptions, the date of which is preserved, runs thus:

ALLA IS THE LIVING AND IMMORTAL GOD.
THIS IS THE TOMB OF
OMAR THE SON OF MUCHAMED.
HE DIED IN THE YEAR OF THE HEGIRA,
718.

On the other hand, there are three Armenian, one of 557, and two of 684 and 986, and likewise some of the middle of the 16th century, which comprehends a period of 429 years. They contain nothing more than a Moham-medan memorial sentence, which the Armenian have not, with the name of the defunct, his genealogy or dignity. They are partly Bulgarian or Tartar people of rank, of both sexes, partly clergy, and partly common people, and probably traders. Of some it is said that they came from the province of Schamachie, and some from Schirdan; by which it is plain that the trade of the place must have drawn numbers of people from distant parts to settle there. And perhaps the pieces of money, which are sometimes picked up from the ground by the children of the peasants, may throw still farther light on this subject. Of these I have seen many. They are chiefly small thick pieces of fine silver, well struck, with Arabian and Kufan inscriptions. The breadth of them is seldom more than the thumb nail. Some pieces of silver coin are sometimes also found that are thinner and worse struck. On one side of them are small stars, or other devices; and on the other side only some small dots, with a cross, in which are the ensigns of Justice, such as we find them at this day among the Baschkirs, and other nations of this empire, who, being unacquainted with letters, are obliged to make use of symbols and representations in their stead.

I have subjoined two of these coins in the drawing marked F. These devices, however, are more frequently on the copper coins, and are commonly within a triangle, as in that distinguished by a G.

Yours, &c. M. M. M.

P. S. As I hope to be at St. Petersburg by the spring, if Mr. Urban will be so obliging as to transmit me the number of his Magazine that contains the above (according to the inclosed direction), he will do me a favour.

Abstract of the Letter from the Honourable WARREN HASTINGS, Esq. Governor General of Bengal, to the Court of Directors of the Honourable East India Company, dated Lucknow, April 30, 1783.

MR. HASTINGS begins his letter with a recital of the disordered state of the country, and the revenue of the Nabob Visier, being such as to require the accession of an extraneous aid to restore the powers and constitution of its government. This he represented to the Council at Calcutta, and offered his services to go to Lucknow, whenever the Nabob Visier should require it. His offer was accepted, and on the 17th of February, though much indisposed, he took leave of the Board, and happily arrived at Lucknow on the 27th of March, in a state of health so confirmed as to promise an unremitted attention to the very important objects of his commission. On his way he had the alarming prospect of a soil so completely exhausted of its natural moisture by the failure of one entire season of periodical rain, that, except the fields of grain kept in vegetation by the uncommon labour of the husbandman, the country exhibited an appearance so barren that even the roots of the former herbage no longer existed, and the very beds of the rivers over which he passed threw up clouds of dust from their channels. This was not peculiar to one particular spot. Every region of Hindostan had felt the same angry visitation. Yet such, he says, was his reliance on the unbounded confidence of the Nabob and his ministers, that he dared promise, under every circumstance but that of a second visitation (which, in the course of natural events, is very improbable), a successful progress in terminating the measures which he had begun, unless counteracted, and his operations impeded, by orders which he might not resist. Nor should it, he said, be a common obstruction which should restrain him from pursuing such inherent advantages as, he trusted, would prove superior to every species of opposition. Indeed, adds he, if such springs as give the common movements to popular opinion could influence my proceedings, I have already experienced them in two instances; one of which I believe to have had the special service I am engaged in for its object, and the other the general ruin of my authority. The first he alludes to is a report, fabricated at Fort George, of a dismissal with disgrace from his office; the other to a paper transmitted to him, said to be part of a report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons, which declares a right invested in the Commander in Chief of the army to oppose the power delegated by the government itself to the first executive member. He repeats the words of the report to which he alludes (see vol. L. IV. p. 708); and then, impelled by a sense of national duty, superior to every consideration of personal safety, he dares to denounce and to date the fall of the British empire in India from the instant that it shall be decidedly declared, or understood, that any Commander in Chief of the army, be his title what it will, is, or may be, by any constructive power, rendered independent of the government, under which the wisdom of Parliament hath hitherto placed the army serving in these provinces. God forbid! exclaims he, that any future Pizarro's and Almagro's should disgrace the annals of your dominion, or mark the traces of its decline with the blood of your servants and soldiers! But the contest will probably be of short duration; and happy will it be for the interest of humanity, if if such shall be the issue, that the fatal blow shall be sudden, and the ruin instantaneous. For himself, he is not apprehensive of any evil consequences from the partial and limited command which he possesses over the army, intending to provoke no competition. Nor, he hoped, would the province over which he presided require any foreign aid for its internal protection; nor, of course, any exercise of powers which he might deem himself warranted to resist.

After this spirited digression, he proceeds to represent the effects which have been produced in consequence of his commission. Before his departure from Calcutta, he had applied for an immediate supply of money for the subsistence of the troops stationed in these provinces, and had the pleasure to find that the acting minister had advanced ten lacks of rupees, which had proved a critical and effectual relief; and that, since his arrival, other payments had been made, to a considerable amount.

Here he enters into a state of the debts, of the arrears and payments, and of the lenient measures he had pursued to obtain his ends. That he had likewise obtained, by his own suggestion, from Almas Ally Cawn, very large contributions, by way of refutation of the charges of perfidy and disloyalty, which had been industriously urged against him, and had nearly driven him to abandon the country for the preservation of his life and honour.

He here mentions the salutary purposes to which he had ordered the sums, so obtained, to be applied, viz. as a fund for the payment of the interest on the Company's bonds, which had suffered something in their credit before he left Calcutta.

Another article he mentions, is, the sums due from Pyzoola Cawn, by which two lacks of his amount are now in regular course of payment; the remaining three are not yet due by stipulation; but he had intimated to his vakeel to have both payments immediately concluded; to which his master had consented; and, as a farther proof of his respect, had sent his son to Lucknow, to confirm his attachment to the Company and the British nation.

He hopes, likewise, that a considerable part of the Nabob's debt will be liquidated in the course of the present year, and the discharge of the remainder insured by the engagements of creditable bankers, so that it may be wholly cleared before the end of the next.

He next proceeds to acquaint the Directors with the regulations he intends to establish before he leaves Lucknow.

1st, To realize the amount of the Company's demands on the Nabob, and to obtain ample securities for the payment.

2dly, To induce the Nabob's ministers to appoint bodies of regular troops for the support of his collections, and for the internal defence of his country. This will preclude the necessity of calling for the aid of the Company's troops, and will release him from the extraordinary and undefined subsidy which he now pays for the regiments scattered throughout his dominions; and will confine the Nabob Vizier of Oude's payments to the brigades stationed at Cawnpore, and to the subsidy paid by treaty for its expence.

3dly, These objects obtained, his wish is, that their wisdoms will put a final period to the ruinous system of interference in the affairs of the Nabob. Allowed, and to withdraw, for ever, that influence by which it was maintained.— This country, says he, excepting the factory at Tonda, has no inlets of trade by which it can supply the issues which are made from it; therefore, every rupee, which is drawn from its circulation into your treasury, must accelerate the period at which its ability must cease to pay even the stipulated subsidy. By the establishment of this regulation you maintain an accession of more than half the military force required for the defence of your own dominions, without any charge to your revenue; and you oppose a wide and powerful frontier to your eventual enemies, without distressing the country by its maintenance, because the specie, thus applied, will of course flow back into its circulation; and it is a tribute which it ought to pay, as its whole wealth would not, in any other way, yield an adequate mode of protection. Few, he concludes, are the advocates of the national interest, and their voice will be faintly heard amidst the numerous and loud exclamations of private rapacity; but I humbly assume to rank myself with the former, and to assure you, that, if you seek for a permanent and profitable system of connection with this country, you must confine your claims upon it to the line I have recommended. If you transgress it, you may extend the distribution distribution of patronage, and add to the fortunes of individuals, and the nominal riches of Great Britain. But your own interests will suffer by it, and the ruin of a great and once flourishing nation will be recorded as the work of your administration, with an everlasting reproach to the British name.

To this reasoning I shall join the obligations of justice and good faith, which cut off every pretext for your exercising any power or authority in this country while the Sovereign of it fulfills the engagements which he contracted with you.

I have the honour to be, &c. &c.

MR. URBAN,

THE great opposition which the Presbyterian Divines of the last age made to Milton's celebrated Treatise on the Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce, provoked his indignation in return; and all the epithets that disdain, mingled with rage, could supply, he poured out in copious streams on the whole sect. He says, in one of his poems, that though they have seized the widow'd whore, PLURALITY, yet that they have only envied, not abhorred, her sin. In the same poem he singles out one Mr. Edwards as the peculiar object of his contempt, and says,

"Men whose life, learning, faith, and
" pure intent,
" Would have been held in high esteem
" by Paul,
" Must now be nam'd and printed He" retics
" By shallow Edwards, &c.

[Vid. Poems, XVIII.]

The bishop of Bristol, the late Editor of Milton's Works, observes in a note, that "Mr. Thomas Edwards was Author of the Gangræna." Some account of this work, and of the particular reasons which provoked the great Poet to "dama" the author "to everlasting fame" (for this must be his doom since he is mentioned with scorn by Milton), may possibly afford some amusement to your readers. Its general title is "GANGRÆNA, or a Catalogue and Discovery of many of the Errors, Heresies, Blasphemies, and pernicious Practices of the Sectaries of this time, vented and acted in England in these four last years: as also, a particular Narration of divers Stories, remarkable passages, Letters, &c. &c." To this was added a second part, consisting of a Vindication of the preceding Treatise from the Animadversions of John Goodwin, Saltmarsh, and others; and containing "a fresh and further Discovery of Errors, Heresies, Blasphemies, and dangerous Proceedings of the Sectaries of this time." 4to. Printed in the year 1646, second edition.

In perusing this work, I frequently thought of the great heroes of Hudibras.

— *Petulant capricious sects,
The maggots of corrupted texts.*

But he well understood the persons of whom he was writing. Edwards is one of the Knight's own Saints to a hair; but dreadful in his wrath against the Saints of Squire Ralpho, and, like Hudibras, "smells a rat" in every thing they say or do. He was, in truth, the old cat of the Presbyterians, and always on the watch for prey.

As he put Milton's tract into his Gangræna (the Index Expurgatorius of the Roundheads), it is not to be wondered at, that the great writer (whose disposition was so irritable) should have been highly offended, or that he should have revenged the insult. This he hath effectually done: for what could not a single stroke of Milton's pen execute! He had something of the disposition of another great man of the same "irritable genus."

"Whoe'er offends—in some unlucky time
" Slides into verse, or hitches in a rhyme."
POPE.

In a list of the "many errors of the Sectaries," there is the following account of "Milton's Doctrine of Divorce;" to which an express reference is made in the margin. "No. 154, That it is lawful for a man to put away his wife
" upon indisposition, emptiness, or contrariety of mind arising from a cause
" in nature unchangeable, and for disproportion and deadness of spirit, or " something distasteful and averse in the " immutable bent of Nature; and Man,
" in regard of the freedom and eminency
" of his creation, is a law to himself in " this matter, being head of the other
" sex which was made for him; neither " need he hear any judge therein above
" himself."

The error immediately added to this, and which, it seems, had some Sectaries of that distracted period for its abettors (as it hath had more lately), is thus mentioned. "No. 155. That it is lawful
" for one man to have two wives at " once."

But

But the passage which probably gave Milton the greatest offence, is the second part of the Gangræna, where the licentious tendency of his Doctrine of Divorce is illustrated and confirmed by the example of a very scandalous woman, one Mrs. Attaway, a female preacher among the Oliverian enthusiasts, who left her husband under the pretence of religion, and associated with another man, who quitted his wife with the same godly plea. "There are (says Edwards) "two gentlemen of the Inns of Court, "civil and well disposed, who, out of "novelty, went to hear the woman "preach, and, after Mrs. Attaway, the "lace-woman, had finished her exercise, "these two gentlemen had some discourse "with her: and among other passages "she spake to them of Master Milton's "Doctrine of Divorce, and asked them "what they thought of it; saying, it "was a point to be considered of; and "that she, for her part, would look "more into it, for she had an unsatisfied "husband that did not walk in the way "of Zion, nor speak the language of "Canaan. And how accordingly she "hath practised it in running away with "another woman's husband is now sufficiently known to Mr. Goodwin and "Mr. Saltmarsh."

Mrs. Attaway's pious gallant takes leave of his wife exactly on the principles of Milton's book. The Gangræna hath published part of his letter, in which he says, "because she hath been "rather a disturber of his body and soul "than a help-meet for him, he shall "never come to her any more;" but, in order to make that look like sanctity, which was in fact cruelty and perfidy, he prays that "God would direct her, "and keep her as one of his creation." This is something like the reverend Divine mentioned by Pope, who, though he would not curse the poor, yet would not relieve them, but piously left them with the Lord! Mrs. Attaway's letter is a curious specimen of that spiritual cant which was so much in fashion at that unhappy period, when every thing that was infamous was disguised with the masque of religion, and the most villainous actions were thought to be "sanctified by the word of God and prayer." In a Letter to William Jenney (for that is the name of her "well-beloved in the Lord"), she says, "I am unspeakably "sorry in respect of thy sufferings, I "being the object that occasioned it;"

[i.e. his wife's uneasiness at her husband's being always with Mrs. Attaway]. "I "need such love, and shall desire to dedicate my spirit to the Lord to seek "him in thy behalf, that he would be "pleased to set thee at liberty. "Mc-thinks thy sufferings should be almost "at the highest, they are so great. "When the people of Israel's bondage "was the greatest, then the same day "the Lord delivered them. Let us look "to the Lord, believing confidently in "him with the faith of Jesus, and no "question but we shall be delivered. In "the mean season I give up my heart "and affections to thee in the Lord, and "whatsoever I have or am in him "which is our head, thou shalt command "it; and while thou art absent I shall "rest in the possession of thy love, "which I shall not be so injurious as to "question."

It must have highly provoked Milton to have had a doctrine, which he appears to have had so much at heart, exposed both to ridicule and more serious abhorrence by so disgusting and so atrocious an example.

The great poet says that,

"Men whose life, learning, &c.

"Must now be nam'd and printed "Heretic,

"By shallow Edwards."

I am in doubt whether Milton could with his whole heart pay such a compliment as this to any of the Heretics of the Gangræna. In general they were obscure sectaries of the lowest abilities, and whose names have been buried in total oblivion for more than a century. Hugh Peters, though engaged with Milton in the support of rebellion, could never, I should imagine, have possessed any great share of his esteem. John Goodwin embarked, body and soul, in the same righteous cause; and, together with Milton, was particularly proscribed after the Restoration (though they had the good fortune of escaping, while Hugh Peters was hanged), yet he never could have been so great a favourite with the poet as to draw forth the highest encomium that was perhaps ever bestowed on any man. I mention Hugh Peters and John Goodwin, because I have not observed any names but theirs in the Gangræna that appear to have been of any distinguished note or consequence, even at that period of which it immediately treats. Who ever heard or read of Paul Best, Henry Denn, John Hitch, Clement

Clement Wrighten, William Kiffin*, or William Erbury? I had forgot Colonel Lilburn, one of the great heroes of the Gangraena. But Milton could neither have thought nor said, that his "life," or "Learning," or "pure Intent," "would have been held in high esteem by St. Paul."

In reading this Work of "Shallow Edwards," I was much struck with the similarity that hath always subsisted between Sectaries and Heretics of every period. They are all influenced by the same spirit, and have in general expressed themselves pretty nearly in the same manner. Zanchius said, two centuries ago, that the follies and blasphemies of some Heretics of that day had all been anticipated by the Arians and Plotinians of more antient date. Vetus christianitas repetita! They chewed a cud which a hundred beasts had been chewing before!

In the Catalogue of the errors and heresies of the Gangraena, I particularly took notice of several which have of late been brought forward with fresh zeal; and much labour and many heads have been employed to give them credit and consequence. For it should seem that they only need to be understood in order to be believed; and nothing but attention is wanted to produce conviction. Such is the confidence of their modern advocates: and their predecessors possessed the very same happy assurance, founded on the same good opinion of themselves and their cause!

It may amuse your readers to lay before them a specimen of free enquiry as it was conducted by some liberal and ingenious gentlemen at a crisis when the GANGRÆNA seems to have discharged its most purulent contents in the greatest abundance.

"That right reason is the rule of faith, and that we are to believe the Scriptures so far as we see them agreeable to reason, and no further."

"That Jesus Christ is not God essentially, but nominally; and may no otherwise be called the Son of God but as he was Man."

"That Christ is not of a holier nature than we; but in this appears God's love to us, that he will take one of us in the same condition, to convince us of what he is to us, and hath made us to be in him. It is a discomfort to the Saints that he should be of a more holy nature than they, as being no ground for them to come near with boldness to God."

"Christ did not, by his death, purchase Life and Salvation: for it was not the end of God, in the coming of Christ, to purchase Love and Life; but Christ himself was purchased by Love. Christ came not to reconcile God to Man, but Man to God." "Christ was a most glorious publisher of the Gospel; but in all that Christ saith to be the end of his coming there is not a word mentioned of any thing done by him in a way of satisfying God."

"That using the set forms of prayer prescribed is Idolatry."

"That many Christians in those days have more knowledge than the Apostles."

Your theological readers, Mr. Urban, need not be informed by what men these heretical paradoxes have of late been established. There is not one of them but hath been avowed with all the forwardness of ostentatious singularity, and defended with all the eagerness and all the dissimulaculousness of Bigotry and Prejudice.

There were two sectaries whose bold and blasphemous assertions made them the most prominent figures in the whole group. The one was called Clement Wrighten, and the other Paul Best. The former (says Mr. Edwards) "was some time a professor of Religion, but now an Arch-Heretic and fearful Apostate; an old wolf and a subtle man, who goes about corrupting and venting his errors. This man fell off from the communion of our Churches . . . into mortalism, holding the soul mortal; for he is judged to be the author, or at least to have had a great hand in the book of the mortality

Yours, &c. ATOPOMASTIX,

MR. URBAN, Dec. 5. 1734-

I WISH not to see your useful repository become the channel of religious controversy, and shall therefore not request you to insert the observations, which a late letter to the Bishop of Sarum would else produce. But as you have, in that part of your Magazine which is appropriated to the review of publications (vol. LIV. p. 767) inserted an extract from it, I know your candour will indulge me, and your correspondents will excuse it, if I take the liberty of sending of you a few sentiments upon it.

When I read the Charge, I did not think it possible for malice to select a part, which every friend of virtue would not most cordially subscribe to: much less could I expect that that part would be chosen as the ground of reflection, in which the great and good Bishop (as your correspondent C—o—o justly calls him) most earnestly exhorts his clergy to be zealous, conscientious, and active in their several stations; attentive in their public ministrations; exemplary in the exercise of every virtue; free from every vice and fault, from every levity of conduct and conversation, that can tend in the remotest degree to bring discredit upon the order, to defeat their labours, and give advantage to those who seek advantage against them.

It is somewhat unfortunate for the writer of those gentle strictures, that he did not at least pass over this part of the Charge, which contains such clear and unequivocal testimonies of the pious and devout affections of his lordship's own heart, and of his sincere desire to inspire and spread the same regard to virtue throughout the diocese.

I will allow him all the merit that his wit may claim; but he must excuse me if I doubt his attachment to the Church of England, of which he calls himself a member, and his regard for virtue, of which he would be thought an advocate, when he takes offence at sentiments so unexceptionably just, and conducive to the interests of both.

But, though I admire his pleasantry, I cannot praise his judgement in the application of it. The story which he tells, by way of glancing at his Lordship and the parochial clergy, is a mirror in which he may have been used to behold himself; which, from long and familiar use, hath perhaps so sufficiently impressed upon his own mind the striking image of a modern saint, that he hath now no longer occasion for it; and having found it useful in reflecting the reason of his own dislike to virtue, he is willing to extend its use. But, not so happy in his discernment as in his desire to serve his lordship, he mistook the object of his friendly wishes, and lent that speculum which would have been useful to his brethren, the methodistical declaimers against virtue, to a character who both loves and inculcates, recommends and delights in the practice of it.

* The late worthy and Rev. Mr. Spicer of Reading, an old and worthy correspondent to our Magazine; of whom we should be glad to lay some further particulars before our readers. He died Nov. 27, 1734.

I am almost inclined to pity the unlucky use this Lay Member of the Church of England, as he calls himself, hath made of his story; which, like the invention of the fatal composition it speaks of, hath furnished his adversaries with the means of his own destruction. "No wonder," quoth he, "our fleets and armies are so unsuccessful against the common foe, when our officers have such an antipathy to the smell of powder." No wonder our morals are so depraved, when our bishops and our clergy are so averse to teach; and take such pains to decry the need of virtue; when a character so high and respectable as the Bishop of Sarum hath spent so many pages to depreciate it! Excellent teacher! What a pity that his Lordship had not foreseen the wish of this witty genius, and, to adapt his conduct to the humour of the tale, really decried, instead of taking so much pains to recommend, the exercise of virtue. I have long suspected the reason of the dislike these zealots have to virtue, but never could find one honest enough to confess, or till now weak enough to betray, the real cause.

In my earlier years, I was inclined to give them credit for good intentions, and to believe they did not mean, in their zeal for speculative opinions, to discard the moral virtues. I had conceived we only differed in our mode of teaching; they making the mercies of the Gospel the topic of their sermons, on the supposition that, these once impressed upon the affections of their hearers, the virtues of course would follow; we pressing upon ours, the need of virtue, together with the need of those mercies which their own conscious defects must then concur with our reasonings to convince them as not less necessary or important than the most zealous of these Gospel teachers can believe them. A longer acquaintance with the world, and some observations that I have been able, situated among them, to make upon their morals, have obliged me to think less favourable both of their principles and their practice than I had been used to do.

The contemptuous and unguarded style in which they speak of the duties of morality I was always aware might lead their weaker disciples to think them of little consequence, and therefore wholly to despise, or pay very little attention to the practice of them. This effect I have too frequently had occasion to observe; and not only to find them very deficient in the duties of charity, integrity, and such plain virtues, but to hear them talk in the most contemptuous language of their more conscientious neighbours, who have thought it not beneath them to aim at least at the character of moral men. Nay, I am sorry to add, that the clergy (whether it be that such characters stand in the way of their increase, and that they cannot so easily seduce our people to separate from us where this is the case), in proportion as they are more active in their duty, and more exemplary in their lives, are the objects of their greater resentment and dislike. If there were not some reason for their dislike to virtue, they would surely love and honour it wherever it should be found. However they should differ in principle, they would at least so far accord with us as our practice should be right. They would reverence the prelate who should in these times of profligacy with so much zeal and ability inculcate the duties of a Christian; they would unite their prayers with ours for the increase of that spirit which his pastoral address so evidently breathes; and for the success of those endeavours which he so affectionately and seasonably exerts to stimulate his clergy, and induce them to co-operate with him in the pious work of amending the morals, and saving the souls of those who are committed to their care.

I hope I do not transgress the bounds of charity when I add, that the writer who could sit down with a disposition to depreciate a Charge so evidently written with the best intentions, and so obviously calculated to do good, cannot himself be possessed of that spirit which it breathes, but must, whatever may be his zeal or his attainments in other respects, be very deficient in some of the first duties and brightest ornaments of a Christian.

MR. URBAN, Lichfield, Nov. 25.
FOR the use of your antiquarian correspondents, and for the ornament of your excellent Miscellany, I inclose you a faithful and elegant drawing of the ancient Altar-piece now in the hands of Mr. Greene of this city, the collector and possessor of a museum that (Sir Ashton Lever's, so soon to be dismembered, excepted) has not perhaps its equal in this kingdom. An account of this antique painting was given in the Gentleman's Magazine for May 1783, p. 396, but a mistake was made in the description of that compartment of which St. Anthony is the subject, who is there described as "relieving a distressed pilgrim;" but upon a sketch of this compartment being sent by Mr. Greene to Mr. Pegge of Whittington, that worthy and eminent antiquary remitted the following quotation from Caxton (fol. cxv.), which gives a clear and satisfactory explanation of that particular panel in this curious piece of antiquity:

"There was an hermyte that had renounced the world, and not perfightly, for he had somewhat propre to hymself, whom St. Anthonye sent to the market to bye fleshe; and as (he) was comynge and brought the fleshe, the dogges assayled hym, and also tare hym, and toke the fleshe from him. And whan he came to St. Anthonye, he told him what was happed to hym. And thenne said Saynt Anthonye to hym: Thus as the boundes have doon to the so doo the devyllis to monkes that kepe money, and have some propre to theymself."

The lump under the hermit's garment in the drawing represents the flesh he had bought; and the dog reared on his hinder legs means to express the bounds mentioned in the legend above.

The drawing comprehends the whole of the Altar-piece, and is an advantageous specimen of the untutored pencil of our ingenious artist Mr. Stringer.

Yours, &c. H. W.

MR. URBAN,
AS I was lately looking into the LXXIInd volume of the Philosophical Transactions, I met with the following curious passages in Sir Wm. Hamilton's Letter to Sir Joseph Banks, giving an account of the earthquakes which happened in Italy from Feb. to May 1783:

GENT. MAG. January, 1785.

"I must mention," says the elegant writer, "a most remarkable instance I met with of animals being able to live long without food, of which there have been many examples during these present earthquakes. At Soriano, two fattened hogs that had remained buried under a heap of ruins, were taken out alive the forty-second day; they were lean and weak, but soon recovered." Afterwards, in his description of the effects of the earthquakes at Messina, he says, "A curious circumstance happened here (Messina) also, to prove that animals can remain long alive without food; two mules belonging to the Duke de Belviso remained under a heap of ruins, one of them 22 days: and the other 23 days, they would not eat for some days, but drank water plentifully, and are now recovered. There are numberless instances of dogs remaining many days in the same situation; and a hen belonging to the British Vice Consul at Messina, that had been closely shut up under the ruins of his house, was taken out the 22d day, and is now recovered; it did not eat for some days, but drank freely; it was emaciated, and shewed little signs of life at first. From these instances, and those related before of the hogs at Soriano, and several others of the same kind that have been related to me, but which being less remarkable I omit, one may conclude, that long fasting is always attended with great thirst, and total loss of appetite."

These passages recalled to my memory an instance of a similar kind that happened in Derbyshire a few years ago, which I cannot help thinking full as remarkable as any of the above related by Sir Wm. Hamilton. As the instance I refer to has never yet, to the best of my knowledge, been made public, I am persuaded Mr. Urban will not think it undeserving a place in his entertaining Museum.

During the heavy snow which fell in the night of the 7th of January, 1776, a parcel of sheep belonging to Mr. John Wolley, of Matlock, in that county, which were pastured on that part of the East Moor that lies within the manor of Matlock, were covered with the drifted snow; in the course of a day or two all the sheep that were covered with the snow were found again, except two, which which were consequently given up as lost; but on the 14th of February following (some time after the break of the snow in the valleys, and thirty-eight days after the fall), as a servant was walking over a large parcel of drifted snow which remained on the declivity of a hill, a dog he had with him discovered one of the two sheep that had been lost, by winding (or scenting) it through a small aperture which the breath of the Sheep had made in the snow; the servant thereupon dug away the snow, and released the captive from its prison; it immediately ran to a neighbouring spring, at which it drank for a considerable time, and afterwards rejoined its old companions as though no such accident had befallen it. On inspecting the place where it was found, it appeared to have passed between two large stones which lay parallel with each other at about two feet and an half distance, and probably were the means of protecting it from the great weight of the snow, which in that place lay several yards thick; from the number of ropes around it, it did not appear that the sheep had been able to pick up any food during its confinement. Soon afterwards its owner removed it to some low lands, but as it had nearly lost its appetite it was fed with bread and milk for some time; in about a fortnight after its enlargement it lost its sight and wool, but in a few weeks afterwards they both returned again, and in the course of the following summer it was quite recovered. The remaining sheep was found dead about a week after the discovery of the other.

MR. URBAN,

I Here send you some historic matter respecting the use of coffee, tea, and chocolate in this kingdom: Little could our ancestors of two centuries back suppose that their descendants would be reduced to the necessity of sending from the East to Western Indies for the materials for a comfortable breakfast. There is a gradation in customs, which often originate from individuals. Tradition ascribes the smoking of tobacco to Sir Walter Raleigh. It is observed by Ant. a Wood (Ath. Oxon. II. 1140.), that while Nathaniel Conopius, a Cretan born, continued in Balliol College in Oxford, which he left in 1648, he made the drink for his own use called coffee, and usually drank it every morning, being the first, as the ancients of that House informed him, that was ever drunk in Oxon. In the year 1650, we learn from the same author (Life. 8vo. v. Index). "Jacob a Jew opened a coffee-house at the Angel in the parish of St. Peter in the East, Oxon, and there it was by some, who delighted in novelty, drank. In 1654, Cirques Jobson, a Jew and Jacobite, borne near Mount-Libanus, sold coffee in Oxon; and in 1655, Arth. Tillyard, apothecary, sold coffee publicly in his house against All Soules Coll. This coffee-house continued till his majesties returne and after, and then they became more frequent, and had an excise set upon coffee." The author of the "New View of London" (1708, p. 30) found it recorded, "that one James Farr, a barber, who kept the coffee-house which is now the Rainbow, by the Inner Temple Gate (one of the first in England), was in the year 1657 presented by the inquest of St. Dunstan's in the West, for making and selling a sort of liquor called coffee, as a great nuisance and prejudice of the neighbourhood, &c." And who would then have thought London would ever have had near 3000 such nuisances, and that coffee would have been (as now, 1708) so much drunk by the best of quality and physicians? The frequency of coffee-houses at and soon after the Restoration is apparent from several authorities. In the "Kingdom's Intelligencer," a weekly paper, published by authority; in 1662, are inserted four advertisements of these articles; of which I have selected the last as being the fullest; which is the paper from Monday Dec. 22, to Dec. 29, 1662. "At the coffee-house in Exchange-alley is sold by retail the right coffee-powder from 4 to 6s. 8d. per pound, as in goodnets; that pounded in a mortar at 2s. 6d. per pound; also that termed the East India berry at 18d. per pound; and that termed the right Turkie berry well garbled at 3s. per pound; the ungarbled for lesse; with directions gratis how to make and use the same: likewise there you may have chocolatta, the ordinary pound boxes at 2s. 6d. per pound, the perfumed from 4 to 10s. per pound; also sherbet made in Turkie of lemons, roses, and violets perfumed; and tea according to its goodness. For all which if any gentleman shall write or send, they shall be sure of the best, as they shall order, and to avoid deceit, warranted under the house seal, viz.

A. J. R.

Morât the Great, &c. Further, all gentlemen that are customers and acquaintance are (the next New-year's day) invited at the signe of the Great Turk at the new coffee-house in Exchange-alley, where coffee will be on free-cost." And so may be to the world's end, was added in the preceding of Dec. 20. In the two former of Aug. 4, and Oct. 13, the terms are "tea or chaa, according to its goodness;" unluckily no price is any where mentioned to this article; in the others there is considerable. Coffee in the first advertisement was from 2s. 6d. to 5s. In the second the same, a better sort at 4s. and the best of all at 6s. per pound. The right Turkey berry at 2s. 8d. The India berry, sweet and good, at 1s. 6d. per pound, of which at present in divers places there is much, bad, which the ignorant for cheapness do buy, and is the cause of such bad coffee as is drunk in divers places. Chocolate in the first pound boxes at 2s. the perfumed at 4s. 6s. 10s. 16s., and the very best at 20s. per pound. In the second, the perfumed at 4s. 10s. 10s. per pound. In the last, coffee rose 8d. higher than in the preceding week.

In the year 1665 appeared in 4to. a facetious poem, with the title of "The Character of a Coffee-house; Wherein is contained a description of the persons usually frequenting it, with their discourse and humours; as also the admirable virtues of coffee. By an Eye and Ear-witness." It begins:

A Coffee-house, the learned said
It is a place where Coffee's sold;
This derivation cannot fall he,
For where Ale's vendid, there's an Alehouse.

The author mentions the signs, the Great Morât, the Sultan, Sultaness:

John's admir'd curled pate,
Or the Great Mogul in's chair of state,
Or Constantine the Grecian,
Who fourteen years was th' opely man
That made Coffee for the great Balhaw,
Although the man he never saw:
Or if you see a Coffee-cup
Fill'd from a Turkish pot, hung up
Within the clouds, &c.

He then proceeds to the company, and the several liquors,

The Gallant he for Tea doth call,
The Lover for nought at all;
Pragmatic he doth intreat,
That they will fill him some Beau-cheat;
The Virtuoso, he cries, hand me,
Some Coffee mixt with Sugar-candy;
Phanaticus (at last) says, come,

Bring me some Aromaticum;
The Player bawls for Chocolate:
All which the Bumpkin wond'ring at,
Cries, Ho, my Masters! what d'ye speak,
D'ye call for drink in Heathen Greek?
Give me some good old Ale or Beer,
Or else I will not drink, I swear.

That these houses soon became places of general resort is very evident;

Of all sorts and all conditions,
Even Vintners, Surgeons, and Physicians,
The Blind, the Deaf, and Aged Cripple,
Do here resort, and Coffee tipples.

I shall conclude this account with one line, which carries back the liquor farther than is generally known:

Spiced Punch (in bowls) the Indians quaff.

Let us come now to tea with eggs. (Sir Kenelm Digby's Book of Receipts, Lond. 1669, 8vo. p. 255.)

The Jesuite that came from China, anno 1654, told Mr. Waller, that there they use sometimes in this manner: "To make a pint of the infusion, take two yolks of new-laid eggs, and beat them very well with as much fine sugar as is sufficient for this quantity of liquor; when they are very well incorporated, pour your tea upon the eggs and sugar, and stir them well together. So drink it hot. This is when you come home from attending business abroad, and are very hungry, and yet have not convenience to eat presently a competent meal. This presently discuteth and satisfieth all rawness and indigestion of the stomach, flyeth suddenly over the whole body and into the veins, and strengtheneth exceedingly, and preserves one a good while from necessity of eating." Mr. Waller findeth all those effects of it thus with eggs.

It is certain that it was a favourite liquor with this poet, as we may infer from his verses on it:

The Muse's friend, Tea, does our fancy aid;
Repress those vapours which the head invade;
And keeps that palace of the soul serene.

King William, it has been said, was fond of this beverage; and from the same authority of report, in his time it was three pounds a pound.

THE inclosed extract from an ancient record may be esteemed curious and interesting by those who have entered into the spirit of Mr. Walpole's Historic Doubts, for the following reasons:

1. This record is unnoticed in any of our histories, ancient or modern, that I can recollect.

2. It ascertains the individual charge on Sir William Stanley, for which he suffered: this our historians, and their commentators, have either affected not to be clear in, or been defective in pursuing the direct means to come at it; (which, by the way, is now open to the researches of those whose leisure, talents, inclinations, and love of truth, are adequate to the purpose of investigation, by access to the public records, in the dark times of Edward the Fourth, Edward the Fifth, Richard the Third, and Henry the Seventh.)

3. It ascertains another fact, which seems hitherto perfectly unknown, either to the one or to the other, that Sir Robert Clifford was arraigned and convicted for the same offence.

4. It shews that Sir William Stanley and Sir Robert Clifford were both arraigned and convicted on one and the same indictment, and both adjudged to be hanged, drawn, and quartered. And

5. That this identical record, whatever is now become of it, as well as of other interesting records [extracts of some, if this is well received, may be occasionally communicated] about the same period, was under the inspection of all the judges, post terminum Trinitatis, anno regni Caroli Regis Primi.

Of this record, Sir Thomas More, under-sheriff, in his junior years, or that great luminary Lord Bacon, could hardly be ignorant; and, if the latter was not, he must have been wanting in his endeavours, or have suppressed his knowledge of it for political reasons, greatly to his discredit as an historian and a man of veracity.

MR. URBAN,

Jan. 6.

MR. Coxe's very instructive Travels into Poland, Russia, Sweden, and Denmark, have afforded me much pleasure. They are the travels of a man of letters, and form a very pleasing exception to that crowd of publications written by men, who as the ombra of our young noblemen have been admitted into the courts of Europe, and who seem to think they cannot better entertain their fellow countrymen than by relating the particular civilities and even private conversations with which they had been honoured by personages not less distinguished by their elevated station than by their politeness and hospitality. These gentlemen seem to forget that many of these courts are little more than the country-seats of our nobility; and that it is as improper to print what they saw and heard there, as to publish in your entertaining Miscellany an account of one of their last visits to the country-seat of any of their noble acquaintances. The German nobility indeed do complain of this abuse, and one of their princesses lately said to an English gentleman, "but I must be cautious what I say to you,—you are perhaps an author."

But, thus prejudiced in favour of Mr. Coxe, you will believe me it was not without great regret and even surprise, that I read his reflections on the penal laws of Russia; and, in particular, his vindication of capital punishments. If Mr. C's conclusions are just, the Emperor Joseph has done ill in adopting the wise and humane principles of the Marquis Beccaria; and London may continue to behold its citizens expiring in in crowds on a scaffold before Newgate, instead of cleansing its streets from filth, repairing roads, digging canals, improving the navigation of rivers, or working in our mines as in Siberia. Mr. C. tells us, "that the horror of dissolution has been repeatedly observed in the generality of mankind to preponderate beyond any other terrors." Were it the dread of death that impelled the robber or murderer to commit their respective crimes, I should yield myself an easy convert to Mr. C's reasonings. But to preserve a certain rank in society, or to continue the enjoyment of vicious indulgences, to which they had been too long habituated, appear to me to be the motives which induce them to hazard an existence, which, it should seem, without those gratifications is of no value to them. What then is the most heavy punishment we can inflict on them, or hold out as a warning to others? Shall we allot them death, which they had so lately braved with rashness, and often with intrepidity? Let us rather deny them what they sought. Let us degrade them from the rank they aimed to preserve by injustice, and let the labour of the remainder of their lives be appropriated to relieve the distresses of those who though poor revere those laws which have secured to them their personal safety, and which have generously promised they shall never want. Mr. C. adds, "that if we could devise a punishment more terrible than death, this new punishment ought to be inflicted within the reach of vulgar observation, and not in the remotest regions of Siberia." To the latter clause I entirely accede, and wish much to see our criminals employed as they are at Vienna, where six or eight of them, connected to one chain, and guarded by a soldier, sweep the streets. They behave with decency, and no one can be so ungenerous as to insult them. In London the criminal encourages his companions in iniquity by the spirit with which he braves death, or confessing his crimes melts the spectators into tears, who, commiserating his fate as a man, almost forget the crime for which he suffered, and are ready to reproach the laws as too severe. Breaking on the wheel is a punishment which, it should seem, will meet Mr. C's ideas. "It is more terrible than death." But will he propose the introduction of it into our own country? I shall only remark, that murders are much more frequent in Paris*, in spite of its boasted police, than either in London or Vienna.

But Mr. C. urges, that the lenity of the Russian laws is illusive, and that, "upon a general calculation, it will perhaps be found, that notwithstanding the apparent mildness of the penal code, not fewer malefactors suffer death in Russia, than in those countries where that mode of punishment is appointed by the laws." It could have been wished that so intelligent a traveller as Mr. C. instead of resting on the casual remark of a "foreign gentleman †," had made use of the excellent opportunities which her Imperial Majesty granted to him ‡, to ascertain a point of so much importance to his argument and to mankind, before he had attempted to refute the excellent remarks of Judge Blackstone. He tells us, that some die under the knout, some are exhausted by fatigue on the journey, and that the remnant perish prematurely from the "unwholesomeness of the mines." If they die under the knout, or on the journey, we can only lament that their sentence is ill-administered; and if the mines of Siberia were unwholesome, which as there are none of quicksilver I cannot believe to be the case, by whom ought they to be worked—by the innocent—or the guilty?

I cannot take leave of this subject without making one remark on the application made by her Imperial Majesty to the Government here, to receive the criminals condemned to death and transportation. To send those of the latter denomination to our own colonies, as we formerly did, was not diminishing our own strength. Habits of labour and industry changed the refuse of Gr. Britain into useful citizens; and numbers who had broken the laws of this country, have voluntarily risked their lives in the armies of the United States, in defence of a constitution equally free with our own. Let us not give such accessions of strength to an empire already too vast, which is every day becoming more and more formidable to the rest of Europe, and which, possessed as she is of the command of three seas, bids fair to become in the course of less than a century the first maritime power in the world. Sailors, mechanics, coiners, are often found in the lists of the condemned. Will not the Empress avail herself of such means of improving her subjects? Will she not reward the ingenious with that ease or affluence which they sought at the hazard of their lives? Will not such invite the associates of their crimes to partake of the rewards of their boldness? Siberia will lose its horrors, and robberies may be committed without dread of perpetual slavery.

P. S. Can any of your ingenious correspondents favour the public with an account of the origin and fall of that excellent plan for the building of Penitentiary Houses, in which the late Dr. Fothergill interested himself so much, whose steady perseverance, I doubt not, would have completed what his benevolence and judgement had induced him to undertake? How much does society lose by the death of one virtuous citizen! Yours, &c. S.

MR. URBAN, Jamaica, Aug 1784.

THE following letter, never before published, was extracted from an old book of manuscripts in the Island of Jamaica, containing also Venables' Narrative, with colonial and political discussions and memoirs during the last century. Mr. Long, in his valuable survey of Jamaica, has made copious quotations from this book.

The translation is bald and inaccurate; but, as the Spanish original is not before me, I have not ventured to make any material alterations.

[This letter of Columbus, which bears evident marks of authenticity, appears to have been written during his fourth and last voyage, when he lay in a most deplorable situation on the coast of Jamaica, where, after having completed his richest and most valuable discoveries of Veragua, Mexico, and the whole coast of Terra Firma, from the Gulph of Honduras to the mouth of the river Orinoco, he was forced to run his ships on shore, being so rotten and worm-eaten that he could no longer keep them above water. Here he suffered the extremest misery. Seized with the most excruciating pains of the gout, deserted by most of his crew, his provisions exhausted, and the natives his enemies, he had no resource but to the bare chance of a trusty servant's finding his way to St. Domingo in an Indian canoe, which he providentially accomplished, entrusted, as it should seem, with the following letter, and the papers therein mentioned. Whether this letter ever found its way to the Spanish Court, does not appear. EDITOR, &c.

Letter from CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS to the King of Spain.

"SIR,

Jamaica, 1503.

Diego Mendes, and the papers I send by him, will shew your Highness what rich mines of gold I have discovered in Veragua; and how I intended to have left my brother at the River Berlin, if the judgements of Heaven, and the greatest misfortunes in the world, had not prevented it. However, it is sufficient that your Highness and successors will have the glory and advantage of all, and that the full discovery and settlement are reserved for happier persons than the unfortunate Columbus. If God be so merciful to me, as to conduct Mendes to Spain, I doubt not but he will make your Highness and my great mistress understand that this will not only be a Castle and Law; but a discovery of a world of subjects, lands, and wealth, greater than man's unbounded fancy could ever comprehend, or avarice itself covet. But neither he, this paper, nor the tongue of mortal man, can express the anguish and afflictions of my mind and body, nor the misery and dangers of my son, brother, and friends. For here already we have been above ten months lodged on the open decks of our ships, that are run on shore and lashed together. Those of my men that were well have mutinied under the Perris of Seville; my friends that were faithful are now sick and dying. We have destroyed the Indians provisions, so that they abandon us all; therefore we are like to perish by hunger; and these miseries are accompanied with so many aggravating circumstances, that it renders me the most wretched object of misfortune this world shall ever see; as if the displeasure of Heaven seconded the envy of Spain, and would punish as criminal these undertakings and meritorious services. Good Heaven, and you holy saints that dwell in it, let the King Don Ferdinand, and my illustrious mistress Donna Isabella, know that I am the most miserable man living, and that my zeal for their service and interest hath brought me to it, for it is impossible to live and have afflictions equal to mine. I see and with horror apprehend my own, and (for my sake) these unfortunate and deserving people's destruction. Alas! Pity and Justice have retired to their regions regions above; and it is a crime to have done, or have promised, too much. As my misery makes my life a burthen to myself, so I fear the empty titles of Perpetual Vice-roy and Admiral render me obnoxious to the Spanish nation. It is visible enough that all methods are made use of to cut the thread that is breaking; for I am in my old age oppressed with insupportable pains of the gout, and am now languishing and expiring with that, and other infirmities, among savages, where I have neither medicines nor provisions for the body; priest or sacrament for the soul: my men mutinying, my brother, my son, and those that are faithful, sick, starving, and dying; the Indians have abandoned us, and his Grace of Saint Domingo, Obando, has sent rather to see if I am dead, than to succour us, or to bury me alive here; for his boat neither delivered a letter, or spoke, or would receive any from us. I therefore conclude your Highness's officers intend that here my voyage and life should end. Oh blessed Mother of God! who compassionates the most miserable and oppressed! why did not Cenell * Bovadilla kill me, when he robbed me and my brother of our dearly purchased gold, and sent us to Spain in chains, without trial, crime, or shadow of one? These chains are all the treasures I have, and they shall be buried with me, if I chance to have a coffin or grate; for I would have the remembrance of so unjust and tragical an act die with me, and for the glory of the Spanish name be eternally forgotten. Had it been so (oh blessed Virgin), Obando would not have found us for ten or twelve months perishing through malice as great as our misfortunes. Oh, let it not bring a further infamy on the Castilian name, nor let future ages know there were wretches so vile in this as to think to recommend themselves to Don Ferdinand by destroying the unfortunate and miserable Christopher Columbus, not for his crimes, but for his presences to discover and give to Spain a new world! It was you, oh Heaven, that inspired and conducted me to it! do you therefore weep for me, and shew pity; let the earth, and every soul in it that loves justice and mercy, weep for me; and you, oh glorified Saints of God, who know my innocence, and see my sufferings, have mercy on this present age, which is too envious and obdurate to weep for me! Surely those who are unborn, will do it, when they are told that Christopher Columbus with his own fortune, at the hazard of his own and brothers' lives, with little or no expence to the crown of Spain, in twenty years and four voyages, rendered greater services than ever mortal men did to prince or kingdom; yet was suffered to perish without being charged with the least crime, poor and miserable, all but his chains being taken from him: so that he, who gave Spain another world, had neither in that, nor in the old world, a cottage for himself, or his wretched family. But should Heaven still persecute me, and seem displeased with what I have done, as if the discovery of this new world would be fatal to the Old, and as a punishment bring my life in this miserable place to its fatal period; yet, oh good angels, you that succour the oppressed and innocent, bring this paper to my great Mistress; she knows how much I have suffered for her glory and service, and will be so just and pious as not to let the sons and brothers of him who has brought Spain immense riches, and added to it vast and unknown kingdoms and empires, want bread or live on alms! She, if she lives, will consider that cruelty and ingratitude will provoke Heaven, and that the wealth I have discovered will stir up all

* This man, a Spanish knight, and a favourite at court, when Columbus was governor of Hispaniola, was sent out with a commission to enquire into his conduct. He had been represented to his Sovereigns, Ferdinand and Isabella, as cruel, covetous, corrupt, ambitious, and tyrannical; but it was thought his greatest crime was, that of being immensely rich. He was therefore charged with working the gold mines within his jurisdiction clandestinely, and concealing from the officers of the crown those that were the most valuable. As his ruin was predetermined, it was easy to find accusers. He was seized, divested of his government, put in irons, his whole property confiscated, and, thus impoverished he was sent prisoner to Spain. Here he found means to get admittance to the royal presence, and was again taken into favour, probably on a promise of making still more valuable discoveries. In pursuit of which, on the 9th of May, 1502, he set sail with four small barks, and touching at the port of St. Domingo on the apprehension of an approaching tempest, he was there refused entrance; his knowledge of the coast enabled him to escape its fury, by taking a timely shelter in a commodious creek; where he had the satisfaction to learn, before his departure, that his inveterate enemy Bovadilla, with 19 ships, chiefly laden with the property of which he (Columbus) had been robbed, had perished miserably. mankind to revenge and rapine, so that the nation may chance to suffer hereafter for what envious, malicious, and ungrateful people do now."

A letter of Sir William Herbert of St. Julian's in Monmouthshire (father in law to the famous Lord Herbert of Cherbury), to a gentleman of the name of Morgan in the same County.

SIR,

PERUSE this letter in God's name. Be not disquieted. I reverence your hoary hair. Although in your son I find too much folly and lewdness, yet in you I expect gravity and wisdom. It hath pleased your son, late at Bristol, to deliver a challenge to a man of mine, on the behalf of a gentleman, he said, as good as myself. Who he was he named not, neither do I know. But if he be as good as myself, it must either be for virtue, for birth, for ability, or for calling and dignity: for virtue, I think he meant not; for it is a matter that exceeds his judgment; if for birth, he must be the heir male of an Earl, the heir in blood of ten Earls (for in testimony thereof I bear their several coats): besides he must be of the blood royal; for by my grandmother Devereux I am lineally and legitimately descended out of the body of Edward IV. If for ability, he must have a thousand pound a year in possession, a thousand pound a year more in expectation, and must have some thousands in substance besides; if for calling and dignity, he must be a Knight, a Lord of several seignories in several Kingdoms, a lieutenant of his county, and a counsellor of a province.

Now to lay all circumstances aside, be it known to your son, or to any man else, that if there be any one, who beareth the name of a gentleman, and whose words are of reputation in his country, that doth say, or dare say, that I have done unjustly, spoken an untruth, stained my credit and reputation, in this matter, or any matter else, wherein your son is exasperated, I say he lieth in his throat, and my sword shall maintain my word upon him in any place or province, wheresoever he dare, and where I stand not sworn to observe the peace. But if they be such as be within my governance, and over whom I have authority, I will for their reformation chastise them with justice, and for their malapert misdemeanour bind them to their good behaviour. Of this sort I account your son, and his like, against whom I will shortly issue my warrant, if this my warning doth not reform them. And so I thought fit to advertize you hereof, and leave you to God. W. HERBERT.

MR. URBAN,

Jan. 10.

A Paragraph has appeared in many London news-papers this month, copied doubtless from the country ones, and purporting, that "The Society of Antiquaries having had undoubted information that the remains of King Alfred the Great, who died in the year 901, were deposited in the parish church of Driffeld, about 20 miles from Hull in Yorkshire, deputed two of that learned body (accompanied by some other gentlemen) to take up and examine the same. Accordingly, on Tuesday the 20th of September last, the above gentlemen with proper assistants entered the church for that purpose, to be directed to the identical spot by a secret history; after digging some time, they found a stone coffin, and, on opening the same, discovered the entire skeleton of that great and pious prince, together with most part of his steel armour, the remainder of which had probably been corroded by dust, and length of time. After satisfying their curiosity, the coffin was closed as well as the grave, that every thing might remain in the state as when found. In the history above alluded to, it appears, that King Alfred being wounded in the battle of Stamford Briggs, returned to Driffeld, where he languished of his wounds 20 days, and then expired, and was interred in the parish church thereof; during his sickness he chartered four fairs at that place, which are now annually held." You may be well assured, that if the discovery aforesaid was made, it was not conducted by any deputation from the learned body referred to, however much it were to be wished they would occasionally appoint such deputations, and publish reports from them, but was the result of mere private curiosity. Nor is this the least error in the account, for the body deposited in Driffeld church was not that of Alfred the Great, who died 901, but that of Alfred king of Northumberland, who died at Driffeld two centuries before him, A. D. 704 or 705, after a reign of 20 years, not distinguished by any remarkable events. See Kapin, I. 175, 176; and the authors there cited. Saxon Chronicle, sub anno. Bede, V. 19. Flor. Sketch

SKETCH of the LIFE and CHARACTER of the late Captain COOK. (Copied from Vol. III. of COOK'S Voyage, written by Captain KING.)

CAPTAIN JAMES COOK was born at Whitby in Yorkshire, in the year 1727, and, at an early age, was put apprentice to a shopkeeper in a neighbouring village. His natural inclination not having been consulted on this occasion, he soon quitted the counter from disgust, and bound himself, for nine years, to the master of a vessel in the coal trade. At the breaking out of the war in 1755, he entered into the King's service, on board the Eagle, at that time commanded by Capt. Hamer, and afterwards by Sir Hugh Palliser, who soon discovered his merit, and introduced him on the quarter-deck.

In the year 1758 we find him master of the Northumberland, the flag-ship of Lord Colville, who had then the command of a Squadron stationed on the Coast of America. It was here, as I have often heard him say, that, during a hard winter, he first read Euclid, and applied himself to the study of mathematics and astronomy, without any other assistance than what a few books and his own industry afforded him. At the same time that he thus found means to cultivate and improve his mind, and to supply the deficiencies of an early education, he was engaged in most of the busy and active scenes of the war in America. At the siege of Quebec Sir Charles Saunders committed to his charge the execution of services of the first importance in the naval department. He piloted the boats to the attack of Montmorency; conducted the embarkation to the Heights of Abraham; examined the passage, and laid buoys for the security of the large ships in proceeding up the river. The courage and address with which he acquitted himself in these services, gained him the warm friendship of Sir Charles Saunders and Lord Colville, who continued to patronise him, & ring the rest of their lives, with the greatest zeal and affection. At the conclusion of the war he was appointed, through the recommendation of Lord Colville and Sir H. Palliser, to survey the Gulph of St. Lawrence and the Coast of Newfoundland. In this employment he continued till the year 1767, when he was fixed on, by Sir Edward Hawke, to command an expedition to the South Seas, for the purpose of observing the Transit of Venus, and prosecuting discoveries in that part of the globe.

From this period, as his services are too well known to require a recital here, so his reputation has proportionably advanced to a height too great to be affected by my panegyric. Indeed he appears to have been most eminently and peculiarly qualified for this species of enterprise. The earliest habits of his life, the course of his services, and the constant application of his mind, all conspired to fit him for it, and gave him a degree of professional knowledge which can fall to the lot of very few.

The constitution of his body was robust, inured to labour, and capable of undergoing the severest hardships. His stomach bore, without difficulty, the coarsest and most ungrateful food. Indeed temperance in him was scarcely a virtue, so great was the indifference with which he submitted to every kind of self-denial. The qualities of his mind were of the same hardy, vigorous kind with those of his body. His understanding was strong, and perspicuous; his judgment, in whatever related to the services he was engaged in, quick and sure. His designs were bold and manly, and both in the conception and in the mode of execution bore evident marks of a great original genius. His courage was cool and determined, and accompanied with an admirable presence of mind in the moment of danger. His manners were plain, and unaffected. His temper might perhaps have been justly blamed, as subject to hastiness and passion, had not these been disarmed by a disposition the most benevolent and humane.

Such were the outlines of Capt. Cook's character; but its most distinguishing feature was that unremitting perseverance in the pursuit of his object, which was not only superior to the opposition of dangers, and the pressure of hardships, but even exempt from the want of ordinary relaxation during the long and tedious voyages in which he was engaged. His eagerness and activity were never in the least abated. No incidental temptation could detain him for a moment; even those intervals of recreation which sometimes unavoidably occurred, and were looked for by us with a longing that persons who have experienced the fatigues of service will readily excuse, were submitted to by him with a certain impatience whenever they could not be employed in making further provision for for the more effectual prosecution of his designs.

It is not necessary here to enumerate the instances in which these qualities were displayed during the great and important enterprizes in which he was engaged. I shall content myself with stating the result of those services, under the two principal heads to which they may be referred—those of Geography and Navigation, placing each in a separate and distinct point of view.

Perhaps no science ever received greater additions from the labours of a single man than Geography has done from those of Capt. Cook. In his first voyage to the South Seas he discovered the Society Islands; determined the insularity of New Zealand; discovered the straits that separate the two islands, and are called after his name; and made a complete survey of both. He afterwards explored the Eastern coast of New Holland, hitherto unknown, an extent of 27 degrees of latitude, or upwards of 2000 miles.

In his second expedition he resolved the great problem of the Southern Continent, having traversed that hemisphere between the latitudes of 40 and 70 degrees, in such a manner as not to leave a possibility of its existence, unless near the Pole, and out of the reach of navigation. During this voyage he discovered New Caledonia, the largest island in the Southern Pacific, except New Zealand; the island of Georgia, and an unknown coast, which he named Sandwich Land, the Thule of the Southern hemisphere; and having twice visited the Tropical Seas, he settled the situations of the Old, and made several New discoveries.

But his last voyage is distinguished above all the rest, by the extent and importance of its discoveries. Besides several smaller islands in the Southern Pacific, he discovered, to the North of the Equinoctial Line, the groupe called The Sandwich Islands, which, from their situation and productions, bid fairer for becoming an object of consequence in the system of European navigation than any other discovery in the South Sea. He afterwards explored what had hitherto remained unknown of the Western coasts of America, from the latitude of 43 to 70 degrees North, containing an extent of 3500 miles; ascertained the proximity of the two great continents of Asia and America; passed the straits between them, and surveyed the coasts on each side to such a height of Northern latitude as to demonstrate the impracticability of a passage in that hemisphere from the Atlantic into the Pacific Ocean, either by an Eastern or Western course. In short, if we except the Sea of Amur, and the Japanese Archipelago, which still remain imperfectly known to Europeans, he has completed the hydrography of the habitable globe.

As a navigator, his services were not perhaps less splendid, certainly not less important and meritorious. The method which he discovered, and so successfully pursued, of preserving the health of seamen, forms a new era in navigation, and will transmit his name to future ages amongst the friends and benefactors of mankind.

Those who are conversant in naval history need not be told at how dear a rate the advantages which had been sought through the medium of long voyages at sea have always been purchased. That dreadful disorder, which is peculiar to this service, and whose ravages have marked the tracks of discoverers with circumstances almost too shocking to relate, must, without exercising an unwarrantable tyranny over the lives of our seamen, have proved an insuperable obstacle to the prosecution of such enterprizes. It was reserved for Capt. Cook to shew the world, by repeated trials, that voyages might be protracted to the unusual length of three, or even four years, in unknown regions, and under every change and rigour of climate, not only without affecting the health, but even without diminishing the probability of life in the smallest degree. The method he pursued has been fully explained by himself in a paper which was read before the Royal Society in the year 1776, and whatever improvements the experience of the present voyage has suggested are mentioned in their proper places.

With respect to his professional abilities, I shall leave them to the judgement of those who are best acquainted with the nature of the services in which he was adily acknowledge, three expeditions of difficulty, of so much a variety of manner and invariable required not only a knowledge of his skill and comprehension, in resources, and application of what prior calls of the service required.

Having given the most faithful account I have been able to collect, both from my own observation and the relations of others, of the death of my ever-honoured friend, and also of his character and services, I shall now leave his memory to the gratitude and admiration of posterity, accepting, with melancholy satisfaction, the honour * which the loss of him hath procured me, of seeing my name joined with his, and of testifying that affection and respect for his memory which, whilst he lived, it was no less my inclination than my constant study to shew him.

To the Memory of Capt. JAMES COOK, the ablest and most renowned Navigator
this or any Country hath produced.

[Supposed to be by a Naval Officer grown old in the service of his country.]

He raised himself, solely by his merit, from a very obscure birth, to the rank of Post-Captain in the Royal Navy, and was unfortunately killed by the Savages of the Island of Owhyhee, on the 14th of February, 1779; which Island he had, not long before, discovered, when prosecuting his Third Voyage round the Globe.

He possessed, in an eminent degree, all the qualifications requisite for his profession and great undertakings, together with the amiable and worthy qualities of the best men,

Cool and deliberate in judging; sagacious in determining; active in executing; steady and persevering in enterprising, from vigilance and unremitting caution; unsubdued by labour, difficulties, and disappointments; fertile in expedients; never wanting presence of mind; always possessing himself, and the full use of a sound understanding.

Mild, just, but exact in discipline; he was a father to his people, who were attached to him from affection, and obedient from confidence.

His knowledge, his experience, his sagacity rendered him so entirely master of his subject, that the greatest obstacles were surmounted, and the most dangerous navigations became easy and almost safe under his directions.

He explored the Southern Hemisphere to a much higher latitude than had ever been reached, and with fewer accidents than frequently befall those who navigate the coasts of this Island.

By his benevolent and unobtruding attention to the welfare of his ship's company, he discovered and introduced a system for the preservation of the health of seamen in long voyages, which has proved wonderfully efficacious; for, in his second Voyage round the World, which continued upwards of three years, he lost only one man by disemper, out of 118, of which his company consisted.

The death of this eminent and valuable man was a loss to mankind in general, and particularly to be deplored by every nation that respects useful accomplishments, that honours science, and loves the benevolent and amiable affections of the heart. It is still more to be deplored by this country, which may justly boast of having produced a man hitherto unequalled for nautical talents; and that sorrow is farther aggravated by the reflection, that this country was deprived of this ornament by the enmity of a people from whom indeed it might have been dreaded, but from whom it was not deserved. For, actuated always by the most attentive care and tender compassion for the Savages in general, this excellent man was ever assiduously endeavouring, by kind treatment, to dissipate their fears, and court their friendships; over-looking their thefts and treacheries, and frequently interposing, at the hazard of his life, to protect them from the sudden resentment of his own injured people.

The object of his last mission was, to discover and ascertain the boundaries of Asia and America, and to penetrate into the Northern Ocean by the North-East Cape of Asia.

Traveller! contemplate, admire, revere, and emulate this great Master in his profession, whose skill and labours have enlarged natural philosophy, have extended nautical science, and have disclosed the long-concealed and admirable arrangement of the Almighty in the formation of this globe, and at the same time the arrogance of mortals in presuming to account, by their speculations, for the laws by which He was pleased to create it.—It is now discovered, beyond all doubt, that the same great Being who created the universe by his fiat, by the same ordained our earth to keep a just poise, without a corresponding Southern continent, and it does so! * He stretches "out the North over the empty place," and hangeth the Earth upon nothing." Job.

* Capt. King went out second lieutenant of the Resolution, but, by the deaths of the Captains Cook and Clerke, came home captain of the Discovery. He, alas! has not long survived the fame acquired by this publication. Epit.

If the arduous but exact researches of this extraordinary man have not discovered a new world, they have discovered seas unnavigated and unknown before; they have made us acquainted with islands, people, and productions, of which we had no conception; and if he has not been so fortunate as Americus to give his name to a continent, his pretensions to such a distinction remain unrivalled; and he will be revered while there remains a page of his own modest account of his Voyage, and as long as mariners and geographers shall be instructed, by his New Map of the Southern Hemisphere, to trace the various courses and discoveries he has made.

If public services merit public acknowledgments; if the man who has adorned and raised the fame of his country, is deserving of honours; then Captain COOK deserves to have a monument raised to his memory by a generous and grateful nation.

MR. URBAN,

Jan. 2.

IN the first volume of Warton's History of English Poetry, I find the following passage: "Nicola, Uxor Gerardi de Canvill, reddit computum de centum marcis pro maritanda Matildi filia sua cuicumque voluerit exceptis Mimicis Regis." "Nicola, wife of Gerard of Canville, accounts to the King for 100 Marks for the Privilege of marrying her Daughter Maud to whatever person she pleases, the King's Mimics excepted." — Whether or no Mimici Regis are here a sort of players kept in the King's household for diverting the Court at stated seasons, at least with performances of mimicry, I cannot indeed determine; yet we may remark an error, not unlikely to be made from the similarity of the I to the strokes that form the N M and U in manuscripts of that date. If so, the mistake must have arisen by reading mimicis instead of inimicis regis; and the king's enemies were the persons excepted. Y. Z.

MR. URBAN,

Jan. 13.

I OFTEN meet with observations, in the course of my reading, the truth of which can only be demonstrated by the concurrence of a number of people. The following is one which (not having the opportunity to communicate to a numerous circle) I have sent you, begging if any of your correspondents can adduce an instance to the contrary, they will do it through the channel of your Magazine.

It is asserted, to prove the difference of an animal and a rational being, that there never was an instance of a person having dreamt of an animal that was dead, though we often dream of a man or woman deceased. J. A. T. C.

A Gentleman in Antigua* is desirous of being informed who was the real author of the Life of John Bunkle†; and, as he pretends his stories are founded on fact, whether any of those wonderful scenes in the North of England have been visited or described by any modern Tourist, or any of the houses, &c. ever had a real existence‡. He thinks an assertion in the well-written Life of Garrick, concerning the coaches filling up the space from Whitechapel to Temple-bar, knowing the distance and width of the streets, ought to rank in the line of credibility with the marvels of Bunkle.

ANTIQUARIUS informs us, that the parish-church of Harlow in Essex being accidentally burnt down, 1711, the workmen, who were digging on the foundation of the vestry, found an iron chest, and in it a large crucifix and a bottle, with this inscription, "Sanguis S^ci Catherine."

LEICESTRENSIS, who declares himself much gratified with the gleanings of Thirlby's life which have already appeared in the last volume of the Gentleman's Magazine, p. 260, which he admired before he had the least idea that Dr. Johnson (p. 893,) had furnished so many of the anecdotes, expresses the warmest wish that still farther particulars of him may be brought to public notice.—He would be happy also to see some account of Mr. Kilby, a famous schoolmaster at Leicester.

H. J. conjures our biographical correspondents to communicate what they happen to know of the Life of Markland, one of the most learned as well as pious men that ever adorned literature and religion. Some anecdotes of him have appeared in the Life of Mr. Bowyer, that excellent friend to virtue and science, who must have had frequent opportunities of knowing his character.—Even the slightest additional anecdotes of him (our correspondent observes) must be highly pleasing, until a more regular history of his life can be digested.

* Who would have done well to have sent his query at a less enormous expence. Letters from abroad should be post-paid. EDIT.

† The author in question was Mr. Amory, the son of a physician at Wakefield in Yorkshire. EDIT.

Part II. 4th.

ARTICLE XIX. On the remarkable Appearances, at the Polar Regions, of the Planet Mars, the Inclination of its Axis, the Position of its Poles, and its spheroidical Figure; with a few Hints relating to its real Diameter and Atmosphere. By William Herschel, Esq. F. R. S.

For settling the inclination and nodes of this planet's axis a good theory is here obtained by measures taken of the situation of some remarkable luminous spots*, by which its poles are distinguished†. But the "result of the contents of this paper" will best be given in the author's own words:

* The axis of Mars is inclined to the Ecliptic $59^{\circ} 42'$.

† The node of the axis is in $17^{\circ} 47'$ of Pises.

"The obliquity of the Ecliptic on the globe of Mars is $28^{\circ} 42'$.

"The point Aries on the Martial Ecliptic answers to our $19^{\circ} 28'$ of Sagittarius.

"The figure of Mars is that of an oblate spheroid, whose equatorial diameter is to the polar one as 1355 to 1272, or as 16 to 15 nearly.

"The equatorial diameter, reduced to the mean distance of the earth from the sun, is $9'' 8''$.

"And that planet has a considerable but moderate atmosphere. So that the inhabitants probably enjoy a situation in many respects similar to ours."

ART. XX. A Description of the Teeth of the Anarrhichas Lupus Linnæi, and of those of the Chatodon Nigricans of the same Author. To which is added, An Attempt to prove that the Teeth of Cartilaginous Fishes are perpetually renewed. By Mr. William André, Surgeon.

The teeth of fishes have an amazing variety, and none are more singular than those of the Anarrhichas Lupus, or Sea-wolf, and those of the Chatodon Nigricans, a species of Angel-fish, of which "the former have been but imperfectly described, and never represented distinct from the fish."—"The Sea-wolf is a fierce and ravenous fish, found in "the Northern parts of the Globe; "where is frequently grows to the "length of four feet, and upwards." The annexed description of its teeth cannot well be understood without a diagram. We shall therefore only add, that "they are not fixed in sockets; but "fastened to the jaw; are formed of a "hard bony matter, and are admirably "calculated for seizing its prey."—The Chatodon Nigricans, whose teeth are also described, "was brought from the West "Indies, and measured about 5 inches "in length;" and, from examining the teeth of sharks, sting-rays, and other cartilagenous fishes, the author concludes, that their renovation is frequent and perpetual during their lives. And thus it appears, that fishes have not only great longevity, but some of them "retain, in the article of teeth, a perpetual juvenility, being apparently "strangers to edentulous old age."

ART. XXI. Abstract of a Register of the Barometer, Thermometer, and Rain, at Lyndon in Rutland, 1783. By Thomas Barker, Esq.

The most remarkable circumstance here observed is, "a continued three "days rain, May 27 to 30, in which "there fell $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches; the most," Mr. Barker thinks, "that has come in one "unceasing rain since July 1736, when, "in about the same time, there came "5 inches," and "an uncommon haziness." This, which began during the showery time in June, and continued the rest of the summer, is here well described, and was generally observed, not only in England, but "all "over Europe, and even to the top of "the Alps."—"This haze," our author adds, "was very like Virgil's description of the summer after Julius "Cæsar's death, which was probably "the same case,

"Cum caput obscurâ nitidum ferrugine
 "textit";

"for rusty iron is a very good description of the colour the sun shone;" with this difference, that, according to Plutarch, it then "gave very little "heat," whereas with us "the summer "was in general hot and dry, and in "some countries very much so." Mr. Barker "never knew more mischief "done by thunder than there was in "different places this year."—On the meteors he has advanced nothing new.

* "In iron clouds conceal'd the public
 "light."

DRYDEN.

* A bright spot near the Southern Pole, appearing like a polar zone, has also been observed by M. Maraldi. See Dr. Smith's Optics, § 1094.

† These white spots at each pole Mr. Herschel, from analogy, supposes to be snow accumulated (as on the earth) in those very cold regions.

ART. XXII. On the Periods of the Changes of Light in the Star Algol. By John Goodricke, Esq.

For Mr. Goodricke's former observations on this star, see our last volume, p. 837. By the calculation here given he thinks "the period of its variation" "is ascertained, within ten or fifteen" "seconds, to be, on a mean, 2 days, 20" "hours, 49 minutes, and 3 seconds." Its duration now appears to him "about" "eight hours." Flamsteed, he adds, "has in two places" "marked Algol as" "of less magnitude than at other" "times."

ART. XXIII. Experiments and Observations on the Terra Ponderosa, &c. By William Withering, M. D.

This substance (terra ponderosa arena- rata), which is not unlike that of a lump of alum, was found in a lead-mine at Allon-Moor, in Cumberland. Experiments shew that it contained a large proportion of the terra ponderosa united to fixed air. Its more obvious properties are described, and also those of terra ponderosa vitriolata, found in the same mines, and elsewhere in England, and in Scotland; with experiments and observations on both.

ART. XXIV. Observations on the Transit of Mercury over the Disk of the Sun, on November 12, 1762, made at the Royal Observatory at Paris, with some Reflections on an Effect which was perceived in those Observations similar to that of a Refraction in the Atmosphere of Mercury. By John William Wailot, Member of the Electoral Academy of Sciences and Belles Lettres at Mannheim, &c. [In French †.]

"The use that may be made of the" "Transits of Mercury is, their enabling" "astronomers to determine, with more" "exactness, the position of the nodes of" "its orbit, and the difficulty of seeing" "that planet, in its other aspects with" "the Sun, renders them the more pre"cious. This transit was rendered "particularly disadvantageous by the "Sun's proximity to the horizon, and "Mercury's passing too near its edge.
"But all the 12th of November was so "clear as to give us great encourage"ment, and the exactness with which

"our observations were made now au"thorises us to have a better opinion of "them."

"The external contact
"of its entrance was at 4^h 56^m 28^s.
"The centre of Mercury
"was on the edge of the Sun at 4^h 58^m 28^s.
"The inner contact
"Mercury absolutely de"tached from the Sun at 3^h 3^m 43^s.
"Mercury, twice mea"sured, was found both
"times exactly the same,
"viz. 9 parts of the obje-
"tive micrometer, which
"are equal to 9th 53rd of a "great circle.

"Inner contact of Mercury
"exit, at 1^h 17^m 10^s 4th

"The centre of Mercury
"on the edge of the Sun at 1^h 20^m 38^s 4th

"The external contact
"of Mercury to the Sun
"tally out of sight at 2^h 22^m 53^s 4th

M. Wailot "saw not the least ap"pearance of an atmosphere or nebulo-"sity round Mercury." Yet he is "not "the less convinced of its existence, as "round all the celestial bodies, and "that it might have been perceived in "this transit in a sky more pure and "clear than that of Paris." For the calculation formed from his observations we must refer to those astronomers who understand French to the article.

ART. XXV. Thoughts on the constitution of Air, and of Dephlogisticated Air: with an Account of some Experiments on the Subject. By Mr. James Wall, Engineer. [of Birmingham.]

ART. XXVI. Sequel to the above. By the same.

The author here abandons an opinion (which he had formerly entertained), that "air is a modification of water;" observes, experimentally, that, "if any" "of the acid of nitre enters into the" "composition of the dephlogisticated" "air, it is a very small part," &c. But for his other observations and experiments, as they cannot be abridged, we must refer to the articles.

ART. XXVII. An Attempt to compare and connect the Thermometer for strong Fire, described in Vol. LXXII. of the Philosophical Transactions [see our Vol. LIII. p. 857], with the common Mercurial ones. By Mr. Josiah Wedg-wood, F. R. S. Patron to her Majesty.

This thermometer has been found, from extensive experience, to answer
Mr.

* "Historia Caelestis, vol. II. edit. 1725, p. 284 and 534."

† As some of our astronomers and philosophers understand no language but English, surely this, and all foreign articles, should be translated by the foreign secretary.

Mr. Wedgwood's expectations "as a measure of all degrees of common fire above ignition."—"To connect it with one which long use has rendered familiar to us," is all that is wanting. — This desirable and important object, however difficult, seems likely to be obtained by the experiments here communicated. But those, with the means employed for obtaining an intermediate thermometer, the species of gage used on this occasion, the method of taking the boiling heat of mercury, the apparatus for using ore in these experiments, &c. require diagrams. We shall therefore only add, that it appears that an interval of 4 degrees, on Mr. Wedgwood's thermometer, is equivalent to an interval of 41° on Fahrenheit's; consequently 1 to 130, and that the 9 of the one corresponds to the 1077½° of the other.

ART. XXIX. An Account of a remarkable Frost on the 13d of June, 1783. By the Rev. Sir John Cullum, Bart. P. R. S. and S. A.

The ground near Hardwick-house, in Suffolk, at three o'clock that morning, was covered with a white frost; and at Barton, about three miles off, between three and four, ice was seen in some shallow tubs of the thickness of a crown-piece, which was not melted before six. Some remarkable effects on the corn, trees, and shrubs, produced by this unseasonable frost, are accurately described.

ART. XXX. On a new Method of preparing a Test Liquor to shew the Presence of Acids and Alkalies in Che- mical Mixtures. By Mr. James Watt, Engineer.

Syrup of violets, we are told, was formerly the principal test of the point of saturation of mixtures of acids and alkalies. The infusion of tounesol, or of a preparation called litmus, has since been substituted in its stead. After giving the results of its being mixed with acids, alkalies, &c. Mr. Watt mentions a fact which seems to call in question its being always a test, &c. as above supposed, and has now discovered that red cabbage (brassica rubra) furnishes the best test, and in its fresh state has more sensibility, both to acids and alkalies, than litmus. — Annexed are different methods of extracting the colouring matter, and of preserving its virtues whilst kept in a liquid state.

ART. XXXI. An Account of a new Plant, of the Order of Eungi. By Thomas Woodward, Esq.

This extraordinary vegetable was first discovered by Mr. Humphreys, of Norwich. After giving its generic description, Mr. Woodward informs us, that "it arises from a volva, which is buried six or eight inches deep in dry sandy banks, and consequently is very difficult to be detected in its earliest state. To its perfect state it makes a rapid progress. It is not the agaricus procerus, but approaches nearly the genus Lycoperdon." Several plants that have some affinity with the fructification of this plant, are mentioned. And by late observations Mr. Woodward is convinced that it "frequently comes to a state of perfection before it reaches the surface."

ART. XXXII. Experiments to investigate the Variation of Local Heat. By James Six, Esq.

These experiments were made with thermometers of Mr. S.'s own new construction, placed in 3 different stations, viz. one on the top of the high tower of Canterbury Cathedral, about 220 feet from the ground; another at the bottom of the same tower, at about 110 feet; and a third in Mr. Six's own garden, not more than six feet from the ground, and all carefully exposed to the open air, in a shady Northern aspect. "The heat of the days always exceeded that at the middle, and still more the heat at the upper station." This difference might have been expected, "Not so the finding the cold of the night at the lowest, not only equal to, but, very frequently, exceeding the cold at the

the

the highest stations.—To discover “whether these variations would continue the same in winter,” &c. on Dec. 19. 1783, Mr. Six placed one thermometer in his garden, one on the top of the high tower, as before, and the third on the top of St. Thomas’s Hill, about a mile distant from the city, where, at 15 feet from the ground, it was nearly on a level with that on the cathedral tower. His observations are annexed, in two tables. “In the day-time the several thermometers nearly agreed, but in the night the cold at the lower station exceeded the cold at the higher ones rather more than it did in September, when the weather was warmer.”—The different dispositions of the atmosphere in other respects, and the various state of the weather at the time of making those observations, with its effects on the instruments, are also noted. The most extraordinary is the circumstance above observed, viz. that “whenever the sky became clear, the cold seemed to arise from the earth, and to be found in the greatest degree, as long as it continued clear, in the lowest situation.” Mr. Six then describes the valley in which Canterbury Cathedral stands, and suggests some useful discoveries which may possibly result from experiments of this kind.

ART. XXXIII. Account of some Observations tending to investigate the Construction of the Heavens. By William Herschel, Esq. F. R. S.

In this article, after describing the construction of his lately-completed telescope*, Mr. Herschel gives his reasons for considering the heavens as an expanded firmament of three dimensions. (rather than the concave surface of a sphere, as usual,) relates the effect of applying the telescope to a part of the milky way, and his method of estimating the number of the stars seen; compares different observations of Messrs. Messier and Mechain with his own; examines the nebulae and clusters of stars lately given in the Connoissance des Temps for 1783 and 1784; and has discovered (he says) “466 new nebulae and clusters of stars,” none of them (to his knowledge) “seen before by any person.”—Nebulae and clusters of stars (he adds) “are arranged into

* “The object speculum is 20 feet focal length, and its aperture 18 feet 7 inches,” &c.

“strata, which seem to run on to a great length;” has observed “double and treble nebulae,” with others of various shapes and lights; explains what he means by gaging the heavens, with its use; adds a short table, extracted from his gages, “by which it appears, that the number of stars increases very fast on approaching the milky way;” with some conjectures concerning the motions of the solar system, “if (as he surmises) the sun be placed in the great sidereal stratum of the milky way,” and some circumstances attending the “detecting of nebulae.”—“The well-known nebula of Cancer, visible to the naked eye,” he says, is probably one belonging to a certain stratum, whose situation he describes. He also forms some conjectures concerning the extent of another stratum, which he calls “that of Coma Berenices,” and concludes with promising more observations on this new and important subject, the interior Construction of the Universe, which he hopes we shall in time faintly know, and be able partly to delineate, by the improvement of telescopes, which he thinks are “yet in their infant state.” The whole (of which we can give only a very imperfect idea) is, in truth, a most curious article, and does honour to the genius and researches of Mr. HERSCHEL, from whom more important discoveries may be expected, and who may justly be deemed among astronomers what COOK is among navigators, the first of his profession, the explorer of worlds unknown, and the illustrator of the celestial, as our great navigator was of the terrestrial, globe:

“Axem humero torquet stellis ardentibus aptum.”

ART. XXXIV. An Account of a new Species of the Bark-Tree, found in the Island of St. Lucia. By Mr. George Davidson.

Of this bark-tree Sir Joseph Banks gives the following botanic character: “Cinchona floribus paniculatis, glabris; laciniis, linearibus, tubo longioribus; flaminibus exsertis; foliis ellipticis, glabris.” It was discovered in the woods, in 1779, by Mr. Alexander Anderson, is undoubtedly a species of the Cinchona, is of a lighter red than the Red bark, rather inclining to a cinnamon colour, and is manifestly more bitter and astringent than either of the other barks. A drawing of it is annexed.

ART. XXXV. An Account of an Observation of the Meteor of August 18, 1783, made on Hewitt Common, three Miles from York. By Nathaniel Pigott, Esq. F. R. S.

The time here mentioned is "about ten o'clock P. M.;" the motion "from W. N. W. towards the S. S. E.;" the length of the tail "15 or more degrees;" the apparent diameter of the nucleus "one-third or one-fourth of the full moon's diameter;" its altitude, when formed, "about 30°," and when it became extinct, "about 19° or 20°," the interval "nearly twenty seconds." To this observer "it appeared to vanish, or gently die away," without dividing. "Nine or ten minutes after its dissipation" he heard a noise, like the report of a very distant cannon. Supposing this to be exact (which, however, he does not warrant), and arguing from the known velocity of sound, "its distance at its extinction" must have been about 120 miles, and "its perpendicular altitude about 40." A scheme and a small sketch are annexed.

ART. XXXVI. Observations on the Comet of 1783. By Edward Pigott, Esq.

This comet was discovered by Mr. Pigott at York, Nov. 19, 1783, (as mentioned in our last volume, p. 839.) This article contains a table of observations from Nov. 19 to 26, and Dec. 3, and also one by Mr. John Goodricke. This comet had exactly the appearance of a nebula. Its light was so faint, that it could not be seen in a good opera-glass. In the night telescope the nucleus was scarcely visible, and the diameter of the surrounding coma was about three minutes of a degree. M. de Mechain discovered it on the 26th of November.

ART. XXXVII. Experiments on mixing Gold with Tin. By Mr. Stanesby Alchorne, of his Majesty's Mint.

In opposition to the general opinion of metallurgists, as expressed by Dr. Lewis, that "tin has a property of destroying the ductility of gold, on being melted with it, even in very small quantities," this writer shews, by several experiments, some of which are here recited, that "tin, in small "quantities at least, may be added to gold, either pure or alloyed, without producing any other effect than what might easily be conceived, a priori, from the different texture of the two metals." From the above experiments this conclusion seems to be fairly drawn, that, "though tin, like other inferior metals, will contaminate gold in proportion to the quantity mixed with it, yet there does not appear any thing in it specifically inimical to this precious metal."

ART. XXXVIII. On a Method of giving a Direction to Aërostatic Machines. By the Count de Galves. [In French*.]

This article is a certificate, signed at Madrid, March 2, 1784, by five persons †, attesting that the above-named Count, the day before, sailed on the Canal of Manzanares, in a boat which he had prepared, 25 feet long, and four and a half broad, with a machine (here described) of his own invention, against the wind and stream, 150 feet in a minute, besides 60 feet before it could be stopped, after its ceasing to move its wings; and with the wind and stream it went 243 feet in a minute, by the same continued motion of the wings. The principle on which this machine is constructed is drawn from that by which birds fly, and fishes swim, and is therefore thought applicable to the new aërostatic machines. But we cannot give an idea of it without a diagram, for which we have not room.

ART. XXXIX. An extraordinary Case of a Dropsy of the Ovarium, with some Remarks. By Mr. Philip Meadows Martineau, Surgeon to the Norfolk and Norwich Hospitals.

Sarah Kippus, the pauper here mentioned, was 80 times tapped, and in all had taken from her 6631 pints of water, or upwards of 13 hogheads. She was first tapped in 1767, and died in August 1783. Lady Page, whose famous case is mentioned by Dr. Mead, collected faster, but lost much less, viz. 1920 pints. The superabundant quantity, more than she drank, "must have been taken into the body by absorption," and life, it appears, may thus be protracted "a long time without much pain, and often with intervals of great ease and comfort."

2. BIBLIOTHECA TOPOGRAPHICA BRITANNICA. N^o. XXV. Containing an Historical Account of that venerable Monument of Antiquity, the Textus Roffensis; including Memoirs of the learned Saxonist Mr. William Elstob and his Sister. By Samuel Pegge, M. A. To which are added, Biographical Anecdotes of Mr. Johnson, Vicar of Cranbrook; and Extracts from the Registers of that Parish. 4to.

ERNULF, a Norman, bishop of Rochester from A. D. 1114 to A. D. 1124, is supposed, by Mr. Wharton, to have composed this famous MS. (which is written in a very elegant hand), Mr. Pegge thinks, with Mr. Hearne, in 1122, at the age of 82. The 13 later archbishops of Canterbury, and the 15 later bishops of Rochester, with a few other matters, are by a more modern hand. It "consists of two parts; the 1st containing the laws and constitutions of the Anglo-Saxon kings, in Latin and Saxon, transcribed from ancient copies; and the 11d giving us a register, or chartulary, of the church of Rochester, from the autographs, with some other matters relating to that cathedral, written in the times of Ernulf and his successors; but these last in a later hand." The above short account of the contents is taken from Mr. Wanley, who has also given an exact list of all the articles that compose the 1st part, with a general representation of those in the 11d, which have been abbreviated by Mr. Wharton and Bp. Nicolson. Next follow the fate, history, transcripts, and impressions of this book, and its parts.

The first person that made any use of this MS. was Laurence Nowell, dean of Lichfield, preceptor, in the Saxon tongue, to the Kentish antiquary, Lambarde, and, after him, Lambarde, Abp. Parker and his assistant, Joceline, Selden, Sir Henry Spelman, the first Sir Edward Dering, Somner, &c. &c. The

MS. appears, by this account, to have been in perils, not only by land and water, but also by false brethren, having, in particular, been purloined and detained by a Dr. Leonard, a physician, in 1632, from whom it was recovered by a chancery suit, and being "tarnished" by a fall into the salt water in its return from London (whither it had been sent) to Rochester.—For the various transcripts and impressions of it, we must refer to the work before us, adding only, that the very accurate transcript of its unpublished parts, finished in 1712 at the expence, and by the care, of the Rev. Mr. William Elstob, rector of St. Swithin's, London Stone, and now in the possession of our author, gives occasion to some memoirs of that learned Saxonist and his accomplished sister, of which we will subjoin his account of the latter, and the rather, because as she was living in 1752, when Mr. Ballard published his Memoirs of the learned Ladies of Great Britain, though he was well acquainted and corresponded with her, there is no account of her in that work.

Mrs. Elizabeth Elstob was born in the parish of St. Nicholas, in Newcastle upon Tyne, Sept. 29, 1683, so that she was ten years younger than her brother. Her mother, [descended from the old kings or princes of Wales,] who was a great admirer of learning, especially in her own sex, observed the particular fondness which her daughter had for books, and omitted nothing that might tend to her improvement so long as she lived; but, alas! she was so unfortunate as to lose her mother when she was about eight years of age, and had but just gone through her Accidence and Grammar. A stop was now put to her progress for a time, through a vulgar mistaken notion of her guardian, that one tongue was enough for a woman. However, the force of natural inclination still carried her to improve her mind in the best manner she could; and as her propensity was strong towards languages, she with much difficulty obtained leave to learn the French tongue. But her situation in this respect was happily much altered when she went to live with her brother, who, being impressed with more liberal sentiments concerning the education of women, very joyfully assisted and encouraged her in her studies for the whole time he lived. Under his eye she translated and published An Essay on Glory, written in French by the celebrated Mademoiselle de Scudery. But what characterises Mrs. Elstob most, she, as she intimates in her Dedication to the Saxon Homily, was the first English woman that had ever attempted that ancient and obscure language, and I suppose also the last. But she was an excellent linguist in other respects, being not only mistress of her own and the Latin tongue*, but also of seven other languages. And she owed all her skill in the learned tongues, except what may be ascribed to her own diligence and application, to her brother. She was, withal, a good antiquary and divine, as appears evidently from her works, which I must now recite."

* See note on ART. XXIV.

These our limits oblige us reluctantly to omit.

"But this excellent woman, her profound learning, and masculine abilities notwithstanding, was very unfortunate in life. After the death of her brother, and the ill success of her studies, she was obliged to depend upon her friends for subsistence, but did not meet with that generosity she might reasonably expect, Bp. Smalridge being the only person from whom she received any relief. After being supported by his friendly hand for a while, she at last could not bear the thoughts of continuing a burthen to one who was not very opulent himself; and being shocked with the cold respect of some, and the haughty scorn of others, she determined to retire to a place unknown, and to try to get her bread by teaching children to read and work; and she settled, for that purpose, at Evelham in Worcestershire.

"At Evelham she led at first but an uncomfortable and penurious life, but growing acquainted afterwards with the gentry of the town, her affairs mended; but still she scarce had time to eat, much less for study†. She became known after this to Mr. Ballard‡, whom I have so often mentioned; and about the year 1733, one Mrs. Capon, the wife of a clergyman§ of French extraction, who kept a private boarding-school at Stanton in Gloucestershire, and was herself a person of literature, enquired of him after her, and being informed of the place of her abode, made her a visit. Mrs. Capon, not being in circumstances to assist her herself, wrote a circular letter to her friends, in order to promote a subscription in her behalf. This letter, which was extremely well written, describing her merit, her extensive learning, her printed works, her ease and affluence till her brother's death, her multiplied distresses afterwards, and the meekness and patience with which she bore them, had the desired effect, and an annuity of twenty guineas was raised for her. This enabled her to keep an assistant, by which means she could again taste of that food of the mind from which she had been so long obliged to fast. A lady, soon after, shewed Mrs. Capon's letter to Queen Caroline, who, recollecting her name||, and delighted with the opportunity of taking such eminent merit into her protection, said, she would allow her twenty pounds per annum; but, added she, as she is so proper to be mistress of a boarding-school for young ladies of a higher rank, I will, instead of an annual allowance, send her one hundred pounds now, and repeat the same at the end of every five years. On the death of Queen Caroline, anno 1737, a most unlucky event, in appearance, for poor Mrs. Elstob, she was seasonably recommended to the present Duchess-dowager of Portland; and her Grace, to whose father, the Earl of Oxford, she had been well known, was pleased of her goodness to appoint her governess to her children. This was in the year 1739; and from this period, the letters she wrote to Mr. Ballard, which are now in the Bodleian Library, are observed to have a more sprightly turn, and she seems to have been exceedingly happy in her situation. To be short, she died in an advanced age, in her Grace's service, May 30, 1756, and was buried at St. Margaret's, Westminster. I am obliged to my much-esteemed friend, Mr. Thomas Seward, residentiary of Lichfield, for the above very particular account of the latter part of Mrs. Elstob's life; and as this gentleman knew

* "Epist. Fratri ad eam citat. supra."

† "Her own account of her situation at Evelham goes thus: 'I had several other designs, but was unhappily hindered by a necessity of getting my bread, which, with much difficulty, labour, and ill health, I have endeavoured to do for many years, with very indifferent success. If it had not been that Almighty God was graciously pleased to raise me up, lately, some gracious and good friends, I could not have subsisted; to whom I always was, and will, by the grace of God, be most grateful.' MS. Life."

‡ "Ballard's Memoirs, p. 249. This Mr. Ballard was a most extraordinary person. He was bred in low life, a woman's taylor, at Campden in Gloucestershire, but having a turn for letters, and in particular towards the Saxon learning, he became acquainted, from a similarity of study, with Mrs. Elstob, after she was settled at Evelham. By the assistance of the Rev. Mr. Talbot, vicar of Keinton in Warwickshire, and a recommendation to the President of Magdalen College, Oxon, he removed to that University. The President appointed him one of the eight clerks of his college, which furnished him with chambers and commons; and thus being a Gradual, he was afterwards elected, by the procurement of the President, one of the beadles of the University. See more of him in the Anecdotes of Bowyer, pp. 10, 500."

§ Was not this "clergyman" also minister of Cheltenham; and, if so, did he not change his name to Chapone, a name now well known to the literary world? EDIT.

|| On account of the Dedication to the Queen (when Princess) of her Saxon Grammar, in 1715, both her and Mrs. Capon personally, and was one of the subscribers above-mentioned, the narrative may be depended upon*."

We will close the account of this extraordinary woman with a stanza which was written long ago by Sam. Wesley, and which occurs in one of his poems:

"A Cleveland for thy beauty nam'd,
"Than Dorchester more witty,
"For learning more than Elstob fam'd,
"For poetry than Kitty."

Mr. Pegge concludes with this

"COROLLARY.

"The Textus Rossensis is, doubtless, in very safe and good hands; but if, by any accident, an unexpected misfortune should now happen to it, sufficient care has been taken to perpetuate it, by the several publications above-mentioned; the transcripts † made by the Elstobs, and the collation made by Dr. Denne, of which last there are at present two copies. However, whereas Dr. Wilkins says, 'Maxime venerandum hoc monumentum antiquitatis in summum rei publicæ literariæ commodum typis expressum extat ‡,' this is not strictly true, some parts of the MS. having not been yet printed, but they are nevertheless secured by the transcripts. 4. Sermons preached before the University of Oxford, in the Year 1784, at the Lecture founded by the Rev. John Bampton, M. A. late Canon of Salisbury. By Joseph White, B. D. 8vo.

THE Bamptonian lecturer for the last year conducts us through a path which, though not absolutely new and unfrequented, was never before so fully opened, so agreeably diversified, and strewed, on every side, with such fruits and flowers. The comparison of Christianity and Mahometanism, and the decided weight in which the Impostor of the East and his enthusiastical reveries, like the Satan of Milton, when weighed in the balance with the Messiah and his divine doctrine, are found wanting, must strike with conviction every impartial observer, and we cannot but think, if translated into Arabic and Persian, and circulated through our vast possessions in Indostan, might operate powerfully on the minds of such disciples of the Prophet as would open their eyes and ears; on such, we mean, as are not blinded and fascinated by the deceitfulness of the world, and the lust of the flesh, in particular by polygamy.

The texts and subjects of each discourse we will briefly add, and then give a quotation. Sermon I. Explanatory of the Plan proposed. Matt. xi. 19: Wisdom is justified of her children.—II. History of Mahometanism considered. Acts v. 38, 39: If this counsel, or this work, be of men, it will come to nought: But if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it.—III. History of Christianity considered. The text the same.—IV. The Character of Mahomet. John vii. 12: Some said, He is a good man; others said, Nay, but he deceiveth the people.—V. View of the Life and Character of Christ. 2 Cor. iv. 10: That the life also of Jesus might be made manifest.—VI. External Evidence of the Mahometan Religion considered. 1 Kings xiii. 18: He said—I am a Prophet also—and an Angel spake to me by the word of the Lord. But he lied.—VII. External Evidence of Christianity. John x. 25: Jesus answered—The works that I do in my Father's name, they bear witness of me.—VIII. The Koran contrasted with the New Testament, Luke xix. 22: Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee.—IX. Contrary Effects of Mahometanism and Christianity. Matt. vii. 16: Ye shall know them by their fruits,

The

The following, by which our readers may judge of the author's style and manner, is the concluding part of his Vth Lecture:

"Considered then in all its circumstances, the history of Christ shrinks not from comparison with the most partial and lofty representation of the prophet of Arabia.

"Of both we find, that the earlier part of life, before the publication of their respective missions, passed away in silence, private and undistinguished. The first years of Mahomet were busied in the cares of merchandize; till returning to his native city, he devoted to solitude and retirement the leisure which his opulence had procured. The youth of Jesus was spent in domestic privacy, and was remarkable only for affectionate and dutiful submission to his parents: unless, indeed, when in the temple, he, by his ready answers to the questions of the Rabbins, and his skilful exposition of the scriptures, astonished those that heard him, and gave an omen of his future greatness.

"The designs of Mahomet were gradually and cautiously unfolded; and in order to prepare the minds of his countrymen for the reception of his faith, he first artfully persuaded his own relations and domestics, and drew to his side the most powerful of his neighbours.

"Jesus walked forth by the sea of Galilee, and saw fishers casting their nets. These were his first converts and disciples. Though they were destitute of riches and of power, he found in them what his ministry required, an honest and a willing spirit. He won them neither by subtle arguments nor crafty persuasions; but bade them forsake their nets and follow him, to see his humble dwelling, to hear his heavenly discourses to the people, and witness the wonders he was going to perform.

"Jesus called his hearers to repentance, but Mahomet to conquest.

"At their first appearance they were both compelled to avoid the rage of the multitude, who would have destroyed them; but Mahomet escaped by a secret ignominious flight, and Jesus by a public miracle.

"The revelation of the Arabian prophet was inconsistent; a system of contradiction, continually shifting with the views of his policy, and the necessities of his imposture: now looking towards Mecca, and now to Jerusalem. Widely different was the conduct of Christ. He did not seek to accommodate his doctrine to fortuitous changes in his external circumstances; he did not at one time revoke what he had asserted, or contradict what he had enjoined, at another. Every part of his teaching was regular and consistent in the objects to which it was directed, and the language in which it was conveyed.

"Mahomet allured his followers with the glories of a visible monarchy, and the splendour of temporal dominion. In him we behold the lord of war, and the destroyer of mankind, riding in triumph over the spoils of thousands, who fell by his desolating sword; laying cities in flames; carrying misery and bloodshed through the earth; and pursued in his victorious career by the lamentations and curses of its inhabitants. In Jesus we see the adorable prince of peace, the friend and saviour of the world, riding meekly to the holy city, hailed with the acclamations and blessings of much people, whom he had rescued from sin and death, wiping the tears from all eyes, and healing every sickness and every disease.

"And here the comparison must cease.—The events that followed, in our Saviour's life, are too august to be placed in competition with any mortal power, and can be comprehended only by minds habituated to the contemplation of heavenly objects. Let us consider the passion of our Lord, and the magnificent scenes of his resurrection and ascension, and then ask, In what part of all the history of Mahometanism any parallel or resemblance can be found? Let us consider the last days of Christ's continuance upon earth, and how does the prophet of Mecca sink in the comparison? Let us in imagination hear and see the blessed Jesus, when he gives his Apostles authority to go forth and baptise all nations, and preach, in his name, repentance and remission of sins; when he impowers them to cast out evil spirits, to speak with new tongues, and to work wonders; when he holds up to them the promise of the Comforter, and power from on high; and when, having blessed them, he ascends into heaven, where he is forever seated in glory on the right hand of God.

"But chiefly, what raises Christ and his religion far above all the fictions of Mahomet, is that awful alternative of hopes and fears, that looking-for of judgment, which our Christian faith sets before us.

"At that day, when Time, the great arbitrator of truth and falsehood, shall bring to pass the accomplishment of the ages, and the Son of God shall make his enemies his footstool; then shall the deluded followers of the great impostor, disappointed of the expected intercession of their prophet, stand trembling and dismayed at the approach of the glorified Messiah.

"Then shall they say, Yonder cometh, in the clouds, that Jesus whose religion we laboured to destroy, whose temples we profaned, whose servants and followers we cruelly oppressed! Behold he cometh; but no longer the humble son of Mary, no longer a mere mortal prophet, the equal of Abraham and of Moses, as that deceiver taught us, but the everlasting Son of the everlasting Father! The Judge of mankind! The sovereign of Angels! The Lord of all things both in earth and heaven!"

The

The copious display of Oriental literature in the Lectures is illustrated in a Supplement by Notes and Authorities, among which are large extracts from the spurious gospel of Barnabas, never before printed.

In these Sermons we observe, with pleasure, that new ground is taken; it is occupied exactly in the point it should be; the design is sublime, the execution is worthy of the design. Of course there is imagination, sentiment, diction, a perpetual combination of novelty and importance; the art of painting facts and drawing characters; much knowledge of original books, and yet more knowledge of men in the original. In a word, learning, science, taste, and truth, strong eloquence, and eloquence strong on the right side, conspire to exalt these Sermons very high indeed!—very high even among the few classics we have of divinity discourses in England. As such, for the sense of the publick is right if it be well excited, the author's gains, we may venture to pronounce, will not be very inferior to his desert. He will receive no inconsiderable sum of money; in money's worth, fair fame, beyond all estimate; and (if we augur right) no small ecclesiastical preferment.

The second edition (for they have already been long out of print—and what wonder if such a book should pass through twenty editions?) is to be inscribed, by permission, to his Grace of Canterbury, one of the first friends who directed the author's studies to the Oriental languages, and who is still his invariable patron.

5. The Female Guardian. Designed to correct some of the Foibles incident to Girls, and supply them with innocent Amusement for their Hours of Leisure. By a Lady. sm. 8vo.

TREADING in the laudable steps of Mad. de Genlis, Mrs. Barbauld, Miss More, and other Female Guardians, the present anonymous writer has made a very acceptable present to mothers, and those who are engaged in education, in the little volume before us. Mrs. Teachwell (the name she assumes) having been well educated, but deprived of her fortune by the death of her father (his estate being entailed), many years ago undertook (she tells us) the office of instructing girls, in which she was liberally assisted by the generosity of a "Dowager Duchess," who bequeathed to her her house (The Grove), and grounds for life, "on condition" that she should make it her place of "residence."—"The house," therefore, as one of her pupils expresses it, "is a palace, and the grounds a paradise," of which, and the amusements and employments of the fair inhabitants, a glowing description is annexed. But more interesting are the lights and shades, or pictures, of their susceptible minds, which, with many pleasing anecdotes and histoiettes, all with some moral end in view, are here exhibited in XXXIII numbers, or little chapters, as the reader may judge by the contents, viz. "Family Anecdotes." Mrs. T. here gives her own history, abridged above. "Improving Exercises." Containing her method of inculcating advice, and rendering 'medicine palatable.'—"Man-ner of living. Scenes at the Grove." Communicated in two letters by one of the elder misses.—"The Mother." A good comment on a picture of one drawn by Mad. Genlis.—"Unassuming Beauty." The description of Eliza Finch, a former pupil.—"The Christian Woman." Pourtrayed by a former pupil.—"Sensibility." The improved character of Lady Betty Shapely.—"Parental Watchfulness." From this we will select the following, as to many of our readers it may be new: we recollect having heard it.

"The memory of Q. Caroline is revered for the excellence of her domestic character.

"As a mother, she shone in a conspicuous manner, by the attention which she paid to cultivating the dispositions of her children.

"Of her Majesty's superior talent for that tender office, of her adroitness in seizing the happy moment to instill virtuous principles, the following anecdote records an instance, which ought never to be forgotten.

"The Princess Royal was accustomed, as going to rest, to employ one of the ladies of the court in reading aloud to her, till she should drop asleep.

"It happened, one evening, that the lady who was appointed to perform this office, being indisposed, could not, without great inconvenience, endure the fatigue of standing; yet the Princess was inattentive to her situation, and suffered her to continue reading, till she fell down in a swoon.

"The Queen was informed of this the next morning.

"Her Majesty said nothing upon the subject; but at night, when she was in bed, sent for the Princess, and, saying that she wished to be lulled to rest, commanded her Royal Highness to read aloud.

"After some time, the Princess began to be tired of standing, and paused, in hope of receiving receiving an order to seat herself.—“Proceed,” said her Majesty. In a short time a second Op. seemed to plead for rest.—“Read on,” said the Queen.—Again the Princess stopped; again she received an order to proceed; till at last, faint and breathless, she was forced to complain.

“Then did this excellent parent exhort her daughter to forbear how she indulged herself in ease, while she suffered her attendants to endure unnecessary fatigue.

“An illustrious example to mothers, how to create and improve occasions for forming the dispositions of their children.”

And thus, by example, does this Female Guardian teach. As a farther trait of this princess’s character, it may be added, that with the same hauteur, when Princess of Orange, she set out with requiring the like standing homage from the Dutch ladies, but soon finding her error, she corrected it, and, by an opposite conduct, engaged their esteem.

“Excessive Management.” The pride, avarice, and profusion of Miss Haughty, Miss Riches, and Miss Squander.—“Thoughtless Cruelty.” Tenderness to animals recommended and exemplified.—“Inadvertent Deceit.” The amiable character of Miss Franklin.—“Depravity.” The care required in tilling the mind.—“Partiality.” The parental mismanagement of Miss Wrangle.—“Gentleness.” Recommended by precept, and enforced by the example of Miss Finch.—“Timely Obedience.” Exemplified from a letter in the Spectator, No 263.—“The Negligent Mother.” Mrs. Sly and her daughter.—“Conceal- “ment.” Its sin and wickedness.—“The Scourge.” Miss Pert’s tongue.—“Early Rising.” Its advantages.—“Anger.” Miss Touchwood and Miss Sullen.—“Condescending Affection.” Molly Friendly and Polly Lovely.—“The Morning.” Its beauties and glories.—“Refined Morality.” From The Castle of Otranto.—“Heroic Sentiments.” From the same. The concluding moral, however, (if such it may be called,) of that work, of “visiting the sins of the “parents on the children,” as a Christian, Mrs. T. will not approve.—“Physi- “ognomy.” The judicious Choice.” The history of Miss Pride, Molly Lovewell, and Sir Thomas Carmine, which gives a subject (well executed) for the frontispiece.—“Hospitality.” Reverence. The “Storm.” The grateful Return.” Benevolence displayed, in various instances,
by Sir James Worthy.—“Confession.” Inculcated and exemplified.—“Heed-
“lessness.” Early to be corrected.

The whole concludes with advice to children in general, and a particular address to the author’s niece, her “im“mediate objects,” for whom “this “little book,” she says, “was expressly “written.—Annexed is a “Library for “her young Ladies,” which consists, in general, of such books as all parents and guardians must approve, though we are a little surprised that Boissuet’s Discourse on Universal History should be the only historical work admitted, and Robinson Crusoe and Telemachus the only romances. Not that we object to the latter, but only wonder at its being recommended in English, as some French plays, Ami des Enfants, &c. are introduced. It is needless to repeat, that we much approve both the plan and execution, think it well adapted to the purpose designed, and, as such, recommend it to the seminaries of female education.

6. A Tour in the United States of America.
By J. F. D. Smyth, Esq. 2 Vols. 8vo.

(Concluded from our last volume, p. 921.)

MR. SMYTH gives the following concise description of the province of Virginia:—

“The houses are almost all of wood, covered with the same; the roof with thingles, the feet and ends with boards, and not always lathed and plastered within; only those of the better sort are finished in that manner, and painted on the outside. The chimneys are sometimes of brick, but more commonly of wood, crated on the inside with clay. The windows of the best sort have glass in them; the rest have none, and only wooden shutters.

“There is no distinction here between inns, taverns, ordinaries, and public-houses;
they are all in one, and are known by the appellation of taverns, public-houses, or ordinaries, which, in the general acceptance of the names here, are synonymous terms.—
They are all very indifferent indeed, compared with the inns in England; and three-fourths of them are in reality little better than mere shelter from the weather; yet the work of them is by no means deficient in charging high.

“When a person arrives at Richmond, his ears are continually assailed with the prodigious noise and roaring of the falls, which almost stuns him, and prevents him from sleeping for several nights, it being a considerable time before he becomes habi-tuated to it.

“My principal amusement was walking.
I took great delight in wandering alone among the rocks and solitary romantic situations around the falls. In these excursions I always

always carried a book in my pocket, and when I came to any place that commanded my attention, either from the wildness and grandeur of the perspective, or from the observation of the raging torrent below, after admiring the beauties of the scene, I would frequently lie down in the shade, and amuse myself with reading, until I insensibly dropped asleep. This was my daily recreation, which I never neglected.

"But I was once extremely surprised at beholding, as soon as I opened my eyes, a prodigious large snake within a few feet of me, basking himself in the sun. He was jet black, with a copper-coloured belly, very fine sparkling eyes, and at least seven feet long. However he did me no injury, for I did not disturb him, nor did he molest me; but as soon as he heard the rustling of the leaves, on my moving, he went off with great precipitation and speed.

"Nothing is more common here than the black snake. He is very bold and daring: yet, to the human race, entirely harmless and inoffensive; nor is his bite poisonous, and is as readily cured as the scratch of a briar. Notwithstanding which, it is said, and I believe with truth, that he is master of all other snakes; even the rattle-snake submits to him. This superiority arises from the strength and power of his muscles, for he insinuates himself in spiral wreaths around his antagonist, and then contracting, by that means conquers or kills him. His prey he swallows whole.

"It is confidently reported, and universally credited, that they devour squirrels, and that they have been found with squirrels whole in their bellies. I myself have seen them swallow frogs of a very large size. After the frog is almost wholly in, if you strike the snake, he will instantly disgorge it, and the frog will leap away.

"The black snakes are particularly serviceable in destroying rats and mice, which they seek after very eagerly, and devour for food; for this purpose they are even more useful than cats, because, by their slender form and peculiar make, they are enabled to pursue these vermin into their lurking holes and hiding places, which they generally do, and thereby at once destroy the whole progeny.

"I have heard many strange relations of the power of snakes in charming birds, and drawing them down out of the air, to devour them, by a certain fascination in their eyes. To these tales I formerly gave no credit; but I have now had conviction of their truth, by frequent ocular demonstration.

"I have observed a little bird, fluttering in the air, within a small compass, gradually descending until it came down on a bush, then hopping from spray to spray, every time lower, constantly sending forth a tremulous doleful note, expressive of dread and surprise, until at length it would drop into the jaws of a snake on the ground, that was gaping open ready to devour it.

"On such occasions I always struck the snake, and the instant he moved, the bird became liberated from his fascination, flying away with the greatest alertness, and would chirp and soar over my head in the air, for some little distance, as if grateful for its deliverance from so formidable an enemy.— This very extraordinary circumstance I have taken particular notice of several different times.

"Squirrels of many various kinds abound prodigiously, but the grey fox-squirrels are the most plenty and most common. You may see them any where in the woods, and at any time, jumping from tree to tree, and making most astonishing leaps, often fifteen, twenty, or thirty feet, from one branch to another. These are the largest, but the flying-squirrel, though much smaller, jumps twice as far, and indeed takes such prodigious vaults that he seems to fly, and appears to have wings, but they are only an expansion of some loose skin on each side of him, which affords him some little support in the air, and breaks his fall when he misses his hold, which indeed is very seldom.

"The most beautiful of the whole species is the ground squirrel, which is small, and most delicately striped with contrasts of darker and lighter shades."

7. A Letter to the Roman Catholics of the City of Worcester, from the late Chaplain of that Society [Mr. Charles Henry Wharton], stating the Motives which induced him to relinquish that Communion, and become a Member of the Protestant Church. The 11d Edition. 8vo.

THE first edition of this work was printed at Philadelphia, where the author now resides. It is written with a spirit of moderation and liberality which does him honour, and therefore we do not wonder at its having been eagerly sought after and read. Without entering into the controversy, the candid and sincere, of both religions, will, we doubt not, be disposed to think favourably of a man, "who" (to use his own words) "without any prospect of emolument, or promise of attention, from the communion he embraces, has sacrificed a certain and comfortable subsistence, and hazarded a tolerable character amongst his nearest connections, rather than incur the reproaches of his own mind, or the guilt of hypocrisy." The authors whose works (he says) have been of most use to him are, Chillingworth, Abp. Usher, F. le Courayer, Albertinus, J. Claude, and Bp. Hurd, in his Discourses on the Prophecies.

S. History

History of the Political Life and Public Services, as a Senator and a Statesman, of the Right Honourable Charles James Fox.
8vo. 1783.

THIS, like The Man in the Moon, (reviewed in our last volume, p. 922,) escaped our notice at the time of its publication. Though between the two there is a great difference, this being as much outré in its panegyric, as that is in its satire. And here it may not be amiss to add, on the subject of "that innocent rifibility" to which Mr. Fox's fables have been exposed, this panegyrist's opinion of that performance:

"The editor of The Man in the Moon has set a dangerous example of this freedom to inferior writers, who, without any of that genuine humour which renders his severest satires exquisitely palatable, will probably have the audacity to copy only the harshness of his strictures."

But, as we are not disposed to fight the battles over again, with this writer, either in the senate or in the field, or to retail the parliamentary debates, of which this volume is in great measure composed, we shall only say, that all Mr. Fox's words and actions, from his birth to his famous coalition treaty, are here set in a most brilliant and exaggerated point of view. Undazzled, however, by this fictitious lustre, and professing ourselves much more pleased with Mr. Fox as a poet than a politician, we will only extract two of his poems, here inserted, which we do not remember having seen in our Magazine. We agree with this historian in finding, in the first of these, "exquisite justness and delicacy, both of thought and expression," and in the second "a vein of beautiful poetry."—(See some other verses by Mr. Fox in vol. I. p. 584.)

Nor allows any softer sensation a part?
O, no! for in this all the world must agree,
One folly was never sufficient for me.
Is my mind on distress too intensely employ'd,
Or by pleasure relax'd, by variety cloy'd?
For, alike in this only, enjoyment and pain
Both slacken the springs of those nerves which they strain.

"AN INVOCATION TO POVERTY.

"O Poverty, of pale consumptive hue,
If thou delight'st to haunt me still in view,
If still thy presence must my steps attend,
At least continue, as thou art, my friend!
When Scotch example bids me be unjust,
False to my word, or faithless to my trust,
Bid me the baneful error quickly see,
And shun the world to find repose with thee.
When Vice to wealth would turn my partial eye,
Or Int'rest shut my ear to Sorrow's cry,
Or courtiers' custom would my reason bend,
My foe to flatter, or desert my friend,—
Oppose, kind Poverty, thy temper'd shield,
And bear me off unvanquish'd from the field.
"If giddy Fortune e'er return again,
With all her idle, restless, wanton train;
Her magic glass should false Ambition hold,
Or Avarice bid me put my trust in gold;
To my relief then, virtuous Goddess, haste,
And with thee bring thy daughters, ever chaste,
Health, Liberty, and Wisdom; sisters bright,
Whose charms can make the worst condition
light;
Beneath the hardest fate the mind can cheer,
Can heal affliction, and disarm despair;
In chains, in torments, pleasure can bequeath,
And dress in smiles the tyrant hour of death."

9. A Discourse on the Institution of a Society for enquiring into the History, Civil and Natural, the Antiquities, Arts, Sciences, and Literature of Asia, delivered at Calcutta, Jan. 15, 1784: A Charge to the Grand Jury at Calcutta, Dec. 4, 1783: And a Hymn to Camdeo, translated from the Hindo into Persian, and from the Persian into English. By Sir William Jones. 4to.

IN the regions of the East, this learned judge and elegant scholar seems as much at home (to use a cant phrase) as Addison and Middleton were in Italy. From such an institution as is here recommended, and such a president, a rich mine of Oriental literature, arts, and antiquities, may reasonably be expected. Truly animated and interesting is the whole of this Discourse, and no part of it more so than the beginning, which leads us at once into medias res:

"When I was at sea last August, on my voyage to this country, which I had long and ardently desired to visit, I found one evening, on inspecting the observations of the day, that India lay before us, and Persia on our left, whilst a breeze from Arabia blew nearly on our stern. A situation so pleasing in itself, and to me so new, could not fail to awaken a train of reflections in a mind which had early been accustomed to contemplate with delight the eventful histories, and agreeable fictions, of this Eastern world. It gave me inexpressible pleasure to find myself in the midst of so noble an amphitheatre, almost encircled by the vast regions of Asia, which has ever been esteemed the nurse of sciences, the inventress of delightful and useful arts; the scene of glorious actions, fertile in the productions of human genius, abounding with natural wonders, and infinitely diversified in the forms of religion and government, in the laws, manners, customs, and languages, as well as in the features and complexions, of men. I could not help remarking how important and extensive a field was yet unexplored, and how many solid advantages unimproved; and when I considered with pain, that in this fluctuating, imperfect, and limited condition of life, such enquiries and improvements could only be made by the united efforts of many, who are not easily brought, without some pressing inducement or strong impulse, to converge in a common point, I consoled myself with a hope, founded on opinions which it might have the appearance of flattery to mention, that in any country or community such an union could be effected, it was among my countrymen in Bengal; with some of whom I already had, and with most was desirous of having, the pleasure of being intimately acquainted.

"You have realised that hope, Gentlemen, and even anticipated a declaration of my wishes, by your alacrity in laying the foundation of a Society for enquiring into the History, Civil and Natural, the Antiquities, Arts, Sciences, and Literature of Asia."

Sir William then proceeds to consider, 1. the limits of their enquiries, viz. the very wide boundaries of Asia, from China and Japan to Persia and Arabia, (and even Egypt and Abyssinia), preferring the epithet of Asiatic, as "classical and proper," to that of Oriental; and 2. their intended objects, viz. "Man and Nature—whatever is performed by the one, or produced by the other," or, in other words, "History, Science, and Art." As to the conduct of it, he wishes "to establish at present but one rule, namely, 'to have no rules at all,' thinking an infant society should be perfectly free and unfettered by form, constraint, or expence. The curious and learned should be invited to send their tracts; they should be read (he thinks) in the Hall once a week; a miscellany should be printed once a year; all questions should be decided by ballot, by a majority of two thirds; nine members should make a board, &c.—From these promising beginnings the publick may reasonably conceive high expectations; and we doubt not but that the fruits and flowers thus collected will adorn and embellish our future volumes.

Sir William's "Charge to the Grand Jury at Calcutta" was inserted in our last volume, p. 627.

The "Hymn to Camdeo," the Indian Cupid, which we are confident has not lost by his translation, gives us a very favourable idea of the poetry and allegories of the East. "The description of his person and arms, his family, attendants, and attributes, has new and peculiar beauties. His bow of sugar-cane or flowers, with a string of bees, and his five arrows, each pointed with an Indian blossom of a heating quality, are allegories equally new and beautiful," &c. The two first stanzas and the last will confirm and illustrate the above.

"What potent God, from Agra's orient bowers,
[flowers]
Floats through the lucid air, whilst living
With sunny wine the vocal arbours wreath,
And gales enamour'd heavenly odours breathe?

"His favourite place of resort is a large tract of country round Agra."

Hail,

Hail, power unknown, for at thy beck
Vales and groves their bosoms deck,
And every laughing blossom dresses
With gems of dew his musky tresses.
I feel, I feel thy genial flame divine,
And hallow thee, and kiss thy shrine.

"Know'st thou not me?" Celestial sounds
I hear!

"Know'st thou not me?" Ah, spare a mortal ear!

"Behold"—My swimming eyes entranc'd I raise,
But Oh! they shrink before th' excessive blaze.

Yes, Son of Maya*, yes, I know
Thy bloomy shafts and cany bow†,
Checks with youthful glory beaming,
Locks in braids ethereal streaming,
Thy scaly‡ standard, thy mytterious arms,
And all thy pains, and all thy charms."

"O thou for ages born, yet ever young,
For ages may thy Bramin's lay be sung!
And, when thy lory§ spreads his emerald
wings,

To waft thee high above the towers of kings,
Whilst o'er thy throne the moon's§ pale
light

Pours her soft radiance through the night,

And to each floating cloud discovers
The haunts of blest or joyless lovers,

Thy mildest influence to thy bard impart,
To warm, but not consume, his heart."

Sir William Jones, in this publication, has assumed the three different, but not inconsistent, characters of a naturalist, a judge, and a poet, and has acquitted himself admirably in them all.

THESE interesting letters display great knowledge of the human heart, and are written in an animated, easy more pleasing, and, we think, more consistent with those virtuous principles trigical. In this Mrs. Parry seems to have split on the same rock with her admired friend Mrs. Brooke, in her Julia Mandeville. A character, uniformly well principled, and by profession respectable, cannot suddenly, from an example, become a warning. Temptations of any kind cannot be represented as overpowering the firmest and most virtuous minds, without making virtue and religion mere shadows or bubbles, which, when touched or tried, vanish and dissolve. As they have no connection with the story, and may therefore be easily detached, we will insert the following verses:

"Hid from the world, from malice and deceit,

Deep in the centre of yon neighbouring grove,

The sad Almeria finds a safe retreat,

And mourns in secret o'er her hapless love.

"Soon as the milder shade of night draws near,

And Phœbus has withdrawn his scorching beam,

The maid in sorrow to the vale repairs*,

To count the murmurs of the passing stream.

"Often, to sooth her sorrows, will she try
With music's charms to chase away her pain;

While, as the sings, sweet Philomel draws nigh,

Who thinks she listens to her own sad strain.

"Say, can his pulse with equal cadence beat,

Whose deep designs her easy faith betray'd;

Who, skil'd in all the practice of deceit,

First won her love, then left the gentle maid?

"Perhaps at midnight, when the good repose

In peaceful slumbers, on their pillows
blest,

With troubled dreams the sad Almeria's woes

Shall strike reflection to his guilty breast.

"A pang more sharp his tortur'd breast shall feel;

Her woes redoubled shall false Damon
prove;

Whom he has daggers far more sharp than steel,

On lost Almeria heers from sighted
love."

* The rhyme requires "repair."

11. A Journal of a Voyage to The South Seas, in his Majesty's Ship the Endeavour, faithfully transcribed from the Papers of the late Sydney Parkinson, Draughtsman to Sir Joseph Banks, Bart. in his Expedition, with Dr. Solander, round the World; and embellished with Twenty-nine Views and Designs, engraved by capital Artists. To which are now added, Remarks on the Preface by the late John Fothergill, M. D. F. R. S. And an Appendix, containing an Account of the Voyages of Commodore Byron, Captain Wallis, Captain Carteret, Mons. Bougainville, Captain Cook, and Captain Clerke. 4to.

THERE were some circumstances attending the first publication of the Journal of Sydney Parkinson, which, as they were reported in the Preface, seemed nearly to affect the moral characters of three gentlemen who then stood high in the public estimation; but as that Preface was written by a gentleman* whose pen, on the slightest provocation, was remarkable for its asperity, there is reason to believe the aspersions with which these gentlemen were loaded were greatly aggravated; and as the editor of the present edition has given his testimony, that with respect to one of the gentlemen, the suspicions were unmerited, let us hope, that with respect to the other two, they were not better grounded.

It must, however, be acknowledged, that the powerful opposition which was injuriously made against the publication, though it could not affect the intrinsic merit of the work, yet greatly contributed to retard the sale. The work was ready for publication long before that of Dr. Hawkesworth, who, though patronised by the then Lords of the Admiralty, and supported by their liberality, filed a bill in Chancery, with a view, not only to retard the publication, but to suppress the work entirely. Those who were competent to judge, and those who were friends to the oppressed, beheld these acts with detestation, and encouraged the editor to proceed with spirit. The work came forth, and was approved. With respect to authenticity, it remains unquestioned.—Whatever the journalist reports of the manners, customs, employments, pastimes, arts, genius, temper, and civilization of the inhabitants of the several islands at which he touched, he collected, not from the books and relations of others, but from his own attentive observation and judicious remarks.

* Dr. Kenrick, we are assured, was the author of the Preface.

But by far the most valuable part of his labours, and what was never before executed with equal judgment and fidelity, is that characteristic distinction observable in the portraits of his chiefs, their dresses and ornaments, which marks their originality, and brings them home to the view of the attentive observer, with all their distinctive features most strongly expressed. Who can look upon the two New Hollanders advancing to combat without being struck with their ferocity? Or who, at the same time, can view the Otaheitean lad, Taryota, without being affected by the contrast?—It were needless to enlarge upon the accuracy of the drawings, which embellish and illustrate this work, as they are universally acknowledged to be the genuine resemblance of whatever they are intended to represent. Add to these a most copious vocabulary of the languages of the natives of the islands where there was time allowed for the most indefatigable industry to make the collection.

These are the important objects that give the work before us, so far as respects the Journal of Sydney Parkinson, a superiority over those of contemporary voyagers, who, being intent on gaining the characters of fine writers and elegant artists, have departed from the simplicity of Nature to give a scope to the decorations of Art.

The judicious Abridgment of the respective voyages that preceded and followed that of the Endeavour are intended, as the editor tells us, to form “an ample history of a part of the Southern Hemisphere hitherto but little known;” and it must be acknowledged that a more complete compendium of such a history has not yet appeared in this or any other language.

12. The Art of Painting of Charles Alphonso du Fresnoy. Translated into English Verse By William Maton, M. A. With Annotations by Sir Joshua Reynolds, Knt. President of the Royal Academy. 4to. 1783.

DRYDEN's prose translation of the above scientific poem, well known as it was before, was much more so by Pope's Epistle to Jervas.—But before such a translator, and such an annotator, as have now embellished Fresnoy, Dryden's prose and J. de Piles's remarks must “hide their diminished heads.”—The introductory Epistle to Sir Joshua Reynolds, and a specimen of the poetry, notes, &c. shall be given in our next.

ODE FOR THE NEW YEAR.

By WILLIAM WHITEHEAD, Esq.

DELUSIVE is the Poet's dream;
Or does prophetic Truth inspire
The zeal which prompts the glowing theme,
And animates th' according lyre?

Trust the Muse; her eye commands
Distant times, and distant lands,
Thro' bursting clouds in op'ning skies
Sees, from Discord, Union rise,
And Friendship bind unwilling foes
In firmer ties than duty knows.

Torn rudely from its parent tree,
Yon Scion, rising in the West,
Will soon its genuine glory see,
And court again the soft'ring breast,
Whose nurture gave its pow'rs to spread,
And feel their force, and lift an alien head.

The parent tree, when storms impend,
Shall own Affection's warmth again;
Again its fostering aid shall lend,
Nor hear the suppliant plead in vain;
Shall stretch protecting branches round,
Extend the shelter, and forget the wound.

Two Britains, thro' th' admiring world,
Shall wing their way with sails unfurl'd,
Each, from the other kindred state,
Avert, by turns, the bolts of fate,
And acts of mutual amity endear
The Tyre and Carthage of a wider sphere.

When Rome's divided eagles flew,
And different thrones her empire knew,
The varying language soon disjoin'd
The boasted masters of mankind;
But here, no ills like those we fear,
No varying language threatens here;
Congenial worth, congenial flame,
Their manners and their arts the same,
To the same tongue shall glowing themes afford, [record.
And British Heroes act, and British Bards

Fly swift, ye years, ye minutes haste,
And in the future lose the past;
O'er many a thought-afflicting tale,
Oblivion, cast thy friendly veil;
Let not Memory breathe a sigh,
Or backward turn th' indignant eye;
Nor the insidious arts of foes
Enlarge the breach that longs to close;
But acts of amity alone inspire Firm faith and cordial love, and wake the willing lyre.

Far nobler honours grace thy tomb, for there
Each peaceful virtue drops a grateful tear.

SAID TO BE WRITTEN BY HER GRACE
THE DUCHESS OF DEVONSHIRE.

BRING me flowers, and bring me wine!
Boy, attend thy master's call!
Round my brows let myrtles twine—
At my feet let roses fall.
Breathe, in softest notes, the sible;
Form the song, and sound the lute;
Let thy gentle accents flow,
As the whispering zephyrs blow.

Sorrow would annoy my heart,
But I hate its baneful sting;
Joys shall chase the rapid dart,
For I will laugh, and I will sing.
What avails the downcast eye!
What avails the tear! the sigh!
Why should grief obstruct our way,
When we live but for a day?

W I N T E R.

THE Sun withdraws his forceful ray,
In vapoury clouds he veils his head;
And Winter, half obscuring Day,
Arises from his icy bed.
Impetuous whirlwinds form his train;
Thick clouds and darkness round him lower;
He drives his blasts o'er every plain,
And Nature shrinks aghast, and owns his conquering power.

The boisterous winds, with ceaseless roar,
Bid the rough surges proudly rise,
Impetuous beat the ravag'd shore,
And drive & engage the frowning skies.
In snow-built car, with solemn pace,
Pale Frost glides o'er the joyless plains;
He bids the raging waters cease,
And binds the yielding waves with adamantine chains.

The trees resign their verdant hue,
And tremble at the whirlwind's sound;
The rose, bespangled o'er with dew,
No longer sheds its fragrance round;
All beauty fades, and Winter, dire,
Tremendous, holds imperial sway;

— Dr. Johnson's Ode under this title has been sent us by a correspondent who did not know that it originally appeared in our vol. XVII. p. 538.

The storms proclaim their powerful fire,
And, bellowing round his throne, with horrors blast the day.

If chance the breezes cease to blow,
Deep in their rocky caverns bound,
The clouds emit the treasure'd snow,
And whiteness covers all the ground.
"Broad o'er the South," the Sun appears,
And faintly points his noon-tide rays;
A silvery brow the mountain bears,
Nor sheds his hoary locks, nor feels th' enfeebled blaze.

When, unadorn'd, the pallid morn,
Faint opening, shews the leafless grove,
Oft let me tread the whiten'd lawn,
Or thro' the frozen valley rove;
On thee, great Nature, let me gaze,
Retir'd in thy sequester'd bowers,
Till Sol resumes his brightening blaze,
And Spring, with dewy hand, awakes the vernal flowers. F. K.

THE THRALDOM,

ALTERED FROM COWLEY'S MISTRESS.

I CAME, I saw, and was undone;
The lightning through my bones and marrow quick did run;
A pointed pain pierc'd deep my livid
heart;
A damp, cold tremor seiz'd on every part;
My head turn'd round, nor could it bear
The poison that was whirling there.

So a destroying Angel's breath
Drives on the flying plague, and with it hasty death.

Such was the pain, did so begin,
To the poor wretch when Legion enter'd in.

"Forgive me, O!" I cry'd; for I
Flatter'd myself I was to die.

But quickly, to my cost, I found
'Twas cruel Love, not Death, had made a lingering wound.

Death a more gen'rous rage does use,
Quarter to all he conquers does refuse;
Whilst Love with barbarous mercy saves
His prisoners, to make them slaves.

Thy slave I am then; let me know,
Great Master, the hard task I must for ever do.

Who pride and scorn must undergo,
In tempests and rough seas thy galley row;
And pant, and groan, and sighing find
My sighs increase the angry wind.

Like an Egyptian Tyrant, some Thou weary'st out, alas; in building but a tomb.

Others with sad and tedious art
Labour the quarries of a stony heart!
Of all the works thou dost assign,
Be my employ to dig the mine!

DEEM not, sweet rose, that bloom'st
'midst many a thorn,
Thy friend, tho' to a cloister's shade con-sign'd,
Can e'er forget the charms he left behind,
Or pass unheeded this auspicious morn!
In happier days to brighter prospects born,
O tell thy thoughtless sex, the virtuous
mind;
Like thee, content in every state may find,
And look on Folly's pageantry with scorn.
To steer with nicest art betwixt th' extreme
Of idle mirth, and affectation coy;
To blend good sense with elegance and ease;
To bid Affliction's eye no longer stream;
Is thine; best gift, the unsailing source of joy,
The guide to pleasures which can never cease!

SONNET to GEORGE DEMPSTER, Esq.
On bearing that he had refused to suffer his Carriage to be drawn by his BELLOW SUBJECTS.

BRITANNIA oft indignant has beheld
The boasted champions of fair Freedom's cause,
With self-importance insolently swell'd,
O'erlook Humanity's benignant laws;
And, while they promis'd millions to defend,
Make British Subjects their ignoble Slaves.

For thy unwearied patriotic zeal,
Thy fellow subjects strive their sense to show
Of thy great labours for the public weal,

Thy generous soul dots all respect disdain
That would, on Freedom's sons, impose the lightest chain.

J. BLACK.

SONNET to the Rev. ISAAC CLARKE, of Woodbridge.

*Written in the Evening of the 11th of Nov,
when the Wind was high.*

SWIFT sweep the clouds along the blackening sky,
Loud in the wind the quivering trees resound;
The sinking gale seems ready now to die.
Now stronger swells, and strews with leaves
the ground.
The still and peaceful eve let others hail,
When scarce a leaf waves with the gentle breeze,
When Cynthia's beam rests on the lengthening vale,
Or glitters broken through the branchy trees.
Sweet is the mildness of the moon-light
scene!
Sweet are the pleasures Stillness does inspire!
Yet dearer to thy soul, O Clarke! I ween
This solemn night, in tune to Ossian's lyre
For now thy fancy, spurning earth and time,
With airy beings talks, and tastes the true sublime.

J. BLACK.

Mrs. SHERIDAN
ON HER BROTHER'S VIOLIN.

"SWEET instrument of him for whom I mourn,
"Tuneful companion of my LYCID's
"hours,
"How liest thou now neglected and forlorn,
"What skilful hand shall now call forth
"thy powers!
"Ah! none like him can reach those liquid
"notes,
"So soft, so sweet, so eloquently clear,
"To live beyond the touch, and gently beat
"In dying modulations on the ear."
Thus o'er my LYCID's lyre as I complain'd,
And kiss'd the strings where he was wont
to play,
While yet in pensive sadness I remain'd, Methought it sigh'd, and sighing seem'd to say:
"Ah! me, forlorn, forsaken, now no more Shall fame and just applause around me wait;
No power my gentle Master can restore,
And I, alas! will share his hapless fate,
"Fled is that spirit, chill'd that youthful
fire,
Which taught those strains with harmony replete,
"Ser her vestes on her sister, in our last
vol. p. 934

And

And cold that hand which only can inspire
My senseless form to utter sounds so sweet.

Those sounds melodious ne'er again shall
please,

No tuneful strain from me shall ever flow;
Save o'er my trembling strings a sighing
breeze,

To call one sad, soft note of tender woe.

Else, ah! for ever mute let me remain,
Unstrung, untun'd, forgotten let me be;
Guard me from curious eye, and touch pro-
phane,

And let me rest in mournful sympathy!

One fate with thee, dear Master, let me
share;

Like thee in silent darkness let me lie!
My frame without thee is not worth my care,
With thee alone it liv'd, with thee shall die!"

THE SAME,

ON THE DEATH OF HER UNFORTUNATE BROTHER.

THOU whose vent'rous Muse, sublimely bright,
Above Heaven's concave wings her daring
flight,

Spirit of Milton! once again descend,
And to my feeble Muse thy succour lend;
Teach me, like thee, to mourn the hapless fate

Of a lov'd LYCIDAS; like thee relate
A tale so piteous, and so like thy own,
That thou, again recalling days long flown,
Shalt o'er my LYCID's tomb thy grief renew, [due.

And think the tears that fall are friendship's
He too, like thee, could pour such melting strains, [plaints;

As well might please the natives of the Still in the list'ning ear the sounds' would stay,

Sweeter than oaten pipe, or Doric lay.
But when to loftier themes his soul aspir'd,
When heaven-born genius all his bosom
fir'd,

Whene'er in notes sublime his voice he rais'd,

To sing the wonders of the God he prais'd,
The harmony divine thrill'd through each breast,

And every brighten'd eye his zeal confess'd.
"In manners gentle, in affections" warm,
Skill'd in each art, each pleasing power to charm;

With native honour blest'd, and genuine
truth,

The fire of genius, and the glow of youth,
He fell—the parting waves clos'd round his head, [dead*.

And murmur'd, as they clos'd, for LYCID

* Mr. Linley was unfortunately drowned in the Duke of Ancafter's park.

Ah! Youth below'd, how shall I paint the grief [relief;
Which rends thy parents' hearts, and mocks
Thy sister's deep distress, and that still woe
Which fond remembrance long must cause to flow!

Vain, vain attempt! unequal flows the verse
Which real sorrow prompts me to rehearse;
Yet will I cherish still the pleasing strain,
And bring thee in idea back again;
Recalling every song and note of thine,
Each social strain which thou wert wont to join,

Till warm imagination sees thee near,
And more than mortal music strikes my ear,
Ah! gentle spirit, how wilt thou forgive
The weakness that would wish thee still to
live;

Again to tempt the shaft which Envy throws
At every breast where worth or genius glows!

Then cease complaint, and cease the mournful lay, [pay.

The last sad tribute which my Muse shall Farewell, my lov'd, lost LYCIDAS, farewell!
Still in thy sister's mem'ry shalt thou dwell;
And, when thy own sweet notes again I sing,

Hover around me on Cherubic wing,
And waft the sounds to Angels list'ning
near,

For Angels strains like thine delight to hear,
Shall hear; and to their harps attune thy lays,
And join with thee to hymn their Maker's praise.

time as if nothing had happened to it. And other slip of canvas on a chalky soil, with two cocoa-nut-trees at the end of it, still appear to have kept its ground, though every thing else had been in motion round it. The cocoa-trees, which grew about the house, have been gradually carried with the mass of ruins some hundred feet, if not yards, from their original situation. The mill itself has gone with the sliding mould, though little more than an arm or a piece of the tail race is visible at present. The calamity is still extending. A corn piece to the northward of the building towards the sea (for the motion has been from North to South), with little or no variation, is now the theatre of this surprising spectacle. It has uniformly proceeded towards the sea, which it will in all probability reach in a day or two, as it has now got to the foot of an eminence at no great distance from it; the two sides of which go sloping downwards, and form with the opposite ridges an easy passage to it.

A Pivra Sanga, in Italy, on the 7th of Dec.
about 11 o'clock at night, the weather being every stormy, the thunder fell in several places and at Fort St. Barbe it set fire to the powder, which occasioned so great an explosion that all the houses shook as far as Sciezazza.
That storm has done great damage by setting fire to many places, but we have the satisfaction to hear that no lives were lost.

In Admiral, the storms have been still more awful and alarming. At Newhaven in New-England, the most violent hurricane attended with dreadful thunder and lightning, happened on the 27th of August last ever known in the memory of man. Its course was from N. W. to S. W. and its greatest force about 300 yards wide. In one parish ten dwelling-houses, five barns, two great mills, and a saw-mill were levelled with the ground.
The parsonage demolished, and the Rev.
John Minor (who buried in the ruins. The planks of a new bridge, formerly spiked down, were torn off and carried a considerable distance; the largest trees rooted up in the forests. The lightning set fire to many stacks of hay. In short, destruction marked its progress.

FORBIGN

At Newstead, the same night, at ten o'clock, a shock of an earthquake was felt there, which lasted upwards of a minute. At the castle of Bouliemont, belonging to the Marquis d'Alace, situated on the frontier of Champagne and Lorraine, half a league from Neuchâtel, the motion was so sensible, that persons sitting in their apartments were startled at it; some pieces of furniture were even displaced. That shock was also felt at Clermont, which is in the same line, 50 toises above the level of the Meuse, which waters the base of both the castles, situated on the same hill, and eight leagues from Bouliemont, on the road from Neuchâtel to Langres.

At Barbaud, on Monday, the 16th of October, the inhabitants of part of St. Joseph's parish were alarmed by the appearance of several fissures in the earth, and the building of one or two incursions a little below the surface. On Tuesday, the cracks increasing, some of them began to prepare for flight to places of greater safety. On the evening of the same day, Mr. Phillips, manager of the plantation of the late Sir William Baker, was informed that the lady above him was making advances towards the house, which induced him to quit it, and take shelter with his family in one of the negro huts for the remainder of the night; in the course of which, the kitchen and storeroom fell down, a range of offices adjoining sunk into a deep chasm, which was presently filled up by a heap of mould from the ground above them. At day-light next morning, the neighbourhood in general took the alarm, and assembling near the spot were witnesses to a scene affecting and terrible beyond description. The country looked as if it had been torn and shattered by an earthquake. The cutting house was down; part of the mansion was standing but flanked by a mound of earth higher than the top of it. The ground was intersected by a number of fissures, and in many places welled and inflated into monstrous tumours. Between six and seven the remainder of the house came down with a tremendous crash. The mill, boiling house, and stable had received so many cracks, that every moment appeared to be equally critical with them; the former stood still half past twelve, when the wall went off in two or three immense blocks, and the timbers followed it with such violence as to bury an arm in the earth up to the neck of the last. The wreck was soon universal, and long before the close of the day many of the buildings had sunk so low, that no traces of them were at some distance discernible. The face of the country had undergone so total a change, that the neighbours were frequently unable to determine where many objects formerly to be seen remained good before. A large piece of cedar above the house had long occupied the site of the mansion, and was now with it a long strip of the same wood, and some of the beams were the same of the beams.

off on the proposed journey; but the gentleman very soon recollected that he had left a small parcel behind him of material consequence, the carriage was stopped, and the maid-servant sent to fetch it. Soon after she was gone, the gentleman ordered the driver to go on, and the maid was left behind. After some stay in Wales, the gentleman returned in mourning, having the misfortune to lose both wife and child. The friends of the lady becoming inquisitive as to the circumstances and place of her death, and not receiving any satisfactory information on the subject, formed a suspicion injurious to the character of the husband, and applied to the Chief Justice of the King's Bench, to compel him to give an account of his wife: the day was accordingly fixed for this purpose, and the lady's father, mother, and many other of her friends, attended, anxious to learn the particulars of the poor lady's fate—when, lo! she had risen from the dead, and was handed into court, in proper person, by the afflicted husband. The whole court was in amazement, and the mother fainted at the apparition. She was questioned by the Judge, if her absence had been voluntary? To which she answered in the affirmative, and that she had no complaint to make—Was she married to her supposed husband? This was a question that she did not feel necessary to be answered—Was she inclined to return with her supposed husband; or with her father? She chose to go with the husband: and they retired accordingly. Their friends are still at a loss to account for so mysterious a conduct.

A lady in the neighbourhood of London, a short time since, went to the bank to receive a dividend amounting to a considerable sum, which she took in bank bills, put them loose in her pocket, and directed her coachman to drive to a tradesman's in the city, where she bought some goods, and took the opportunity of examining her bills and putting them in her pocket book; after which she got into her coach, and ordered her servant to drive home. A few miles from town the carriage was stopped by a single highwayman with a crape over his face, who demanded the lady's money and watch, which she gave him: "Madam," says he, "you have more property about you; give me your pocket book." This was complied with, and the highwayman rode off. After a few minutes consideration, the lady called to the coachman to turn about and drive back again to the tradesman's where he had taken her up. On her arrival there she enquired for the master of the shop, and was informed that he was gone out of town; but his return was uncertain, it might be in an hour or two, or perhaps not for two or three days. This answer increased her suspicion, she declared that her husband was of a very particular nature; and she would wait till she saw him. About an hour afterwards the tradesman made his appearance.

once, when the lady desired to speak with him in private; and the moment they were alone, she told him she had been robbed by a highwayman that afternoon, and that he was the man. The tradesman began to turn, protesting his innocence; but the lady replied, very coolly, that she was positive as to his person and voice, though his face was covered; that, if he would quickly restore her property, she would never discover him, from a regard to his family; but if he did not instantly comply with this request, she would order him to be taken into custody. Upon this the tradesman burst into tears, and, acknowledging his guilt, restored the property; and the lady has so strictly kept her promise, that her most intimate friends cannot obtain even a distant hint by which the penitent robber may be discovered:—The fabricator of this story forgets that the coachman and footman on reading this account must know who is meant.

EVUPTIONS, COMOTIONS, HURRICANES.
There is at this moment (Dec. 14.) a slight eruption of lava from Mount Veiuvius, which, so far from alarming, gives universal satisfaction, as a few days ago a shock of an earthquake was felt at Naples. The earthquakes still continue with some force in Calabria, sometimes towards Catanzaro, and at other times in the neighbourhood of Reggio.

The lava continues to run gently from an opening near the Crater of Mount Vesuvius, without descending low enough to do any damage to the fertile and cultivated country at the foot of the mountain.

A shock of an earthquake was felt at Brinsford, Dec. 9, at ten minutes after nine o'clock in the morning. The concussion was pretty strong, but of short duration, attended with a rumbling noise which resembled the report of a cannon. There was no perceptible vibration; but, during several nights previous to the shock, fiery vapours were observed to issue from the earth in various parts near the coal mines.

The accounts from Ireland are of the most melancholy kind. That unhappy island is still afflicted with violent earthquakes, the explosion of subterraneous fires, and a dreadful famine. The benefactions of the Court, and the liberal donations of private persons in Denmark, have as far as possible relieved the distresses of the miserable inhabitants.

On the 25th of November, at ten minutes past six at night, several shocks of an earthquake were felt at Sirsborough and in Alsace. The shocks seemed to come from South-west to North-east; they lasted five or six seconds; the motion was so great, as to throw down the furniture of the houses, and some of them were removed from their places; otherwise this event has caused very little fear, as no fatal accident happened. The shocks were felt in the western part of that island.

The Royal Society of Edinburgh have offered a premium of 300 livres, for the best collogium on Peter Richet de Bellevue, the first professor of Anatomy and Botany in that University, and who first established the Botanic Garden there. The composition was to be written in Latin or French, and transmitted to M. de Ratisse at Montpelier, before the 30th of Sept. 1785.

The Royal Medical Society at Paris had proposed a premium of 600 livres for the solution of the following question: "What are the characteristic symptoms of nervous disorders, such as hysteria, hypochondriasis, &c. What their differences; and what their principal causes, and the general indications to be observed in their treatment?" The solutions are to be sent to M. Vieq. D'Azys, before Jan. 1, 1786.

M. Thibaut, a Professor in the University of Lorraine, has discovered a method of producing inflammable air from pit-coal, a circumstance which may be of great advantage to this country. He found, from various experiments, that 15 ounces of powdered pichcolite yielded, in about three quarters of an hour, 100 quarts of air, of so pure a quality, that on trial it was proved to raise a balloon as rapidly, and as high, as if it had been mixed with the usual inflammable air.

M. Geoffroy formerly procured 5 ounces of water from 8 ounces of spirits of wine.—M. Levecher has lately not only converted the whole of the spirit of wine into water, but from 16 ounces has procured 18 ounces of pure water.

M. Le Roy has lately laid before the French Academy of Sciences a memoir, proposing an easy method of retewing fresh air in the holds and apartments of transport ships, and other crowded vessels. The simplicity of his proposition perhaps will make it a very salutary expedient among the maritime part of mankind. It consists of a large sail wrapped up in the form of a funnel, the wide mouth of which may be kept expanded by a circle of cane or whalebone, which is to be turned to windward, and the small end terminates in a long pipe, by which the fresh air is conveyed as a pleasure to different parts of the ship.

The celebrated financier M. Neckar has published a work, intitled, "Treatise on the Finances," which he divides into three parts: The first is called, "That which was done before me;" the second, "That which I did;" and the third, "That which remains to be done." The work is in three volumes octavo.

INTERLUNGE EXTRAORDINARY.

A few months hence, a gentleman of credit and reputation in London, prepared his family for a journey into Wales; their baggage was packed up, the day fixed, and arrangements provided, which look up himself, his wife, child, and third servant, and they set

A widow, named Ann Liddell, at Carlisle, was, about two years since, admitted a patient in the Dispensary there, for a most excruciating pain in her face, and on the right side of the head. Many medicines were given but without relief. After several months treatment, Dr. Hornum directed the maxillary sinus (or hollow part of the cheek bone) to be opened, where her pain was least; after injecting some decoction of bark for a few days, a frightful infection was excited, about an inch long, and thick as a goose quill. She had a retention of her complaint for several hours; but it returned, and another infection was seen at the orifice, but could not be extracted. Two days after this, the second infection was discharged, in form and size like the first; and some time afterwards the fragments of a rib, which procured her some intervals of ease, though the last accounts of Mrs. Liddell do not say she is perfectly recovered. The above narrative, however, wonderful, we are assured, is strictly true. The substance of it was transmitted by Dr. Keigham, a physician of character at Newcastle, to Mr. Latham, F.R.S. at Darford, in Kent. Mrs. Liddell is near 60 years of age, and has been accustomed to take large quantities of

COVERIES, &c.

At the commencement of the New-year, the Theological Society at Haverham proposed a prize of a gold medal, value 400 guineas, for the best treatise "On the Folly of Superstition, the absurdity of dogmatizing on theological subjects, and the proper medium to be observed between those two extremes."

with a great variety of most delicious fish but are abandoned within the last seven years to such a degree, that on the most moderate comparison not more than one in ten live great their former haunts.

Between the Landward and Rindal-fjord lie four broken rocks, three of which are in the fair way, and the other nearly in the same direction with the Rindal-fjord, which renders that passage exceedingly dangerous at low tide. On one of the above-mentioned rocks is fifteen feet water; on a second, but four above the third, on some low tides the water has been seen; the fourth is nearly as the third. These rocks ought to be laid down in the charts.

MEDICAL CASES.

A prisoner in Idoy, bit by a mad dog, had an interval of fifteen hours, in which he drank easily, and without agitation, large quantities of various liquors.—Of nine persons in the same prison bit by the same dog, one only was attacked by the hydrophobia; and he recovered the first not the last bitten, nor the most wounded. He fell sick after four months and died hydrophobous and convulsed, but without delirium. Land. Med. Jour. A ready vomit in cases of poison. A pinch of snuff, or a little powdered tobacco. Ibid. The red bark is in much less esteem abroad than the quill-bark.—When quill-bark not two years ago sold in Italy for three shillings and sixpence a pound, the red bark sold for fourteen-pence. Ibid.

Mr. Charles Noble, who died lately at Canterbury, being opened, the largest stone was taken out of his bladder that can be remembered. It filled the whole pelvis, and the bladder was distended to an immoderate size. The stone, which was no where attached, was of a depressed oval figure with the smallest end downwards, tolerably regular in its shape, very compact, and weighed 17 ounces avoirdupois. It measured 12 inches in circumference; was two inches thick at the broadest end, and two and a half at the narrowest, towards the neck of the bladder. From the smaller extremity a small fragment was broken off, which, with the gritty sand that accompanied it, would have weighed about half an ounce more. Mr. Noble began to feel symptoms of the stone 20 years ago; and had taken all the lithontriptics that have acquired any character; but for the last five years had wholly been under the care of Dr. Benj. Chandler of Canterbury, who by an abstemious and bland diet and keeping his bowels lax, had so far succeeded as to enable him to enjoy the company of his friends every evening over a game at quadrille during the winter, and to walk abroad in the summer, till five weeks before his death; when he was in constant pain, owing, as the Doctor supposes, to the breaking off of the fragment, though he does not attribute his death to that immediate cause. Ibid.

M. Maillaunce, a philosophical politician at Lyons, has just made some accurate observations on the population of 128 parishes in Auvergne, Lyons, and Rouen, and, in opposition to the general opinion, has discovered that in the space of 62 years the population has increased in those places more than one-eleventh part. In 1682, according to an accurate account taken by the famous Colbert, Paris contained 720,000 inhabitants. In 1760 the number, according to the Abbe Expilly, was reduced to 600,000, or to 550,000 according to M. de Buffon; but as during the last 32 years the births have continually exceeded the deaths, M. Maillaunce thinks Paris again upon the increase.

The Political Journal of Berlin, for December, gives the following as a correct list of the land forces of the great powers of Europe in time of peace: Austria 290,000, Russia 470,000, Prussia 224,431, France 192,000, the United Low Countries 37,000, Great Britain and Ireland 58,000, Sweden 49,000, Denmark 67,000, Poland 15,000, Turkey 110,000, Venice 8000, Naples and Sicily 30,000, the See of Rome 5000, Tuscany 30,000, Sardinia 40,000, Spain 98,000, Portugal 20,000, Saxony 26,000, Brunswick 16,000, Bavaria 24,000, Wirtemberg 6000, Hesse Cassel 2000.

Among the numberless phenomena, not accounted for by naturalists, may be reckoned the migration of sea fish, a fact of unquestionable notoriety, recently confirmed on the eastern coast of Ireland and western coasts of Scotland, which formerly abounded to Mr. Wood, but merely to do justice. She was sure of the day and the time, and sure of seeing Mr. Wood, and paying him the trifling owed him. She was cross-examined till she grew angry. She was questioned by counsel about having to long in paying the rent? He answered was, Suppose she did? Her husband did not find fault, and further, the counsel, had no right to call her to account.

Miss Sawyer, her husband, being sworn, contradicted his wife's evidence in every circumstance, and on his cross-examination was perfectly recalled.

Robert Red, a working gardener, sworn.

He recollected digging up the garden on the Monday before the last. He had finished about four o'clock, and he met Mr. Wood in the passage, and told him, now his garden was ready for his company. He went into the kitchen, and while he was there he heard a voice at the bar which he thought he knew. Days the boy, it is Miss Sawyer's come to pay my mother her husband's score. He was cross-examined. Believed Wood had a great coat, but was not sure whether he had or no—Wood had been all, but he did not know what was the matter with him.

Joseph Adams (a day-labourer being sworn, said, He carried a bottle of ketchup to Mr. Wood's house on the 11th of October, saw and spoke to Mr. Wood, and the clock struck five while he was in the tap-room.

Add to the above positive witnesses the testimony of the following respectable persons to his character:

Richard Mann, Esq; brewer; Gregory Bates, Esq; his landlord; Rev. Mr. Whitechurch, Mr. Parker, Mr. Parr, bradymerchant; Mr. Murrel, broker and apptmer; Mr. Brougham and his mother.

Prisoner Brown's defence.

He was so conscious of his innocence, that he would challenge all mankind to charge him with one dishonest act; and he most solemnly declared, he was not one of the persons who committed the robbery with which he was charged. He trusted, that by the aid of Divine Providence, that guards the innocent, he should be able to prove to the satisfaction of the court and jury, that on the day and at the time the prosecutors charge, the robbery to be committed, he was at his mother's house, and could not be one of the persons who committed it.

Edward Lewis, sworn, said, He had asked the prisoner's mother's house, the sign of the King's Arms in Chapel-street, and did not suppose he had missed it; this time 20 years. He was there on the 11th of October, and well remembered seeing the prisoner at the bar there about five o'clock in the afternoon. He was positive to the hour and day. This constant hour of going was about a quarter after five, and he well remembered seeing the young man sitting by the kitchen fire. He could not be mistaken in his person, for he had known him ever since he was born. Being asked, said, he was a day-labourer, and lived at No. 40, Theobald's Row. Miss Owen sworn. She lived with the prisoner's mother. She remembered the prisoner's being at home on the 11th of October, and that he went to bed early that night. He was rather a little intoxicated, and went to bed before the club met. She was certain of the day, because they had a lottery club which met that night, and she remembered him coming in about three in the afternoon that day when they had all dined, and having a red herring for his dinner. And his mother said, He need not have a red herring to make him dry, he had had drink enough. William Webb sworn. Knows the prisoner Brown well, and remembers drinking with him at his mother's house on the 11th of October in the afternoon. The witness came through the passage in his way to the kitchen with a halpenny worth of apples in his hand. He asked the prisoner if he would eat an apple, and he knocked the apple out of his hand under the grate; this was about four o'clock. He was sure as to the time, because he went to the water it was of clock, to water his horses; said, he was addressing Mr. Parker, who rents stables on the premises, and keeps horses to let out. He did not know whether the prisoner had horses of Mr. Parker. He knew he did not hire one of him that day. Mr. Haggley, Mr. Duke, Mr. Leman, were sworn to his character; and Mr. Caird, counsel for the prisoner, said, many more were ready if necessary.

Judge Abbott just observed, that as the jury had been attentive to every thing that had been sworn, he should not take up their time with recapitulating the evidence. He would only remark on the great fallibility there was in swearing to the appearance of persons. Sir Thomas Davenport, who is a person of character and respectability, was so doubtful convinced in his own mind that the prisoners were the persons who robbed him; yet it must be owned there has been instances evidence to the contrary. The jury with one voice gave their verdict, NOT GUILTY.

NOTICE.

At Newby, in the last year, there were 1988 christenings; 1175, burials; and 848 marriages. Increased in christenings 343; burials 166; decreased in marriages 144; trials 321; married this year by licence 144; by banns 906.

At Preston, last year, there were 143 christenings; 81 marriages; 167 burials. Decreased in the burials 81; decreased in the christenings 37; increased in the marriages 2.

At Blackburn there were, in the last year, 448 christenings; 116 marriages; and 250 burials. Increased in the christenings attended by an officer from Bow-street, came readily, and being positively sworn to, they were both fully committed. On circumstances, the counsel said, must not be omitted; and that was, the mare which the short man rode when he committed the robbery, was identified as his mare.

The witnesses were then called. Sir Thomas Davenport, being sworn, said, the first thing he observed that struck him was, the prisoner Brown, who, with a long horse pistol pointed to the coachman, bid him stop. They were then (about the hour and on the road as mentioned by the counsel), going home at the rate of six miles an hour, and on being stopped, the short man came to the window on that side where Lady Davenport sat, and ordered it to be let down, and presently came the taller man to his side, and both prey nearly at the same time demanded their money. Brown had a handkerchief over the upper part of his face, standing to his nose, with his hat a little up. Wood's face had a handkerchief over it, pretty much in the same manner. Sir Thomas had his money loose in his pocket, two guineas and some silver, which he gave Brown into his hand, looking attentively at him at the same time; and Lady Davenport gave Wood her money, in a small round purse. Lady Davenport was putting her watch behind her, which Wood observed, and said to Sir Thomas, "I'll search the chariot, and if I find any thing concealed, by God I'll blow your brains out. At that instant his handkerchief dropped a little. Sir Thomas looked earnestly at him, and he seemed to hold it at a little distance from his mouth, and by the impression he then made upon his mind, Sir Thomas thinks he could not be mistaken in him; they then demanded their watches, and Sir Thomas delivered his to Brown, and begged his Lady for God's sake to give the other man hers, as he seemed to be a very resolute man. Brown appeared somewhat in awe of the other, and when Sir Thomas gave him his watch, said, "Damn you, you have more money, and tell Sir Thomas's left hand pocket. Lady Davenport's watch was a gold watch, which had an outer case chased, but at that time had only a seal-skin case, a seal chain, two seals, one a family seal, with other little trinkets. Sir Thomas's watch had gold inside and outside cases, and a gold cap, a plain steel chain, and two seals; it was made by Mudge, and cost thirty-three guineas. All this while, which could not be less than seven or eight minutes (for the short man seemed as composed and collected as he could have been in any the most deliberate act), the sun shone full in their faces, and Sir Thomas had time to make such observations as convinced him that he should know the persons of both of them.

At the sessions at the Old Bailey, which began on the 8th of December, Thomas Wood and George Brown were indicted for feloniously stealing Sir Thomas Davenport, on the highway, on the 11th of October last; putting him in fear, and taking from his person a gold watch, two guineas, and one shilling in money.

The indictment was opened by Mr Shepherd; and the case stated by Mr. Silver, who said, that on the 11th of October last, about five o'clock in the afternoon, as Sir Thomas Davenport was returning home with his lady from Marlow, on the Bdgware road, two men passed them, who the coachman believed meant to rob them. They first stopped the servant on horseback, and made him dismount, and, after putting their handkerchiefs over their faces, returned and stopped the carriage. The short man attacked Lady Davenport, and demanded her money; she both: after receiving their money, they demanded their watches, and Lady Davenport making some hesitation, and endeavouring to conceal her watch, was observed by the short man, who, upon his stirrups wore a dreadful oath, that he would get off his horse and search, and, if he found any thing concealed, he would blow her brains out. Being terrified by his threats, she gave him her watch, having given him her purse before, and then the tall man, in a low whispering voice, said, "Your pocket-books! Ay, said the other in a rougher tone, your pocket-books: being abused by Lady Davenport, who was then much frightened, that they had no pocket-books, they bid her not be afraid, and turning their horses rode deliberately away. They were about ten minutes in committing the robbery, seemed in no haste, and when they passed the four man, the tall one was seen to deliver to the other the purse and the watch which he had taken from Lady Davenport, as if the tall one had only been servant, and the short one the master. As soon as Sir Thomas got home, he sent to Bow-street an account of the robbery, and a description of the watches, and persons of the robbers; but no intelligence was procured of either till the 11th of November, when Sir Thomas going up St. Martin's Lane observed two men in horseback, who instantly struck him were the identical persons who robbed him. He followed them till they came to a stable-yard in Chapel-street, where they put up their horses, and having that done, he applied to the office in Bow-street, whose officers soon took Brown into custody, and afterwards sent for Wood to his house, in Kenilworth-town, who excited himself at first from attending; but being afterwards waited on by the coachman,

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

The contest between the Emperor and the Dutch seems already in a fair way to be terminated amicably. Her Imperial Majesty of Russia, who, by the magnitude of her empire, and the wisdom of her counsels, has rendered herself respectable, has thought fit to interest herself in the preservation of the peace on this occasion. Three days before Christmas-day, her minister, M. Kalitchoff, at the Hague, received the following memorial from St. Petersburg, which he immediately delivered to the president of the States-General :

" Her Majesty the Empress of all the Russias has never lost sight for a moment, since the beginning of her reign, of the happiness and tranquillity of Europe in general ; it was therefore with the most lively concern, she received intelligence that the negotiations between the States-General and the Emperor, her friend and ally, had been interrupted by acts of hostility, which would seem to put it out of the power of his Imperial Majesty to take any other steps than such as the support of his dignity in the face of Europe should suggest. Her Majesty the Empress has given too many marks of the interest she takes in the peace and prosperity of the Republic, not to be confident that their High Mightinesses will consider the invitation which she now sends them, to devise means for opening again the way to accommodation, as the fruit of the most pure and laudable desire to restore tranquillity, and prevent hostilities that might end in open war, and disturb the peace of all Europe. Her Majesty therefore requests their High Mightinesses will think of the means that their wisdom may suggest, to bring the dispute to an amicable conclusion, a consummation as salutary as it is useful to both parties."

To the above memorial the answer is said to be in substance, " That their High Mightinesses were ready to renew the negotiations, which had not been broken off on their side ; and that they flattered themselves that her Imperial Majesty would condescend, by her good offices, to dispose the Emperor to agree to it, in order to effect an accommodation, such as would not hurt his dignity, nor the independence of the Republic, &c."

Besides the above memorial, her Imperial Majesty is likewise said to have written to the King of Prussia ; and the papers have given the following as a translation of her letter :—" My advantageous sentiments respecting the house of Prussia, sentiments of which I have given efficacious proofs, permit me to hope for the same on their part. I expect it the more, as I have ever been convinced of their reciprocal affection. The war which is preparing between the Emperor of the Romans and the Hollanders excites the immediate attention of the cabinet of

Gen. MAO. January, 1785.

Berlin, of which the Dutch endeavour, by all sorts of intrigues, to secure the accession. Your wisdom acknowledges that the pretensions of the Emperor are equally just and moderate. Nature herself had granted to the Austrian Low Countries the use and advantage of the river in dispute ; Austria alone, by virtue of the law of nature and nations, is entitled to an exclusive right to the use of the river in question. So that the equity and disinterestedness of Joseph the 1st. can only impart this right to other people, it belonging exclusively to his States. The sentiments of Austria merit esteem and attention ; but the avidity of the Dutch, and the judgement which they permit themselves to assume on account of the treaty of Munster over the house of Austria, are notorious, and blameable in every respect.

" Nothing can be alleged with foundation in favour of Holland, therefore she merits not the assistance of any foreign power. The consequences, which these Republicans are drawing upon themselves by their obstinacy must be submitted to the moderation of the Emperor alone. I am firmly resolved to assist his pretensions with all my land and sea forces, with as much efficacy as if the welfare of my own empire was in agitation. I hope that this declaration of my sentiments will meet with the success which our reciprocal friendship deserves, and which hath never been interrupted.

CATHARINE."

Though the above letter, neither in style, sentiment, or propriety, appears to be genuine, yet, as it furnishes a new argument in favour of the Emperor's claim, we have thought it fit to be inserted. There are not a few who look upon the navigation of the Scheldt as a mere pretence to lay the foundation of a war, which, if once begun, must terminate in more important consequences ; and it must be owned, that a war once kindled, in which so many powers must inevitably be involved, cannot well be closed without the revival of old claims, and the regulation of new boundaries. But it is with empires as with families. Wise men, do not however, chuse to bring clear and undisputed rights into question, at the risque of acquiring their rights to which the title is ever liable to be disputed. But this is not all ; the leading powers of Europe have other objects in view to engage their attention. Her Imperial Majesty of Russia has the settlement of her newly acquired territories much at heart, and has caused the following account of what lately happened in Georgia to be published.

Georgia has suffered, time immemorial, from the hostile incursions and ravages of the Tartars residing at the foot of Mount Caucasus. These people frequently quitted their hords, and plundered all the low country about them, sacking towns, and carrying the inhabitants into captivity. These people have

of late united into one body, dared to pass the river Alazan, and make an inroad into Georgia, a country subject to the Russian empire, but on the 14th of October last their temerity met with its just reward; they were attacked, defeated, and completely routed, by a party of troops under the command of Major General Samoilow. We lost on this occasion only two chasseurs killed, and fifteen wounded; of the latter number unfortunately was the brave Lieutenant Col. the Prince of Hesse Reinfels, who died of his wounds the third day after the action."

The military preparations of the Turks, and the troubles which have arisen in Transylvania, give daily more and more serious alarms to the court of Vienna.—Letters from Großwaradin are filled with the horrors occasioned by the Walachians. On the first of November a band of these rebels massacred four officers of justice, who attempted to arrest one of their chiefs. On the 2d, they assassinated 25 gentlemen, as also the Bailiff Brad, who had retired into the village of Krisler. The evangelic pastor of the place and his wife were beheaded with a hatchet. On the 3d, they blew up the house of the receiver-general of the customs in the village of Rabitz; and Mad. Balogh was thrown down from the uppermost story of her house on some pitchforks, held up by the barbarians. M. Balogh and a number of other gentlemen and their wives were knocked on the head. After having set fire to the house of Geo. Kolona, a Reformed preacher, they threw his two children into the flames. Mr. Crisgar was hanged and cut to pieces. His wife and children could not escape death. A detachment of the regiment of Crossi arrived at the time when these executions were committing, killed 30, and dispersed the rest.

Constantinople, Nov. 20. M. de Boligny, minister from Spain, had his first audience the 5th of this month, in which he delivered his credentials to the Grand Seignior, and the presents of the King his master: the usual ceremonies were observed on the occasion. The Spanish minister was invested with a magnificent pelisse, and his suite with pelisses of less value. Among the presents of the court of Madrid, was the large field tent, which King Ferdinand made use of in the camp of Oceanua; it is lined with red velvet, richly trimmed with gold lace and tassels, divided into separate apartments fit for a whole court, and is surrounded with a large gallery.

It is given out, that the commission, with which the above minister is charged, relates chiefly to the mediation which his Catholic majesty wishes the Porte to undertake in order to accommodate the differences that now subsist between the Spanish nation and the States of Barbary; and the following letter from Mr. Dun, the English proconsul to the above States, seems to give some colour to the above report. "Port Mahon, Dec. 15, 1784. I have been prevented continuing my letter by the most cruel and disagreeable alarm which could have occurred. Fifteen or twenty sail of Barbary corsairs invest, and are every instant expected to land, in order to pillage, murder, and make as many slaves as they can; the whole town is in the utmost confusion; they have neither arms nor ammunition to defend themselves, nor have they any place to fly to for security; the Governor, however, is very diligent, and has sent to the Continent for a supply. God knows what we have to expect should they land while we are here, especially in the night-time. The English who are here claim my protection, thinking that, being missioned to the States of Barbary, I might command some attention from the Algerines. The inhabitants of this island have justly deserved the chastisement they are now threatened with; they were traitors to the English, by encouraging secretly the Spaniards to besiege us; now they have lost our protection, they feel the change, and bitterly lament it. They had enriched themselves by the trade with the Algerines, and they took the first opportunity of shewing their ingratitude, by a general petition to go volunteers in the late expedition. What have they as present or ought to expect from that uncivilized nation, who from knowledge of their unfriendly intention towards them, are resolved to invade them; indeed, I think, there will be as bloody a scene as imagination can paint. The Minorquins, when they now see an Englishman, follow him, and question to know if their dear Johns (by which epithet they formerly were pleased contemptuously to distinguish our nation) will ever return. They pray for the Russians; nay, even the Turks, to take the island in preference to its remaining in the possession of Spain.

By other letters it appears that the Algerine corsairs are growing formidable to the Spaniards in every quarter.

The Syren, Capt. Greave, just arrived at Portsmouth, brings advice that the port of Malaga was blocked up by a fleet of seven stout vessels from twenty-four to thirty-six guns, bearing the flag of the Day of Algiers; so that not a ship belonging to Spain can pass. The Barbary nations have one and all joined in a war against the Catholic King; and their conjoined force in the Mediterranean is become so very strong, that the trade of Spain is there at a perfect stand. And unless the court of Madrid take some very spirited measures, their other branches of commerce are in a fair way of annihilation.

Letters from Leghorn likewise say, that a squadron consisting of nine xebecs, two barks and six half-galleys, had sailed from Algiers; to attempt some enterprizes on the Spanish ports in the Mediterranean;—probably the same which appeared off Port-Mahon.

Leghorn, Dec. 13. By a Ragusan vessel from Tunis, in five days, advice was received here, that the plague continued to carry

carry off near five hundred persons daily in that regency: and that above thirty thousand were already dead.

The corporation of Calais have resolved to erect a monument, to perpetuate the memory of the two intrepid Aeronauts (see p. 71).—Blanchard receives 1000 Louis d'Ors, in consequence of his accomplishing his attempt to cross the channel in his balloon; this was the promised reward of the French King; who, to say the truth, is never slow to reward ingenuity, although he is cautious in admitting the claims of every pretender.

EAST INDIA INTELLIGENCE.

The letter from Gov. Hastings, of which mention has already been made, (Vol. LIV. p. 949), has since been made public, of which our readers will, in this Magazine, find a faithful abstract. (see p. 18).

Fort St. George, July 24, 1784. The Ponburne and Foulis sailed for China July 25, 1784. The Middlesex arrived at Madras June 9, and was expected to sail for China in a day or two after July 28. The Barrington arrived at Madras June 11, and sailed for Bengal June 25. The Contractor arrived at Madras June 19, and was expected to sail for China in a day or two after July 28. The Valentine arrived at Madras June 29, and sailed for Bengal July 14. The Hillborough arrived at Madras July 11, and sailed for Bengal on the 26th. The Earl of Mansfield arrived at Madras July 21, and remained the 28th.

To the accounts likewise which we gave in our last, of the sufferings of the prisoners, who unfortunately fell into the power of Tipoo Saib, the particulars that follow may be added. They are extracted from a letter written by an officer who shared in common with Mr. Hubbard, the severity of heavy chains, hard fare, and cruel imprisonment. "Immediately after he [Tipoo] had taken us at Biddinore, he repaired to Mangalore where Capt. Nugent had arrived with his Battalion, who joined the garrison, which consisted of one grenadier battalions, the 9th battalion of Scapoys, and the 42d, besides about 100 Convalescents, from the different corps, who could not be removed. With this small force did Capt. Nugent, to his immortal honour, hold out for six months; and for the last month they were fighting in the ditches for frogs, having nothing else to eat. At this critical moment, the news arrived of peace, and Tipoo endeavoured by every means to prevail with the French to continue with him, but they withstood his threats and solicitations.

AMERICAN NEWS.

In the preamble to the act lately passed by the General Assembly of the province of Pennsylvania, for the abolition of slavery, the Assembly rejoice, that it is in their power to extend a portion of that freedom to others which the hand of Providence hath extended to them. "It is not, they say, for them to enquire why, in the creation of mankind, the inhabitants of the several parts of the earth are distinguished by a difference in feature and complexion; it is sufficient for them to know, that all are the work of an Almighty hand; and they esteem it a peculiar blessing, that they are enabled, this day, in commemoration of their own happy deliverance from that estate of unconditional submission to which they were reduced by the tyranny of Britain, to manifest the sincerity of their professions, and to give a substantial proof of their gratitude:

"Be it therefore enacted, &c. That all persons, as well Negroes and Mulattoes, as others, who shall be born within this State from and after the passing of this Act, shall not be deemed and considered as servants for life, or slaves; and that all servitude for life, or slavery of children in consequence of the slavery of their mothers, shall be, and hereby is, utterly taken away, extinguished, and forever abolished."

Philadelphia, Oct. 6. Capt. Martin, just arrived in a brig from Port-au Prince, brought with him a man belonging to a sloop, the Intrepidity of Boston, that had foundered at sea. This man, with two others, when the vessel went down, were fortunate enough to get hold of a part of the gunwale that had parted from the ship; on which they supported themselves till next day, when two dropt off, and the surviving man continued five days in this perilous situation before he was seen and taken up by Capt. Martin.

IRISH INTELLIGENCE.

A great cause came on to be tried in the Court of Exchequer, Dublin, on the 3d of Dec. 1784, between the King and Mess. Connor, merchants, which was decided in favour of the latter. The subject of litigation was as follows: On the equalizing duties being passed, there was a duty of 11d. $\frac{1}{2}$ per pound laid on tobacco imported from America, but by some mistake tobacco imported from Great Britain or elsewhere, was not mentioned. Mess. Connor therefore entered a large quantity of tobacco from Great Britain (the duty of which, if entered from America, would have amounted to upwards of 3000l.) but under an old unrevoked Act of William and Mary, at 2d. $\frac{1}{2}$ per pound; and in consequence of the omission in the late Acts for equalizing the duties have got this verdict, by which they will clear 2000l.

From the most undoubted authority we learn, that the White Boys daily receive rapid accessions to their numbers. Several counties, who heretofore only heard of their name, are now unhappy sufferers from their depredations. In the county of Clare a few days since, we hear, a poor old and infirm firm clergyman of the Roman Catholic persuasion was forcibly taken out of his bed, and put to such torture, that he died the next evening, for venturing to preach the preceding Sunday against the infatuation of those deluded transgressors of law and order.

ADVICES FROM SCOTLAND.

On 24th of December, about 9 at night, a fire was discovered in the ship Anne, Capt. Kidd, lying in the middle of the harbour of Leith, the flames of which burst from the cabin. The vessel was lying in the third tier from the Quay; and it being low water, it was next to a miracle that the whole fleet, more than 200 in number, were not all reduced to ashes. Fortunately for Leith, in about three quarters of an hour the fire was got under; but never were human abilities more vigorously exerted than upon this occasion.

At a Court of Sessions at Edinburgh a cause was determined in which Mess. Richardson and Co. of Perth, merchants, were plaintiffs, and the Edinburgh insurers defendants. The merchants had shipped a cargo of salmon from Berwick for Venice, and insured the same; each barrel valued in the policy at 3l. 5s. The ship proving leaky, and the weather tempestuous, the ship-master put into St. Lucar, where the salmon were sold for 2l. 10s. per barrel; upon which the merchants, Richardson and Co. raised an action against the insurers, to recover the loss. The insurers contended, that by a N. B. in the policy, "corn, seed, salt, fish, fruit and flower, are warranted free from all average, unless general, or the ship be stranded," and therefore was exempted from all partial losses, such as were claimed by the plaintiffs, by the express terms of the policy. The plaintiffs contended that the N. B. respected only the perishable nature of the commodities during the voyage, but that all other losses stood upon the same footing with the general inference. The Court found, without going into the import of the N. B., that the loss claimed did not fall under the policy.

The sentence in favour of Lord Adam Gordon and Mr. Alves by the commissioners, as mentioned in our last, has since been reversed by the Court of Exchequer.

COUNTRY NEWS.

At Hassings a fisherman was shot through the head by a light dragoon, three of whom were called to the assistance of the revenue officers, in seizing boats of an illegal structure, according to the directions of the late act against smuggling. The man was making off to sea, to save his boat, when the soldier fired his musket, and shot him through the head. The Coroner's Jury have brought in their Verdict Willful Murder—The smugglers, it is said, had drawn their vessels, during the severity of the season, into creek and harbours about the coast, of which the revenue officers being apprised, they have made their account in seizing almost a whole smuggling navy.

At a coal pit near Manchester, on Saturday the 11th of December, as soon as the first man had got down to work, a large part of the mouth of the pit fell in and shut him up in total darkness. Every effort was tried to deliver him from this dreadful prison, but without effect, till the Saturday following, when, to the astonishment of all who saw him, he was dug out alive; but a most shocking object, worn down by fatigue in endeavouring, by incessant labour, to work his deliverance, and emaciated with hunger and thirst till he was to appearance, a living skeleton. He languished a few hours, but no means could preserve his life.

At Sparton in Cheshire, about 7 o'clock in the morning of the 2d of December, one of the large reservoirs of water belonging to Mr. Davis's cotton-mills (near two acres in extent, and about four yards deep) burst its bank, and threw the whole neighbourhood into the utmost consternation. Fortunately the water made its way through the doors and windows of the manufactory (two floors of which only gave way) or the whole pile of building must have been levelled with the ground. The water flowed in the street with irresistible impetuosity. The cellars of many houses were instantly filled, and the lower chambers of some damaged to a very great degree. The hurry and confusion of men, women, and children, endeavouring to save themselves from the rapidity of the current, can hardly be described. No lives were lost; and the whole damage is said not to amount to more than 1000l.

Letters from the Isle of Man, where the last remains of old British honesty are still supposed to reside, take notice, as a rare instance, that a house at the North end of the island had lately been robbed of 98l. but that on the inhabitants on the neighbourhood being summoned to appear, in a certain day, before a Jury of Enquiry, to clear themselves upon oath from the theft, the robbers, dreading to add perjury to the robbery, had secretly restored the money, before the day appointed, to the place whence it was taken.

At Whitehaven, in the course of last year, there were 349 christenings, 91 marriages, 401 burials. Increased in christenings 23; decreased in marriages 20; increased in burials 62.

At Carlisle there were births, males 103, females 230, in all 133; burials, 153. The births of the Dissenters are not included.

At Slifford, in the last year, there were 451 marriages, 1404 baptisms; and 1052 burials.—Increased in marriages 108; increased in baptisms 202; decreased in burials 21.

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE.

On Wednesday, the 8th of December last, the weather took a most remarkable turn in the Southern climates of Great Britain. From very mild, a gentle frost, just intense enough to break up the roads, set in from the North: it was accompanied with a fall of snow, that in less than 24 hours laid the flat country every where level as a plain, so that the most experienced stage coachmen had no certain signal to direct their way. Even the post-boys and their horses (the guides most to be depended upon) were unable in many places to proceed; and where they were daring enough to make the attempt, were obliged to remain at the first sheltering place till the roads could be made passable by the labour of men. The mail-coach from Bristol was twice in the night dug out of the snow on Marlborough downs; and, when it reached Marlborough town, the passengers were glad to stay behind, while the drivers with astonishing perseverance proceeded with the mail, and brought it in only a very few hours later than usual to the Post-office in Lombard-street. A greater interruption to business and travelling has not been felt since the general improvement of the roads by the establishment of turnpikes. For two days afterwards, the frost was intense, and the cold excessive; but though the country wore the livery of winter, the inhabitants, in comparison with those of the Northern climates, felt little of the rigours of it.

Much about the same time the winter began in Holland: before the 13th, the rivers were all covered with ice and snow; and in France the Seine was frozen over so early as November.

On Thursday, the 25th of November, the hotel of Prince Strembergh at Brussels took fire; and there being no water to be procured for more than two hours, the upper part of the hotel was by that time all in flames, which being increased by 130 measures of wood just laid in, every effort made to extinguish them proved ineffectual. Nothing remains but the bare walls. The Monks exerted themselves, but the common people seemed rather indolent.

On the 20th of December, in the dead of night, a fire broke out in the hotel de Thoulouze at Paris, which lasted near four hours, and was not got under till the whole angle of the left wing was burnt to the ground. The linen wardrobe, the collection of medals (the rarest perhaps in Europe), and part of the library, fell a prey to the fury of the flames. The chapel, vestry-room, and all the riches they contained, were likewise reduced to ashes. The loss is estimated at 360,000 livres. It was occasioned by the servants over-heating the stoves. The Duke and the Princess de Lamballe were in the house that day, and his Highness with great presence of mind gave the necessary orders for extinguishing the flames. His Highness, who joins to his other virtues a profound piety, was next day seen at his church, rendering thanks to the Almighty, for his mercy that the whole building was not consumed.

During the month of December, the Elector of Saxony had a very narrow escape for his life. While he was engaged in the chase, he had taken a bye-road, which led to some frightful precipices. Fortunately two women, who were at work in the woods, apprized his Highness of his mistake; and on taking a view of the country, he was struck with horror at the danger he had escaped. After rewarding his deliverers, he returned as directed by the women, and fortunately joined his associates without hurt.

There is now at Paris (if their prints can be believed) a wild man, lately caught in the woods of America 200 miles beyond the Lakes. He was taken, as the story goes, by a party of Indians, who had often seen him, but being swift of foot they never could come up with him. At length he was discovered asleep, and then they surprized and bound him; he is said to be near 7 feet high—but 'tis added, that half a bear was found by him! The wild men hitherto found were not carnivorous. Man in his natural state is not armed to attack a bear.

A young African Prince has likewise been lately brought over, and introduced at the Court of Versailles, probably with a view to give a turn to the coffee-house conversation in the city of Paris. He is allowed 1000 Louis d'ors a year during his stay, and is said to be son to the King of Dogria, a country united to the kingdom of Benin, and watered by the river Formosa, which runs under the Line. His father's subjects amount to upwards of four millions, and his army consists of 80,000 negroes, and upon the whole his people seem to have more civilized ideas than their neighbours. Indigo may be easily cultivated in those parts, and become a trade of consequence, as it grows wild in many districts of that kingdom.—If his father is so great, why pension the son?

The Edict for the new Loan in France, though it has been registered, and in part subscribed, yet a great deficiency is like to ensue from the tinesse of those who had the distribution of it. It creates a loan of 125 millions of livres in 125,000 bills of 10000 livres each, bearing an interest of 5 per cent. and reimbursible in 25 years with increase of capital. At first it went at $4\frac{1}{2}$ and 5 per cent. above par. but has since sunk considerably, and it is supposed will soon be below par. as the money'd people have discovered, that too large a proportion hath been given through favour to those who have not money to pay for it.

DOMESTIC OCCURENCES.

Dec 11.

Came on before the Chief Baron of the Exchequer and a London Jury, a second cause,

cause, wherein Capt. Sutton of the Iris (see Vol. LI. p. 617) was plaintiff, and Commodore Johnstone, defendant. The plaintiff on the former trial having obtained a verdict for 5000*l.* the defendant moved for a new trial on a plea which was deemed valid by the judges. A new trial was granted. And Mr. Erskine went over the same ground he had done before, by establishing the conduct of Capt. Sutton on the day of action at Port Praya; though, as he observed, a very material witness (Lieut. Bruce) was absent, who had appeared on the former trial, whose place, however, was supplied by Lieut. Read. This officer's evidence was of more weight by being compared with that given by Lieut. Bruce on the former trial, the judge having referred to his notes for that purpose; both tended to prove, that previous to the action, the Iris had the misfortune to lose her top-sail; that by this accident the working of the ship was materially retarded, and her progress was impeded; that the first accident was soon followed by a still worse, namely, her foretop-mast being carried away; that in consequence the Iris unavoidably fell astern of the Romney (the commodore's ship) about a mile or more; that, notwithstanding these accidents, every possible exertion was used on the part of Capt. Sutton, who in the evening was not more than two cables length and a half at most from the Romney in a line edging down towards the enemy; that the mainmast was likewise wounded; that no blame was cast on Capt. Sutton from the 17th of April, 1781, the day of action, till the 22d elapsed, when Capt. Lumley was sent on board; and that if the Captain's conduct had been thought reprehensible, there were opportunities enough to have called a court martial.

These facts being established, the jury awarded an additional 1000*l.* to the former verdict.

Dec. 16.

At a court of Common Council holden at Guildhall, the bill for raising 2000*l.* on the inhabitants of London, towards the orphans fund passed into an act.

Dec. 23.

The drawing of the lottery ended, when No 30,791 was drawn a prize of 20*l.* and as last drawn was entitled to 1000*l.*

Dec. 31.

It was reported, but on what authority we know not, that a waiter at one of the gaming houses in St. James's-street, got in Christmas-boxes, from the members of the established clubs above 500*l.* A nobleman, who in the course of the week had won 80,000*l.* gave him 100*l.* of his winnings. Early one evening he peer lost all his money, and, as it is not unusual, borrowed a sum from the waiter to begin again, and, as has been said, afterwards won the above sum—This story, whether true or false, should awaken the attention of the legislature, in order to preserve from absolute ruin young men of fortune, who set no bounds to their extravagance at play. Whoever could be proved to have won above a certain sum in any one year, should forfeit double to the crown. This perhaps might be one mode of putting a stop to ruinous gambling among the great.

A gentleman and his wife in Cheapside, being without a servant, requested an acquaintance to let their daughter, a young girl of 16, be with them till they could provide themselves. The gentleman having occasion to stay out late, the girl was left to sit up for him, who unfortunately falling asleep, some of her cloaths took fire. Awakened by the flames, she strove in vain to extinguish them. In her fright she ran up to her mistress's room-door, who, terrified by her shrieks, rose and opened it, but, seeing the girl in flames, suddenly shut it again. Some other people in the house, hearing her, hastened to her assistance. The fire had scorched her in so dreadful a manner before it could be extinguished, that she languished five days, and then expired.

Saturday, Jan. 2.

Being New-year's-day, their Majesties and several of the Royal Family, came from Buckingham-house to St. James's, and were present at the performance of the Ode (see p. 53), as was the Prince of Wales; afterwards they attended the court and drawing-room, at which were present many of the Nobility, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and several Bishops, and most of the foreign Ambassadors, who came to pay their compliments to their Majesties, on account of the new-year. The fashion of the Court was poppy-coloured satin waists and trains: their heads ornamented with poppy-coloured ribbons and flowers.

Wednesday 5.

Was executed George Owen, convicted of forging and publishing an order upon the Assay-office with intent to obtain several pair of silver-buckles sent there to be marked according to the late Act of Parliament. He was to have been executed with the other prisoners the Wednesday before; but respited only, as it should seem, to increase his sufferings. He was a young man of some expectations; and by the death of his father entitled to an estate of 50*l.* a year, and a considerable sum of money. He expected a reprieve to the last, and in that hope was indulged, by the humanity of the sheriffs, with a longer time than usual for prayer.

Friday 7.

The wind being N. N. W. very moderate, and the sky clear, Mr. Blanchard, accompanied by Dr. Jeffries, took his departure for the Continent in his balloon, from the Castle at Dover. Nine bags of ballast; the French edition of Mt. Blanchard's Voyage with Mr. Sheldon; a large inflated bladder, containing a number of letters from people people of distinction in this country to several of the French nobility; a compass, and some philosophical instruments; a small bottle of brandy; two beautiful silk ensigns, English and French; a few biscuits; and two cork jackets; made the whole of their cargo. The ascended at 13 minutes past one, close to the large gun (well known by the name of Queen Anne's Pocket Pistol). Mr Blanchard kept the balloon in exact equilibrium for a considerable time. The greatest silence reigned among the numerous concourse of spectators, until Mr. Blanchard had got so far from the cliff as to be over the sea: he stood erect in the car, and saluted the spectators most gracefully, by bowing, taking off his hat, and waving his ensign. He was then cheered by the loudest acclamations.—A more particular account of their departure, with a sketch of their balloon, in our next.

Saturday 8.

Dr. Jeffries appears to have written the following letters to his friends in England, which has since appeared in all the papers.

"Calais, Jan. 8, 1785.

"Heaven has crowned my utmost wishes with success; I cannot describe to you the magnificence and beauty of our voyage. When about mid-channel, and at high elevation, we had such a prospect of the country as surpasses my descriptive faculties; when two-thirds over, we had expended the whole of our ballast. At about five or six miles from the French coast we were again falling rapidly towards the sea, on which occasion my noble little captain gave orders, and set the example, by beginning to strip our aerial car, first of our silk and finery: this not giving us sufficient release, we cast one wing, then the other; after which I was obliged to unscrew and cast away our moulinet; yet still approaching the sea very fast, and the boats being much alarmed for us, we cast away, first one anchor, then another, after which my little hero stripped, and threw away his great coat. On this I was compelled to follow his example. He next cast away his trowsers. We put on our cork jackets, and luckily at this instant we found the mercury beginning to fall in the barometer, and we soon ascended much higher than ever before, and made a most beautiful and lofty entré into France exactly at three o'clock. We entered rising, and to such a height, that the arc we described brought us down just twelve miles into the country, when we descended most tranquilly into the midst of the forest De Falmores, almost as naked as the trees, not an inch of cord or rope left, no anchor or any thing to help us, nor a being within several miles. My good little captain begged for all my exertion to stop at the top of the first tree I could reach. I succeeded beyond my comprehension; and you would have laughed to see us, each without a coat of any sort, Mr. Blanchard assisting at the valve, and I holding at the top of a lofty tree, and the balloon playing to and fro over us, holding almost too severe a contest for my arms. It took exactly twenty-eight minutes to let out air enough to relieve the balloon without injury. We soon heard the wood surrounded by footmen, horsemen, &c. and received every possible assistance from them. I was soon well mounted, and had a fine gallop of seven miles. We were invited to the chateau or seat of Monsieur de Sandrouin, where we received every polite attention, and were led through a noble suite of apartments, to partake of an elegant refreshment, &c. and at nine sent away in an elegant chariot and six horses, but under a promise that we would call at the chateau of M. Brounot at Ardingham, where we stayed about an hour, and then set off again as before towards Calais, where we arrived between one and two this morning. I was surprised to find the difficulties of access; five very strong gates, bridges, &c. the guards very vigilant, but had all orders to let us pass, the commandant having set up for us. We visited him, and were very politely received; but the attentions of M. Mouron and his family exceeded all description. This morning the mayor, governor, commandant, and officers, in a body, the king's attorney-general, &c. have been to pay us a congratulatory visit, and we have been complimented, as they compliment the king alone, by sending us the wine of the city.—A patent is now making out to make my captain a citizen of Calais. We are receiving honours and attention much above our merit." (See p. 67).

Mr. Blanchard's letter from the same place.

"We arrived here safe and well, and are at this moment with Mr. Mouron, to whose house we came last night. At the instant of my writing to you, the magistrates are busy in preparing me a patent to make me a citizen of Calais. To this singular honour, they have added that of sending me the wine of the city, a compliment paid only to Royalty, and inviting me to a public dinner. I cannot express my feelings on these marks of favour, which honour me far more highly than my feeble efforts have deserved.

"M. le Commandant, who had so politely attended our arrival, and made the gates of the city to be opened to us, has behaved in a manner not less flattering. They drew out their cannon to salute us immediately on our appearing above the French coast; and I can scarcely finish this billet, so eager are they to felicitate me on an event which has doubtless been attended with much danger; for we were two hours on the sea, and had never reached hither but by stripping ourselves of all our cloaths. By the next post I will give you a more exact and circumstantial detail. I am, &c.

"BLANCHARD."

Monday 10.

This day Lieut. Gen. Haldimand, Governor

nor and Commander in Chief of the province of Quebec, arrived at his house in May-Fair, and has been since introduced to his Majesty.

Wednesday 13.

The Sessions began at the Old Bailey, when Edward Payne, one of the fresh-water pirates, who robbed the ship Elbe (see vol. LIV. p. 791) of dollars, to the number of 10,000, was capitally convicted.

Thursday 14.

The purser of the Ganges E. Indiaman, Capt. Dempster, came to the East-India-house with the agreeable news of the arrival of the above ship off Cape Clear in Ireland, but in want of cables, &c.

Monday 17.

The sessions ended at the Old Bailey, when eleven convicts received sentence of death for various crimes.—Mr. Rose, in the absence of the Recorder, officiated, and was very pathetic and solemn, in pronouncing the dreadful, but necessary, sentence of the law.

Tuesday 18.

Being appointed for the annual celebration of her Majesty's birth-day, their Majesties, the Princess Royal, Princesses Elizabeth and Augusta, with Prince Edward, and several others of the royal children went to St. James's, to receive the compliments of the nobility. At noon the Park and Tower guns were fired; and a brillianter appearance of the great officers of state, foreign ministers, nobility and persons of distinction, attended the drawing-room than has been known on the like occasion for some years. His Majesty appeared in a scarlet coat, elegantly embroidered with gold. His star, George, and epaulet, were diamonds uncommonly rich. Her Majesty wore a plain Conquetot satin, trimmed with a rich point lace; her head-dress without diamonds. In the evening there was a splendid ball. The general court dress was rich fancy satins, and the new manufacture of Irish tabbinets and poplins elegantly trimmed. The gentlemen dressed mostly in velvet, but several appeared in plain and corded tabbinets. At night there were illuminations.

The Medical Society of London held their annual meeting, as usual, in honour of her Majesty's birth-day. The oration was delivered by Dr. Ralph, and, after choosing their president and officers for the year ensuing, the Society dined together at the Devil Tavern, Temple-bar.

Wednesday 19.

A balloon was this day launched from Ranelagh Gardens, Dublin, in which Mr. Crosbie was the only traveller. An incredible number of spectators attended his ascent, which at first was slow, perpendicular, and majestic; but soon began to rise with astonishing velocity, insomuch that in three minutes and a half he was out of sight. He was for some time enveloped in clouds, and the first object he saw, when disengaged, was the light-house in the harbour, a little above which he found himself crossing. Being totally unprepared for crossing the Channel to England, he had presence of mind instantly to open the valve, by which a sufficient quantity of air was soon evaporated, and he came to the ground by an easy descent on the Strand of Clontarf. This hair-breadth escape spread universal joy among as numerous a multitude of spectators as ever assembled together in that kingdom on any occasion, having all given him over for lost. Had it been high-water, he must inevitably have perished.

Thursday 20.

The Lords of the Treasury have sent orders to the Commissioners of Customs, to enquire into the particulars of the illicit conveyance of sheep and wool to the coast of France. This is preparatory to a bill to be brought in this session, for effectually putting a stop to this injurious practice.

This day his grace the Duke of Rutland opened the session of the Irish Parliament, with a most conciliating speech from the throne, which produced unanimous and loyal addresses from both Houses of Parliament, almost without debate.

Saturday 22.

In this day's Gazette there has appeared a most loyal and animated address from the gentlemen, clergy, freemen, and freeholders of the city of Dublin to his Majesty, in which they declare their rooted abhorrence of every attempt to create unjust and dangerous discontents, tending to subvert the constitution in church and state; they reject with indignation the interference of any body of men unknown to the laws and constitution; and they cherish a firm and unchangeable attachment to the connection with their sister kingdom, as the great bond of mutual strength and safety. This address was signed by 21 peers and 1121 commoners, &c.

Tuesday 25.

The Prince of Wales attended the House of Lords, as a private peer. He was seated in the row below the Earls, and by the side of Lord Mount Stuart.

The Earl of Galloway officiated as Lord High Chamberlain of Great Britain in the room of Sir Peter Burrell who is abroad. In that capacity he assisted at the introduction of the two new Marquisses into the House of Peers. He carried a white rod in his hand, and over his Earls robes were his collar of the order of the Garter.

The session was opened by the following most gracious speech from the throne.

“My Lords, and Gentlemen,

“After the laborious attendance of the last session of parliament, it has given me peculiar pleasure that the situation of public affairs has admitted of so long a recess.

“Among the objects which now require consideration, I must particularly recommend to your earnest attention the adjustment of such such points in the commercial intercourse between Great Britain and Ireland as are yet finally arranged: the system which will unite both kingdoms the most closely on principles of reciprocal advantage, will, I am persuaded, best ensure the general prosperity of my dominions.

"I have the satisfaction to acquaint you, that, notwithstanding any appearance of differences on the continent, I continue uniformly to receive from all foreign powers the strongest assurances of their good disposition towards this country.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I have ordered the estimates for the ensuing year to be laid before you; I confide in your liberality and zeal to grant the necessary supplies, with a just regard, as well to the economy requisite in every department, as to the maintenance of the national credit, and the real exigences of the public service.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"The success which has attended the measures taken in the last session towards the suppression of smuggling, and for the improvement of the revenue, will encourage you to apply yourselves with continued assiduity to those important objects. You will, I trust, also take into early consideration the matters suggested in the reports of the commissioners of public accounts, and such further regulations as may appear to be necessary in the different offices of the kingdom.

"I have the fullest reliance on the continuance of your faithful and diligent exertions in every part of your public duty. You may at all times depend on my hearty concurrence in every measure which can tend to alleviate our national burthens, to secure the true principles of the constitution, and to promote the general welfare of my people."

His Majesty having withdrawn, the Lord Chancellor informed the house that Henry Cowper, Esq. had been nominated as Clerk Assistant, in the room of Samuel Strutt, Esq. deceased, and wished to know if the house approved of his appointment: which being agreed to,

Earl Temple took his seat as Marquis of Buckingham, as did the Earl of Shelburne as Marquis of Lansdown.

The Lord Chancellor then read the speech, and the Duke of Hamilton moved the address, which was seconded by Lord Walsingham, and carried without opposition. It was, as usual, an echo of the speech.

In the House of Commons, the King's speech being twice read by the Speaker;

Mr Phillips rose, and after a short but elegant speech, expressive of his feelings on the tender regard shewn by his Majesty for the common interest and happiness of all his subjects, he concluded, with moving, that an humble address be presented to his Majesty, which motion was seconded by

GENT. MAG. January, 1785.

Mr. Edwards, who frankly acknowledged that, independent of any other consideration, his attachment to the present ministers and their measures was a sufficient inducement for him to pay every tribute of praise to the best of Kings, for taking into his confidence men capable of conducting the public business, and of uniting in one common bond of interest two sister kingdoms, whose prosperity so much depended, not on their professions, but on the principles of mutual trust and confidence in each other's friendship. He was happy, he said, to see men at the head of affairs, who had the address to secure the good-will of contending nations, without taking any part in their quarrels; and he congratulated the House on the fair prospect of peace before us, which would enable the minister, by wise and virtuous measures, to restore public credit, and to lighten the heavy burdens of the people.

Lord Surrey owned, that, by the tenor of the speech, there was a possibility of supposing a supply for the present year unnecessary, and by consequence the people eased of their burdens; but he was too well acquainted with the necessities of Government to give credit to any such idea. He could not therefore assent to the motion, as in the whole course of his parliamentary experience, he had never read a speech so remarkably deficient and excentric. The material points to have been touched, namely, the reform of the representation—the right of trial by jury—the military establishment—but not a word of these in this matchless composition.

Mr. Pitt defended the speech.

Lord North declared his willingness to consent to the motion; but perfectly agreed with the noble Lord [Surrey], as to the excentricity and deficiency of the speech.

Mr. Burke diverted the House with his usual flow of satirical irony, on the merits of this favourite composition; and then, with a transition that was natural to him, applied the asperity of his remark to the ruinous state of our East Indian possessions.

Mr. Fox inveighed against the violation of the constitution, in the measures that had been pursued in Ireland, by the attachments from the King's Bench against the sheriffs, who had acquiesced in the legal and constitutional exercise of their duty.

Mr. Pitt, in answer to Mr. Burke, wondered not to hear the Right Hon. member exclaim against the shortness of the speech. He was a friend to long speeches.

He was replied to by the three preceding speakers.

And the address was agreed to, una voce.

Monday 31.

Dispatches were brought to Lord Sidney's office, from Lord Torrington at Brussels, which mention that preliminaries of peace had been agreed on between the Emperor and the Dutch, which will soon be made public.

DEATHS.

LATELY, at Bath, aged near 50; Langhorne Burton, of Enderby, co. Linc. esq; He was educated at Trinity College, Camb. and from thence removed to one of the inns of court; but not pursuing the law as a profession, he resided chiefly upon his estate at Enderby, where he acted in the commission of the peace with such ability, temper, and impartiality, as will make his death severely felt in that neighbourhood. To his high character as a magistrate (for which useful office few persons were better qualified) may be added his liberality to the poor, in which he was eminently conspicuous. He had been for some years severely afflicted with the gout, of which disorder he died in December last; soon after his arrival at Bath. He married Miss Walker, a lady of fortune, by whom he has left no issue.

At Harford, co. Hunt. in an advanced age; John Squire, esq.

At Culworth, co. Northampt. in her 75th year, Lady D'Anvers.

At Addington, co. Bucks, aged 94, Mrs. Philips, mother of Mr. P. coroner of Middx.

At Finnington Farm, co. Somerset, aged 82, Mr. Francis Morris, a wealthy farmer, and father of J. A. M. esq.

John Benson, esq; treasurer to the county of Middlesex.

William Pym, esq; of Little Wymondley, co. Herts, a lineal descendant from the celebrated Patriot.

Mr. Kennedy, huntsman to his Majesty.

At Beachworth, Surrey, in his 63d year, the rev. John Allen, M. A. vice-principal of Magdalen-hall, Oxford. He may be said to have lived almost his whole life in the University. He was for many years under-librarian of the Bodleian library; afterwards tutor, and vice-principal, of Magdalen-hall. By his attendance at the library, he gratified his appetite for reading, and looked into as many books as most men of his time: but he never wrote nor published any thing but a few Sermons. He was inducted into a college living, but obtained no higher preferment. But, though he never rose to a prebendal stall, he enjoyed what was in his possession, which was more than a competency, with great thankfulness of heart. His residence at Oxford, which was only interrupted, by being a private tutor in Berkshire for some time, occasioned his frequently serving the office of pro-rector. Whilst in that station, he made a Latin speech, in which language he was a master, in the Theatre, on his presenting the King of Denmark to the degree of Doctor of Laws. He always mentioned this honourable, though little, circumstance with pleasure, for he was a friend to kings. He was deeply read in civil and ecclesiastical history, and in polemical divinity. If he was a low-churchman in politics, in religious affairs he was thoroughly episcopal, and even an Athanasian. He was very very convivial; his conversation entertaining and instructive; interdum non inficatus. His moral character was unimpeached. His parts were rather useful than brilliant, and he was fitted for a station that demands learning, patience, and steadiness. He went to take his leave of the University, and of his Hall, before he died; and on his return into the country, in an irrecoverable illness, he quitted the mortal scene, where, to the satisfaction of himself, his relations, and his acquaintance, he had performed his part as well as most men. He was never married: a mode of life that would have come too soon to him in his youth, and in the decline of life is almost always too late.

At Newington-Butts, after a long and severe illness, Mr. John Wimberley.

At Reading, Mr. Dancy, master of the Blue Posts, Russell street, Covent-Garden: He was walking in Reading church-yard with his son, a child of four years old, and suddenly dropped down dead. His father and mother died within three days of each other, about a year ago, at his house in Russell-street.

Near Maudstone, in his 74th year, Mr. Gen. Turner. He had buried four wives, by all of whom he had issue, and was the reputed father of 47 children.

At Gellyhyr, Glamorg. Joseph Pryce, esq.

At Whiddon-park, Devonshire, John Bailey, esq. By this gentleman's death, one of the Honiton petitions to Parliament, for an undue election there, drops; but the borough petition is to be presented, at the request of 140 voters who stood forth in his favour.

At Sarr-castle, Ireland, the lady of Lord Massey.

At Doncaster, aged 75, Mrs. Delabone, relict of the late H. D. esq; of York, and sister to Sir Robert Burdett, bart.

At Yarm, aged 74, Mrs. C. Leighton.

At Peterborough, Mrs. Amey Forster, youngest daughter of John Forster, esq; formerly of that place, and brother of John Forster, D.D. rector of Elton, co. Huntingdon. Notwithstanding she had the misfortune to be deaf from her cradle, she had learned to read, to write perfectly well, and to converse familiarly with her acquaintance.

In the beginning of Oct. last, at Rome, the Marchioness of Accorambani, sister to Sir William Murray, of Polmaise, in Scotland.

At Annapolis, Maryland, after a long indisposition, Sir Robert Eden, bart. governor of that State previous to the late revolution.

Oct. 14. At Montreal, in Canada, Lieut. Piers Welsh, of the 29th reg. of foot.

Nov. 7. This morning the body of Capt. Richard, commander of the British packet Reebuck, was discovered in the water, at New York, opposite to where his ship was moored. No marks of violence whatever appearing upon him, it was concluded by the coroner's inquest that he had met an accidental death. His numerous social and moral virtues had so endeared him to the inhabitants of that city, that each individual appeared emulous to shew every mark of respect to his memory. The different British, Irish, and American ships paid him due nautical honours, and his remains were followed by a very great concourse of citizens.

27. Rev. Mr. Spiter, of Reading, an old and valuable correspondent to our Magazine.

Dec. 10. At East Malling, Kent, aged 78, Tho. Hartley, M.A. R. of Winwick, Northamptonsh. author of many excellent discourses, a treatise on the Millennium, &c. He was a person of rare natural endowments, and employed them in that best of purposes, the promotion of real internal piety: preferring this to all forms and names amongst men, he sought out the sincere lovers of it, under the different religious distinctions, to be his friends and companions. His faith was not a dead or imaginary faith, for he shewed it by his works. In his conversation and deportment he was humble and devout, abounding in love; of charitable sentiments towards others; inoffensive as a child; instructive as the man of wisdom. Beyond a moderate supply of his necessities, he only esteemed this world's goods as the means of a generous beneficence, which he constantly practised. His life adorned his doctrine, and who can doubt but that the end of such a life is blessed? He translated into English the writings of Baron Swedenborg, with whom he had been acquainted, and of whom he was a great admirer.

14. At Mansfield, aged 76, Mr. Charles Thompson, who was one of the factors of the company of merchants of London trading through Russia into Persia, at the time when the factory at Reft, in the province of Gilan in Persia, was pillaged of goods to the value of 80,000*l.* by one of the pretenders to the throne after the death of Nadir Shah in 1747, and that trade thereby totally annihilated. Since his return home, he has lived many years at Mansfield. His remains, agreeably to his own desire, were deposited on Nottingham forest, about two miles from Mansfield, near the road leading to Southwell, in a grave six yards deep, which is to be walled round, and encircled with palisades. Over his head there will be a rose tree planted, and at his feet a laurel tree. He has bequeathed 100*l.* to the General Hospital near Nottingham; 10*l.* each to ten clubs at Mansfield; the interest of 500*l.* for the benefit of the poor of that town, 4*l.* each yearly; and to several indigent relations the sum of 100*l.*

18. At Honiton, Yorkshire, aged 108 years, Mrs. Margaret Scurral.

22. After a short illness, the rev. Joseph Bridges, M. A. sub-chauher of York cathedral, and V. of St. Martin's, Coney-street.

24. Sir Samuel Burford, knr. some time since a vice-consul in Italy.

25. At Vauxhall, Mrs. Aston, wife of J. A. esq.

26. In Marsham-street, Westminster, Mr. Four

Farnborough, formerly merchant in New Engl.
27. In Queen sq. Westminster, in her 90th year, Mrs. Cracherode, mother of the rev. Mr. C.

. At Hackney, Mr. David de Castro, forty-one years head reader to the Portuguese Jew synagogue in Bevis-Marks.

At Chelsea, much regretted, of a cancer in his mouth, Edward Wynne, esq; barrister at law, eldest son of the late Serjeant Wynne. This gentleman's knowledge and proficiency in polite literature could only be exceeded by his charity and benevolence. He printed (without his name), but did not publish, "A miscellany, containing several law tracts," 8vo. 1765; viz. 1. "Observations on Fitzherbert's Natura Breuium, with an introduction concerning writs, and a dissertation on the writ De non procedis in Affixis Juratis, and on the writ De Leproso amovendo." 2. "An inquiry concerning the reason of the distinction the law has made in cases between things annexed to the freehold, and things severed from it." 3. "Argument in behalf of unlimited extension of collateral consanguinity, with extracts from the statutes on which the question arose." 4. "Account of the trial of the Pix. Observations on the nature and antiquity of the court of claims." 5. "An answer to two passages in the Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors." 6. "Observations on the antiquity and dignity of the degree of Serjeant at Law."—The two last were by his father, who, in the former, refuted an aspersion cast on his character by Mr. Walpole (see Astlebury's "Epistolary Correspondence," vol. I p. 181.) Mr. W. published (anonymously also), "Eunomus, or dialogues concerning the law and constitution of England. With an essay on dialogue," 4 vols. 8vo. 1774. In this elegant and truly Ciceronian work, Mr. W. with great learning and ingenuity, supported the immense and complicated fabric of the laws of his country. Dying a bachelor, his estates, together with his house at Chelsea, and his very valuable library, collected chiefly by his father and himself, devolve to his brother, the rev. Lutwell Wynne, of All Souls college, Oxford.

28. Aged 78 years, Dr. John Pearce. He was formerly many years an eminent apothecary in Corbet-court, Grace-church-street, but since retired to Stoke Newington, where he took his degree, and practised with general satisfaction amongst his neighbours and his friends, till the death of his wife, soon after which he returned to London, where he lived to the time of his death with his son, an eminent attorney in Cretched-friars. His religious persuasion was that of a dissenter to the forms, though not to the principles, of the church of England—his leisure was occupied in the most liberal researches into the truths of religion, of philosophy, and medicine, and he embellished all these with the culture of polite literature—these pursuits influenced all his conduct, and endeared him as a husband, a father, a friend, and a man—all were his friends, for he lived without enemies—his life was happy, for he lived without guile; and his death was lovely, for a gentle sigh was his angelic harbinger to eternal felicity.

29. In his 89th year, at South [Windsor, Essex, the right hon. Sir Tho. Parker. He was admitted of the Middle Temple, May 3, 1718, and called to the bar, in that society, June 19, 1724; on May 17, 1736, he received his majesty's writ, commanding him to take upon him the degree of serjeant at-law, and was sworn at the chancery bar June 4, and the same day a patent was sealed, and he was sworn king's serjeant before Lord Chancellor Talbot. On July 7, 1738, a patent was sealed, constituting him one of the barons of the court of exchequer, into which office he was sworn before his great patron and friend Lord Chancellor Hardwicke. On April 21, 1740, a patent was sealed, constituting him one of the justices of the court of common pleas. On November 27, 1742, he received the honour of knighthood, and on the 29th of the same month a patent was sealed constituting him lord chief baron of the court of exchequer. On the 21st of January, 1768, his patent being renewed, he was again sworn into the lord chief baron's office, where he presided longer than any of his predecessors had ever done. He resigned his high office in November, 1772, full of years, integrity, and honour. And, as the last distinguishing mark of his sovereign's approbation and favour, for his long and faithful services, he was, on the 20th of the same month, sworn one of his majesty's most honourable privy council. He was twice married; first, to Anne daughter and coheir of James Whitehall, esq; of Pipe Ridware, in the county of Stafford, by whom he has left two sons, Thomas Parker, esq; the present possessor of Parkhall, and George Parker, esq; of Lichfield, both in Staffordshire; secondly, he married Martha daughter and coheir of Edward Strong, esq; of Greenwich, in Kent, by whom he has left two daughters, Martha, married to Sir John Jervis, knight of the Bath; and Lætitia, to the rev. Thomas Heathcote, second son of Sir Thomas Heathcote, of Hurley-lodge, Hants, bart. Through a long and exemplary life he invariably preserved, united, and adorned the characters of a steady friend, an upright judge, and a sincere Christian. His remains were deposited in the family vault at Parkhall.

At Staplehurst, Kent, advanced in years, the rev. John Taylor, D.D. rector of that parish, in the commission of the peace for that county, and one of the proctors in convocation for the diocese of Canterbury.

In the latter end of this month, at Aix, in Provence, the rev. John Knight Taylor, fellow of New-college, Oxford, chaplain and private private secretary to Lord Chesterfield, ambassador to the court of Spain.

Jan. 1. Aged 71, Mr. Richard Hillis, who, after forty years industriously pursuing business, retired from it with honour and an excellent character. It would seem vain and ostentatious to relate the many benevolent and generous actions of the deceased; it will be only necessary to pay due attention to an authentic anecdote transmitted to us by a correspondent of character:—At one period of his life, a contemporary, for whom he had contracted an intimate friendship, became distressed in his affairs; and at a meeting of the creditors, and investigating the cause, it evidently appeared not to have originated from any fault of his own, but from his unavoidable connections with others in business. The deceased acquainted them, that he had left his friend 1000*l.* in his will; but as 1000*l.* at that moment would be of much more use than ten times the sum at his death, he begged leave to present him with two Bank notes of 500*l.* each; an action rarely to be met with in the present day.

2. At Croydon, — Purrier, esq; merchant. Peregrine Cust, esq; brother to Sir John C. Cust, the late Speaker, uncle to Lord Brownlow, and M. P. for Lichester.

Mr. Purser, attorney, in Johnson's-court, Fleet-street, and vestry-clerk of St. Dunstan's in the West.

3. Mrs. Elizabeth Mollyn, house-keeper of Hampton-court palace.

6. Mrs. Redwood, of Bromley, Kent, relict of the late Jeremiah R. esq.

7. In Welbeck-street, Cavendish-sq. of a paralytic stroke, Mrs. Frances Jeffreys, a maiden lady of fortune.

At Ealing, Mr. Wood, coal-merchant to his Majesty.

In a fit of apoplexy, Mr. Gerard, many years house steward to the Countess Dowager of Albemarle.

At Chelsea college, Mrs. Dawson, wife of Lieut. Col. Dawson, late of the Old Buffs.

8. At Hammersmith, William Freke, esq. At Cowbridge, aged 105, Mrs. Wilkins, a widow lady.

At Cumberwell, co. Wilts, after a lingering illness, the right hon. Lady Maria Coventry, second dau. of the Earl of C.

9. In Lamb's-conduit str. J. Balchen, esq. At Whitehall Lodge, Mr. Rein, porter to the water-gate there, and at St. James's.

At Newcastle-upon-Tyne, William Spark, esq; lately elected master of the Trinity-house of that port.

In Queen-square, Westminster, Humble Ward, barrister at law, and first cousin to Lord Dudley and Ward.

Mrs. Bartlett, wife of Mr. Benjamin B. F. S. A. of Lamb's Conduit-street.

Edw. Vaughan, esq; alderman of Shrewsb. 10. In his 76th year, at his house in Great Kirby-street, Hat-on-Garden, Mr. Nevil Fether, one of the worthiest-hearted men that ever existed. He was formerly an eminent sword-cutter in Great New-street, but had retired some years from business, and devoted his whole time and attention to acts of beneficence and humanity. His neighbours, both in town and at Eosfield, where he had a country-house, will have cause to regret the loss of so worthy a friend, and the necessitous will lament their benefactor.

11. At Belton, co. Linc. aged 8 years, the hon. Miss Frances Cust, eldest daughter of the right hon. Lord Brownlow, by his Lordship's second wife, Frances, sole daughter of Sir Henry Banks, knr.

13. W. Hart, esq; father of the lady of Dr. Milman.

Rev. Dr. Haddon, R. of St. Dunstan's, Stepney.

At Ickwell, co. Bedf. aged 81, Henry Fish Palmer, esq.

In Portland-street, Mrs. Wyndham, relict of the late J. W. esq; of Cromes, Norf.

14. At Goldsmiths'-hall, Edward Reynolds, esq; clerk of the arraigns for the county of Middlesex, and deputy clerk of the arraigns for the city of London, and likewise clerk to the Goldsmiths' company.

At Bath, Mrs. Gilpin, wife of R. G. esq.

15. At Tendring-hall, Suffolk, Edward, son of Adm. Rowley. His death was occasioned by the following circumstance: he went to see a lady in Jermyn street, London, in whose family was kept a little dog, which being interrupted by the child while it was feeding, flew at him, and bit his lip. His friends, having some suspicion that the dog was mad, went to Dr. Hunter, who recommended them to an eminent surgeon, who put a caustic to the lip, and applied such medical treatment as was thought necessary. A few days after, the child went on a visit to some friends at Boxford, in Suffolk, where he complained of illness and pain; a physician in the neighbourhood was sent for, but to no effect; he was seized with the hydrophobia, and died in 24 hours.

John Webb, esq; alderman of Gloucester.

17. At Hereford, rev. Thomas Russell, D. D. canon residentiary and prebendary of that cathedral, V. of Lugwardine and Brampton Brian, and Master of Ledbury hosp.

At Bath, where he went for the recovery of his health, Dr. Raitt, many years an eminent physician at Huntingdon.

In Lime-street, Mr. Thomas Stephens, late of St. Petersburg.

At Mr. Strothoff her brother-in-law's house, in Martin's-lane, Cannon-street, aged 62, Mrs. Burgess, relict of John B. esq; Hamburgh merchant, who died Oct. 12, 1767, and sister of Richard Glover, esq; author of Leonidas and other well-known poems.

18. Aged 82, Mrs. Picker, wife of Francis P. esq.

Mrs. Hartley, wife of Sam. H. esq. Tho. Wiggins, esq; M. P. for Oxchampton. George Hill, esq; one of the custodors for the

the city of London and county of Middlesex.

19. At Cecil-street coffee-house, Mr. Nichols, from Quebec.

20. In Stratford-place, the hon. Mrs. Catherine Talbot, mother to the present Earl T.

21. At his house in Bishopgate Street, in his 75th year, Beeson Long, esq. If we were to attempt a character of this gentleman, such as he deserved, the mere representation of the truth would appear like panegyric. To avoid such an imputation, we can only say, that, after a long and well-spent life, during which he endeared himself to the world and to his family, he died revered, lamented, and beloved. His splendid fortune was open, like his heart, to the most liberal contributions of charity. He was governor of several hospitals, a principal promoter of the subscription for the relief of the sufferers in the hurricane at the West Indies; and united the various and more amiable offices of a parent, a Christian, and a citizen of the world! He rose to the Elysium of future bliss, after a single sigh that seemed to breathe out his last wishes for the welfare of his country.

At Canterbury, Mrs. Gregory, wife of the rev. Mr. Gregory, a minor canon of that cathedral.

At Dunmore, Essex, aged 101, John Wigmore, esq.

Mr. Hatchett, linen-draper, Gerard-street.

22. This day, at noon, the remains of the late Mr. Wildman (see our last vol. p. 999,) who left express directions in his will that his body should not be buried till 12 days after his decease, were interred in a vault under St. James's church, Clerkenwell, in a very private manner, the corpse being followed by only one mourning-coach, in which were the rev. Mr. Sellon, Mr. and Mrs. Schreiber, and Mr. Wildman. This gentleman was the original owner of Gimcrack and Eclipse, two of the most celebrated horses that ever started.

In his 72d year, at the parsonage-house of St. Martin's, near Looe, in Cornwall, the rev. Jonathan Toup, R. of that parish, V. of St. Martin's in the same county, and prebendary of Exeter; a gentleman well known to the learned world for his Emendationes in Suidam, and other proofs of his eminent critical sagacity.

23. In Old Palace-yard, Westminster, Sam. Strott, esq; many years clerk-assistant to the House of Peers.

Matthew Stewart, D. D. emeritus professor of mathematics at Edinburgh.

26. In Abchurch-lane, Miss Gill, dau. of Ald. G.

28. Richard Bond Knight, esq; formerly of the Bank.

ECCLESIASTICAL PREFERMENTS.

REV. John Norbury, D.D. fellow of Eton college, Maple-Derham V. co. Oxford.

Rev. Dr. Heath, fellow of Eton college—both vices Thomas Barnard, dec.

Rev. H. Gretton, B. A. Springfield Bawville, co. Essex, vice C. Gretton, M.A. dec.

DISPENSATION.

Gentleman's Magazine;

For FEBRUARY, 1785.

BEING THE SECOND NUMBER OF VOL. LV. PART I.

Some Account of the late Epidemic Ague, as it appeared in the Neighbourhood of Bridgnorth in Shropshire.

TOWARDS the latter end of January 1784, several people were complaining of a violent pain in the head, with great heat of the body, but without perspiration or rigours; they were restless, and sometimes delirious; the appetite was impaired, with sickness at stomach, and costiveness; the urine was high-coloured, and without sediment; the tongue and fauces were dry and clammy, and most of them complained of thirst; the pulse was quick, but not full. These were the first symptoms of this epidemic; and, where nothing had been used for their relief, they continued with little variation for a very considerable time. Some applied to me who had been ill in this way for three weeks or more, without any remission of the symptoms: and in many cases where medicines had been used (especially the warm cardiacs usually had recourse to by the good old women), much mischief was done by increasing the fever, and every concomitant symptom. The nausea of which they complained, seemed to indicate the propriety of emetics; but these, whether employed in full or in nauseating doses, only did service where they procured evacuation by stool. They hardly ever operated by exciting sweat, nor would the most powerful diaphoretics, however employed, produce any perspiration on the skin. They evidently did hurt, by increasing the circulation, the anxiety, and the delirium; and therefore were very rarely made use of. But purging, however excited, never failed relieving the symptoms; after a few stools, the fever abated, the thirst diminished, the anxiety lessened, and the patient seemed well of his disease; indeed in some instances this evacuation alone proved a cure; and in every case where it failed of that, it always brought on a regular ague, which soon yielded to the application of the bark. In this way did the affection rage for many weeks, till at length, in the month of March for the first time, it assumed a different appearance; and then the sick were affected with regular agues. Now, the symptoms of which they complained were a violent pain in the head, sickness, cold shiverings, heats, and then sweatings, loss of appetite, and great lassitude. The rigours returned generally every second day. There were however some instances of quotidian agues, but of quartans I had hardly an example. In some few cases the symptoms of the several stages were particularly violent, as inducing coma, delirium, painful micturition, &c. The disease having acquired this regular type, it became more and more general till the month of May, when there appeared the greatest number of the diseased at one time. So general indeed was the complaint, that hardly a family in the country of whatever condition escaped it; though in the town there were comparatively but few instances of the affection. Towards the end of May there was a very evident remission; patients before affected were getting well, and there then occurred but very few instances of the complaint; but about the middle of June the disease returned, nearly with as much violence as before, and fresh patients were applying every day for relief. The disease.

ease continued in full force for about two weeks longer, when it again went off; and by the middle of July most of the affected were gotten well, at least I had hardly a patient with ague at that time.

Whether this epidemic, the history of which I have concisely delivered, really depended upon any particular constitution of the air, is a question of some consideration? I am inclined to think, that its very changeable state had very considerable influence in disposing to the formation of marsh miasma, the application of which to our bodies has been long and very justly considered as the most powerful remote cause of intermittent fevers. And from the short account of the weather now to be mentioned, it will appear that the season was such as may be presumed to be very powerful in exciting such miasmata; the large quantity of snow which remained upon the ground in every part of the country for many weeks together, sometimes going off by a thaw, then succeeded by frost, again by snow, and then by rain many times, till at length the wet prevailed all together; such causes continuing and operating, must be very powerful in exciting an unhealthy disposition of the weather; and accordingly we found its effects existed in every part of the country, on the dry gravelly and sandy soil, equally violent with situations exactly different. Many people, it is true, escaped the disease, but more particularly those (as before observed) who lived in the town, and consequently were less exposed to the contact of the air; less employed in working, riding, or walking, on the cold, wet, and damp ground; and therefore less liable to have their perspiration obstructed, or their skin constricted by the application of cold.

Of the state of the weather I am enabled to give only a general account, and my observations are confined chiefly from the 25th of December 1783; previous however to that time the air had been for many days uncommonly mild, so much so that abundance of spring flowers were in blossom in an open garden in this town*. The air on that day was uncommonly cold, especially in the morning part; but about noon there came down a large shower of snow, and the snow continued descending all that day; at the same time there was a disposition to freeze, and at night the frost was exceedingly severe. The frost continued with a very cold wind, for the most part northern, till January 8, when there was a fall of rain which continued the whole day; but at night the frost returned more severe than before, and in a few hours the streets were covered with ice. The latter frost, which was of seven weeks continuance, did not remit till February 21, in the afternoon, when there came down a very kind, gentle, and continued rain. Some small rain indeed appeared now and then through the course of the frost, but was frozen in its passage from the clouds; appearing as showers of ice rather than rain. Very few fine open days occurred, the atmosphere being for the most part thick, humid, and cloudy. And during great part of this period, the snow returned many different times, often for a whole day together, and lay in great heaps upon the ground, rendering travelling difficult and dangerous. The snow appearing at the same time with the frost, large quantities were accumulated upon trees, and in many orchards did considerable damage, the trees breaking under the weight of the frozen snow. The river Severn was frozen † over in many places, and rendered unnavigable for a long time. After this frost and snow, though they were dissolved in the most favourable manner, very large floods appeared in every part contiguous to rivers, and continued many days. The ground in every situation for a long time afterwards was very cold and wet: at the same time there was a chilly or cold air, with a N. or N. E. wind (except for a few days), without any rain, till the 10th of May, on which day the atmosphere was uncommonly warm and sultry. In the afternoon of this day, violent thunder-storms suddenly poured from the clouds, and were succeeded by very constant heavy rain, which lasted all night, and part of the following day. The weather was afterwards dry, or but very little rain appeared till the 30th of the same month, about noon, when very heavy rain again occurred, and continued during the remainder of the day. Indeed throughout the whole of the following month, rain more or less appeared almost daily, with a S. or S. W. wind; but with the beginning of July fine weather again returned, though during great part of that month we had much rain. And this must suffice for my account of the state of the weather.

MR. URBAN, Feb. 3.
THE favourable reception you gave to my hasty sketch of Dr. Johnson, the spontaneous effusions of the heart, encourages me to furnish your readers with the following additional recollections.

Yours, &c. T. T.

P. 869. l. 20. add, At the request of Mr. Cruikshank, the executors permitted his body to be opened, on the suggestion, that his internals might be uncommonly affected, which was the case on inspection. The dead may sometimes give instruction to the living. The Cirus of Xenophon ordered his breathless body to fertilize the earth that had given it nourishment. Johnson's inside had not the soundness of that of old Par, (as related by Harvey), not far from whom he is now deposited. One of his kidneys was found to be decayed. He never complained of disorder in that region (which was mortal to his friend Mr. Garrick); and probably it was not the immediate cause of his dissolution. Perhaps, "of no disease he died," like the character in the Tragedian: for who can tell wherein vitality consists? Johnson could bear, perhaps, with ambitious satisfaction, that he was to be buried in Westminster Abbey: for the love of fame is the last infirmity of noble minds; and, to continue quotation in the words of Dr. Young,

"Nor ends with life, but nods on sable
"plumes,
"Adorns our hearse, and flatters on our
"tombs."

Possibly the thought, or talk, of the incisions of anatomy would have disturbed his imagination. But in this case, what was not prohibited was permitted. For it may be easily asked, in the words of the soldier to the Ephesian Matron in Petronius,

"Id cinerem aut manes credis curare se-
"pultos?"

P. 903. col. 2. l. 54. add, It were to be wished, he had not pronounced, in his Hebridian Tour, whatever particular provocation was before him, that "a Scotchman must be a sturdy Moralist, who does not prefer Scotland to truth." An insilverent expression, in the House of Lords, on the imputed cowardice of the Americans, accelerated them into enemies and heroes. If Johnson's accusation had been more confined, a Caledonian, like Wotton's Ambassador, might have been permitted to exaggerate for the honour of his country. But it was taken for a national reflection, never to be forgiven nor forgotten: and it is considered as a breach of the union at least between Johnson and Scotland: The dead cannot send a negotiator in their cause. To say the truth, Johnson confessed at last, that the Scotch would never forgive him for publishing that book. But he never wished he had not written it.

The well-known short epigram of Cleiveland*, against our sister kingdom, is more malignant than all that Johnson has said or written.

P. 904. col. 1. l. 56. add, On hearing that this literary lady (one of the joys of his own life) was likely to be courted into matrimony a second time, Johnson set himself to prevent it, and wrote her a letter, as full of friendship as her heart was of affection; to which, or to a second letter of the objurgatory kind, it is said, she made a spirited reply. He offered, ill as he was, to travel to her to Bath, with all possible expedition, to expostulate with her, and to obtain only an hour's conversation, with the hope of dissuading her from her inclinations. "Can Love be controul'd by advice?" Hardly ever. Then, "Let Cupid and Hymen agree!" Johnson was asked about the letter in print, that is addressed to her and signed with his name (see vol. LIV. p. 900.): which occasions the present extravagance of this pen. He said, it exhibited his opinion, but had not two sentences together as he wrote them. He said, "it was an adumbration of his letter."

P. 906. col. 1. l. 7. The supposition of his having had a daughter was groundless. Mrs. Johnson never had a child after her marriage with the Doctor, nor, from her advanced age, was such an event probable.

L. 56. add, The younger Warton, by his influence, procured for him the honorary degree of Master of Arts at Oxford, on the conclusion of his Dictionary.

Col. 2. l. 55. add, He amused himself, very lately, with translating into Latin verse many of the Greek epigrams: and had read over the Expedition of Xenophon, and the Iliad of Homer. He took care to keep up all his stock of learning of all sorts, and, in the words of Queen Elizabeth, "to rummage up his old Greek."

P. 908. l. 1. r. No man was prophane, or obscene, in his company; and none

* "Had Cain been Scot, God would have chang'd his doom,
"Not forc'd him wander, but confin'd him home."

could leave his conversation without being wiser, or better.

L. 26. add, But, as he had erected a history of Seged King of Ethiopia in his Ramblers, he changed it to Abyssinia. He had formerly translated an account of those countries, written by a French Jesuit.

Col. 2. l. 16. add, It is just come to the knowledge of this Narrator, that Mr. Gerard Hamilton offered Johnson his purse of one hundred guineas (bonos erit bene quoque); but it was not accepted, "for," said Johnson*, "I am worth fifteen hundred pounds!" A sum of money that would last longer than the whole half-guinea that Parson Adams boasted was sufficient for all his charges and expences. The reader, if he is in a good humour, may not dislike the comparative allusion. Adams, for the moment, was richer than Johnson.

P. 909. l. 43. add, Mr. Potter, the elegant translator of Æschylus, has ably defended the Ode and Ode-writing of Gray against the opinion of Johnson*: so has a Scotch Professor, in an entertaining but sarcastical imitation of his language and criticism. Lyttelton, Akenfide, and Hammond, have also found friends in their defence against Johnson's accusation.

Col. 2. l. 19. add, His character for learning lifted him into so much consequence, that it occasioned several respectable writers to dedicate their works to him. This was to receive more reverence than he paid. Murphy (to whom he was obliged, as he often said, for many social happinesses) addressed to him an imitation of a satire of Boileau: and Goldsmith dedicated a Comedy to him, and praised him for what, as he explained it, Johnson would like to be praised—"his piety, and his wit."

P. 910. l. 20. Mr. Garrick used to relate an incident, with great humour, but without personal mimicry (of which perhaps he was the inventor, and the inheritance went to Foote, says the communicator, who desired it might have a place here) that made a good story as he told it. Johnson was once beset with questions, by somebody, about the merits of the tragedy of Douglas, that had just made it's public appearance. After submitting to hear some favourite descriptive passage, which the reciter praised to the skies, ignorantly or hypocritically, he was asked, if there ever had been written lines so transcendently excellent by any other poet? To get rid of the importunity, Johnson impetuously replied; "Yes, by many a man—by many a woman—and by many a child."—This answer immediately checked the enthusiasm of the querist. On reporting this decision at a table, it was asserted in company, that Johnson took an opportunity of saying this again, to a very eminent scholar at Edinburgh, whom he made an enemy by it.

This opinion of our Critic was not meant as a severity against Douglas; for he had said, "he thought it as good a first play as he had read." Gray commended it excessively. It accordingly holds it's rank at the theatre. It's merits, and the great performance of the character of Lady Randolph by Mrs. Siddons, who is above praise, bring it into frequent representation, and occasion clapping hands and weeping eyes. Johnson received, in the course of the last year, a long and agreeable visit from this actress. On his being asked afterwards, if he could not wish to compose a part in a new tragedy (Euripides and Voltaire wrote plays when they were older than Johnson) to display her powers? He replied, "Mrs. Siddons excels in the pathetic, for which I have no talent." Then, says his friend, imperial tragedy must belong to you (alluding to his Irene). Johnson smiled.

P. 911. It must be told, that a dissatisfaction was expressed in the public papers, that he was not buried with all possible funeral rites and honours. In all processions and solemnities, something will be forgotten or omitted. Here no disrespect was intended. The executors did not think themselves justified in doing more than they did. For only a little cathedral service, accompanied with lights and music, would have raised the price of interment. In this matter, fees run high: they could not be excused; and the expences were to be paid from the property of the deceased. His funeral expences amounted to more than two hundred pounds. Future monumental charges may be defrayed by the generosity of subscription: the whole cost will be more than the last mentioned sum.

P. 911. l. 18. add, The booksellers gave it out, as a piece of literary news, that he had an inclination to translate the lives of Plutarch from the Greek. It appears from his literary memorandum book, that this was one of the tasks he assigned himself. He had cut out so much for himself, that many more years of life would not have concluded these Herculean labours. The winter before he died, he talked seriously of a translation of Thuanus, as a task of no extraordinary labour. . . . It

Queries on good Materials for Roads.—Anecdote of Dr. Fothergill. '87

It was forgot to be told, that twenty years ago he gave an abstract, in the Gentlemen's Magazine, of Mr. Tytler's book, in vindication of Mary Queen of Scots, at the instigation of an old acquaintance. Probably he thought her innocent of the charge of writing the letters to Bothwell.

But he confessed, that her letting Bothwell run away with her, and the marrying him afterwards, was very profligate and indefensible. This writer cannot avoid giving the classical reader, Dryden's Virgil lying upon his table, a parallel adventure (for, says Voltaire, there are examples of every thing in this world) of Dido the queen of Carthage, who was ruined by love (as much as the desiring and the desirable Mary of Scotland), and followed her paramour Æneas into the cave, where and when, says poetical-history,

"She call'd it marriage, by that specious
"name

"To veil the crime, and sanctify the "shame."

"That the ceremonies were short, we may believe," says Dryden, "for Dido was not only amorous, but a widow."

He composed the preface to the Poems of Miss Williams, to Sully's Memoirs, to Macbean's Classical Geography, and to Adams on the Globes.

He had a large, but not a splendid library, near 5000 volumes. Many authors, not in hostility with him, presented him with their works. But his study did not contain half his books. He possessed the chair that belonged to the Ciceronian Dr. King of Oxford, which was given him by his friend Vansittart. It answers the purposes of reading and writing, by night or by day, and is as valuable in all respects as the chair of Aristotle, as delineated in the preface to Hoole's liberal translation of that poet. Since the founding of this period, intelligence is brought, that this literary chair is purchased by Mr. Hoole. Relicks are venerable things, and are only not to be worshipped. On the reading-chair of Mr. Speaker Onslow a part of this historical sketch was written. T. T.

MR. URBAN,

Feb. 9.

A S good roads are so desirable an object to every traveller; and a spirit of improving them has of late years, spread to almost every part of this kingdom; a constant reader wishes Mr. Urban to admit the following into his useful Magazine, and hopes that some intelligent correspondent, who has been conversant in these subjects, will spare so much time as to communicate his sentiments through the same channel, which, besides conferring a public benefit, will much oblige the writer.

What kind of gravel is best for maintaining a good road?

What is the usual depth laid, and whether is the barrel, or sloping form, preferable?

But as the materials nearest, though not best, are usually adopted to save expence of carriage; whether any mixture can be added to improve the inferior kinds; particularly a red soft broken shelly stone (the materials of my neighbourhood) which soon by use turns into sand, and cuts through; and which has caused this country to import stones from Wales, &c. to pave the roads, which renders the progressive improvements not only tedious, but withal expensive?

May it not be presumed the roads hitherto mended with this soft stone, have been done too slightly, or failed in some respect through want of knowing the best mode of repairing with these imperfect materials?

If any of your kind readers will take the trouble to inform the writer from his own experience, whether from these kind of stones a road can be made to answer or not, and if it can, the best method how? the hints will be most gratefully received by his and your humble servant,
H.

ANECDOTE of the late Dr. FOTHERGILL.

THE Doctor has thought much, and with no small degree of discernment, on the subject of the situation of Great Britain with respect to her Colonies. He is in his life, written by Dr. Lettsom, said to have been the author of "An English Freeholder's address to his Countrymen," and other papers to which he did not set his name in the public prints, but which were judiciously calculated to put an end to a war, which, in conjunction with Dr. Franklin, he had anxiously laboured to prevent. For in the year 1774, previous to the departure of Dr. Franklin out of this kingdom, Dr. Fothergill, together with a nobleman of great political experience, attempted a compromise with him, and endeavoured to effect a permanent reconciliation between America and Great Britain. These three persons met, and devoted many hours to deliberate on the matters of difference between the two Countries Countries. After much discussion, it was agreed that Dr. Franklin should commit to paper such a conciliatory plan, as he conceived America had a right to expect; and that the other two, as Englishmen, should then object to such claims as they might judge Great Britain ought not to grant. Seventeen propositions were drawn up; but as the 12th article of the number was insisted on by Dr. Franklin, tho' many of the others were acceded to, the negociation was broken off; and in a short time afterward Dr. Franklin embarked for America. The refusal on the part of this country to repeal the Massachusetts and Quebec acts, and to grant a free government to Canada, seems to have been the chief causes which frustrated the laudable exertions of Dr. Fothergill to preserve the reputation, the prosperity and the glory of this empire. See Monthly Review for January.

MR. URBAN,

Feb. 19.

THE anecdotes of Bp. Hoadly in p. 509 of your last volume, fully confirm what was said of him in p. 512 of that for 1774; to which I rely upon your accustomed impartiality for permission to refer the unprepossessed and the candid. Jus suum cuique.

In the Life of Archbishop Secker prefixed to his Sermons, among other academies in the country in which he received his education, particular mention is made of that "of one Mr. Jones, kept first at Gloucester, then at Tewkesbury." This slight mention of Mr. Jones appears, from p. 573, col. 2, of your volume for 1780, to have occasioned some animadversion: he is there called Samuel Jones; as he is also in p. 36, col. 2, of that for 1769. This, in all probability, is right: but if so, this Mr. Jones was not "author of the History of the Canon of Scripture," as represented in p. 595, col. 1, of your Magazine for last August; that author's Christian name being undoubtedly Jeremiah.

The palliative for suicide * in p. 877, col. 1, should not have been admitted into your Magazine. Decipit exemplar vitii imitabile. An excellent antidote was recommended in p. 607, 8, 9; in addition to which you must give me leave to claim a place for the following transcript from an evening paper some time since, containing a concise and full answer to a correspondent, who had defired some one to point out to him any passage in Scripture that forbids suicide:

"I beg leave to answer that request by desiring him to read the sixth commandment—Thou shalt do no murder. It does not say, Thou shalt not murder thy fellow-creature; but no murder. The commandment is full and express: the life, which God hath given either to our neighbours or ourselves, is not in our own power. The command might be immediately intended for restraining the hand of the murderer of another; for till of late self-murder never entered the heart of man; but the same reason, which caused this solemn protection to the life of another, must in every instance be of force to preserve our own. Give me leave just to add a lesson, delivered as from God himself: 'My Son (speaking in the person of the Creator) despise not thou the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him.' The height of cowardice and presumption are the causes of this strange action." Not to bear pain and sorrow argues weakness of mind; and to put an end to our being is presumption. Both are contrary to that fortitude which as men we ought to possess, and as Christians ought to glory in practising."

In another answer in the same paper is the following pointed passage:

"I am sorry to think that your correspondent has spent his time to so little purpose, as not to be perfectly master of the Ten Commandments; for surely if he was, he would there find all kinds of murder expressly forbidden; and what is suicide but self-murder?"

Archbishop Secker has also some very judicious observations upon this subject in his 24th Lecture on the Church Catechism. VINDELL.

A CAUTION AGAINST GOING TO LAW; BEING AN OBSERVATION OF MR. SELWYN, WHO FORMERLY STOOD FOR CHAMBERLAIN OF LONDON.

HE that would go to law, must have a good cause—a heavy purse—a skillfull attorney—an able advocate—good evidence—an intelligent jury—an upright and patient judge—and having all these, unless he has very good luck, he will stand a small chance of succeeding in his suit. S.

MR. URBAN, Burbach, Feb. 1.
I AM surprised to find no account of a monastery in Shropshire, called WHITE-LADIES*, situated near Tong Castle, the ruins of which are still considerable. From the circular arches in the church walls, and having no pillars, I conclude it to be Saxon. It is an extra-parochial place, yet the area of the church is still used as a burying-ground. On digging a grave to the depth of 5 or 6 feet, some figured quarries were brought up; having myself directed the man to go as near to the wall as possible, I succeeded by this means in procuring some that were perfect from the undisturbed floor, which now lies 6 or 7 feet from the surface, being filled up with stone and rubbish. I herewith send you a drawing of four of them (see our plate, fig. 1.), which shews the whole design. They were of various colours, green, yellow, red, &c.

I have added the representation of a triple head conjoined, cut in stone (see fig. 2.). The middle figure has strong, masculine, and warlike features, the other two are nearly similar, and express much feminine delicacy. The stone, which is a very hard grit, and the drawing on the paved quarries, are all the marks of antiquity I could collect from this place.

Fig. 3. is a very useful and portable instrument, in which the perpendicular, square, diagonal, &c. may be found; it is made of plate brass, about the thickness of a new shilling. The piece A B is a ledge of brass soldered to the flat piece exactly in the middle, and is $\frac{1}{2}$ inch of an inch broad.

Fig. 4. is a flooring brick, or quarry, $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches square, ploughed up with many more at Rodely in Leicestershire; the figures on most of them were gone. I selected the above, being perfect, and the impression very strong. It is evidently the arms of one of the Hastings; the T in the upper part might be a characteristic mark for a Knight Templar. This place is called Rodely, or Rutheley Temple, and belonged anciently to the Knights Templars. (see Burton.)

Fig. 5. is an Apostle-spoon, of the same kind as is described by Sir John

Cullam*. I purchased it at Hinckley about a year ago, and it probably belonged to the Priory. The figure is that of one of the twelve apostles: on the top is the figure of dove, that is on the hat, which cannot be seen; he holds the cross with the right hand, and a book open in the left. The figure and spoon are of the finest silver, the figure is gilt as far as the base α . On the back of the bowl are engraven the letters and date as in fig. 6. OBSERVATOR.

THE gold ring, herewith sent for your engraver to copy, was found by a ploughman in Flodden field in the summer of 1793, and is now the property of George Allan, esq. of Darlington. The thoughts of your ingenious correspondents on it are requested. (See the plate, fig. 7.)

The seal which accompanies it (fig. 8.) seems to have been a monastic seal of silver, probably belonging to some foreign abbey; but having unhappily fallen into barbaric hands, the upper part has been most absurdly and unnecessarily cut off, for the sake of examining the metal. There is reason, however, to think the piece so broken off may be still existing; if it should, the possessor cannot do better than bring it to the Printer of your Miscellany, where a little more than the value of the silver will be given for it. The figures on this seal are executed with a considerable degree of elegance for the times in which it was engraven. In the dexter compartment is a king crowned, with a sword in his right hand, on the point of which he rests, and bearing in his left a crown of thorns, in which is a cross. The king is smooth-faced, and without a beard. In the sinister compartment is a monk with a cowl on his head, and having a long bushy beard. In his hands he holds a book. The drapery of both is very good, but to what abbey it belonged is not known. The seal remains, forms the DRREGEMET.

An explanation of it

* "A Priory of White or Cistercian Nuns," at Brewood, "as old as the reign of Rich. I. or H. I. John," is mentioned by Tanner in his Notitia, p. 452. "It is still," he says, "called White Ladies, the same that is mentioned in the accounts of K. Charles II's escape from Worcester fight, being near Boscomb and the Royal Oak." Is this the same? F. P. T.

* "The Apostle spoon, formerly presented at christenings, and so called from having the figures of the apostles at their ends, are not all yet melted down. Mr. Gough has what might be called an Evangelist spoon, with the figure of St. Mark's lion on the top of the handle." Hist. of Hawkes, p. 209.

MR. URBAN, Cramond, Feb. 3.

IT would be a great improvement of your Miscellany, were every number to have a short topographical account of some parish*. This would by no means preclude the publication of large parochial descriptions in the "Bibliotheca Topographica Britannica," but would rather promote it, as a noble superstructure might be raised on the brief epitome inserted in your Magazine. I hope that my example will be followed by many, I send you a short sketch of the parish in which I reside.

The parish of Cramond lies in the counties of Edinburgh and Linlithgow; but that portion of it which is in the latter shire is not large, consisting of about 500 acres, the sole property of the Earl of Roseberry, divided from the rest of the parish by the river Almond. The parish begins two miles north west from Edinburgh, and extends to the westward four miles along the Firth of Forth. It is six miles in length from east to west, and for the most part two miles broad, but very narrow at the ends; and, if we except part of Corstorphine hill, is wholly arable. It consists of near 4000 acres, rents from 25s. to 50s. and is divided among the following proprietors, who are set down according to the extent of their valuation in the cess books:

Lady Viscountess Glenorchy.
Sir John Inglis of Cramond, Bart.
Hon. Charles Hope Weir of Craigiehall.
George Loch of Drvlaw, Esq.
Countess of Dalkeith.
Earl of Roseberry.
William Davidton of Muirhouse, Esq.
Sir Philip Ainslie of Pilton, Knt.
Baron Law of Lawriston.
Charles Watton of Laughton, Esq.
John Howison of Brachead, Esq.
Mortification of Craigcrook.
Mr. Thomas Edington.
Mr. Bayn Whytt.
Mr. Robert Spotswood.
Samu. Mitchelson, Esq. of Clermiston.

Of these families, the most ancient is the Howison of Brachead. Part of the estate was given by one of the James's, Kings of Scotland, to a labouring man of the name of Hucison, on the tenure of attending with a basin of water and a napkin at Cramond Bridge, every time the King passes. Tradition reports, that the King was hunting in the neighbourhood, and having separated from his suite, fell in with a band of gypsies, from whom he was in great danger, but was rescued by the above man, who was threshing in a barn hard-by, and ran with his flail to his Majesty's assistance. At what period this happened I cannot learn; but it must have been before 1511, for in that year I find George Hucison of Brachead a witness to a charter. The epithet of μαρτυρ was applicable to the present Laird's father; as I am told he could hold a Scotch pint stoup lengthwise between the middle finger and thumb of his hand. Arms, Argent a heart proper, on a chief Azure, three fleurs-de-lis Or.

The largest building in the parish is the house of Roydon, built 1687, by the Viscount of Tarbat, afterwards Earl of Cromarty, and now belonging to the Countess of Dalkeith. It is situated on the banks of the Forth, is of a rectangular form, with an open court in the middle, and offices at the North-west corner. The East and West sides are each 100 feet long: the North side 88; and the South, which is the principal front, and projects 4 feet on each side, is 96 feet long. Hard-by is a rude stone, erected by the late Sir James Adolphus Oughton (who resided here many years), with the following inscription:

M. S.
OSSIAN.
P. P. D.
CELT CELEBER.
I. A. O.
P.

What the meaning of P. P. D. is I know not (perhaps some of your learned correspondents may inform me); the rest is Memoria Sacrum Ossiani Celtarum celeberrimi. Jac. Adolph. Oughton posuit.

Near Lady Glenorchy's fine seat of Barnton, in a wall, is a stone of this figure (see our plate, fig. 9.) The letters are raised capitals; the surface seems to have made an acute angle with the top, and an obtuse with the bottom, but some stupid mason has chipped away all the rest of the inscription, to make it even with the wall. A groove runs the whole length of the stone just below the letters. What can this stone have been?

The Mortification of Craigcrook is an estate of 250 acres, rent 250l. per annum, which is distributed by the Presbytery of Edinburgh among poor old men and women, and orphans. It was mortumortified for that purpose by John Strachan of Craighcrook, who died about 1710.

There are three villages in this parish, Muttonhole, Over Cramond, and Nether Cramond. This last, situated at the influx of the river Almond into the Forth, contains above 300 inhabitants, and was a famous Roman naval station. Three Roman roads meet at this place, which was called by them Alaterva. I wish some of your correspondents would let me know the distances from other stations to this, as marked in the Roman itineraries, for I cannot get any of them at present. There are three islands belonging to this parish, Inchkeith, Inchmickery, and Cramond Inch. The first and second are the property of the Countess of Dalketh; the last belongs to Lady Glenorchy. The living is worth 140*l.* a year, in Lady Glenorchy's gift.

Of the Parochial Descriptions in the "Bibliotheca Topographica Britannica," the principal defect is, that they are not accompanied with such a plan of each parish as is in the History of Hinckley. For want of these, they who never were on the spot are left in disagreeable obscurity as to the particular situation of places. And the number of acres belonging to each proprietor ought always to be mentioned.

XIMENES.

MR. URBAN,

Feb. 4.

THE appearance of this coin (fig. 10.) unequivocally marks its antiquity. It is of gold, but has a considerable quantity of alloy. The letters are evidently E I S U. Camden mentions a British coin which he had seen with the letters E I S U; and on the reverse an ear of corn. He says, that British coins were neither gold nor silver, but a mixed metal, and that wheels and axes were frequently found upon them.

MR. URBAN,

Feb. 5.

I find that you do not disdain to take notice of and communicate whatever may belong to antiquity or natural history, supposing it worthy notice. Much may have been said concerning the reality and existence of what is called the road-stone. I shall make no search into the opinions concerning the matter, but proceed to assure you that I have one, which I make no doubt of being genuine, and having been really taken from the head of that creature. I believe it to be indeed an unique, and am persuaded, from some instances in my own knowledge, that it is possessed of an unfailing power in stopping and preventing any bleeding at the nose, which may resist all (either inward or outward) applications. It hath been in the possession of my family for many years, and (I have been always told) was brought from the East in the last century by a relation who had travelled much. I remember well, when young, that I was subject to most profuse and dangerous bleedings at the nose; I have worn the stone about my neck for months, during which the hemorrhage entirely ceased. Since that it has lain by entirely unthought of. Some time ago a person of credit in my parish was reduced (before I knew it) to the most dangerous and exhausted state, by a bleeding at the nose, which nothing could stop for any time: I carried her the stone I have mentioned, which she wore at the pit of her stomach, suspended by a string round her neck, for a month, during which time, and ever since (though she has now an ague, and is in a very weak condition), she has not bled a drop, or had the least tendency so to do.

The stone is of the circumference of the annexed circle, (fig. 11.) the blank (being the gold setting) is that on the lower side, with some irregular excavation; the other side has a great relief, or prominence. I hold the stone of great value, having the utmost assurance of its great efficacy, in the complaint mentioned. Should you think this worth inserting in your collection, you will do it: otherwise you will excuse the person who sends you this plain, but long account, and who is, Sir, your obedient servant, CLERICUS.

BE so good as to communicate to your readers, for explanation, a seal found at Evesham Abbey (see fig. 12); and an ancient cast in plaster of some grotesque figures (fig. 13.)

You receive a token of Morat (see p. 27.), who kept the Coffee-houses in Exchange Alley, (fig. 14), and your readers are desired to compare what is said in your last, on Coffee-houses in general, and which had been before said in vol. XLIX, p. 237. Yours, &c.

MR. URBAN,

Jan. 20.

PERMIT me, in the name of a grateful public, to return my thanks to your correspondent in the Magazine for Novem.

November last, p. 811, who signs himself 'A Country Rector,' for the care and attention he bestows upon his parish registers, and the accuracy he recommends to be observed in keeping them. Surely, Mr. Urban, there is not a more truly respectable character, I would hope in many instances not a happier being, than a parish priest, who resides among his people, and employs himself in faithfully and diligently attending to the various important duties of his station: were this more generally the case, were there fewer instances of pluralities and non-residence, I am well persuaded that our Churches would be better filled, the number of dissenters would be much smaller, and we should not hear of so many adventurers mounting the rostrum, whose principal recommendations are a moderate stock of assurance, a sonorous voice, and a copious flow of words: there is a very pleasing picture of such a parish priest as I refer to, delineated by the late Mr. Scott, in his descriptive Poem of Amwell, in the character he gives of the Rev. Thomas Hassal, vicar of that parish during the first 57 years of the last century.

With respect to what your correspondent asserts, as to the inattention of the clergy to the registers at the time of the Usurpation, I can confirm it in one instance from my own knowledge. The rector of the parish in which I live was sequestered in 1644; in looking over some extracts that I made some years ago from the registers, I find him characterized as "a very accurate, fair, and delicate writer, who made every entry "from the beginning (of his incumbency) with his own hand:" the manor and advowson, being prebendal property, were sequestered also, and the lessee of the manor, who was a colonel in the rebel army, purchased the whole, and presented a reverend doctor to the living, who held it about 12 years, and then resigned it for a better; when another rector was presented by similar authority, who held it till the Restoration, and was then obliged to surrender it to the sequestered rector, who was still living: as to the first of these two usurpers, he kept the register of baptisms till Dec. 1646, that of marriages till July 1646, and entered three burials in August and September of the same year; from this time forward, I believe, he never vouchsafed to make a single entry, except of one marriage in 1652: and as to his successor, he has not left in the register the faintest vestige of his having ever possessed the living; nor indeed have I any evidence that he did possess it, except that he is inserted in Calamy's Account of the Ejected Ministers, as having been ejected from it, that is, obliged to resign a living, to which he was not legally presented, to the legal incumbent; and his christian name not appearing in that account, I was never able to discover it: it is necessary, however, in justice to these two reverend gentlemen, to add that, though they neglected the registers, they were kept, probably by the clerk, as, in one or two instances, where a child of the first of them was baptized, it stands recorded as the child of "my Mr."

In support of your worthy correspondent's endeavours to promote the accuracy of parish registers, I have taken the pains to transcribe the following injunction, to which he refers, and which stands by way of introduction to our registers, not knowing whether it is inserted in all parish registers, and imagining that, if it is not, you may perhaps think it worthy of a place in your valuable miscellany, as it will shew the high ideas our predecessors had of the value and importance of them. Yours, &c.

MR. URBAN,

I WAS much entertained with the genuine specimens of Highland poetry, which some time since appeared in your valuable miscellany; and trust the ingenious gentleman, to whom you and your readers are so greatly obliged, is yet far from having relinquished the subject; being apt to persuade myself considerable information still remains to be given upon it, and which no person seems better qualified than your correspondent, to obtain or communicate. His sole defect seems to be an insufficient acquaintance with the Gaelic language; but even for this, it must be acknowledged, his laudable and uncommon assiduity makes ample amends. There is one object, which, though it does not seem to have called forth the attention of any of the numerous partisans of Ossian, would not, in my humble opinion, have been unworthy of it: I mean the testimonies of ancient Scottish or Irish authors. This idea occurred to me on reading the following passage in an old neglected Scottish Poet, or rhiming historian of the XIVth century.

When that the Lord of Lorne saw
His men stand of him sik aw,

That they durst not follow the chase,
Right angry in his heart he was,
And fair wondered that he should sa
Stoney thum alone but mae.
Hee said, we thinke Macmorris for me,
Right as Gowmakorne was wome,
So have from Fyngull his men yie,
Right so from as all his he,
He set example thus him like, &c.

The Booke of K. Robert Bruce, by John Barbour Archdeacon of Aberdeen.

He goes on with an allusion to the Romance of Alexander, which, with similar references to other compositions of that nature in different parts of the work, leads me to conclude that there once existed an epic poem, or romance, on the story of Fingale, of some length. Whether this extract can be elucidated by the poems of Ossian, as published by Mr. Macpherson, not having the book by me, I am unable to say. Of this nature, likewise, is the following passage from an old Scottish Poem, printed by Sir David Dalrymple, intituled, "Anc Littill Interlude of the Droichers [Dwarfs] part of the Play."

My soir grandsyr, hecht Fyn Mackeroll,
That dang the devill and gant him yowll.

And this:

My fader, mekle Gow Macmorne,
Out of his moder his wame was thorne.

But I must submit the consideration and further pursuit of this idea to such of your readers as have better opportunities of enquiring into it.

I cannot, however, conclude without expressing my hopes that Mr. Hill, before he dismisses the subject, will cause the pieces which have appeared in your Magazine, with whatever other authentic remains of the like kind he or his friends may have been fortunate enough to obtain, to be printed in a distinct volume*: since every thing else which has been published under the title of Gaelic Poetry merits little but reprobation or contempt. Yours, &c. DEIRENSIS.

MR. URBAN,

I N a letter from Dr. Samuel Knight, Prebendary of Ely, to Dr. Zachary Grey, written in May 1742, and published in Bibl. Topog. Brit. N° II, part ii. p. 191, it is mentioned, that Dr. Maddox Bp. of St. Asaph was the first Bp. that preached at the anniversary meeting of the sons of the clergy. The Dr.

* A few copies have been so printed by Mr. Hill, to distribute among his friends. EDIT.

was, however, greatly misinformed, as may be seen by attending to the following list.

Mr. Gough, in Brit. Topog. v. I. p. 766; has noticed an 8vo pamphlet, published in 1733, in which, among other articles relating to the corporation of the sons of the clergy, were inserted the names of all the preachers, &c. to that time. As that pamphlet must be very scarce, there may be many of your readers to whom the following list, imperfect as it is, may not be unacceptable. And, should you allow it a place, such of your correspondents as have it in their power will, I am inclined to hope, rectify mistakes, and supply omissions. By this mode of communication, the names of those who deserved to be recorded as benefactors to that excellent institution, will be perpetuated: it may also be a means of enabling collectors to procure copies of the sermons they want; and from the dedications, prefaces, and supplements to them, some historical facts may be discovered that are not generally known. [A few queries and hints of this kind you receive inclosed, and I wish to see answers to the former, and additions of greater importance to the latter, by those who have better opportunities of acquiring intelligence than myself.] Possibly from notes thus occasionally repolished in the Gentleman's Magazine, a regular circumstantial detail of the transactions of this charitable establishment may be at length compiled. Dr. Kennet, who preached in 1702, then suggested the expediency of proposing a reward to some industrious scholar for drawing up "an historical account of the first erecting of this society, of the several benefactions given to it, and of the manifold good services done by it;" and the corporation having now subsisted above a century, is it not become more requisite that such a work should be carried into execution?

Though a list of the preachers, since the year 1720, is inserted in the Appendix to the last sermons which have been published, I am apt to imagine, that Mr. Urban's reprinting it may not be deemed superfluous, as well because your usefully miscellany has a more extensive circulation, as that it must be convenient to have all the names collected in one publication; nor ought I to pass unnoticed its being in the Gentleman's Magazine, that, by the favour of the Rev. Mr. Conant of Sandwich, the first public information was given, to whom the widows and children of the clergy are principally indebted for the Charters of Incorporation. (See vol. LII. p. 386.) The original letters of that gentleman's great grandfather Mr. Edward Wake shew him to have been (to use his own words) "the first starter of the plan," and to have, with unremitting diligence, successfully pursued his darling project; a labour of love for which he ought to be had in lasting remembrance.

[A] Dr. Sprat's sermon was delivered at the first anniversary meeting after the grant of the charter of incorporation, which bears date July 1, 1678: there are in it many references to former meetings, and in the beginning of it their being by the blessing of God several years renewed. [It does not, however, appear, that any of the sermons before preached were published]. The expression renewed implies that there was a charitable institution of this kind before the civil war. Do any accounts of it remain? The Dr. professes himself very much in all things unequal to those who had gone before him; and says, that he was over-ruled to much out of his own order, to preach by reason of the sickness of the Rev. Prelate, who had undertaken the employment. By out of his own order, did he mean as to age, or rank and station in the Church? He was then Prebendary of Westminster, though not so styled in the title-page. The sermon is dedicated to the president, and the rest of the governors of the corporation. Dr. John Dolben, at that time B. of Rochester, and Lord Almoner (alt. abp. of York) was president. By the charter the president, as well as all other officers of the corporation, are to be elected yearly. Q. The names of the presidents and vice-presidents?

[B] In his dedication to the stewards, he observes, that 512l. had in that year been given towards the support of widows of poor ministers, and their children, besides the sums collected at the meeting for putting forth apprentices. Of the fourteen stewards, the first on the list is Ad. Henry Killigrew. Q. The son of Dr. Henry Killigrew, Prebendary of Westminster, and master of the Savoy; and the brother of Mrs. Anne Killigrew, termed, by A. Wood, "a grace for beauty, and a muse for wit?"

[C] Sir Salathiel Lovel, Recorder of London, was one of the fifteen stewards in 1692. Q. Where was his father preferred? Towards the conclusion of the Bp's discourse is a paragraph as pertinent now as it was at that time.—"Though the bounty, which worthy persons have from time to time deposited in our treasurer's hands, be very considerable, yet it is grievous to see how little falls to the share of particular supplicants, by reason of their excessive number; nor is the Parade, which makes such a noble show on these days in our streets any objection against what I have sadly observed to you; since it would be very strange if so many thousands of ministers, as our Church consists of, should not always produce a very great number, whose natural parts, and liberal education, have enabled them to improve the advantages, put into their hands by the good providence of God, to the giving at very plentiful fortunes. And, upon a just computation, I doubt not but it will be found, that there are extremely few of the sons of the clergy, whose large circumstances in the world are owing to their patrimony, in comparison of those who are enriched by the blessing of God upon their own industry."

[D] To this sermon is annexed [and, as it may be inferred from the dedication, for the first time] a faithful account of the sums distributed for fourteen years last past, viz. from 1684 inclusive. All the former sermons were preached in Bow Church; but in 1693 the meeting was removed to St. Paul's cathedral, where it has been ever since held.

[a] Sir Nathan Wrighte was one of the stewards to whom Dr. Asheton dedicated his sermon. He was at that time King's Serjeant, and in May 1700 appointed Lord Keeper of the Great Seal. His father was rector of Thurcaston, co. Leicester. The sons of the clergy can boast of the present Lord Chancellor's being also of their lineage. And reason have they to think themselves much obliged to Lord Thurlow, for not only being their steward in 1779, but for his since encouraging these anniversary meetings, by his presence, and by his generous contributions.

[r] In the appendix to this sermon is the account of the money distributed for 19 years. The lowest sum 228l. in 1685; the highest 644l. in 1696. Dr. Kenner, at p. 19, offered a hint [whether it might not be advisable] to "encourage some industrious young men, to write the lives, &c. of the sons of the English clergy; men famous in their generation, a tribe worthy to be numbered by themselves," [in some distinct memorials of them]. And, in a note, he instances 26 in the highest order of the Church [without going further back than to the memories of himself, and of his contemporaries], besides five worthy prelates then living. But, said Bp. Sprat, p. 33, "it is an evident observation, that no other one race, nor the sons of any one other profession, nor perhaps all together, are so much scattered amongst all professions, all ways of life, as the sons of clergy-men alone." He mentions, among the stewards for the succeeding year, the son of an Abp. the sons of Bps. and of other dignified clergy. Qu. Who were the stewards of the next year's meeting? And an upright Alderman of London, above the chair, being mentioned. Qu. Who he was? The stewards in 1702 are commended in the dedication for their prudent way of chusing out stewards worthy to succeed them. Qu. What was the method, and is it still followed?

[c] In his dedication he congratulates the good fortune of the year, that amongst their number there were two who had the honour to bear flags in his Majesty's navy. Qu. The names of these Admirals?

[h] Jos. Addison, Esq. was one of the stewards in 1707; as was also Fr. Atterbury, Esq. Qu. How related to Bp. Atterbury?

[i] The number of widows and children relieved, in 1712, was 424, of which twenty-six of the widows received 5l. each; two 4l. two 3l. 10s. sixty-two 3l. forty 2l. 10s. one hundred and forty-eight 2l. eighty-five 1l. 10s. and thirty-nine 1l. The whole sum distributed amounted to 969l. 10s.

[l] From the appendix it appears that, in 1724, there was living one widow of a sequestered clergyman, to whom was allowed an annuity of 7l. She must therefore have been very far advanced in life, probably not less than 100 years of age. Qu. What was her name? Seven hundred and eight widows, were then upon the list at 5l. per. annum each; thirteen other widows who by particular benefactions received 65l. and ten who had 50l. being the benefaction of Dr. Gatsford. Col. Windham, R. Millar, Esq. the Executors of Mr. Gillingham, and the Rev. Mr. Hill, are mentioned as benefactors, for sums given to put children out apprentices.

[m] Dr. Kilborn, in a note to page 18 of his Sermon, observes, that the pensioners of the corporation were then upwards of 800, but that the revenue, together with casual benefactions, would not afford more than 5l. a year to each widow.

[n] In this sermon, p. 25, is this sentence: "No doubt of it, there are some elevated seats of honour and profit in the patrimony of the Church, but what are they among so many?" And Mr. Trapp, at p. 45 of his discourse, remarks, "that, were their revenues to be equally divided, each of them, one with another, would have no more, than is commonly the annual acquiescence of a very ordinary mechanical tradesman; half of them have actually no more, and hundreds of them not a quarter so much." The impolicy of the equalizing, levelling plan, and its insufficiency to answer the specious ends proposed to result from it, were likewise noticed by Bishop Maddox in his anniversary sermon, p. 10.

[o] "It is," says Dr. Stebbing, p. 20. "worthy of your observation, that though the amount of our yearly pensions exceeds the revenues of our estates by near fifteen hundred pounds, the corporation has never yet found it necessary to shorten her hand, the good providence of God having perpetually supplied that defect by casual benefactions!"

[p] Of the collection made at the meeting in 1738, 50l. was given by the Prince of Wales, for which a deputation of the Stewards waited upon his Royal Highness, with an address of thanks.

[q] To the 6th page of the sermon, preached by the present Bp. of Chester in 1776, is subjoined the following note.

"But it may not perhaps be generally known, that there are three distinct societies formed for the benefit of the indigent widows and children of the clergy, and all closely connected with each other."

"The

"The first and principal is, The Corporation for the relief of the poor widows and children of clergymen, established by charter. The funds of this charity are employed chiefly in giving pensions to the widows of the clergy.

"The second, which arose not long after, is The society of the feast of the sons of the clergy, consisting of the company annually assembled under that name, at St. Paul's Church, and Merchant Taylors Hall. The money collected at these two places is wholly expended in apprenticing out the children of necessitous clergymen. The expences of the music and the feast are generously defrayed by the stewards of that society.

"The third is, The society of Stewards and Subscribers for maintaining and educating the poor orphans of the clergy till of age to be put apprentices.

"This society was formed in 1749. It is composed of those who have been stewards of the former society, and any others who chose to become members of it. It is supported by annual subscriptions of one guinea each, and maintains two schools, one for boys, and the other for girls."

Though the third society was so lately instituted, it appears to have been a part of the original plan of the charter, because Mr. Wake, in his letter of the 27th of June 1678, thus expresses himself, "the design promises well, and if men that have opened their mouths will not shut their purses, we shall grow rich, and have an house for 80 boys, and their master lodged." The number of children now maintained are no more than thirty-two boys, and twenty-six girls; nor has the increase of the fund latterly been so great as could be wished, or the nature of the charity seems to demand.

[2] Prince George, our present most gracious Sovereign, and his brother Prince Edward, were at the Rehearsal in 1747, and their Royal Highnesses on the following day contributed 100l. to the collection. Upon this occasion the stewards presented an address of thanks to the Prince of Wales. The Address, as also that presented in 1738, with the answers to both, are printed in the periodical publications of the respective years.

It must have been from the want of a proper application, that the society has not been honoured with a similar mark of kindness and condescension from the royal grandson, the tenderness and liberality of whose disposition are unquestionable.

[3] See some shrewd remarks on the intolerant principles in this sermon, in our vol. for 1770, p. 361. But Qu. whether it was printed? EDIT.

[4] This sermon was very remarkable, and much criticised at the time, but underwent some corrections before it was printed. EDIT.

MR. URBAN,

IN your catalogue of an evening club established by Dr. Johnson at a public-house in Essex-street, you have distinguished such members as attended the funeral of this truly great man; observing likewise, that other gentlemen of the same society, "by mistake," were not invited. On enquiry, however, I find that your information was erroneous. All who were designed by the Doctor's executors to be present at his interment were summoned by cards of special invitation. In your Magazine for December you have told the public (and truly), that one of the number, then mentioned by you, had no other introduction than that of Dr. Brockleby.

To compensate so trivial a correction in your valuable Miscellany, I enclose you a list of as many of Dr. Johnson's associates as originally met at the Turk's Head in Gerard-street, Soho; were from thence transplanted to Prince's in Sackville-street, Piccadilly; and now dine at Baxter's in Dover-street, on almost every Tuesday during the session of parliament. Their names are set down according to the order in which they appear on their books, a circumstance supposed to have been regulated by their seniority in the club. The three first are the only survivors among the original members by whom the rest were chosen. Since Mr. Garrick's funeral this association has been called (what I am told it has never called itself) THE LITERARY CLUB.

SAMUEL JOHNSON.

This club, consisting of thirty-five Members, is said to be full. Those marked with an asterisk attended the remains of Dr. Johnson to Westminster Abbey. I am, Sir,

Your most humble servant, &c.

MR. URBAN,

THE rules of the Club established by Dr. Johnson at the Essex Head (see p. 8.), in imitation of the "perpetual Club" of the Spectator, were these:

"The Club shall consist of four and twenty.

The meetings shall be on the Monday, Thursday, and Saturday of every week; but in the week before Easter there shall be no meeting.

Every Member is at liberty to introduce a Friend once a week, but not oftener.

Two Members shall oblige themselves to attend in their turn every night from 8 to 10, or to procure two to attend in their room.

Every Member present at the Club shall spend at least 6d. and every man who stays away shall forfeit 3d.

The master of the house shall keep an account of the absent members; and deliver to the President of the night a list of the forfeits incurred.

When any Member returns after absence, he shall immediately lay down his forfeits; which if he omits to do, the President shall require.

There shall be no general reckoning, but every man shall adjust his own expences.

The night of indispensable attendance will come to every member once a month. Whoever shall for 3 months together omit to attend himself, or by substitution, nor shall make any apology in the fourth month, shall be considered as having abdicated the Club.

When a vacancy is to be filled, the name of the Candidate, and of the Member recommending him, shall stand in the Club-room 3 nights. On the fourth he may be chosen by ballot; six Members, at least, being present; and two thirds of the ballot being in his favour; or the majority, should the numbers not be divisible by three.

The master of the house shall give notice, six days before, to each of those Members whose turn of necessary attendance is come.

The notice may be in these words:

"Sir,

"On the of will
"be your turn of presiding at the Essex Head. Your company is therefore earnestly requested."

One penny shall be left by each Member for the waiter."

The Club was first projected in the winter of 1783; and began to assemble regularly at the beginning of 1784, when the above regulations were agreed on, and prefaced by the following motto:

"To-day deep thoughts with me resolve
"to drench
"In mirth, which after no repenting
"draws."
MILTON.

The names you have already printed are those who were members at the time of Dr. Johnson's death, in the order in which they were entered in the book. The three last were introduced in the room of Dr. Scott, who was named, but never attended; of Mr. Tyres, who abdicated the club, Feb. 1, 1784; and of Mr. Strahan, who followed his example on the 26th of June.

ALDEBARAN.

MR. URBAN,

Feb. 5.

SINCE my last, another letter of Dr. Johnson to Mr. Cave, in 1738, has been recovered; which I now send you for insertion.

"SIR, Monday, No 6, Castle-street.

I AM to return you thanks for the present you were so kind as to send by me, and to intreat that you will be pleased to inform me by the penny-post, whether you resolve to print the Poem *. If you

you please to send it me by the post, with a note to Doddsley, I will go and read the lines to him, that we may have his consent to put his name in the title-page. As to the printing, if it can be set immediately about, I will be so much the author's friend, as not to content myself with meer solicitations in his favour. I propose, if my calculation be near the truth, to engage for the reimbursement of all that you shall lose by an impression of 500, provided, as you very generously propose, that the profit, if any, be set aside for the author's use, excepting the present you made, which, if he be a gainer, it is fit he should repay. I beg that you will let one of your servants write an exact account of the expence of such an impression, and send it with the poem, that I may know what I engage for. I am very sensible, from your generosity on this occasion, of your regard to learning, even in its unhappiest state, and cannot but think such a temper deserving of the gratitude of those who suffer so often from a contrary disposition. I am, Sir, your most humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON."

The following particulars of Johnson's early life have been communicated by the friend to whom you owe the copy of the epitaph in p. 9.

"Mrs. Johnson committed her young Goliath to the care of a poor woman, soon after his birth; and with the milk of his nursing mother he imbibed a scrophulous disorder, the effects of which were visible through life (see p. 123). Mrs. Johnson was persuaded to try the regal-touch; and (though not a superstitious woman) said, that the hand of her gracious Mitreels cured her infant. I do not know whether the piece of gold, that was given him by her Majesty, was thought worthy of being preserved by its master."

"When about 3 years old, he was master of a brood of eleven ducks, one of which he had the misfortune to destroy. Immediately after the accident, he came to his mother, and desired she would write. "Write, what am I to write?" "Write upon poor Duck." "Well then, Sam, tell me what to say." The great infant, after shaking his head for a few minutes, thus began "in numbers, for the numbers came:"

Here lies good master Duck,

Whom Samuel Johnson trod on,

If't had liv'd it had been good luck:

For then there'd been an odd line

"Dr. Swinfen, a physician of eminence, lodged with Michael Johnson, and was Sam's godfather.—When the Dr. came to us last summer, he asked me if I remembered a small stone in the body of the cathedral, with this inscription:

Here lies the body of Mrs. ELIZABETH BLANEY, a stranger.

She departed this life

2d of September, 1694.

and asked in what condition the stone was? I said, "I knew it well, but that it was broken in two by the feet of passengers; and added, that, though I had frequently made enquiry, no person could give me the least account of the said Mrs. Blaney." The Doctor said, "In the first place, put down a new and a substantial block of marble, with the same inscription as the old one had; and I will repay you whatever it may cost. Elizabeth Blaney lived at Leek, where my father was an apprentice, and fell in love with him. Upon his removal to Lichfield, she followed him, and took lodgings opposite to his house. Her passion was not unknown, but he had no inclination to return it. It, however, overcame her health; and, when my father was told that she was in danger, he went to her, and offered her his hand. She saw death approaching, and declined it. She soon after died, and my father placed the stone I enquired after over her body. Of what family she was, I never could learn.

"Some false accounts of the meanness of Michael Johnson's situation in trade have appeared in the public papers. You know that the situation of the house* rendered a stall in Lichfield market unnecessary; and to have weekly standings in the neighbouring towns was far from disreputable, considering that booksellers were at that time established only in principal places. Mr. Johnson said, they had the business of all the adjoining places, and were in excellent circumstances, till they undertook to make parchment in a building (now destroyed) near the great willow†. In this new undertaking nothing prospered; they had no sooner bought a large stock of skins, than a heavy duty was laid upon that article, and from Michael's absence by his many avocations as a bookseller, the parchment business was committed to a faithless servant, and thence they gradually declined into strait circumstances. My grandfather Hunter received as much for the education of Johnson as was paid for the children of other tradesmen.

"The Norton mentioned at the close of the epitaph in p. 9. is beyond the least doubt in Worcestershire. Vigorniensis should be substituted for Parvicensis."

The "loose piece by Floyer," which is noticed in Johnson's first letter to Cave, may be seen in Gent. Mag. 1734, p. 127. It was probably sent by Johnson himself, who not many months ago strongly pressed the communicator of the foregoing anecdotes, to give to the publick some account of the life and works of Sir John Floyer, whose learning and piety deserve recording, and concerning whom any authentic materials would be acceptable. An original portrait of him is preserved at Lichfield, and very probably will be published by subscription.

Yours, &c. J. NICHOLS.

MR. URBAN,

A Few particulars concerning Mr. Levett, on whose memory Dr. Johnson has bestowed an elegiac copy of verses*, may not be unacceptable to your readers †.

Mr. Levett, though an Englishman by birth ‡, became early in life a waiter at a coffee-house in Paris. The surgeons who frequented it, finding him of an inquisitive turn, and attentive to their conversation, made a purse for him, and gave him some instructions in their art. They afterwards furnished him with the means of other knowledge, by procuring him free admission to such lectures in pharmacy and anatomy as were read by the ablest professors of that period. Hence his introduction to a business, which afforded him a continual though slender maintenance. Where the middle part of his life was spent, is uncertain. He resided, however, above twenty years under the roof of Johnson, who never wished him to be regarded as an inferior, or treated him like a dependent §. He breakfasted with the Doctor every morning, and perhaps was seen no more by him till midnight. Much of the day was employed in attendance on his patients, who were chiefly of the lowest rank of tradesmen. The remainder of his hours he dedicated to Hunter's lectures, and to as many different opportunities of improvement as he could meet with on the same gratuitous conditions. "All his medical knowledge (said Johnson), and it is not inconsiderable*, was obtained through the ear. Though he buys books, he seldom looks into them, or discovers any power by which he can be supposed to judge of an author's merit."

Before he became a constant inmate of the Doctor's house, he married, when he was near sixty, a woman of the town, who had persuaded him (notwithstanding their place of congress was a small coalshed in Fetter-lane), that she was nearly related to a man of fortune, but was injuriously kept by him out of large possessions. It is almost needless to add that both parties were disappointed in their views.—If Levett took her for an heiress, who in time might be rich, she regarded him as a physician already in considerable practice.—Compared with the marvels of this transaction (as Johnson himself declared when relating them), the tales in the Arabian Nights' Entertainments seem familiar occurrences. Never was infant more completely duped than our hero. He had not been married four months, before a writ was taken out against him, for debts incurred by his wife.—He was secreted; and his friend then procured him a protection from a foreign minister. In a short time afterward, she ran away from him, and was tried (providentially in his opinion) for picking pockets at the Old Bailey. Her husband was with difficulty prevented from attending the court, in the hope she would be hanged. She pleaded her own cause, and was acquitted; a separation between this ill-starred couple took place; and Dr. Johnson then took Levett home, where he continued till his death, which happened suddenly, without pain, Jan. 17, 1782. His vanity in supposing that a young woman of family and fortune should be enamoured of him, Dr. Johnson thought, deserved some check.—As no relations of his were known to Dr. Johnson, he advertised for them. In the course of a few weeks an

* See it in vol. LIV. p. 695.

† This letter originally appeared in the St. James's Chronicle, but with some mistakes which are here corrected; and an original letter of Dr. Johnson's is also added.

‡ He was born at Hull, in Yorkshire.

§ Dr. Johnson has frequently observed, that Levett was indebted to him for nothing more than house-room, his share in a penny loaf at breakfast, and now and then a dinner on a Sunday.

* He had acted for many years in the capacity of surgeon and apothecary to Johnson, under the direction of the good and learned Dr. Lawrence; when he retired to Canterbury, Dr. Heberden was called in to him.

heir at law appeared, and ascertained his title to what effects the deceased had left behind him.

Levett's character was rendered valuable by repeated proof of honesty, tenderness, and gratitude to his benefactor, as well as by an unwearied diligence in his profession.—His single failing was an occasional departure from sobriety. Johnson would observe, he was perhaps the only man who ever became intoxicated through motives of prudence. He reflected, that, if he refused the gin or brandy offered him by some of his patients, he could have been no gainer by their cure, as they might have had nothing else to bestow on him. This habit of taking a fee, in whatever shape it was exhibited, could not be put off by advice or admonition of any kind. He would swallow what he did not like, nay what he knew would injure him, rather than go home with an idea that his skill had been exerted without recompence. "Had, said Johnson, all his patients maliciously combined to reward him with meat and strong liquors, instead of money, he would either have burst, like the dragon in the Apocrypha, through repletion, or have been scorched up, like Portia, by swallowing fire."—But let not from hence an imputation of rapaciousness be fixed upon him. Though he took all that was offered him, he demanded nothing from the poor, nor was known, in any instance, to have enforced the payment of even what was justly his due.

His person was middle-sized and thin; his visage swarthy, adust, and corrugated. His conversation—except on professional subjects—barren. When in dishabille, he might have been mistaken for an alchemist, whose complexion had been hurt by the fumes of the crucible, and whose clothes had suffered from the sparks of the furnace.

Such was Levett, whose whimsical frailty, if weighed against his good and useful qualities, was—

"A floating atom, dust that falls unheeded
"Into the adverse scale, nor shakes the balance."

IRENE.

I am, Sir,

Your most humble servant, &c.

Just after Mr. Levett's death, Dr. Johnson sent Dr. Lawrence the following account of it:

"SIR,

Jan. 17, 1782.

OUR old friend Mr. Levett, who was last night eminently cheerful, died this morning. The man who lay in the same room hearing an uncommon noise got up, and tried to make him speak, but without effect. He then called Mr. Holder the apothecary, who, though when he came he thought him dead, opened a vein, but could draw no blood. So has ended the long life of a very useful and very blameless man.

I am, Sir,

Your most humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.

MR. URBAN,

AS your publication is universally acknowledged to be the best repository of the kind, for whatever is useful or interesting in literature, I make no apology for sending you a few remarks upon a book, which is at present very little read or known. I mean of the tragedies of Seneca, from the perusal of which I have been long deterred by the slight manner in which I have heard them mentioned by those to whose opinions I have been accustomed to pay deference.—I have lately, however, had occasion to consult a passage in Seneca's Medea; and I confess, Mr. Urban, I was much surprised to find great spirit where I was taught to expect insipidity, much warmth where I thought every thing was cold, and characters well supported and strongly marked, which I had conceived to be weak and uninteresting. I am a young man, and of course do not expect the greatest submission to my judgement; but I declare that, after reading Apollonius Rhodius, Valerius Flaccus, and Euripides, my mind has been more forcibly impressed by the character of Medea, as portrayed in Seneca, than by any of the above-mentioned authors.—I could point out a variety of passages of superior force and beauty, as to language, sentiment, and expression; but I fear I should exceed the limits of your plan and my own leisure; I wish, however, to take the liberty of appealing to one or two, in defence of my assertions.

In the dialogue between Medea and her attendant, after the former has declared her general resolve of some mighty revenge, though without having decided on the particular scheme or mode of it; the attendant reminds her of her deserted and helpless situation telling her, her friends were gone from her, her husband had proved faithless, and that nothing remains by which she can be assisted in the execution of her purposes.

Ahiere Colchi—Conjugis nulla est fides,
Nilique superest opibus et tantis tibi.

The

The emotion of the first part of Medea's answer I consider as one of the finest breaks I have ever seen in any ancient or modern tragedy, and indeed the whole is well worth transcribing.

*Medea superest, hic mare et terras vides,
Ferrumque et ignes, et deos et fulmina.*

I know no passage more energetic, or more expressive of the confidence which a lofty mind, labouring under the sense of injuries, and conscious of its vigour and vast resources, may be imagined to repose in itself.

The whole of this scene is beautiful, and many parts of it sublime. I remember no one in the corresponding play of Euripides which may justly be placed in competition with it. The heroine's character is strongly imagined, and consistently supported throughout; and at the conclusion of the conference, when she exclaims,

Fortuna opes auferre non animum potest, the reader must feel his affections wonderfully softened towards her, and in some manner inclined, through his admiration of her masculine spirit and pity for her situation, to palliate the vast vengeance to which he must conceive her adequate, and indeed hastening to accomplish. I cannot quit my subject without noticing one passage more: it is in the conference between Jason and Medea. After having found all her attempts to soften the indignation of Creon, and to frustrate the intended marriage of Jason with Creusa, ineffectual, Medea appears fixed in her determination of revenge at all events, and to the most extreme extent; and seems only to deliberate about the means which might make her vengeance most oppressive to Jason individually, and most extensive in its general operation. She plays upon his sensibility with exquisite address, and torments him with all the varied acuteness of which he may imagine a haughty, incensed, jealous, and disappointed woman susceptible;—at last she mentions their common children, and finding that Jason could not for a moment support the idea of parting with them, and that his affection for them was of the warmest and most lively nature, in a moment she determines that her revenge shall be directed to this his most vulnerable part, and, forgetful of every consideration but the predominant one of passion, she immediately resolves to make them the sacrifice, and to punish Jason in the most exquisite manner through the sufferings and death of his children. I beg leave first to transcribe Jason's affectionate language respecting his children, as the classical reader will be better enabled to judge of the force and excellence of Medea's reply, which I think almost without a parallel. When she solicits to have the children entrusted to her care, Jason says.

*Parere precibus cupere me, fateor, tuis
Pietas vetat: namque istud haud possum pati,
Non si ipse memet cogat & rex & focer.
Hæc causa vitæ est, hoc perusti pectoris
Curis levamen, spiritu, citius quam
Carere, membris, luce.*

Medea says aside, and we may conceive with what spirited abruptness,

— — Sic gnatos amat?
Bene est, tenetur: vulneri patuit locus.

In this particular part and moment she assumes the colour of Iago's character in Othello, and of Zanga's in the Revenge; but I do not think it possible to point out a passage, in either of the above justly celebrated performances, equal to that which I have cited from Seneca. In short, the dignity of Medea's character is supported throughout in a very masterly manner. In the last scene, at the time of her final parting with Jason, when we are to conceive her rising with her chariot into the air, with all the majesty of a divinity, who without the most sensible emotion can read her animated acclamation,—

Sic fugere soles.

Happy should I be, Mr. Urban, to know myself the instrument of rescuing (I may almost say) from obscurity a book, which is in my opinion distinguished by elegant language, and sublime and elevated sentiments. I sincerely regret that it did not come sooner under my inspection, and I think myself justified in assuring the classical reader, that the perusal of Seneca's Tragedies will reward his industry, and abundantly gratify his curiosity.

I remain your humble servant,

A. B.

MR. URBAN,

I saw in the Ducal library at Parma an old map with this inscription—

..... Bedrazius civis Januæ, composuit hanc anno Domini millesimo ccccxxvi. — die Julii.

In this map, beyond the Fortunate Islands, others are delineated and inscribed, "insulæ de novo repertæ." The date is 56 years earlier than the voyage of Columbus; and the librarian told me, that some pre-pretend that this is the old map from which the envious contemporaries of Columbus charged him with deriving the information which caused his discovery. This account, for innumerable reasons, cannot be admitted: and it is probable, that, after the discovery of the Antilles, the insertion was made in an older map. However, as I have not met with any mention of this singular map in any description of Italy, I think it worth communication. I transcribed from the library catalogue the following character of the map: post insulas fortunatas aliæ conspiciuntur insulæ rudi tamen & indoctâ circumscriptiōe redditæ. Major longum terræ tractum formâ penè rectangulâ repræsentat; cui inscribitur "Antillia." Altera, non brevi intervallo distans, ejusdem penè figuræ, sic annotatur "Saravagio." Huic proxima adjacet insula minor falcata cum lemmate "Tanmor." Tandem pone Antilliam postrema est quadratæ quasi formæ, sed latere uno paululum convoco, quæ obscuro hîc nomine donatur "Royllo." Infra vero scriptum legitur "Insulæ de novo repetæ."

MR. URBAN,

SUFFER even an individual to state an inconvenience from the new mode of conveying mails.—I live at Wargrave; and, as the letters are not dropped nigher to me than Maidenhead*, we have a person who walks daily to that place, and returns with the London letters, which I now do not receive so early by two, three, four, and five hours as I used to do by the old mails; and I never can answer a letter by return of post, unless I send to Maidenhead on purpose, a distance of seven miles. I have also letters from a nephew at Reading, which letters always go to Maidenhead, and return by the same person above employed, which costs me each letter 2d. postage, and 2d. the man bringing home; formerly they cost me only 2d. Surely, as an obscure individual, I have cause to complain. I know people of more consequence than myself have made it a subject of complaint, but we have had no redress; the answer from the post-office being, that we must submit to a fair trial of the scheme, as in times of distress, when so great a saving to government is made by having their mails carried for half the cost of the old mode, we ought to submit to many inconveniences. But that saving should not arise from injustice to the individual. I am sure, myself and many of my neighbours, feeling the deprivation of a daily correspondence, send four letters out of six by packets, and as such should think the revenue will not be increased. No doubt the commercial cities of Bristol and London may reap some benefit; but my trade of making, &c. requires equal attention from government with that of the first merchant in the metropolis.

* Surely our correspondent might have his letters much nearer from Twyford. EDIT.

MR. URBAN,

IT is remarkable that, of the noble family of Percy Earls of Northumberland, six earls out of eight in seven successive generations (besides some collateral branches) came to untimely deaths. Henry, the first earl, was killed in the battle of Bramham-Moor in Yorkshire, in 1408, 8 Hen. IV.

His brother, Thomas Earl of Worcester, was beheaded at Shrewsbury in 1403, 4 Hen. IV.

Henry Lord Percy, commonly called Hotspur (son to the 1st earl), was killed in the battle of Shrewsbury, the same year.

His son Henry (the 2d earl) was killed in the battle of St. Albans in 1455, 33 Hen. VI.

Three of the sons of the earl also fell in battle, viz. Henry, the 3d earl, in the battle of Towton, 1461, 1 Edw. IV. Thomas Lord Egremont, in the battle of Northampton, 1460, 38 Hen. VI. and Sir Ralph Percy, in the battle of Hegley moor, 1464, 4 Edw. IV.

Henry, 4th earl, son of the 3d earl, was killed by a tumultuous rabble in Yorkshire in 1489, 4 Hen. VII.

His grandson, Sir Thomas Percy, was executed at Tyburn for Aske's conspiracy in 1537, 29 Hen. VIII.

And the two sons of this Sir Thomas came also to untimely ends; as Thomas, the 7th earl, was beheaded at York for high treason in 1572, 14 Eliz.; and Henry, the 8th earl, shot himself in the Tower in 1581, 27 Eliz.

After this, it is but justice to add, that all the descendants of this noble house from that time to the present, being six generations, have died natural deaths, viz. Henry, the 9th earl; Algernon, the 10th; Joscelyn, the 11th and last earl; Elizabeth, Baroness Percy, and Duchess of Somerset; Algernon Lord Percy, and Duke of Somerset; George Viscount Beauchamp, and his sister, the late Duchess of Northumberland, Baroness Percy.

CRITO.

MR. URBAN,

YOUR antiquarian readers may not be displeased to be told, that the sword of the Marquis Spinola, general of the Spanish army in the Netherlands, was purchased at Paris by Mr. Martin, of King-street, Covent-garden, at the sale of the Prince of Conti's effects, and may probably still remain in his collection. And it may be deemed no improper supplement to the account of the Armoury at Brussels, given by Mr. Nichols from the museum of the Spalding Society, (Bibl. Top. Brit. N^o XX. p. 75.) to add this description.

The mounting is entirely of steel, and is richly ornamented with curious embossments in pretty high relief, exhibiting in several compartments various Scripture historical passages and emblematical figures disposed round the pommel, bow, cross bars, and shell of the sword; each compartment has its proper inscription in Latin. The principal compartment on the outer side of the pommel represents Samuel anointing David; under it, Esau hunting; and above it, Esau selling his birth-right. On the opposite side, Saul possessed with an evil spirit, and David playing before him on the harp. Above is Abraham preparing the altar for sacrificing his son, and beneath it the servant keeping the asses. Between these two chief compartments, and serving to divide them, are two capital figures at full length in oval frames; the one Venus with Cupid; the other Juno with her peacock, holding in her hand a rod with a twisted snake descending. Within other of the larger compartments on the bow, cross bar, shell, &c. are represented David by the advice of Michal making his escape from Saul through a window; the judgement of Solomon between the two harlots; the Queen of Sheba visiting Solomon; Absalom slain by Joab as he hung on the tree; Elijah fed with bread and water in the wilderness by an Angel; Saul consulting with the Witch at Endor; Ammon killed by his brother Absalom at a banquet. In the smaller compartments are represented, the rape of Tamar by her brother Ammon; Elijah fed by a raven in the wilderness; David consulting with Jonathan for his safety; Jonathan and David renewing their friendship; a single Justice with her sword and scales; David seizing the lion; David cutting off Saul's skirt;

GENT. MAG. February, 1785.

David slaying Goliath; David feeding his father's sheep; the emblematical figure of Faith, a term; David and Jonathan, and David and Absalom, with emblems of Charity and other devices: and on the end of the scabbard is represented Joab slaying Abner. On the inside of the bow is engraved Ambr * Spinola * Exerc * Imper. The blade is of that sort which is usually denominated a flaming sword, and shews the sword to be of an excellent temper.

Some of your readers who are F.F.A.S., may recollect the exhibition of a cross-bow found in Flodden field by a farmer's servant ploughing there about 10 years ago: the string broke on the slightest touch, but the bow was as elastic as when first left at the celebrated battle fought there 250 years ago.

REMARKABLE ANECDOTE.

IN November last, the Rev. Dr. Seabury, a D. D. of Oxford, formerly a persecuted American missionary, after having applied in vain to the English Bench of Bishops, with the most honourable credentials, was consecrated Bishop of Connecticut in partibus infidelium, by the Episcopal College at Aberdeen, or, in other words, the Five Nonjuring Scotch Prelates, who have regularly kept up and continued their succession in that kingdom ever since Episcopacy was abolished. This event, productive as it must be of important consequences, (strange to say!) has never been mentioned in any of our papers*. Whether this first American prelate will apply, or not, and with what success, for the large sums bequeathed by Archbishops Tenison and Secker, and Bp. Benson, towards the establishment and support of Episcopacy on that continent, time must shew.

MR. URBAN,

I Cannot help having a concern for my fellow Christians, when they venture out of their native element, and especially for some respectable Aeronauts, who have lately been in great danger of falling from the sky into the sea. I beg leave, therefore, by your means, to recommend to them, upon their entrance into their balloons, a pious ejaculation taken from Milton:

— upled by thee,
Urania, into Heaven I have presum'd,

* Not when we received this. We have seen it slightly mentioned since. EDIT.

As

An earthly guest, and drawn empyreal air,
Thy tempering; with like safety guided

Return me to my native element;
Left from this flying steed unrein'd (as once Bellerophon, though from a lower clime,)
Dismounted, on th' Aleian field I fall,
Erroneous there to wander, and forlorn.

But, if their attempt be to cross the British Channel, they may, after changing "Aleian field" into "British sea," read the last line thus :

Too vent'rous—there to sink, for ever lost.

By the way, it would please me much if any of your correspondents would help me to clear the lofty bard from the charge of tautology in the words "wander erroneous."—When successful, but illiterate, candidates return in print their grateful, that is, their thankful, thanks to their electors, one may more easily excuse such a phrase in them, than one can in the great Milton, on account of the authority and weight of his example. W. S.

MR. URBAN,
THE mention of Solomon's Song by a late correspondent reminds me of
Dr. Jortin's character of that book, which I here send you.

"As to his song, many commentaries and discourses have been written upon it by the ancient fathers, and by modern divines, which have not made it one jot clearer than it was before. Their allegorical, mystical, and spiritual interpretations are arbitrary, unsupported, and the mere effusions of a fertile imagination. It is a short and elegant poem, in which the name of God is not once mentioned, in which not one religious or moral duty is recommended, and which is never cited by our Saviour, or by any writer of the New Testament."

I beg leave here also to add Mr.
Knox's character of Dr. Jortin's Sermons, to which I alluded in my last.

"Posthumous publications, it has been remarked, are usually inferior in merit to those which were published in an author's life-time. And indeed the opinion seems plausible, as it may be presumed, that an author's reason for not publishing his works, is a consciousness of their inferiority. The sermons of Dr.
Jortin were however designed, by their author, as a legacy to mankind. To enlarge on their value, would only be to echo back the public voice. Good sense and sound morality appear in them, not indeed dressed out in the meretricious ornaments of a florid style, but in all the manly force, and simple graces, of natural eloquence. The same caprice, which raises to reputation those trifling discourses which have nothing to recommend them but a prettiness of fancy, will again consign them to oblivion : but the sermons of Dr. Jortin will continue to be read with pleasure and edification, as long as human nature shall continue to be endowed with the faculties of reason and discernment *."

To which may be added his laconic answer, on being asked why he did not publish his sermons : "They shall sleep," he replied, "till I sleep †."

THE mention you have made of Dr.
Wm. Oldys in p. 329 of your last volume, induces me to send you an account of his father Dr. W. Oldys, who, according to Wood, vol. I. p. 31, took the degree of D. D. Jan. 16, 1642, and was vicar of Adderbury, in Oxfordshire.
A man, from the private accounts I have received, of unfulled character, and who was cruelly murdered by the parliament soldiers without any provocation. Dr.
Oldys was returning home in his chariot from Oxford, and this happened between the garrison of Oxford and his own home.
The Dr. married Margaret, the daughter of Ambrose Sacheverell Clesh, by whom he had eleven children. The third son was William, of whom you have given us an account. Mrs. Cecilia Goad, the last surviving child, erected a monument to his memory in the chancel of the church at Adderbury immediately over the place of his interment, with the epitaph inclosed, having collected it some years ago on a search after matters of antiquity in that church, and about which time I sent for your publication that curious epitaph on Dr. Pelling (see vol.
XL. p. 512) taken from Bath Abbey.
Some others, which I thought worthy of every attention, shall be forwarded for your publication hereafter, with such biographical accounts as I may deem worth your notice.

MR. URBAN. Mortlake, Jan. 1.
IN the church-yard of this parish lies buried the famous Doctor Partridge, under whose name an Almanack is still published. The following inscription is engraved on a flat black marble stone raised about four feet from the ground:
 Johannes Partridge, Astrologus, et Medicinæ Doctor,
 natus est apud East-Sheen
 in comitatu Surrey,
 18 Januarii 1641,
 & mortuus est Londini 24 Junii 1715.
 Medicinam fecit duobus Regibus unæque
 Reginæ,
 Carolo scilicet Secundo, Willielmo tertio,
 Reginæque Mariæ.
 Creatus est Medicinæ Doctor,
 Lugduni Batavorum.

I have searched the register of this parish, of which East-Sheen makes a part, but do not find his name. Indeed, there are but two baptisms registered in the year 1644, tho' in the year before there are 20; in 1645, and 1646, there was only one in each year, in 1647, there are 4, and in the year following more. So that during the height of the great rebellion, the register seems to have been very irregularly kept*. It appears that Partridge was physician to Charles the Second, and I have a translation by him of the Theſaurus Medico-Chymicus of Myſſicht, printed for Awnſham Churchill in 1682, in the title-page of which he styles himself physician to his Majesty. It is dedicated to Madam Frances Jermyn of St. Albans, and introduced by two commendatory poems by William Hyde and John Gibbon, Blue mantle-herald at arms. The latter mentions an improvement of Lilly's book of Astrology. Why he was not made physician to James the Second, may be imputed to his political principles, because it appears that he was retained by William and Mary in that capacity. In 1708, when Partridge was 64 years of age, Swift published, under the name of Isaac Bickerstaffe, Esq; predictions for that year, intending to ridicule the Almanack-makers and pretenders to Astrology, levelling his satire particularly at Dr. P. whose death he foretold would happen on the 29th of March in that year. This was followed by the "Account of the first of Mr. Bickerstaffe's predictions, being an account of the death of Mr. P. the almanack-maker, upon the 29th instant, in a letter to a person of honour." Herein he makes him declare himself a Cobler and a Non-conformist, and say, "I wish I may not have done more mischief by my physic than my astrology, though I had some good receipts from my grandmother, and my own compositions were such as I thought could at least do no hurt." Partridge, in his Almanack for 1709, asserts (if Swift has not misquoted) that "he is not only now alive, but was likewise alive upon that very 29th of March when Bickerstaffe had foretold he should die." Swift takes advantage of this tautology (for it hardly can be called by a worse name), pays him off very wittily in his "Vindication of Isaac Bickerstaffe, Esq;" and charges him with beating the poor boy, who happened to pass by him in the street, crying, "A full and true account of Dr. Partridge's death, &c." From which circumstance, whether the beating was imaginary, or not, we may collect the manner in which these papers were originally published. In his Grub-street Elegy on the supposed death of Partridge, the Almanack-maker, written in 1708; after telling us in a note that he was "a Cobler," he with much humour shews—relative to Dr. Partridge's Life *, such information will no doubt be agreeable to many of your readers.

P. S. It is remarkable that in this parish lived Dr. Dee, a famous mathematician and reputed conjurer, whose memory must have been fresh with people living when P. was young, and not improbably might lead him to the study of astrology.

PERMIT a private person, through your Magazine, to point out to the minister a proper subject for a new tax.

That the wants of government must be supplied, is very certain: it is equally so, that the means of supplying these wants should be as little burdensome as possible: but, more than that, a wise legislator should make them subservient to the promotion of morality; which he can easily do, by laying the necessary taxes on objects and instruments that are employed in such amusements as tend to corrupt the manners of the people. Gambling is a vice in itself, and leads to the commission of various other species of wickedness; every kind of it should therefore be checked; more especially any one that is in its own particular nature barbarous, groveling, and inhuman; and under such a description does the unnatural practice of Cocking come; a practice as mean as it is cruel; inasmuch that one never could have thought our nobility and gentry would have fallen into it; and yet they have. They have adopted a custom, that is more suitable to the ferocious manners of savages, than to those of a polished and enlightened nation; though, I believe, it is a custom that does not exist in any other country besides our own. And shall England lie under the singular odium, arising from an amusement so disgraceful and brutal? Sorry am I to observe, that it is even carried on under the auspices of r—y. It would be well, if this hateful practice could be abolished entirely; but, as that would be difficult to effect, I would have it be made of some service to the government and to the people, by substituting a tax on game-cocks, in the lieu of one of those that I presume the minister has in contemplation; which would be the means of preventing one additional burden from lighting on the shoulders of the honest and industrious part of the nation. To make this tax answer, it should be heavy. Let every proprietor of fighting-cocks pay annually 10l. 10s. for every bird he brings out to battle. Let the cocks be registered in the books of the distributors of stamps; and if any man set his cock to fight without having previously registered him; let him for each offence upon conviction incur a penalty of 100l. without the magistrate having liberty of mitigation: half the money to go to the crown; and half to the informer. Horses, cards, dice, &c. are taxed; and why should game-cocks kept for fighting be exempted?—However, as I only meant to suggest the idea of such a tax, I shall here leave the particular adjustment of the plan to some person whose abilities are superior to those of AMADEUS.

MR. URBAN,

Jan. 10.

SOME person, either grossly deceived, or not a well-wisher to truth, has in your October Magazine, p. 790, informed the public through your conveyance, that a reputable draper of Dublin was taken by a mob to a place called the Tenter-fields, and there not only tarred and feathered, but so cruelly whipped at a post, that he then fainted, and afterwards remained in danger of his life; and this he chuses to represent as having happened so lately, that the then last mail (plainly implying in October) had communicated the fact as having happened but in the preceding week.

Persons inclined to misrepresentation readily can exaggerate facts, and mingle truths with falsehood, so as to deceive the cursory reader; and if your correspondent be exempt from this charge, his only excuse must arise from his being ignorant of the real state of facts; had he possessed sufficient intelligence, he might have informed you, that in last August a person, who acted as a draper and tailor, did, at a very early hour of the morning, receive the abominable and unjustifiable treatment of tarring and feathering from a set of the lowest miscreants; and by an injudicious attempt at resistance, suffered under some strokes of a cudgel, but not any stripes of a scourge. This indignity, however indecent, was inflicted upon him for a supposed violation of an agreement, solemnly entered into by him and those of his fraternity, to make up only the manufactures of his own country.

Your

* Some particulars also of Francis Moore, Physician, another early Almanack-maker, who resided at Lambeth, would be agreeable.

Your correspondent should, in justice to the magistracy of Dublin, have informed you, that a person (by name Garret Dignam) who was convicted of such unjustifiable acts, received a most merited and severe whipping, upon the 23d of August last, through six or seven of the most public streets, and in that very part of the city where the offence had been committed; since which time the villainous and inhuman practice of tarring and feathering has totally ceased in Dublin.

Not improbably, some such correspondents as above mentioned may attempt to impose upon you, and through you upon the publick, by a variety of representations of the cruel charge of maiming soldiers in Dublin; accompanied with variety of very captivating strictures upon the barbarity of the practice, which certainly is as execrable as any one could wish to paint it; however, allow me to mention, that many of the military have long been most justly suspected of committing this outrage upon themselves; and within these two months one has been convicted by a court-martial of the crime, sentenced to receive 800 lashes, and actually has received 500 of them; the motives for these acts, before the present year, were supposed to be a dislike to the service, and the expectation of being supported for life by the bounty of government: for the latter offences the public benevolence may perhaps be a sufficient temptation; as you are to know, that, by way of preventing the maiming of soldiers, some of our military senators (not unknown in England) procured an act of Parliament in the last session, which allows a soldier maimed by what is called houghing (or cutting the sinews of the leg or thigh) 20l. yearly; if the offender be not discovered; to be paid by the innocent proprietors, in the parish where the offence is committed; and the examination of the soldier himself, concerning the commission of the fact, is to be conclusive evidence.—I shall not say much as to the justice of this law, as the good effects of it may be collected from the above instance of its operation; how many more the military fortitude and ingenuity may conceal, I shall not pretend to enquire; but am, Sir,
Yours, &c. PETER NIPPLE.

Mr. URBAN,
WHEN you have room in your valuable collection, please to insert

these remarks on English Oak; a tree of so much dignity and importance to this country should have met with an abler pen; but perhaps these hints may incite some of your readers to do it justice.
T. H. W.

REMARKS ON OAKS:

a. Quercus Robur of Linnæus. The common oak:

β. Quercus Mas of old Botanists. The Bay-oak:

In Swedish Ek; in Danish Eg; in Saxon Ac, whence Akernell, and Acorn.

"The monarch oak, the patriarch of "trees;

"Shoots rising up, and spreads by slow
"degrees;

"Three centuries he grows, and three he
"lays,

"Supreme in state, and in three more
"decays."

How far the Poet is justified in fixing these æras we are not able to ascertain; but it is probable that there are oaks coeval with our oldest records; this we can assert from our own knowledge, that an oak planted fifty years ago, has at this time so young an appearance that it does not seem to have acquired a tenth perhaps not a twentieth, part of its growth, or age.

The two sorts of oaks indigenous to this kingdom were not distinguished with the accuracy that the noblest of our trees deserves, till Mr. Ruggles gave an account of them, in your Magazine, (vol. LIII. p. 677), where the reader may also see some hints of our own, on the same subject (p. 653). . . That kind of oak which the old Botanists call Quercus Mas, Ray says, he found distinguished, by the name of the Bay-oak, from the superior verdure of its foliage; and it were to be wished, that, out of respect to that great man, this name might be retained.

Transplanted oaks scarce ever make thriving-trees, the tap-root which is destroyed in moving seems to be necessary toward enlarging and extending the plant to its fullest size; but whoever chooses to transplant these trees would do well to set some acorns among them: posterity will thank him for it. Oaks grow largest on a sandy loam, where the soils of sand and clay meet; on sand only, or among rocks, they are apt to be shaky; in stiff clay, or on the tops of hills, the growth is slow, but the timber is excellent. This tree, as well as most other plants, flourishes best in a situation tion sloping to the south-east; but its spreading roots and branches are injurious to cultivation, and lopping is peculiarly destructive; therefore it is highly necessary to encourage the growth of bushes in forests and wastes, as bushes are the great preservers and defenders of young timber, from the browsing of cattle, which is fatal to it. We have been informed, by good judges, that if the bushes were preserved in the forests near Portsmouth, they would produce oaks, more than sufficient, to supply ship-timber for that arsenal *.

It has been enacted, to encourage the business of the tanners, that no oak should be felled without barking, which cannot be done except when the sap is rising; but timber which is cut in winter, is much more durable; and it is earnestly recommended that a trial might be made, by building two ships at the same time, one of timber cut in November or December, and the other with trees which were felled at the usual time, with the sap in them; it is highly probable, that the ship winter-cut would be tight and rare, many years after the ship summer-cut, had been consigned to the fire, and forgotten. If this be the case, the nation at present pays at least twenty pounds for every penny saved to the tanner in bark. We have heard it asserted, that the Americans are so careful, in respect to the quality of the timber they build their ships with, that their contracts specify not only what kinds of timber, but also that it should be such as hath grown in hedges, because that which grows in woods is much more porous, and less durable.

The first opening of the leaves of oaks affords a pleasing variety of colours, which did not escape the observation of Chaucer, who finished from nature, though he generally took his outlines from Italian masters.

... "A pleasant grove ...

"In which were Oaks grete freight as a "line,

"Undir the which the gras so freshe of
"hew

"Was newly sprong, and in sight fore,
"or nine,

* Owners of this tree should remember, that crooked timber is of much more value for shipbuilding than straight.

"Every tre well fro his fellow grew,
"With braunchis brode, ladin with levis
"new,
"That sprongin out agen the sonne
"shene,
"Some very rede; and some a glad lighte
"grene." The Floure and the Lease,

If painters would observe the various tints which different trees shew, in the first expansion of their foliage, they would find little occasion to have recourse to the gloomy and melancholy fadings of Autumn to diversify their landscapes, especially when they would represent a cheerful scene.

Lucretius gives a picturesque view of the glaucous Olives, intermixed with trees of a different verdure, and we beg leave to insert his beautiful description of the progress of cultivation, as the sense of it has been mistaken by our translators.

"Inde aliam atque aliam culturam: dulcin
"agelli

"Tentabant, fructusque seros mansuescere
"terra

"Cernebant indulgendo, blandique co-
"lendo.

"Inque dies magis in montem succedere
"sylvas

"Congebant, infraque locum concedere
"culti;

"Prata, lacus, ritos, segetes, vinetaque
"lata

"Collibus, et campis ut haberent, atque
"olearum

"Cœcula distinguens inter plaga, curvare
"posset

"Per tumulos, et convalleis camposque
"profusa." Lib. V. 1366.

Evelyn in his account of the oak has given an erroneous translation of a part of this passage; misled by the words cœcula plaga, he brings in the azure sky, instead of the glaucous rows of olive trees.

"Betwixt

"Whose rows the azure sky is seen immix'd
"With hillocks, vales, and fields."

Creech has totally omitted the striking appearance of the olive; and a prose translator, not knowing the true colour of the olive, renders cœcula green. We do not mention this from any disrespect to Evelyn, whose memory every lover of science must venerate, but to apologize for the frequency of our quotations from authors in the original.

* See his own edition of the Silva.

since

since a person of Evelyn's knowledge and abilities has been so much mistaken in his translation.

About the latter end of the seventh century, the great and good king Ina thought acorns, and other kinds of mast, of so much consequence, that among the few laws which he imagined would be sufficient to regulate the simple economy of our Saxon ancestors, he gave particular directions relating to the fattening swine in woods, since his time called pawnage, or pannage, and enacted, that whosoever shall have kept his hogs in another person's woods, the owner of the woods should be intitled to the following shares; if the fat was three fingers thick, he was to have every third hog, if two fingers thick the fourth, and if of the thickness of the thumb, the fifth.

"Lif mon nime æferne on ypinum.
"æt ðrýfingnum þ ðriddæ. æt
"trýfingnum þ feorþ þ ðýme-
"lum þ fýfte."

There was thought to be, at that time, such a close connection between trees and swine, that the size of a tree was determined by the number of hogs that could stand under it. (Leg. Inæ.)

In a succeeding century, Elfhelmus, after giving away his lands at Bricandon, reserves the pawning of two hundred hogs for his lady, in part of her dowry. The improved cultivation of modern times has rendered pawning of so little value that what was then of consequence to a lady of the first rank, is now chiefly left to the labouring poor.

About the year 880, Duke Alfred bequeaths to his wife and daughter some estates, with a particular legacy of two thousand hogs; he afterwards gives four legacies of an hundred hogs each, and the remainder to religious houses, (Lye's and Manning's Dict.)

Mast is particularly mentioned, about the middle of the eleventh century, in a donation of Edward the Confessor.
"Mid lande. 7 mid loxe, mid pude.
"7 mid pelde, mid mede. 7 mid
"lare, mid mæste. 7 mid æue ran.
"7 mid eallum ðingum". (Hickes's Thesaurus.)

It appears from Domesday-Book, that in William the Conqueror's time, timber trees were still of no farther consequence than from the food they afforded to swine; for the value of the woods, in several counties, is ascertained by the number of hogs they would fatten;

some were of such extent as to support two thousand. The survey was taken so accurately, that in some places woods are mentioned of one hog. "Silva de uno porco."

Swine fed in the woods furnished so considerable a part of the food of former ages, that a scarcity of mast was one of the causes of the frequent famines that then happened. The unknown annalist, who wrote the Chronicon Saxonum, after describing the extraordinary famine and mortality of the year 1116, records particularly the failure of mast in that year; "gærn on mæstene *."

When the Abbey of Croyland was burnt, in the same century, the friendly contributions to the Monks shew how much they depended for their subsistence on the flesh of this animal, "Dedit etiam Haco de Milton tunc nobis duo decem quartaria frumenti, & viginti pingues bacones; dedit et Elsidus de Pinchbeck centum solidos argenti, et decem bacones; dedit et Ardnatus de Spalding duo carcassia bovina, et duo decem bacones." (Historia Ingulfi.)

Our Norman tyrants, in their rage for extending forests, took away the right of pawning from those on whose lands they had encroached: this was one of the grievances that John was compelled to redress, (Chartade Forest.)

The importance of swine in these times reminds us of the herds of Ulysses, who, after his stock of hogs had been plundered by the voracious suitors of Penelope, had still a large number remaining at home; beside twelve herds, that were sent to feed in an adjacent country,

"Within the space were rear'd
"Twelve ample cells, the lodgement of "his herd.
"Full fifty pregnant females each con-
"tain'd;
"The males without (a smaller race †)
"remain'd;
"Doom'd to supply the suitors wasteful
"feast,
"A stock by daily luxury decreas'd;
"Now scarce four hundred left."

Pope's Odyssey, xiv.

* Bishop Gibson, in his edition of the Chronicon Saxonum, ingenuously acknowledges, that he does not know the meaning of this expression.

† "A smaller race," meaning, a smaller number, "αγλαον παλιρρον."

When

When Moses prohibited the Israelites swines flesh, he no doubt had good reasons for it, but it must have deprived them of a considerable source of subsistence, as Samaria, a district of the holy land, furnished very numerous herds. (Mark, chap. v.) Mahomet imitated Moses, in this prohibition, to entice the Jews to follow him.

We find, from a passage in the Edda, that the fondness which our Gothic ancestors entertained for swines flesh was of a very early date; for in the first institution of their pagan superstition the enjoyments of their coarse Elysium, in the hall of Woden, consisted in their being continually feasted with ale, and the fat of the inexhaustible boar Srimner, dressed by the cook *Andrimner. Hence it may be inferred, that our ancestors did not originally come into Saxony, from a place north of that country, as swine are tender animals, and can scarce live through the winter, in a wild state, in that latitude. In Sweden they are supported with difficulty, even in houses. Swines flesh could not have been thought a delicacy but by those who had been used to it. In Strabo's time, Rome was chiefly supplied with hogs, which were fattened on masts in the woods of Gaul. That author also says, that in the mountainous parts of Spain, the inhabitants ground their acorns into meal. Pliny, who describes very minutely the different effects of the various sorts of acorns in the fattening of swine, asserts, that in his time acorns were brought to table, in Spain, as a desert (secundis mensis): it is probable, that they still continue to be eaten by the common people of that country, for they are produced after the repast of the goatherds of Cervantes, and Teresa sends the dutchess a present of the choicest she could collect.

Though it can hardly be supposed, that men, in early ages, lived on acorns, and wild fruits only, in the wretched state the poet describes, (Lucretius, Lib. V.) yet it is certain that they depended much for their vegetable food on the natural produce of trees; after the introduction of corn, mast was in a great measure given up to swine, but where there was no care taken to collect it,

* Mahomet, in his paradise, feeds his followers with "the Ox Balam, and the fish Nim, the lobes of whose livers would suffice seventy thousand men."

Sale's Koran.

and feed them gradually, in a few weeks the supply failed, and it was necessary to kill, and preserve in store, such as were fat. This salted food, assisted by the great quantity of salted fish, which the superstition of the times compelled our ancestors to eat, laid the foundation of the leprosy, and other cutaneous diseases, which were formerly so common, that the forest laws direct, that if a deer is found dead, it should be sent to the next Lazar house, or Spital house; but these distempers are now happily eradicated, by the constant supply of fresh meat and vegetables, which the improvements of modern cultivation in our fields, and gardens, regularly furnish.

MR. URBAN,

DR. Priestley, in a letter to the Critical Reviewers, of the last month, announces a continuation of the Theological Repository, and solicits correspondence: adding, that "it will be open to any queries or difficulty relating to religion; and it is wished, that the writers should conceal their names."

Is this the conduct of free ingenuous enquiry, or is it the art of jesuitism, and the insidious shyness of present Presbyterianism? Will Dr. Priestley set his own name to every sentiment he holds forth in print? and will he invite assassins to stab religion in the dark? Let him blush to see his hand set to this unworthy challenge, and if he wants seconds in the combat, let them not be ashamed to enter their names at the barrier, and come forth, as all the honest enemies of Christianity have hitherto done, with fair declarations who they are, however unfairly they handle their weapons. Let Dr. Priestley reflect how he can answer, not to his Saviour, for he has disavowed him, but to his God and Judge, for this insidious conduct.

P. Q. R.

P. S. The above is not thrown out with any view to make your valuable miscellany a channel for polemical controversy, but to awaken some of the professors of our pure and holy religion to enter the lists in defence of the "faith once delivered to the Saints," and without regard to establishments, creeds, or confessions, tell the undecided, or deluded multitude, whether THE TRUTH is in Priestley or Jesus.

Lord

LORD MONBODDO'S ACCOUNT OF PETER THE WILD BOY, formerly brought from the Woods of Germany*.

"IT was in the beginning of June, 1782, that I saw him in a farm-house, called Broadway, within about a mile of Berkhamsted, kept there upon a pension which the King pays. He is but low of stature; not exceeding five feet three inches; and, although he must now be about seventy years of age, has a fresh healthy look. He wears his beard. His face is not at all ugly or disagreeable; and he has a look that may be called sensible and sagacious for a savage. About twenty years ago he was in use to elope, and to be missing for several days; and once, I was told, he wandered as far as Norfolk; but of late he has been quite tame, and either keeps in the house, or saunters about the farm. He has been the thirteen last years where he lives at present; and before that, he was twelve years with another farmer, whom I saw and conversed with. This farmer told me, that he had been put to school somewhere in Hertfordshire, but had only learned to articulate his own name Peter, and the name of King George, both which I heard him pronounce very distinctly. But the woman of the house where he now is (for the man happened not to be at home) told me, that he understood every thing that was said to him concerning the common affairs of life; and I saw that he readily understood several things that she said to him while I was present. Among other things, she desired him to sing Nancy Dawson; which he did, and another tune which she named. He never was mischievous, but had always that gentleness of nature which I hold to be characteristic of our nature, at least till we became carnivorous, and hunters or warriors. He feeds at present as the farmer and his wife do; but, as I was told by an old woman (one Mrs. Collop, living at a village in the neighbourhood, called Hempstead †, who remembered to have seen him when he first came to Hertfordshire, which she computed to be fifty-five years before the time I saw her,) he then fed very much upon leaves, and particularly upon the leaves of cabbage, which he eat raw. He was then, as she thought, about fifteen years of age, walked upright, but could climb trees like a squirrel.— At present he not only eats flesh, but has also got the taste of beer, and even of spirits, of which he inclines to drink more than he can get. And the old farmer above-mentioned, with whom he lived twelve years before he came to this last farmer, told me, that he had acquired that taste before he came to him, which is about twenty-five years ago. He has also become very fond of fire, but has not yet acquired a liking for money; for though he takes it, he does not keep it, but gives it to his landlord or landlady, which, I suppose, is a lesson that they have taught him. He retains so much of his natural instinct, that he has a fore-feeling of bad weather, growling and howling, and shewing great disorder, before it comes.

"These are the particulars concerning him which I observed myself, or could learn by information from the neighbourhood." From all these facts put together, his Lordship makes the following observations:

"1st, Whatever doubts there may be concerning the humanity of the Oran Outan, it was never made a question but that Peter was a man.

"2dly, That he was, as the Dean [Swift] says, of a father and mother like one of us. This, as I have said, was the case of two savages found in the dismal swamps in Virginia, of the one found in the island of Diego Garcia; and of him that was discovered by M. le Roy in the Pyrenæes, and in general of all the savages that have been found in Europe within these last 300 years; for I do not believe that, for these 2000 years past, there has been a race of such savages in Europe.

"3dly, I think there can be no reason to doubt of what was written from Hanover, and published in the newspapers, that he was found going upon all four, as well as other solitary savages that have been found in Europe. It is true that others have been found erect; which was the case of the two found in the dismal swamp of Virginia; likewise of the man of the Pyrenæes, and of him in the island of Diego Garcia.

But

* Lord Monboddo, in support of his hypothesis, that man, in a state of nature, is a mere animal, without clothes, houses, the use of fire, or even speech, adduces the Oran Outan, or Man in the Woods, and this Peter the Wild Man, and others, as examples. He denies the want of the organs of speech as an objection, and insists, they only want the artificial use of them.

† Hemet Hempstead (here meant) has a considerable market for corn. EDIT.

OSST. MAG. February, 1785;

But these, I suppose, were not exposed till they had learned to walk upright; whereas Peter appears to have been abandoned by his parents before he had learned that lesson, but walked as we know children do at first.

"4thly, I think it is evident that he is not an idiot, not only from his appearance, as I have described it, and from his actions, but from all the accounts that we have of him, both those printed and those attested by persons yet living; for as to the printed accounts, there is not the least information of that kind in any of them, except in one, viz. Wye's Letter, No 8; wherein it is said, that some imputed his not learning to speak to want of understanding; which, I should think, shewed rather want of understanding in those who thought so; when it is considered that at this time he had not been a year out of the woods, and, I suppose, but a month or two under the care of Dr. Arbuthnot, who had taken the charge of his education. The Dean, indeed, tells us, that he suspected he was a pretender, and no genuine wild man; but not a word of his being an idiot. And as to the persons living, not one with whom I have conversed appeared to have the least suspicion of that kind; though it is natural that men, who were not philosophers, and knew nothing of the progress of man from the mere animal to the intellectual creature, nor of the improvement of our understanding by social intercourse and the arts of life, but believed that man, when he came to a certain age, has from Nature all the faculties which we see him exert, and particularly the faculty of speech, I should think him an idiot, and wanting even the capacity of acquiring understanding. I knew an officer of dragoons, a man of very good sense, who was quartered where Peter then lived for some months, and saw him almost every day, and who assured me that he was not an idiot, but shewed common understanding, which was all that could be expected from one no better educated than he.

"Lastly, those who have considered what I have said * of the difficulty of articulation will not be surprised that a

* Lord Monboddo, far from thinking speech or articulation natural to man, rather wonders how he can, by any teaching or imitation, attain to the ready performance of such various and complicated operations. Add to this, when the organs are completely formed to one language, how hard it is to model them to any other, man, who had lived a savage for the first fourteen or fifteen years of his life, should have made so little progress in that art. I cannot, however, have the least doubt that, if he had been under the care of Mr. Braidwood of Edinburgh, he would have learned to speak, though with much more difficulty than a man who had been brought up tame among people who had the use of speech, and who consequently must know the advantage of it. And I can have as little doubt that Mr. Braidwood could have taught the Oran Outan in Sir Ashton Lever's collection, who learned to articulate a few words, so as to speak plainly enough."

ABSTRACT of the PORTSCRIPT to
Gov. HASTINGS's late Letter, May 14,
1784. (See our last, p. 20.)

ON the 11th of April [1784], the Prince Jewan Bukht, eldest son of King Shih Allum, aged about 36, who has long held the principal share in the little that remained of the administration of his father's affairs, fled from the capital [Delhi], attended only by his mother's brother and one other person; and rapidly passing the bounds of his father's dominions, escaped far beyond the reach of pursuit before his absence was discovered. The King sent circular orders to every quarter, that he might be apprehended and sent back. The Nabob and Governor received letters to that effect; who, as soon as they had learned that the course of the Prince's route lay towards Lucknow, sent, separately, to inform him of the commands they had received, and the mortification it would be to them to withhold from him, in consequence of those commands, the duties of respect due to his rank, should he still persist in coming that way; and therefore intreating him not to come. Answers were at the same time written, to acquaint the King with the part they had taken, and the utmost they could take, in obedience to his orders. The Prince, in reply, pleaded the interest of the King his father as the sole motive of his flight, and declared his resolution to proceed at all events, trusting his fortune to the sincerity of his intentions, which, he was sure, would bear the strictest test. At the same time the Governor received letters from Major Browne, the Company's resident at Delhi, expressing his Majesty's pleasure that his son had chosen Lucknow for the place of his retreat, as he there would be safe from the

the consequences which might have been apprehended had he thrown himself into other hands. This, the Major said, he had written by the King's express command. In consequence of this information, it was resolved to receive the Prince, according to the custom of Hindostan, with the same honours as are paid to the King. In conformity to this plan, the Nabob-Vizier and Governor repaired, on the 7th instant, to the Prince's encampment, about eighteen miles from Lucknow, and paid him the customary forms of obeisance. On the 9th he entered Lucknow, preceded by the Nabob-Vizier, and followed by the Governor, who, for reasons of policy, did not chuse to appear as a principal on the occasion, though, at the instance of the Prince, he could not refuse to accompany him as an attendant. For the same obvious reasons, the Prince having desired to be accommodated with a house, the Governor had made an offer of his, and had himself taken possession of one that had originally been prepared for his reception within the palace, and adjoining to that in which the Nabob-Vizier lived. He was thus minutely particular, he said, because the meanest circumstance would be circulated to ever, Durbar in Hindostan, and construed the prognostic of future events, and in that inspection may give birth to them. He thought it his duty, therefore, to avoid every appearance which might be represented as a symptom of encouragement; and by so doing he had the satisfaction to find he had done right. The Nabob accompanied him to his house, and the Governor paid his respects to him on the 20th, and had the honour of a long conversation, in which he explained all the motives of his visit, and painted the wretched condition of his father in such glowing colours as exceeded, he said, his [the Governor's] powers of language to do them justice in the recital.

The sum was, that his father was a mere passive instrument in the hands of others, and that he [the Prince] had undertaken a journey at the peril of his head, as the only chance of affording relief to the King, and a restoration of the dominions of his house; that if he could effect this, he wished for nothing for himself but the credit of having served his father with duty, zeal, and fidelity. He observed that, distressed as the royal family was, he lived in splendor, had his jagheer, his horses, his elephants, and, comparatively, every comfort of domestic ease and pleasure; all which he had willingly sacrificed, and exposed his life to danger, and his person to fatigue, for the sake of procuring for his father that ease and tranquillity of mind which he himself had relinquished, in which if he failed, he would either return on his Majesty's command, which he trembled to think of, or would go to Calcutta, and there solicit a passage for England, which, he understood, was not more than five months; and he could accommodate himself to any situation, and bear whatever others could bear, in the well-grounded hope of obtaining the wished-for relief. He said, the Governor was not to expect letters from his father of any other complexion than such as were consonant to the wishes of those who were about him; but he knew his real sentiments were what he had imparted to Major Browne. The Governor might be sure that his conduct could not be displeasing to his Majesty, when he assured him that the whole revenue of his empire, for the support of his domestic establishment, did not exceed a lack and 50,000 rupces.—It was natural, he said, for those, by whose power the Sullanut was supported, to endeavour to raise themselves to the independent possession of it, and so that he would submit; but it was the condition of vassalage and humiliation to which the servants of the King had degraded him, that he regretted, and which his sense of duty could not suffer him to see with forbearance. Such was the tenor of his grievances.—In reply, the Governor told him, that the Company's government had just emerged from a state of universal warfare, and required a term of repose; that his nation was weary of war, and dreaded the renewal of it; that it would be equally alarmed at any movement which might eventually tend to create new hostilities; that he came there with a limited authority, and could not engage in a business so full of danger without the concurrence of his colleagues, who, he was sure, would be averse to it; that the country of Oude was in a disordered state, and the Nabob incapable of joining immediately in such a plan; and that to assist the Nabob with the power and influence of the English government to retrieve his affairs, and enable him to perform the duties of loyalty to his sovereign, was the sole business of the Governor at Lucknow. In the mean time, the Prince's residence there, though still and inactive, might be of use as a check upon the people at Delhi, who would not dare to proceed to farther extremities while there was a possibility of his cause being espoused from that quarter; that he [the Governor] would represent his situation to the joint members of his own government, and wait their determination; and in the mean time he might make what advances he thought proper to Madajee Scindia, as he was at the head of the Mahratta state, and was a sworn friend to the English government. This was all that materially passed at this interview. No person was present; nor any communication has yet been made of it, except in secret, to the other members of the board. In the mean time, Major Browne has since arrived here, on the express errand of re-conducting the Prince to court, and to give him assurance of pardon for his past transgressions. What may be the final issue, or even the progressive events, of this visit, the Governor does not pretend so much as to conjecture. He only can promise to have a watchful eye that it may not tend to any consequences which may interfere with his present economical plan, or disturb the tranquillity of the Company's possessions.

One trait of the young Prince's character the Governor reports of his own knowledge: that when he arrived at the place where the first honours were paid him, he was without money, and destitute of every necessary of life, having scarce a change of raiment; yet to his own distresses he seemed insensible, but privately hinted to the gentleman who was appointed to attend him, that the King his father was in such a state of wretchedness, that any supply of money, however small, would be an acceptable gift; and this was further confirmed by the Governor's interpreter, who being sent by the Vizier with a supply of 15,000 rupees for his private use, received the same with many expressions of thanks; but declared that, while his father wanted necessities, he could by no means indulge himself in superfluities, and therefore requested the Governor and Nabob-Vizier to remit the money for the use of his father; and that as, by the attention of the English and others, he had at present more than sufficient for himself, he should take the first opportunity of returning the overplus to his father.

* * * From the foregoing account of the mysterious journey of the young Prince Buke, it evidently appears that his errand was, to solicit success to commence a war; that if he did not succeed at the Court of Lucknow, he was to be recalled, which he actually was, in order to apply elsewhere; and that, this being no mystery to Gov. Hastings, he advised him to make advances to Madajee Scindia.

MR. URBAN, Jamaica, Aug. 1784
CARTE, in his History of England, folio, vol. II. p. 420, anno 1335, asserts, that "Edward Baliol was now the only survivor left of the line of Margaret the eldest daughter of David Earl of Huntingdon; and, having no issue, the crown would descend of course, after his death, to David Bruce, the undoubted heir of Isabel, her second sister. Some, indeed, are apt to imagine, that a sister of King John Baliol had been married either to John Comyn the father, E. of Buchan, or to John Comyn the son, Lord of Badenogh. But this is said without any just foundation; and, if it had been really so in fact, the lines of both these John Comyns had been extinct above eight years before. This appears by Rymer, IV. 251, 252, that the two nieces of the elder John Comyn, late Earl of Buchan, were his next and true heirs."

Did not the Earl of Douglas, in his claim of the crown of Scotland in 1369, derive his title from the Comyns?

Our general Histories of England seem silent respecting the lives and dates of the deaths of Philippa of Clarence, and Philippa of Lancaster*, grand-daughters of Edward the Third; of Blanche and Philippa, daughters of Henry the Fourth; and of Ann Mortimer, grandmother of Edward the Fourth. Can any of your numerous literary correspondents favour me with anecdotes respecting them? Moreri, Art. "Aumale and Ferdinand the Third of Castile," assigns to Eleanor, the Queen of Edward the First, an uterine brother, Ferdinand Count of Aumale, who left descendants†. Is Moreri supported in that assertion? and if he is, by what right were the Plantagenets Counts of Ponthieu? HORTENSIVS.

* This lady, married to John I. King of Portugal, died in 1741. See Mod. Hist. vol. VIII, p. 428. EDIT.

† The same author, however, in the article "Ponthieu", styles Queen Eleanor "Countess," and her son Edward II. "Count, of Ponthieu," which they could not have been, if she had had a brother. EDIT.

13. New Edition of Ames's Typographical Antiquities, by Mr. Herbert. Vol. I.

AT length appears the first volume of this valuable and elaborate work, which was first announced to the public near ten years ago.

The reasons of this delay, as well as the many and great improvements in this new edition, as set forth by the editor in his advertisement prefixed, are the copiousness of the materials which he has been all this time collecting, the enlargement on the accounts given by Mr. Ames, the innumerable extracts from the Stationers' registers of books licensed by them, whereby the work has been enriched with several memoirs concerning the printers, and books printed with licence, distinguished from those printed without, &c. This, with the introduction of a number of books of which before we had no account, will, it is hoped, make ample compensation for the delay. Under these circumstances, and with the addition of many intelligences liberally communicated from other quarters, it being out of the Editor's power to comprise his design as at first planned and promised in two volumes, and the present volume having obtained the approbation of such of his subscribers as had seen it, who wished him to deliver it without waiting for the remaining, he offers it to the public with the addition of 10 sheets above the proposed quota, and every prudential recommendation of it in the press-work, modestly submitting to their candour the reasonableness of departing from the original plan.

On a review of the great improvements here made on what in Mr. Ames was thought a hardy undertaking (though we do not justify the close adherence to the cut of Mr. A's types), we cannot withhold our share of commendation from Mr. Herbert, wishing him health and life to continue his well-digested plan with all its improvements, and to enjoy the satisfaction of having added to the store of literary knowledge a great number of compositions in every department, as well as of authors, translators, and printers.

* * The 2d volume is in the press, and printing with all convenient speed; but, as great care has been and will be taken in retaining entirely the original orthography (a circumstance greatly neglected by Mr. Ames's original printer) it cannot proceed with so much expedition as Mr. Herbert could wish.

14. An Explanatory Appeal to the Society in general, and his Friends in particular. With an Appendix. By William Matthews. 12mo.

IN this "unbrotherly controversy" between the author and a part of the Monthly Meeting [of Friends] for the North Division of the County of Somerset, who, in consequence, have disowned him, "both as a minister and "a member of society," the public at large are so little interested, that we shall only add, that his objections to their established discipline (as stated by himself) lay principally against their deeming it necessary to fix judgement upon, and disown*, as unfit for their communion, all such as contract marriage out of the pale of their society, and against the censuring and disowning of such as shall not refuse to pay tithes, and other demands imposed by act of parliament, for the establishment of a national church. Respecting all which, he conceived, they had now arrant from scripture, example, or precept, to impose such prohibition or censure. It is needless to add, that we think William Matthews right, and the Monthly Meeting wrong. But how, with such liberal principles, he can continue to be a Quaker, we are yet to learn.

15. Canons of Criticism, extracted from the Beauties of Maty's Review, and the Oratorical Powers of Dr. Horsley. 8vo.

THIS writer, being one of the majority who, during the late dissensions in a certain learned body, supported the president in the chair, has here taken occasion to vent his spleen against the two principal leaders of the opposition, by throwing some critical squibs at Mr. Maty's Review and Dr. Horsley's Speeches. And in these, it must be owned, he has too well succeeded. But we will not join in the invidious task of exposing these motes in our brother's eye, conscious of the beam in our own.

18. An Account of the ancient Division of the English Nation into Hundreds and Tithings; the happy Effects of that Institution, &c. By Granville Sharp, Esq. 8vo.

(Reviewed by a Correspondent).

THE diligent and patriotic author of this work, pursuing, as he is always wont, the most extensive method of information, carries his enquiries back to the earliest periods of our constitution, and shews how excellent the institution was for the preservation of public peace and harmony, by an exact division of the people into decennaries, tithings, or ten households, who held a court, of which the headborough was judge; whereby every little community could answer for all its members, and could instantly find an interloper who had fled from the hand of Justice, or who had committed any crime against his neighbours; for he says, "that all the old historians agree that an entire stop to all robbery and violence was immediately effected by this regulation, and that bracelets of gold were hung up in the highways, and no one durst steal them away." The revival of it, at this melancholy period and degeneracy of our police, would be, if practicable, a very acceptable measure; but we fear our evils have too far increased! The decision of the tithingman's or headborough's court was referable, in matters of high import, to the centenarii, that is, the hundred court, and the juries were summoned from among the vicinage; the same that we now call the hundred or high constable's court. The learned author, after very elaborately clearing away all misconceptions of the several terms, and displaying great skill in our ancient law relative to the several tenures by which the people formerly held their rights, takes occasion to say, (p. 42,) "If the right of voting were fully restored, throughout the kingdom, to all householders or masters of families, who principally support the burdens of the state, even if the franchise should descend no lower (which he inclines to think it does), it would be amply sufficient. I trust, to destroy the present deplorable corruption in the representation, or rather the misrepresentation, of the commons, and to restore the ancient dignity and freedom of parliament; especially if all the said householders were duly incorporated as deciners, or freeborns; in their respective neighbourhoods." He presses this argument warmly, and urges that all the deciners (or householders) have "in justice and

"constitutional right," a right to vote—and he goes on to propose that two such divisions, of a thousand deciners each, would be a proper number, throughout the kingdom, to send one deputy to parliament, according to the present population of the kingdom, so as rather to diminish the present number of representatives. And as the voters would be confined to householders in each division, it would obviate the expence of sending for them from a distance, and the order in each would obviate much of the tumult and debaucheries used at elections. By this mode, he may perhaps overthrow the objections which have been made by many to his scheme, proposed long ago, and in which he still perseveres, of reviving annual elections—and we should be inclined to favour his opinion, on the score of regularity, on which he grounds the whole, being preserved in each of these small divisions; but we recollect that mankind are now immersed in luxury, and though the government were to alter, yet they would remain the same, and we might expect to see nearly the same licentiousness prevail in a division of ten decennaries, as now in a whole county—for the fear of corrupting men to vote would not be strong enough to hinder the temptation by the candidates, nor the fear of the high constable's staff deter the voters from taking the bribe: wards and parishes are often not less corrupt at their elections, than boroughs in a borough, or freeholders in a county. In speaking of the ancient congregational courts, held by the sheriffs twice in every year, for the judgement of causes ecclesiastical, criminal, and civil, he mentions the encroachment of episcopal authority, which assumed a self-erected power to judge of all these matters alone, according to foreign canons and decretals unknown to the people, for which purpose a fictitious charter was set up and enrolled in the time of Richard II. said to have been granted by William the Conqueror, but never known till then, which was 300 years after the demise of that prince. Here our author gives a loose to loud and honest denunciations against the church of Antichrist; but we spare to follow him through the digression. He laments that this forgery has caused the jealousy which now subsists between the ecclesiastical and the common law, and which has effectually prevented the bishop of the diocese from sitting in the county court, and pronouncing censure and punishment nishment for vice and immorality; whereby, he alleges, "these evils have increased, and men have lost a due recollection and distinction between right and wrong." We wish it were from no other cause; but political corruption has spread wide the evils of which he complains, and the law of the land is open to all such flagrant offenders; which obviates the author's lamentation on the absence of the bishop.

But here we must stop, to reprove our author for an unjust deduction in a note (p. 85), where, justly bewailing the extent of our Statute Book, he says, that "Men are prompted, by the difficulty of obtaining justice, to revenge their own quarrels with their own hands. And hence duelling, bloodshed, and murder!" This is unbecoming an English subject of these days, when the laws are so constantly and diligently administered in all parts of the kingdom, and every magistrate's daily court of enquiry is thronged with prayers for redress of grievances, and where the execution of the laws is duly enforced with solemnity and christian compassion. That this affords but little warning, is the fault of the people, not of the laws, or the administration of them. But if the Church hath once assumed an inordinate power in our courts, as the author states, we should be inclined to differ from him in his recommendation of the ecclesiastical communicants in every diocese electing a bishop to preside, as heretofore, over all causes ecclesiastical. It is surely more consistent that episcopacy, so much the favourite of the author, should take the Christian charge of instructing its communicants in the way to salvation, and leave the punishment of offences to the laws of the land, and, finally, to God. As to the people's right of electing bishops to serve in parliament, or to instruct them in religion, here we must certainly concur, and hope that if the proposed scheme of sending a bishop to Nova Scotia be resumed, it will be without compulsion, so that the people may chuse out of such clergymen as shall be sent, and not be compelled to have one forced upon them. The diligent author has so accurately developed all the ancient forms of our first establishment, that we would recommend his work to the perusal of all those whose capacious minds dream of settling new colonies, and to those able statesmen who are contriving the plan of a national reformation in England. In short, the sanguine author offers this little tract, or rather the plan proposed in it, of reviving the ancient division of the kingdom, as a general specific, or universal panacea, for all the evils with which the nation now groans. He has, in this work, taken occasion very effectually to answer a late flimsy pamphlet, intituled, Thoughts on a Parliamentary Reform. But, after all, how much inclined soever we may be to join with the learned enquirer in urging a reform, still we know, not how, in such times of overflowing population as the present, to concur in the wish to re-establish a due regard to things throughout the kingdom; as the multiplicity of small jurisdictions, which this would create, would be an evil as great as all those of which he complains. Besides, if we were to examine into all the counties throughout the kingdom, and all their hundreds, we should find that the ancient mode of division still subsisted, though we have, in some degree, forgotten the wise regulations and observances of order in each of them.—Upon the whole, the author's present, like all his former works, breathes his usual spirit of perseverance in the cause of truth and the public good; and we wish that the people would listen attentively, and amend the evils of which he so justly complains.

19. A System of Surgery. By Benjamin Bell, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons, one of the Surgeons to the Royal Infirmary, and Fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh. Illustrated with Copper Plates. Vol. II. 8vo.

PROCEEDING on the plan announced in our account of the former volume* of this work, our author begins his present publication with an account "Of the Stone," and the several diseases thence arising, which are extended through nine different sections, in which the several operations of lithotomy are fully considered, and the preference given to the lateral operation, with the improvements of modern lithotomists. The two last sections of this chapter treat "Of Nephrotomy," and "Of Stones in the Urethra." The next chapter, which is the XIIth, contains an account "Of Incontinence of Urine," with the several methods of relieving it. This disease our author

supposes generally to depend upon one of these three causes, viz. 1. From "a constant irritation about the neck of the bladder, produced by the friction of stones contained in it;" 2. From "paralytic affections," in which "the sphincter of the bladder now and then loses its contractile power, while the natural tone of its body, or of the muscle termed Detrusor Urinae, remains entire;" or, lastly, from "laceration produced in the operation of lithotomy in male subjects, and in the same operation, and by violence done to the parts in delivery, in females."—Our author next treats "Of a Suppression of Urine," in which he recommends the early use of the catheter; blood-letting, both general and topical, "in considerable quantity;" opiates, in large doses;" mild injections, "thrown up by the rectum;" and immersion of the whole body "in the warm bath." And, these means failing, nothing (he observes) "is to be depended on but puncturing the bladder, in order to discharge the urine collected in it." And here he gives "the preference, in perhaps every instance of suppression of urine," to "the mode of puncturing the bladder from the perinaeum," because "it is done with great ease," and "the urine contained in the bladder is more readily evacuated than by puncturing above the pubes; and it is less liable to escape into the neighbouring parts." But surely our ingenious author, in the present instance, has somewhat exceeded the limits of general experience, in thus pronouncing the puncturing the bladder per perinaeum to be an operation that may be "done with great ease." Has he not seen the controversy that was carried on in our Magazine, respecting this operation, in the years 1777 and 1778? It was there shewn to be an operation of very difficult performance, and which, when performed, has in some instances been known to fail, "the operator not getting into the bladder." The method "of perforating the bladder by means of a curved trocar entered from the rectum," indeed, is mentioned; but Mr. Bell does not so much as condescend to describe it, remarking, that "it scarcely deserves to be noticed, as no advantages can possibly occur from it that may not, with more certainty, be obtained from perforating in the perinaeum; and it is attended with this very material inconvenience, that, by passing the instrument in at the back part of the bladder, much risk must be incurred of wounding either the ureters vasa deferentia, or vesiculae seminales." Without further consideration, therefore, we can with freedom venture to say, that this method of operating "ought never to be employed." But, before we thus condemn an operation, the happy effects of which have been often experienced, we think it right to observe, that the accidents, to which Mr. Bell thinks the operation liable, have not appeared even in those instances in which the patients did not recover, as has been proved by dissection of the bodies after death, And the puncture per anum has this very material circumstance to recommend it, that it has never been known to fail the operator in evacuating the urine. But we must apologise for entering, however briefly, into medical controversy, and proceed to the more immediate business of the present article. Chap. XIV. treats of "Obstructions in the Urethra," the most common cause of which our author has found to be "a particular kind of swelling, or enlargement, of the corpus spongiosum urethrae." He has treated the subject at full length, and his modes of treatment, varying according to the different causes upon which the obstruction is supposed to depend, are such as have been long approved by very large experience.—"Of the Fistula in Perinaeo" is the title of the XVth chapter. In the treatment of this disease our author recommends opening the different sinuses, but condemns the use of the catheter, and of bougies; observing, that, instead of forwarding the cicatrization of such sores, they uniformly tend to retard it, by frequently tearing open such adhesions as Nature, if left to herself, would have made altogether complete.—Chap. XVI. "Of the Hemorrhoids, or Piles." In this very painful and troublesome disease Mr. B. extols the use of "an ointment composed of equal parts of oak-galls, very finely powdered, and hogs-lard, or butter;" or "a strong infusion of galls," to be used in the form of injection. Balsam Copaiba, in the dose of of from 30 to 80 drops, twice a day, is also recommended, as found useful in relieving pain, and obviating costiveness. When, however, the tumors of piles become very large, they are recommended to be removed, either by ligature or excision.—Chap. XVII. “Of condylomatous Excrescences, and similar Affections of the Anus.” Different escharotics, with the use of the scalpel, or caustics, are the remedies advised in these affections.—Chap. XVIII. “Of a Prolapsus Ani.” A truss, of a particular construction, is recommended for the cure of this disease.—Chap. XIX. “Of an Imperforated Anus.” Two cases of this kind have fallen under our author’s care, and the method he practised for their relief is accurately described.—Chap. XX. “Of the Fistula in Ano.” The method of treatment recommended is similar to that used by Mr. Pott; and, we believe, by almost every rational practitioner of the present day.—Chap. XXI. “Of the Paracentesis of the Abdomen.” A canula, of a flat form, is recommended in performing this operation, with an equal pressure of the abdomen by a bandage, which is delineated in a copper-plate, and was invented by the late Dr. Monro.—Chap. XXII. “Of the Paracentesis of the Thorax.” The method of performing this operation is well described, and recommended as being “equally proper for the discharge of any other fluid, as for collections of water, or of purulent matter.” This chapter is divided into sections, which treat of the different collections of serum, blood, pus, and air, in the thorax.—Chap. XXIII. “Of Bronchotomy.” The causes (mentioned by our author) which may induce a necessity for performing this operation are, 1. “Any spasmodic affection of the muscles of the larynx, when it arrives at such a height as to endanger suffocation;” 2. “A piece of bone, flesh, or any other firm substance, being lodged in the pharynx, or in the upper part of the œsophagus, and being too large to pass down to the stomach, may, by its bulk, press so much upon the posterior and membranaceous part of the trachea, as to produce a total obstruction to the passage of the air into the lungs;” 3. “Polypous excrescences in the nose falling so far into the pharynx as to endanger suffocation;” 4. “Tumors

“of a firm nature, particularly those of the schirrhous and fleshy kinds, even when situated externally, have been known to compress the trachea so much as to obstruct respiration almost entirely;” 5. “An inflammation of the tongue, arriving at such an height as to obstruct the passage to the fauces entirely;” 6. “Swellings of the amygdalæ, and contiguous parts, that do not terminate speedily in suppuration;” 7. “Obstructed respiration from drowning.” The operation is next very fully and judiciously described; but for this we must refer to the work itself.—Chap. XXIV. “Of Oesophagotomy.” This operation is directed to be performed in those cases where the instrument termed a probang will not succeed. For an account of it we must also refer to the work.—Chap. XXV. “Of the Amputation of Cancerous Mamma.” Our author appears a strong advocate for the early performance of this operation, which he directs to be done by a process in which the cure will commonly be obtained by what surgeons in general have termed “the first intention;” that is, “without the formation of matter, merely by the adhesion of the teguments to the subjacent muscles.”

Two other volumes of this work, we understand, are in the press.

20. The London Medical Journal, for October, November, and December, 1784. 8vo.

BESIDES the account of books, and medical and philosophical news, (of which last we have given some extracts p. 61,) this number contains the following Essays and Observations: “Case of a Stone in the Bladder. By Benjamin Chandler, M. D. of Canterbury,” &c. [Of this also an extract has been given in our last, p. 61.]—“An Account of a remarkable Spasmodic Affection. By Mr. William Hulke, of Deal in Kent.”—“Case of a Fistula in Ano, cured by Means of a Caustic; by Mr. P. Dillon, late Surgeon of the 105th Regiment of Foot.”—“Case of an extra-uterine Fœtus. By Mr. Cammel, Surgeon at Bungay in Suffolk.”—“Three Cases of Women inoculated during Pregnancy.” [These all recovered, and only one of the children had the distemper, and was born dead. The other two had no appearance of it.]—“By Mr. B. Roberts, Surgeon, of Salisbury.”

"liberty."—"Case of Obstruction of the Bowels; with Remarks." By Robert Willan, M. D." &c. [This patient, who had no evacuation by stool for upwards of thirty days, took, without effect, six ounces of quicksilver, in doses of two drachms, and died in consequence of a tumor in the rectum, unattended by heat, fever, or any of the common inflammatory symptoms.]—"Case of a Luxation of the Thigh Bone." By Mr. William Cribb, Surgeon, at Bishop Stortford." [As Wiseman and other eminent surgeons have wholly denied the possibility of a luxation of the femur from the acetabulum, a relation of cases, which tend to overturn this erroneous hypothesis, becomes the more necessary. The subject of this accident was a boy about nine years old; and the luxation was complete.]

21. First Lines of the Practice of Physic. By William Cullen, M. D. Professor of the Practice of Physic in the University of Edinburgh, First Physician to His Majesty for Scotland, Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians of Edinburgh, of the Royal Societies of London, Edinburgh, &c. &c. &c. A Fourth Edition*, corrected and enlarged. 4 Vols. 8vo.

THIS system of the doctrines and rules of the practice of physic, the result of "more than 40 years experience," the author informs us in his Preface, was, at its first publication, intended chiefly as a kind of Text-book for those who attended his lectures, and in every subsequent edition it has been "rendered more full and comprehensive." His system, he declares, is in many respects new, and therefore he explains on what grounds, and from what considerations, it has been attempted; which he does by briefly considering the state of the science of physic, from Galen to the present times; by remarking "on the principal systems of medicine which have of late prevailed in Europe, and taking notice of the present state of physic as it is influenced by these." In particular, he animadverts at large on the three different systems of STAHL, HOFFMAN, and BOERHAAVE. Of the first "the chief and leading principle is, that the rational soul of man governs the whole œconomy of his body;" a fan-giful hypothesis, which has been confuted by Hoffman, and on which Dr. Cullen has here added some strictures of his own: 2. Hoffman has received into his system a great deal of the mechanical, Cartesian, and chemical doctrines of the former systems, with many important facts, and principally a due consideration of "the state and affections of the primary moving powers" in the animal œconomy, unnoticed by his predecessors. But in this too our author discovers some imperfection and incorrectness. And, 3, after "touching upon the great lines" of the Boerhaavean system, he undertakes "to point out" in that also many "imperfections and deficiencies, in order to shew the propriety and necessity of attempting a new one."—Both in "the diseases of the simple solid," and "with respect to the state and various condition of the animal fluids," considering also "the almost total neglect of the state of the moving powers of the animal body, and the prevalence of an hypothetical humoral pathology, so conspicuous in every part of Dr. Boerhaave's system," our professor contends, that "it is not only deficient and incomplete, but fallacious, and apt to mislead."

In conclusion, insisting that not only "a collection of facts," but "some system of principles, by a proper induction and generalization of facts," is essential towards forming a safe and useful treatise of physic, as, in opposition to this opinion, the late M. Lieutaud has given a collection of "facts, without any reasoning concerning their causes," Dr. Cullen offers some remarks "on the promising Synopsis Universæ Medicinæ," in which he discovers such a "total want of method, arrangement, system, or [and] decision," as renders it, he thinks, "of little use," and may much perplex the learner. Into the detail we will not enter, and will only add, that our professor, in his own work (he says), has not only collected facts, but endeavoured "to apply them to the investigation of proximate causes, and upon these to establish a more scientific and decided method of cure," avoiding "hypothesis and theories," establishing "many general doctrines, both physiological and pathological," and suggesting "that which appeared to be the method approved of by experience, as much as it was the consequence of system."

Such

* See vol. LIV. p. 926.

Such is the outline of this new system of physic, which comprehends, the author presumes, the whole of the facts relating to the science; collects and arranges them, he hopes, in better order than has been done before; and points out, in particular, those which are still wanting to establish general principles. Having been so copious in our account of it, we shall not descend to particular subjects, but only give the heads into which this important work is divided, and of which the professed intention is, "to give instruction for discerning, distinguishing, preventing, and curing diseases."

Febrile Diseases, including Fevers and Inflammations of the Eye, Lungs, Stomach, Intestines, Liver, and Kidneys, Phrensy, and various Kinds of Quinsy, with their respective Phenomena, Proximate and Remote Causes, and Cure. Rheumatism, Tooth-Ach, Gout, Eruptive Fevers, Small-Pox, Chicken-Pox, Measles, Scarlet Fever, Plague, Erysipelas, Miliary Fever, &c. Hæmorrhages, Consumption of the Lungs, Hæmorrhoidal Swelling and Flux, Symptomatic Hæmorrhages, Profluvia, Catarrh, Dysentery, Nervous Diseases, Comata, Adynamia, or Diseases consisting in a Loss of Motion in either the Vital or Natural Functions, Fainting, Indigestion, Hypochondriasis, Spasmodic Affections without Fever, Ditto of the Vital Functions, Palpitation of the Heart, Difficult Breathing, Asthma, Croup, Spasmodic Affections in the Natural Functions, Disorders of the Intellectual Functions, Emaciations, Adipose, Flatulence, and Watery Swellings, Rickets, King's-Evil, Venereal Disease, Scurvy and Jaundice.—One general remark we cannot help making, that what is advanced on several diseases inclines us to say, with the Client in Terence, Multo incertior sum quam dudum. As an instance, we will only quote a paragraph relating to the Diabetes. "In all the instances of this disease, which I myself have seen, and in several others of which I have been informed, no cure of it has ever been made in Scotland, though many instances of it have occurred, and in most of them the remedies recommended by authors have been diligently employed. I cannot therefore, with any advantage, enter into a detail of these remedies," &c. And in one or two instances the Professor's theory seems to militate with his own general system.

22. A Treatise on Struma, or Scrofula, commonly called The King's Evil; in which the Impropriety of considering it as an Hereditary Disease is pointed out; more rational Causes are assigned; and a successful Method of Treatment is recommended. By Thomas White, Surgeon to the London Dispensary. 8vo. 1783.

AS this pamphlet relates to a very interesting subject, and appears to be written by a gentleman of skill in his profession, we have selected the following extracts:

"Struma, by all who have wrote upon it hitherto, has been considered as an hereditary disease; but I shall endeavour to assign other, and I hope more rational causes, and prove that opinion not to be justly founded. That it is a disease more general in this country than many others, must be readily admitted; and the opinion of an eminent Italian writer, Zaviani, corroborates this idea, for he calls it the English distemper....

"Persons of red or light-coloured hair are said to be peculiarly subject to this disease; but that this complaint is not confined to the colour of the hair, or the complexion, is evident from the numbers of people that have dark hair and similar * complexions being very frequently strumous....

"We have frequent examples of one child's being strumous, and the rest of the family perfectly free; but if the disease was truly hereditary, none could be expected to escape....

"There are many who suppose this disease to be communicated by nurses†; but this I cannot admit. The instances are sufficiently common where children thrive very well, while the mother or nurse may labour under a variety of complaints; but, on the other hand, where nurses have acute diseases, in most cases the children suffer very materially; and in situations of this kind no one will hesitate to say their milk must be improper for the nutriment of a child; but we are supposed to be speaking of nurses to all appearance in perfect health, and I consider it as of little consequence to the infant, whatever may be the probable disease or diseases of her habit of body. Every one will naturally make choice of those women who come the nearest to the standard of perfection in point of form, if there are otherwise no material objections; but we shall often find, as to women who are of a thin delicate skin, well-proportioned in every respect, and who make the best nurses, that their own children, having the mother's delicacy, and

* "The children of the poorer Jews are almost invariably strumous; and I have had several black people under my care with the same complaint."

† This was the case with Dr. Johnson, See p. 106, ELT.

from

from thence a great degree of susceptibility, have frequent enlargements and affections of the lymphatic glands. I do not, however, conceive that the milk of the nurse, when in perfect health, can possibly create a disposition in the child to the probable diseases of her habit of body....

"Children who have become strumous after inoculation, have been supposed to have had the disease conveyed to their habit with the variolous matter; but I consider this supposition to be equally ill-founded; as I have tried, in many different instances, if struma was a communicable disease, and am firmly of opinion that it is not."

We have selected the two last paragraphs, from a conviction that it must afford real satisfaction to many parents whose children may be supposed to labour under this complaint from either of the preceding causes. We should be glad to give a longer extract from so useful a performance, but the limits of our work will not admit of more than the following addition:

"Prevention of disease has long been considered of so much importance as to become a proverbial phrase; and in no instance can the application of it be more proper, or deserve more serious attention, than in the disease under our present consideration.

"In very young children the prevention of a complaint so general, and so alarming in its consequences, will principally depend upon a proper attention to air, cleanliness, exercise, and diet; and when more advanced, the form, age, and constitution of the patient will be the best guide what kind of regimen, and what other means, may be best suited to this important object."

MR. MASON has prefaced his translation with the following "Epistle to Sir Joshua Reynolds," his friend and commentator:

"When DRYDEN, worn with sickness,
bow'd with years,
Was doom'd, (my friend, let pity warm thy tears!)
The galling pang of penury to feel,
For ill-plac'd loyalty and courtly zeal,
To see that laurel, which his brows o'er-
spread,
Transplanted droop on Shadwell's barren
head,
The bard oppress'd, yet not subdu'd by fate,
For very bread descended to translate:

And he, whose fancy, copious as his phrase,
Could light at will Expression's brightest
blaze,

On FRESNOY's lay employ'd his studious
hour;

But niggard there of that melodious power,
His pen in haste the hiring task to close,
Transform'd the studied strain to careless prose,

Which, fondly lending faith to French pretence,

Mistook its meaning, or obscur'd its sense.

"Yet still he pleas'd, for DRYDEN still must please,

Whether with artless elegance and ease

He glides in prose, or from its tinkling chime,

By varied pauses purifies his rhyme,

And mounts on MARO's plumes, and soars his heights sublime.

"This artless elegance, this native fire, Provok'd his tuneful heir * to strike the lyre.

Who, proud his numbers with that prose to
join,

Wove an illustrious wreath for Friendship's
shrine.

"How oft, on that fair shrine when poets
bind

The flowers of song, does partial passion blind

Their judgment's eye! How oft does Truth disclaim

The deed, and scorn to call it genuine fame!
How did she here, when JERVAS was the
theme,

Wast through the ivory gate the poet's dream?

How view, indignant, Error's base altar

The sterling lustre of his praise destroy,

Which now, if praise like his my Muse
could coin,

Current through ages, she would stamp for thine.

"Let Friendship, as she caus'd, excuse the deed;

With thee, and such as thee, she must succeed.

"But what, if Fashion tempted POPE astray?

The witch has spells, and JERVAS knew a day

When mode-struck belles and beaux were proud to come

And buy of him a thousand years of bloom†.

* "Mr. Pope, in his Epistle to Jervas, has these lines:

Read these instructive leaves, in which conspire

Fresnoy's close art with Dryden's native
fire."

† "Alluding to another couplet in the same Epistle:

Beauty, frail flower, that every season
fears,

Blooms in thy colours for a thousand years."

"Ev'n

"Ev'n then I deem it but a venial crime :
Perish alone that selfish sordid rhyme,
Which flatters lawless sway, or tinsel pride;
Let black Oblivion plunge it in her tide.

"From fate like this my truth-supported
lays,
Ev'n if aspiring to thy pencil's praise,
Would flow secure; but humbler aims are
mine;

Know, when to thee I consecrate the line,
'Tis but to thank thy genius for the ray
Which pours on FRESNOY's rules a fuller
day :

Those candid strictures; those reflections
new,

Refin'd by taste, yet still as nature true,
Which, blended here with his instructive strains,

Shall bid thy art inherit new domains;
Give her in Albion, as in Greece, to rule,
And guide (what thou hast form'd) a British school.

"And O, if aught thy poet can pretend
Beyond his fav'rite wish to call thee friend,
Be it that here his tuneful toil has dress'd
The Muse of FRESNOY in a modern vest;
And, with what skill his fancy could bestow,
Taught the close folds to take an easier flow;
Be it, that here thy partial smile approv'd
The pains he lavish'd on the art he lov'd.

OG. 10, 1782.

W. MASON."

This version, we are told in the Preface, was a very youthful attempt, and to Sir Joshua Reynolds's offer of illustrating it with notes we owe the publication, revised in a maturer age, and corrected by Mr. Gray. Besides the prose of Dryden, there has also been a blank and bald version by Mr. Wills, a painter and a clergyman.—The Art of Painting, however, now appears comme il faut, and is not only as pleasing as such a didactic poem can be, but, by the notes and illustrations of such a master as Sir Joshua, the English has all the grace of an original, and will descend with lustre to future ages.

As a specimen both of the translation and the notes, we will add the directions given on the following subject :

"XXXIII. There must not be two equal lights in the picture."

"Permit not two conspicuous lights to shine

With rival radiance in the same design;
But yield to one alone the power to blaze
And spread th' extensive vigor of its rays,*
These where the noblest figures are display'd;
Thence gild the distant parts and lessening
fade :

As fade the beams which Phœbus from the East

Flings vivid forth to light the distant West,
Gradual those vivid beams forget to shine,
So gradual let thy pictur'd lights decline.

"The sculptur'd forms, which some proud
Circus grace,

In Parian marble or Corinthian brass,
Illumin'd thus, give to the gazing eye
Th' expressive head in radiant majesty;
While to each lower limb the fainter ray
Lends only light to mark, but not display:
So let this pencil fling its beams around;
Nor e'er with darker shades their force confound,

For shades too dark differ'd shapes will give,
And sink the parts their softness would relieve;

Then only well reliev'd, when like a veil
Round the full lights the wand'ring shadows steal;

Then only justly spread, when to the sight
A breadth of shade pursues a breadth of light.
This charm to give, great Titian wisely made
The cluster'd grapes his rule of light and shade."

On the lines thus marked *, after remarking on the management of the Dutch and Venetian painters, part of Sir Joshua's observations are as follows :

"I shall here set down the result of the observations which I have made on the works of those artists who appear to have best understood the management of light and shade, and who may be considered as examples in this branch of the art.

"Titian, Paul Veronese, and Tintoret were among the first painters who reduced to a system what was before practised without any fixed principle, and consequently neglected occasionally. From the Venetian painters Rubens extracted his scheme of composition, which was soon understood and adopted by his countrymen, and extended even to the minor painters of familiar life in the Dutch school.

"When I was at Venice, the method I took to avail myself of their principles was this: When I observed any extraordinary effect of light and shade in any picture, I took a leaf of my pocket-book, and darkened every part of it in the same gradation of light and shade as the picture, leaving the white paper untouched, to represent light, and this without any attention to the subject, or to the drawing of the figures. A few trials of this kind will be sufficient to give the method of their conduct in the management of their lights. After a few trials I found the paper blotted nearly alike. Their general practice appeared to be, to allow not above a quarter of the picture for the light, including in this portion both the principal and secondary lights; another quarter to be as dark as possible, and the remaining half kept in mezzotinto, or half-shadow.

"Rubens appears to have admitted rather more light than a quarter, and Rembrandt much less, scarce an eighth; by this conduct Rembrandt's light is extremely brilliant; but it costs too much; the rest of the picture is sacrificed to this one object; That light will certainly appear the brightest which is surrounded with the greatest quantity of shade, supposing equal skill in the artist.

"By this means you may likewise remark the various forms and shapes of those lights, as well as the objects on which they are flung, whether on a figure or the sky, on a white napkin, on animals, or utensils, often introduced for this purpose*. It may be observed, likewise, what portion is strongly relieved, and how much is united with its ground, for it is necessary that some part (though a small one is sufficient) should be sharp and cutting against its ground, whether it be light on a dark, or dark on a light ground, in order to give firmness and distinctness to the work; if, on the other hand, it is relieved on every side, it will appear as if inlaid on its ground. Such a blotted paper, held at a distance from the eye, will strike the spectator as something excellent for the disposition of light and shadow, though he does not distinguish whether it is a History, a Portrait, a Landscape, dead Game, or any thing else; for the same principles extend to every branch of the art.

"Whether I have given an exact account, or made a just decision of the quantity of light admitted into the works of those painters, is of no very great consequence; let every person examine and judge for himself; it will be sufficient if I have suggested the method of examining the picture in this way, one means at least of acquiring the principles on which they wrought."

None but a painter, it is evident, could have written these notes, or the poem which occasioned them; and, we may add, none but a painter could have translated it. But Mr. Mason is lamp pictor quam poeta.

24. A Dialogue between the Earl of Chesterfield and Mr. Garrick, in the Elysian Shades. 41.

MR. BUTT, one of his Majesty's chaplains, who attended the obsequies of Dr. Johnson, and is a native of the same city, is the acknowledged author of this elegium on his merits, of which the following may serve as a specimen.

"MILTON in his manly days Possess'd (as well he might) a manly soul.

* Of this the following instance is mentioned in another note: "In a whole length portrait by Vandyke, which is in the gallery of the Duke of Montagu, the dress would have an ungraceful effect; he has therefore, by means of a light back ground, opposed to the light of a figure, and by the help of a curtain that touches the light near the figure, made the effect of the whole together full and rich to the eye."

But JOHNSON, in our days emasculate, Bulg'd from the fenny flames of his times,
And pour'd a meteor of such majesty
As MILTON's self shone in his active age.
If my great friend at MILTON's moral worth
Smote strong, and nearly shatter'd to the ground

His merits as a man, he left him still Thron'd on Sublimity's sublimest heights,
And seem'd to me the only man whose mind
Found thoughts, found words, suiting the theme august,

Able to bring great MILTON's stretch of soul,

His noblest work, his holiest poetry,
Full in our view in seraph-glories dress'd.
This portrait JOHNSON was endow'd to draw;

And, when with SHAKESPEARE I the work survey'd,

We saw this great Archangel into view
Rising, but not with ruin'd majesty,
And at the mighty Painter's working bow'd,
Astonish'd at his awful truth of hand,
His vast capacity of mental fight.

Slaves to the whistle of a glorious name
Marvel, that JOHNSON dar'd from MILTON's brow

Rend a few ringlets—but the judging few
Know that he leaves his great original
Divinely awful, one that well may spare
The spoils that candid Wisdom calls her own."

25. The Danger of violent Innovations in the State exemplified from the Reigns of the Two first Stuarts, in a Sermon preached at the Cathedral and Metropolitane Church of Christ, Canterbury, on Monday, Jan. 31, 1785, being the Day appointed to be kept as the Anniversary of the Martyrdom of King Charles the First. By George Berkeley, D. L. Vice Dean of Canterbury, and Chancellor of Brecknock. 4to.

FROM Proverbs xxiv. 21, My son, fear thou the Lord and the King, and meddle not with them that are given to change. After a short historical deduction of the leading causes that terminated in the fatal event of the day, and a just panegyric on our government and present king, the preacher thus introduces the important change, or reform, now meditated:

"That our constitution is absolutely perfect it would be ridiculous to assert. Perfection belongs not to laps'd humanity. That a better constitution may be conceived, we do not positively deny. For many theories may be clearly conceived, which, by the utmost human ingenuity, are not reducible to practice.

"It may, however, be confidently asserted, that so few and so unimportant are the defects, fects, so many and so valuable the perfections of the nicely-balanced British Constitution, as to render it highly probable that any innovations in its system will be more likely to injure than to improve it.

"The people, it is alleged, are not fairly and equally represented. Granting the truth of this position, what benefit could they derive from a more equal representation, which they have not enjoyed, for almost a century, from the present one? During all that time our rights and liberties have been carefully preserved, and, in the name of common sense, what would we have more?"

"No plan of representation could possibly be devised in which the WHOLE NATION would agree. Why, then, should we hazard the consequences of an innovation, which it is barely possible might do some good; but which is much more likely to create discord, and to proceed to lengths which were never intended? Every rank of men, amongst us, both in church and state, may, doubtless, learn most important lessons from the mistakes, as well as from the crimes, of their predecessors.

"Many popular leaders, in the beginning of the reign of Charles, were wise men and true patriots. Now, if differences between such Senators and such a Sovereign produced, in the end, the horrid consequences which we this day lament, what dreadful confusion have we not just cause to expect from differences about the constitution, excited, as seems at present intended, among the people at large throughout the whole island, who have neither leisure nor abilities to comprehend the subject? Besides, although the spirit of superstition be now so fast asleep, that nothing like that which happened in the last century can be apprehended in the present, yet let us not forget, that very lately the President of the Protestant Association assembled twenty thousand followers in the cause of fanaticism.

"Should the legislature, however, in its wisdom, so far yield to the fashionable cry for a parliamentary reformation as to make any alteration in the House of Commons, it will, in that case, unquestionably be our duty, and the duty of every Briton, quietly to submit, although the alteration adopted should appear to us most undesirable."

The dangers here apprehended are placed indeed in a strong light, and the whole discourse is equally replete with historical knowledge and political sagacity.

26. Of the Trial of the Pix. Written in the Year 1760. By the late Edward Wynne, Esq. (Not published.)

AS this is one of the unpublished tracts mentioned p. 17, we will insert it at large.

"This being a proceeding, the very name of which is unknown to our books, I thought it not amiss to set down what I had an accidental opportunity of observing, as to its nature and form: though I drew up an account of it in a smaller compass, and with as little precision as an article in a Dictionary.

"After Trinity term 1760 was held a trial of the Pix (which had not been for twenty years *). This trial was held by virtue of a commission directed to the Privy Council, of whom the Lord Keeper [Healey]; Mr. Legge, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Anson, Lord Falmouth, and Lord Cholmondeley, were present, and sat in a ground-room in the Exchequer. This is a proceeding between the King and his Master of the Mint, to try, by enquiry of twelve men, (chiefly goldsmiths,) whether the money that has been coined, with respect to its quantity and fineness, has been made in pursuance of the covenants of the indenture, to which the Master of the Mint is a party, at his entrance into his office. In every coinage certain specimens are put into an iron box, called The Pix; and it is from the assay of these specimens, in presence of the Jury, that this trial has its name. The form of the proceeding is by reading the commission and indentures, in presence of the Court and Jury; after which a charge is given by the Lord Keeper. The Jury then retire into a room to see the assay made, and have the rolls of the Mint produced before them; and when the assay has been made, they return their inquisition; in consequence of which the Master of the Mint has his discharge for the bullion he has received, or is farther proceeded against, in execution of the penalties established by law for defective coinage.

"According to Mr. Leake †, this trial was established about the 9th of Edward III.

"It is extremely well known, that many of our Kings, in former times, communicated the privilege of coining money to their subjects, particularly to cities and principal monasteries. It is even said ‡, that coins now extant shew there were very few considerable towns without a mint. But the best legal antiquarians, particularly Lord Hale and Madox, prove undeniably from records, that assays were always made at the Exchequer of the money coined at the respective mints*; and that though the owners of the mints had the profit of the coinage, and the residence of coiners among them, yet they had not the power of instituting either the alloy, the denomination, or the stamp†.

27. Observations on the Tea and Window Act, and on the Tea Trade. By Richard Twining. 8vo.

MR. TWINING, in this sensible pamphlet, which certainly does him credit as a man, a writer, and a tea-dealer, considers, "1. what was the original cause and intent of the Tea Bill;" shews, "2. in what respects it has hitherto failed, and the causes of that failure;" and, "3. points out those methods which are most likely to correct this failure, to remove the principal objections that are made to this Act, and to render it productive of the good purposes for which it is framed."—The "evils of smuggling," painted in glowing colours, a practice which, he declares, "however sanctified by numbers," he has "uniformly condemned and avoided," is here assigned as the cause, and the suppression of this iniquitous traffic as the general intent, of the late Bill, "by reducing the duty on tea, and making good to the revenue the loss which this reduction would occasion, by a new duty, which should be, on the whole, more eligible than the old one." In what respects the Tea Bill has hitherto failed, and the causes of that failure, are next endeavoured to be shewn. "Smuggling" (it is here observed, and we rejoice at the intelligence) "has actually received a material check, scarcely any loose (or smuggled) tea (sold under the sanction of a legal permit) being to be purchased at this time in London." From a comparative view of the average prices which were held out before the sale, exclusive of duty, and the average prices at which each species of tea has actually sold since the

"sixteenth of September, exclusive of duty†," it appears, we are told, "that the average price of Bohea tea is less than that which was held out to the publick, and of Singlo but little more. Nor is the excess in the price of Hyson tea very considerable." As to the former "therefore there is no cause of complaint," and as to the latter, there cannot, it is hoped, be "much dissatisfaction," for reasons here given, especially as "the excess," it is trusted, "will be of short duration."—But in "the reduction of the prices of Congou and Souchong" there is a great failure indeed, and consequently there must be great and reasonable dissatisfaction.—"Nothing like the expected pecuniary compensation is made for the additional window tax;" better would it have been for the publick "to pay 10s. per lb. for their Souchong," as before; and, "if this high price should continue, smuggling must also continue." Of this failure the causes are next enumerated; and these, it is affirmed, are not the Minister, the E. I. Company, or the Tea-dealer, but the artifices of Smugglers, and the scarcity of tea throughout the kingdom, which, at the first tea sale (Sept. 16), occasioned immoderate prices to be given for some species of tea, and too much for others; an evil which the Directors who presided could not prevent.—Mr. Twining then undertakes a defence of the tea-dealers, a history into which we will not enter, farther than to say, that he ascribes the evil above-mentioned to the measure which had been proposed by the Directors in August, and adopted by the Tea-holders, of returning to the East India Company the tea then remaining uncleared in the Company's warehouses at prime-cost, as, "even with all their cunning, and all their wealth, the smugglers could not have raised the tea to those prices at which it has actually sold, had not the dealers been under the necessity of becoming purchasers." But this was not foreseen, and the writer blames himself "for want of foresight," at the same time allowing that the East India Directors did their duty in endeavouring to keep down the price. By way of episode, "a fair account" is added "of those teas with which the publick have been supplied since the alteration of duty."—The charge of mixing chests of genuine teas, our author, in his own instance, admits and justifies, as an established and approved practice, intended not to impose on his customers, but to give them satisfaction. And this practice he believes to be general.—Bloom, in particular, "though, when properly mixed, it improves other teas, would, by itself, be almost universally disliked."—Of adulteration he also gives a detail, mentions two "methods of making Smouch, with ash-tree leaves, to mix with Black teas," with the several penalties enacted against this iniquitous trade; and adds, that such adulterated tea may be avoided "by buying tea of reputable tea-dealers." The only method to lower the prices, Mr. Twining maintains, is, for the Company to have "an ample quantity of tea in this kingdom." And this method they seem to have been pursuing, as we have heard that they have bought up all the teas in Europe, except the Dutch. Mr. T. also proposes that the lots of each tea put up to sale should be doubled, as, by this means, the smuggler will run a double risk. "This alteration would tend to shorten the sales; a very desirable object." He is also a strong advocate for the allowance of six and a half per cent. discount, as usual, which, since the Tea Bill, has been withdrawn.—And, lastly, it is his wish, "that a Bill be brought into parliament, to direct that a very considerable part of a sum (which may be called the Excess of a Sale) should be applied, not to enrich the East India Company, who have no equitable claim to it, but to the public service of the kingdom."

28. An Account of the Musical Performances in Westminster-Abbey, and The Pantheon, May 26, 27, 29, and June 3 and 5, 1784. In Commemoration of Handel. By Charles Burney, Mus. D. F. R. S. 4to.

"Strong in new arms, lo! Giant Handel
"stands,
"Like bold Briareus, with his hundred
"hands."

GENT. MAG. February, 1785.

"said Pope more than forty years ago;
"but," adds Dr. Burney, "if he had "survived the late Commemoration,
"when the productions of Handel employed more than five hundred voices
"and instruments, he would perhaps "have lost a pun, a simile, and a bon mot,
"for want of a classical allusion to lean
"on." In truth, this commemoration forms a kind of æra in musical history, and therefore well deserves to be celebrated and described by this musical historian. From "a chronological list of the most remarkable musical masters upon record" (given in the preface), it appears, "that the musicians assembled on that occasion exceeded in abilities, as well as number, those of every band that has been collected in modern times," three hundred being the most before known.—After giving Madame Mara, in particular, and Mr. Commissioner Bates, their due and uncommon share of praise, our author adds "A Sketch of the Life of Handel," in which he has considerably amplified the Memoirs of that great musician, published in 1760 (it is supposed) by Mr. Maynwaring, of which an abstract was given in our volume for that year. Some extracts of them shall be inserted in our next.—Of the two commemorations an historical detail is then given; and afterwards the particulars of every part of the five performances are historically related, and scientifically discussed, with a minuteness and taste that mark the master, and must give to those who were absent as adequate an idea of this amazing celebrity as words can convey. The following passage is particularly striking: "Dante, in his Paradiso,
"imagines nine circles, or choirs, of "cherubs, seraphs, patriarchs, prophets,
"martyrs, saints, angels, and archangels, who with hand and voice are eternally praising and glorifying the Supreme Being, whom he places in the centre, taking the idea from Te Deum laudamus, where it is said, To thee Cherubim and Seraphim continually do cry, &c. Now, as the orchestra in Westminster Abbey seemed to ascend into the clouds, and to unite with the saints and martyrs represented on the painted glass in the West window, which had all the appearance of a continuation of the orchestra, I could hardly refrain, during the performance of the Allelujah, to imagine that this orchestra, so admirably “mirably constructed, filled, and employed, was a point, or segment, of one of these celestial circles. And perhaps no band of mortal musicians ever exhibited a more respectable appearance to the eye, or afforded a more ecstatic and affecting sound to the ear, than this.

“So sung they, and the Empyræan rung
“With Allelojahs.”

The following anecdote is curious:

“At the first performance of the Messiah, his Majesty expressed a desire to the Earl of Sandwich of hearing that most truly sublime of all chorusses, Allelujab! for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth, a second time; and this gracious wish was conveyed to the orchestra by the waving of his Lordship's wand. At the second performance of that matchless Oratorio, his Majesty was pleased to make the signal himself, with a gentle motion of his right hand, in which was the printed book of the words, not only for the repetition of this, but of the final chorus, in the last part, to the great gratification of all his happy subjects present; and perhaps the subjects of no sovereign prince on the globe were ever before so delighted with the effects of a royal mandate.”

Annexed is a letter from Count Benincasa, a Venetian nobleman, who, being then in London, was present at the performance, which, as he “is an excellent judge of music,” is very “flattering to the projectors and executors of this stupendous plan,” and is “written with a degree of feeling and intelligence that is equally honourable to himself and the arts.”

The whole of the receipts at the Abbey and the Pantheon amounted to 12,736l. 12s. 10d.; of which 6000l. was given to the Musical Fund, and 3000l. to the Westminster Hospital. The remainder was expended.

AFTER a very serious and seasonable remonstrance on the neglect and abuse of the Lord's day, both in high and low, this writer desires his readers to consider, 1. “What the design of the institution was; 2. How it should be observed to answer this design; and,

3. Whether the religious employment of the leisure it affords be not so conducive, and in many respects so necessary, to their spiritual improvement, that it must have been their interest and their duty to make this use of it, though its design had not been what it is.” On these heads Mr. Symon argues, both from reason and scripture, in such a manner as we hope will answer the benevolent and Christian design of his publication, by reclaiming many from the error of their ways.

30. Le Triomphe de la Raison; ou, Lettres de Deux jeunes Dames de Qualité. Dédiées, par Permission, à Madame la Duchesse Devonshire. Par Mademoiselle Caconak de la Mimardière. 12mo.

THERE is nothing in this novel particularly striking, or uncommon, but the déroulement, which consists in two lovers exchanging their mistresses, to the mutual satisfaction of all the parties.

31. Tales of the Castle; or, Stories of Instruction and Delight. Being Les Veillies du Chateau, written in French by Madame la Comtesse de Genlis, Author of the Theatre of Education, Adele and Theodore, &c. Translated into English by Thomas Holcroft. 5 Vols. 8vo.

AN officer of rank in the army, the Marquis de Clemire, being obliged to join his regiment, his wife, and her mother, with their son and two daughters, ten, eight, and seven years old, retire to their seat, an old castle in Burgundy, where, to beguile the evenings, the Baroness and Marchioness relate Tales for their recreation and instruction. Such is the plan of the present work, which, like all the writings of Mad. de Genlis, is replete with sound sense and excellent precepts. Her imagination is certainly rapid, and her invention great; but, were we to suggest a fault, it would be putting into the mouths of her juvenile auditors questions and remarks much beyond their years. The whole, however, is gay and pleasing, and tout à la Française—Affectation and Vanity, Avarice and Ambition, fall prostrate before her; and, by attending to these admonitions, the wife may improve in wisdom, and the good in goodness—of course we cannot but wish them studied and digested by the young and heedless, for whom this female Mentor, or French Minerva, has written ten and designed them.—Mr. Holcroft's translation is in general correct, and therefore we wish it were quite so, by his observing, in particular, the distinction between learn and teach, and the participle and the verb; have began, for instance, not being grammar. And, to return to the fair author, we are a little surprised at her allowing, in this work, her young pupils to hunt and catch butterflies, when in her former (her Adele) she made that young lady let loose a captive bird. Tenderness to animals and insects is uniform, and the sport here allowed is much more cruel than mere confinement. Some other remarks we could easily suggest, but shall now conclude with earnestly recommending these little Tales to all who wish to unite the utile and the dulce.

32. The Conquests of the Heart. A Novel. By a young Lady. 3 Vols. sm. 8vo.

URGED by the fame of Miss Burney, another young lady has here pursued the same pleasing path, and has made an interesting story the vehicle of much moral instruction. It is related in letters, which certainly do credit both to the head and heart of the writer.—But we will not anticipate the reader's pleasure.

33. Letters to a young Nobleman, upon various Subjects, particularly on Government and Civil Liberty: Wherein Occasion is taken to remark on the Writings of some eminent Authors upon those Subjects; and, in the first Place, upon those of the Rev. Dr. Price. With some Thoughts on the English Constitution, and the Heads of a Parliamentary Reform. 8vo.

THESE Letters, which appear to have been written in the year 1777, were intended, we are told in the Introduction, as an antidote to the poison infused into the mind of a young nobleman by some "specious and artful publications," especially those of Dr. Price on Civil Liberty. And, en passant, some pages are employed in detecting the fallacy of a certain "political touch" of the Bishop of Landaff, "awkwardly obtruded on his ecclesiastical arrangements," against the influence of the Crown.

In his two first letters this sensible and (it is supposed) noble writer fairly examines Dr. Price's definitions of liberty, under the general divisions of physical, moral, religious, and civil;

shews that absolute physical liberty in a material being is impossible; and that it is not to be detached in idea from the other divisions of it; that his arguments in favour of moral liberty destroy his general design; that more religious liberty is not possible with any established religion; and gives some familiar instances of the danger of perfect civil liberty.—In Letters III, IV, and V, Dr. Price is shewn to have argued on begged questions; his arguments are combated, his definitions of licentiousness are proved contradictory, his arguments against the doctrine of the omnipotence of government are shewn to be fallacious, and his manner of evading the question artful; the jumble of contradictions that result from his attributing omnipotence exclusively to the people is pointed out, and short heads are annexed of the different parts constituting the English government.—

In Letters VI. and VII. it is maintained, that "omnipotence must belong to every government as such." Dr. P's foregoing arguments, as applied to the manumission of America, are strongly opposed; and as Dr. Price, to prove that England has no right to govern her American Colonies, chuses to argue "upon his own general principles of civil liberty, and not by the practice of former times, by the charters granted to them, by statutes or precedents," the futility of such reasoning being self-evident, and his general principles confuted, his conclusion (it is affirmed) must fall to the ground.—Letter VIII. contains general observations upon government and obedience, resulting from the American dispute, and some general reflections introductory of a paper inclosed in this letter, intituled, Thoughts concerning an Accommodation with America, 1777—In Letters IX. and X. are some thoughts on the subject of the English constitution, presumed to be new.—Letters XI. and XII. give the true nature, with the use and abuse of parliamentary representation, illustrated by some examples drawn from experience.—And Letter XIII, after recapitulating the arguments used in the two preceding letters, gives the plan before-mentioned, on a leading feature of which, the increasing the number of representatives from the counties, we will only observe, that, had this plan taken place before the Revolution, King William and the House of Hanover would never have been seated on the the throne, that measure being promoted more by the members for boroughs than by those for counties.

34. Every Man his own Law-maker; or, The Englishman's Complete Guide to a Parliamentary Reform; wherein the Road to National Consensus is made plain and easy to the meanest Capacities. 8vo.

" ——— ——— ——— ——— ——— For I

" As first was mine own King."

Caliban, in the Tempest, Act I.

Aut I—— aut Diabolus.—This facetious gentleman, who, supra more, or rather in humble imitation of Prior's Corisca and Lord N——, "what should be serious turns to farce," proposes to extend the election-franchise to vagrants, gypsies, felons and convicts, lunatics, females (especially those who are pregnant), &c. &c. seasoning the whole with a vein of sarcastic humour which cannot but be palatable to all the Anti-Reformers, the opponents of The Man and Majesty of the People.

35. A Short View of the Christian Doctrine of Redemption. A Sermon. By a Presbyterian of the Church of Scotland. 8vo.

THE cause and the effect of the sufferings of our blessed Saviour are the subjects of this discourse. The text is taken from Luke xxiv. 26: "Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory?" In it we can discover nothing particularly new or striking, though the preacher dissents from some opinions that have much prevailed. In particular, he does not think, "that, had Adam abstained from the forbidden fruit, both he and all his descendants would have been for ever beyond the reach of vice;" disclaims the doctrine of imputed sin and imputed righteousness, as not warranted by scripture; thinks the natural immortality of the soul cannot be demonstrated by reason.

36. Thoughts on the Freedom of Election. By John Burnaby, Author of an Historical Description of Canterbury Cathedral, and an Address to the Publick on the Increase of their Poor-Rates. 8vo.

WHILE Lord Camden (to whom this publication is addressed) is "in administration," the author flatters himself "that the constitution of this country will receive no material injury." That it will receive no injury is not said. Whether this is "damning with faint praise," or not, let the reader judge. The pamphlet wholly turning on an election case at Canterbury (see our last volume, p. 973), is not only local, but, the petition having been withdrawn, so nugatory, that we shall say no more of it.

VERSES addressed to Miss Seward,
By the Rev. THO. SEDGWICK WHALLEY, on reading
AN ILL-NATURED CRITICISM
in the LOUISA.

HER bosom burning with unwooled
fire,
Again the terming Muse attunes her lyre;
Beneath the name of Seward flies to earth;
And, lo! proclaims the sweet Louisa's birth:—
To make her worthy of that high renown,
Which Seward long, as with a radiant Crown;
By her enamour'd country had been grac'd,
The Muse, to deck her offspring, summons
Tide;
Energic Genius, with his ardent eyes;
Imagination, bright with changing dyes;
And Sensibility's magnetic power;
And prays them to adorn the natal hour
Of this her darling with each various grace—
Expressive of her high Parnassian race,
And sweet, without a fear, or blush, to claim
The glorious patronage of Seward's name.
Glad they assent; and soon the lovely Maid,
Beneath their soft'ning care, each charm
display'd,
That prove, in concert join'd, their sovereign
art
To win the judgment, and enslave the Within her eye the fires of Genius play,
Temper'd by Sensibility's soft ray,
Glow on her cheek, in every smile appear,
Give strange electric force to every tear;
Inform each step, each gait, and mingle fair
The timid graces with her noble air;
Imagination the rich robe supplies,
That dazzles with a thousand lustrous dyes;
And every ornament is aptly plac'd,
To give the whole its full effect, by Taste.
Shewn to the world, thus form'd, and thus array'd,
All eyes were fix'd upon the matchless
Her melting powers touch'd every generous
breast;
The Wise admir'd her, and the Good caress'd.
This Envy saw, and saw with sick'ning
heart,
As in her lurking-place she writh'd apart:
And shall it be, thou Arrogant! she said,
That undisputed laurels deck thy head?
Thy head alone from Envy's blastings free,
Nor one proud leaf untimely fall of me?
Then vainly are my lips with cankers hung,
And vain the baneful poisons of my tongue!
She said, and, saying, beckon'd to her side
Three friends in nature to herself allied:
Coward Revenge, who shuns a noble war,
And from his secret battery shoots afar,
Bast Jealousy, who loaths a rival's praise,
And, whilst he dreams his fame, defects his
lays;
With private Revenge, who pretends to be
From every taint of secret malice free.

But through a native dread of piercing light,
Wrapt up herself and them in veils of night;
And, heedless of a public censor's fame,
Borrow'd and borrowing, damn'd the sacred

"She walks on stilts," dark Jealousy reply'd, Which all her art would vainly strive to hide.
Look, look too, how she labours to obtain
The long'd appliances of her gaping train."
"Oh, what forc'd action! oh, what torture grace,"
Moves every limb, and grins upon her face!"
Cries private Revenge.—"See her tawdry taste," [passe!]
How danc'd she is with tinsel, fringe, and
"But, midst her glittering threads," Revenge replied,
Her native rags are easily espied;
And while she proudly boasts her race divine,
And claims extraction from the sacred Nine,
How easy to detect her vulgar birth
From some poor, base, plebeian flock of earth!"
More had they rais'd; but, with disdainful
eye,
Candid cut short the scurrilous reply:
And whilst her scornful band indignantly rose
The darkling veil whose skulking glooms they wore,
And shew'd the monsters to the public gaze,
Each in its own deform'd and hated shape.
"Hence! hence, to hell!" she cry'd, detested crew: [pursues]
There your base projects, your dark plots
There spend your venom where you took your birth,
And cease to harass and pollute the earth;
Senseless as vile, in your attempts to black
The glorious sensibility and taste
Genius and radiant Fancy join to shed
With mingled lustre on Louisa's head.
Hence!"—At the word, Truth's brilliant shield she rear'd,
In whose bright mirror at its length appear'd
Each bloated Sord to its own loathing fight:
Banning they fled, and, in the shades of night
Hiding their foul deformity, left Worth
To enjoy a while unpoison'd praise on earth.

ON THE DEATH OF A BELOVED MOTHER.

WHAT though no sculptor'd marble
marks the place
Where Death's cold arms a Mother's coffin embraced;

What

What though no epitaph her lavish praise,
In turgid strain, and learned pomp, displays;

What though confin'd to an inglorious grave,
Where darksome yews their solemn branches wave;

Yet shall Remembrance on her tablet keep
Her Virtues pictur'd, and, surveying, weep.
O when shall Piety and Goodness find
An empire equal to her heavenly mind!
Warm was her soul with pure Devotion's flame;

She felt its power, regardless of the name.
The constant sacrifice of prayer and praise
Mark'd the long number of her chequer'd days.

Nor care intrusive, nor alluring joy,
Stole the blest moments of this pure employ.
From hence deriv'd those gifts which God
bestows

To ease th' oppressive load of human woes;
Patience, whose balm can Pain's fierce stings allay; [survey.

And Faith, whose eye can opening Heaven
No cold self-interest froze her liberal
heart,

In all distress she bore the amplest part.
Her bounty flow'd in one unruffled course,
When smiling Fortune fill'd the generous source:

But when the clouds of dark Misfortune
spread

The night of indigence around her head,
Soft Pity ne'er deny'd for others' woe,
Her sigh to murmur, and her tear to flow.
To sympathise was still her honest pride,
And Nature gave what Poverty deny'd.

Above the dark disguise of fraudulent Art,
Her tongue display'd the purpose of her
heart.

Like the fam'd stream, whose crystal waters
show

The golden treasures of the soil below.
Her children bless'd her mild yet steady
sway;

Love, more than duty, taught them to obey:
That power magnetic drew, with pleasing force, [course:

Their youthful footsteps to fair Virtue's
Her thorny paths without a sigh they tread,
For all was pleasant where their mother led.

But when, to fill the train of earth-born cares,

Pale Sickness caught her in the vale of years, Tir'd of a world, whose cold neglect and pride

No comforts equal to her worth supply'd;
Her only wish to linger longer here,
To save awhile her children from despair,
Who felt, when once this gem was snatch'd
away,

No earthly riches could the loss repay.
At length, when Pain had various tortures
try'd,

And Patience long each torture had defy'd,
Death broke with ruffian hand the vital tie,
And her free soul regain'd its native sky.

O may that darling Hope, whose mild controul

Can calm the tempests of the swelling soul,
Which lifts our eye to that Elysian shore
Where friends congenial join to part no more!

O may that Hope on firm foundations rest,
And prove no fond delusion of the breast!
Which tells, in sweetest whispers, we shall rise

To share th' unfading glories of the skies;
Shall rapt'rous meet at great JEMOAN's
throne,

And, while we crown her bliss, secure our own.
NORVICHIAN.

IN Burton's favourite groves (alas! how chang'd

By Charlotte's death) oft let me devious rove,

Indulging grief, where gladsome once I
rang'd,

In sweet society, with Peace and Love.

Oft, in the silent evening, all alone,

When solemn twilight shades the face of
day,

The plaintive Muse shall hither waft her moan,

With tenderest passion here inspire my lay.

These hours, directed by the Muse's hand,

To latest time thy mem'ry shall endear;

While soft ideas rise at her command,

And in luxurious sorrow prompt the tear.

Recall, soft Queen of Gentleness and Love,

That calm which triumph'd o'er her parting breath,

That blooming feature, by the Graces wove:

—And are those eyes for ever set in death?

Once more—and then—farewell; one lingering view

Tore my fond soul from all it held so dear;
'Tis o'er—farewell, my Joys: sweet Hope,
adieu!

Adieu, my Love!—we part for ever here!

Yet, in the still of night, my restless thought Pursues thy image through its change up-
known;

Steals oft unnotic'd to the dreary vault,

And in that vale of sorrow pours my own.

For, since the hour that clos'd our blooming
scene,

Ne'er has it wander'd from its darling trust;

It hears thy voice, still animates thy mien,

And haunts thy slumbers in the sacred doft.

Each conscious walk of tenderness and joy

Thy faithful partner all alone shall tread,

Recount, while anguish heaves the frequent sigh,

How bliss on bliss thy smiling influence shed.

Thy

Thy smiles were mine—were oft and only
mine;
Nor yet forsook me in the face of death;
E'en now they live—still do thy beauties
shine,
For Fancy's magic can restore thy breath.
Though mine be many, many rolling years,
Ecstatic thought shall linger still on thee;
Time rolls in vain—Remembrance brings her
tears;
You that have lost an Angel—pity me!

JESSE*, of the tabby kind
Least ferocious, most refin'd,
Careless sleeping on a mat—
Happiest she, thrice happy cat!

She frequents no rout nor ball;
Innocent her gambols all!
Wonder not, though she excell
Many a proud imperious belle.

STELLA, Beauty's darling child,
Oft beguiling, oft beguil'd,
Would'st thou with my kitten change?—
Think not the proposal strange.

Ease and peace are JESSE's share,
She is blest without a care;
She from Fashion, Queen of Apes,
Neither borrows airs nor shapes.

Coquetry's a mask so mean,
Ever hated soon as seen,
Throw aside its venom'd spell,
And she must and shall excell.

She is not Coquet, nor Prude;
Though sometimes a little rude—
Riddling, Madam, what of that?

THE BIRTH OF TWADDLE †.
A PILLGARLICK ODE.

Ἀρχὴ καὶ τέλος τῆς παραληρητικῆς Τωάδλης. HOM.

YE nymphs of Pindus' flowery mead,
Fly, catch the fiery-winged steed,
And mount, all Nine, astraddle;
Sput, whip, ride headlong. I implore
Your aid, to sing the death of Bore,
And sing the birth of Twaddle!

'Twas night! 'twas midnight's silent noon;
In silver rob'd, the waning moon
Hung like a falling saddle;
When whispers spoke, on Thames's shore,
The piteous death of favourite Bore,
And recent birth of Twaddle.

Fame swell'd the news, in Tuko's-street,
Where fair Firtilla's votaries meet,
How, by old age grown addle,

* A name given to the cat.

† It is almost superfluous to say that this is now the fashionable word to express what was formerly called "a Bore."

Deserted, on his clay-cold floor,
With his last breath expiring Bore
Had left his throne to Twaddle.

The Chieftain, ere the Senate met,
Nay ere he paid one J—b—l debt,
Or touch'd a die, or spaddle*,
Vow'd to the basis he'd explore
This rumour of the death of Bore,
And whisper'd birth of Twaddle.

He spake, he rose! the circling group,
A ghast'y, motley, juggling troop,
With equal steps 'gan waddle;
And, join'd by many a titled wh—,
Rush'd to condole the death of Bore,
And gratulate King Twaddle.

'Twas true! The birth, with easy pains,
Had issued from the opening brains
Of meek-ey'd, prudish Faddle.
Alas! forlorn, alas! lay Bore,
Whilst all with ardent vows adore
The rising sun, fair Twaddle.

O how ye hugg'd him, maids so prim,
And how ye haste each tender limb
In gentlest bands to swaddle!
And with all Europe might encore,
Since finish'd was the race of Bore,
The infant reign of Twaddle!

Says C—vo, "First let France and Spain
" (For wonders cannot long remain
" Betwixt their grave and cradle †)
" Receive this news quick wafted o'er,
" The doleful death of ancient Bore,
" And joyful birth of Twaddle."

'Tis done. See Blanchard through mid-air
Whole cargoes of the tidings bear,
With globe, canoe, and paddle!
Our Gallic friends responsive roar,
First dropping a soft tear for Bore,
" Encore long live King Twaddle!" F.

Last of the fallen blossoms! griev'd I pay,

*Her Brother's LYRE to Mrs. SHERIDAN.
Written by Mr. P R A T T.*

THIS said, a solemn silence breath'd around,
Cecilia wept upon her Lycid's Lyre;
The pensive breeze then gave a sighing sound,
And the strings seem'd to tremble and expire.

One hollow murmur, like the dying moan,
Was heard to vibrate then with pauses slow
From the sad instrument, when thus the rope
Gave modulations of a softer woe.

"Cease, beauteous mourner! partner of my "grief!

"Tuneful associate of my last despair!

"Thou, only thou, canst bring this breast "relief,

"Thy sympathy alone can sooth my care.

"What though, ah stroke severe! our Ly-
"cid's dead,

"Nor more, alas, can ravish mortal ear!

"What though the soul of melody is fled,

"His best attendant to th' harmonious
"sphere;

"Struck by Cecilia's hand I yet may live,

"Her magic touch again can tune my "frame;

"Her cherub voice my spirit yet revive,

"And sounds of heavenly sorrow grace my
"fame.

"But should not dulcet song, nor music's art,

"Nor social sighs, which mourn the youth
"we love,

"Have power to heal the sister's wounded
"heart,

"Nor to these chords forlorn a solace prove;

"Ah still together let our sorrows join,

"And this sad form still boast thy gentle
"aid;

"Lycid's companion sure should still be thine,

"Still shouldst thou kiss the strings where
"he has play'd."

SUMMARY OF THE PROCEEDINGS IN PARLIAMENT, SESS. II.

Jan. 25.

THE speech from the throne being read, and an address moved for (see p. 73.); Lord Surrey rose, and declared his dissent, for these reasons :

1. The speech was so uncommonly concise, that nothing could be inferred from it. And so miserably deficient, that not a syllable was said of the measures with which parliament was most desirous of being made acquainted.

2. Ministers held parliament so cheap, as hardly to think it necessary to name to that house the ordinary supplies of the current year; and had left it doubtful, whether any would be wanted.

3. Not a word of parliamentary reform, so much the object of national expectation.

4. Nor of establishing the right of trial by jury, on a clear and permanent footing.

5. Nor of the reduction, or augmentation, of the military and naval establishments.

6. Nor of the state of our territorial dominions in the East; notwithstanding the general blame, that has of late prevailed, of their mal-administration, abroad and at home. These were the heads on which Lord Surrey enlarged with great force of elocution; which called up

Mr. Pitt, to obviate those objections, who

1. Allowed the speech to be concise; but insisted on its being comprehensive.

2. That it gave every necessary information respecting the supplies. His Majesty's words were these, "That he had ordered the estimates for the present year to be laid before the house."—For what purpose, if not to provide for the exigences of government?

3. His Majesty's "recommending economy in every department" surely must be understood to comprehend the military and naval departments. And

4. By his Majesty's express declaration "to secure to his people the true principles of the constitution," every thing is implied that it was necessary for a gracious king to promise, or a loyal people to expect.

5. That by the "suppression of smuggling," and "the improvement of the revenue," such a retrospect might be observed to the affairs of the East India Company, as might suffice till the effects of these regulations were more fully known. And

6. To have said more of the affairs of the East, before the late regulations could possibly be known to operate, would surely have been premature.

In the course of his speech, Mr. P. modestly glanced at other essential services, besides the "suppression of smuggling," which the state had derived from the acts of last session; and though he forbore to enumerate the services he had been the means of rendering his country, he had the heart-felt satisfaction to find that his endeavours had not been in vain.

He trusted, therefore, that these objections, which his lordship had been pleased to make, would leave no unfavourable impression upon the house, and that his lordship's would be the only dissenting voice to the present motion.

Lord North hoped the Right Honourable Gentleman, among the many services he had rendered the country, did not allude to that most oppressive, most ill founded, and injudicious of all injudicious acts, the Commutation act. He then adverted to the "system which will unite both kingdoms the most closely, on principles of reciprocal advantages," mentioned in the speech. His lordship played upon the word "reciprocal," as rather an unlucky word, and expressed his apprehensions, lest a similar fatality should attend the pretty word RECIPROCITY of the minister's, as did formerly in the American business. He next took occasion to declare his sense of the plan of reform, which, he was convinced, would give such a shock to the constitution, as would prove an eternal scourge to any rash speculator, who should venture to sport with so serious a subject. In conclusion, his lordship adverted to the Rev. Mr. Wyvill's Letter to the Sheriff of Yorkshire, in which he could perceive, he said, the complexion of the minister's language; but would decline saying any thing more on the subject of reform, as it was not a question now before the House.

Mr. Burke, to the other deficiencies already remarked in the speech, added, the establishment of a sinking fund, towards lightening the grand national burthen, as not unworthy to have been noticed. He heard there were, at that instant, dispatches in the hands of government, brought by Mr. Hastings's secretary, accompanied with some boxes of diamonds, laying open the distractions in India, and holding out war as the dernier resort; that the secretary dying in the passage, had ordered his papers to be destroyed, lest they should bear testimony to the ruinous state of the country; but pledged himself to produce such authentic information as could not be controverted. He concluded with moving an amendment to the address, expressing the deep concern of the house on account of Indian peculation, &c.

Mr. Fox, after adverting to the attack upon the constitution in Ireland (see p. 73); and enforcing Lord Surrey's objections, remarked, poignantly, on the expressions in the Rev. Mr. Wyvill's letter, bold and honest, as a man, and as a minister, as being the expression of the minister, in private conversation; that they must imply some emphatical distinction, he did not doubt; but he was yet yet to learn how they were to be separated. He avowed himself a friend to a reform in the representation, spoke in terms of pointed acrimony of that most infamous, unproductive, oppressive, and rash tax, commonly called the Commutation Tax, which, were it to be repealed to-morrow, would leave behind it the ruinous marks of the mischiefs it has occasioned. He wished to know, if, among the services the Right Hon. Gentleman had to boast, his East India Bill, which, instead of eradicating evils, had confirmed corruption and speculation in our Eastern dominions, was among the number?

Mr. Pitt, in reply to the remarks of opposition, did not wonder at Mr. Burke's exclaiming against the shortness of the speech; the whole house could bear testimony of his aversion to short speeches. As to the noble Lord's (Lord North) facetious observation on the word reciprocity, as applied to American affairs, he should have imagined, that, instead of affording his Lordship a subject for sport, it might have brought to his mind thoughts of most serious compunction. To the strictures of Mr. Wyvil's Letters, he did not hesitate to declare that the measure should have his support, without doors and within, as a man and as a minister, and in that, he thought, there was no mystery; that, with respect to the epithets with which the Commutation Tax had been distinguished, they were certainly misapplied, as he pledged himself to prove, to the satisfaction of the House; and he wished the words speculation and corruption, ascribed to the India Bill, might be remembered, as he should one day be able to bring that charge to issue. He forbore to say more, at present, as the sole business that engrossed his attention was the motion before the house.

Lord North replied to the Right Hon. Gentleman's ironical remarks; and, in a most humorous vein of raillery, kept the house in a roar, till

Mr. Martin rose, and put an end to the debate, by supposing, that every gentleman knew the plain sense of a plain word, and, for his part, he hated quibbling, as no man could think of the horrors of the American war, without lamenting the miseries occasioned by it.

The question put on Mr. Burke's amendment passed in the negative; and the address was carried, nem. con. and ordered to be presented in its original form.

Wednesday, 26.

The address was reported, and ordered to be presented by the whole house.

Mr. Eden moved, that the account of the net produce of the taxes, from Michaelmas 1783 to Michaelmas 1784, be laid before the house; and, likewise, a comparative estimate of the produce of the excise duties in the years 1782, and 1783, and 1784, distinguishing each year, with the drawbacks on the exportation; both motions were agreed to, and the house adjourned.

Friday 28.

The House met, to settle the balloting days for committees, to try petitions on contested elections, when there appeared to be full so presented, or expected to be presented in a limited time.

Mr. Eden rose, and moved for accounts of several imports and exports, there enumerated, to be laid upon the table, which were all agreed to, and will appear in the sequel. The House adjourned till

Tuesday Feb. 1.

Mr. Welbore Ellis moved, that the resolution of the House of June 8, 1784, might be read; which being complied with, he moved,

That the H. Bailiff of the city of Westminster do attend the House on Friday next: agreed to.

Mr. Fox then moved,

That Francis Hargrave, Esq; do likewise attend on Friday next. And also,

That Arthur Murphy, Esq; do likewise attend. Both motions agreed to.

Mr. Adam then rose, and requested the attention of the House to a subject which had caused a very serious alarm in a distant part of the kingdom. What he alluded to, he said, was an act of last session, relative to the distillery, in which there were the following clauses affecting Scotland, namely, That all persons convicted of distilling spirits from corn or other materials, or having in their custody any worm or still used in distilling corn spirits, shall forfeit 100l. for each offence, and the still; and, in case of non-payment of the penalty, the household furniture, implements, crop, and cattle, shall be taken in execution, and sold for the payment of the fine; and, in case no such effects be found, or not sufficient, &c. then the heritors of the parish where the offence has been committed shall be obliged to pay the whole, or make good the deficiency, as the case may happen. And, farther, that the board of excise in Scotland, or the prosecutor, may optionally sue any three of the said heritors they may think proper.—This clause, Mr. Adam contended, was new in principle, irreconcilable with the ordinary modes of legislation, and so singularly cruel and oppressive on the heritors of Scotland, that he trusted it was only necessary to be pointed out, in order to be repealed.

Mr. Pitt declared, that those particular clauses which the hon. gent. alluded, to did not come immediately into his recollection; but that, if the hon. gent. could in any degree amend the revenue or any other laws, he should have his firmest support. He then glanced at the proposition he intended to bring forward for a reform in the representation in parliament, and previous, thereto, would move for a call of the House, that upon so great, so momentous a question, he might have the assistance of as many members as could possibly be brought together; and the rather, as another important measure was

was to be submitted to their consideration, namely, a plan for the adjustment of the commercial concerns between Great Britain and Ireland; and also some material articles of finance. These three great objects, he said, might be considered as the principal outlines of the great business of the session. He would then, he said, if no material objections were made, take the liberty to move, that the House be called over on Tuesday the 15th instant.

Mr. Fox coincided with the Rt. Hon. Gent. in his opinion of the importance of the objects that were to be brought forward, and in the propriety of having them discussed in the fullest assemblies. It struck him, however, as singular, that the commercial system between the two sister kingdoms should this day be opened before the Commons in Ireland, while at the same time the same system should be kept a profound secret from the Commons of Great Britain. He could, not, he said, help looking upon this preference as a manifest disrespect to this House, and called on the Rt. Hon. Gent. for an explanation.

Mr. Pitt, in reply, said, that, when the commercial system with Ireland should be stated, the House would then see the propriety of agitating the business in Ireland first, and that no disrespectful preference was intended, nor such an idea ever suggested. His intention was, as soon as his plan could be completed, to submit it to the consideration of the House; and, tho' he could not yet name the day, he would on Monday se'n'ight, the day preceding the call of the House, openly declare it. In the mean time, he doubted not, but gentlemen would be fully apprised of the sense of the people of Ireland on the subject.

Mr. Eden did not wish measures of such magnitude as had been named to be hurried. They required the most deliberate investigation.

Mr. Adam was of the same opinion.

Mr. Fox requested the measure of reform might not be brought forward in the shape of a specific plan, but as a general proposition.

Mr. Pitt prefigured success from the hon. gen's. support, and expressed his hopes that his opinion, joined to the concurrent opinions of his numerous friends, would be able to convert the poble Ld in the blue ribbon. He could not, however, promise to change his idea of a specific plan to a general proposition, unless that proposition should terminate in a specific plan. He should submit his plan to the correction of the House, and hoped no gentleman would reject it on the first blush.

Lord North rose and, remarked, that, when the business of reform was but named, he was not to be permitted to sit quietly in his seat. He would therefore candidly declare, that he differed materially from his colleague in more points than one. He liked, a specific plan better than a general proposition, as less liable to succeed. The Rt. Hon. Gentleman's declaration in favour of a specific proposition reminded him, he said, of the extreme candour of one of our author's [Milbourne], who wrote a criticism on the poetical version of Virgil then just published, and at the same time promised a version of his own. Upon which it was said universally, that nothing could be more fair, nothing more candid, for he not only gave us a comment to shew the defects of that of which we were in possession, but engaged to give us a plan of what it ought to be. It was also said, that though he might prove but a bad poet, he might yet give us the genuine sense. When his version, however, came out, it was found to be such a patchwork-piece of prose and poetry; such a jumble of sense and nonsense, so execrably blended together, that every body cried out "Give us our old translation; though it has a few defects and trifling errors, it is ten thousand times preferable to your poetry." Lord North commended the Rt. Hon. Gent.'s ingenuity in procuring the votes of his two friends [Mess. Fox and Adam] to his proposition; said, for himself, he was always happy to hear their advice, and listen to their suggestions.—He wished from his heart the Rt. Hon. Gent. would do so too, and be guided by them. He glanced at a Rev. Gentleman's writing to the North, to secure the interest of all the electors to a proposition unknown. Wished him to take the advice of the learned gentleman that sat near him [Dundas], to explain the nature of his proposition a little, and to invert the order of the great questions, that of reform, and that of the adjustment of the commercial intercourse with Ireland; as the former might soon be determined, the other would require much time for investigation.

Mr. Pitt feared the forwardness of some gentlemen, for explanation was merely to find a subject for cavil. In his opinion, it would be an useless anticipation of debate; and as for reversing the order of the two questions, the reason adduced by the Noble Lord was in favour of the latter being brought on first.

Lord North did not expect to hear the word cavil from the Rt. Hon. Gentleman; but hoped the House would learn to familiarize themselves to such obsolete words, which he certainly did not mean to use in their customary sense, but in a new and more refined construction.

The motion for the call of the House being put, it passed for the 15th instant.

Wednesday 2.

Mr. Pitt moved, for leave to bring in heads of a bill, for permitting the colony of Newfoundland to import from the United States of America bread, flour, and live stock in British bottoms, navigated according to law.

Mr. Eden admitted the expediency of the bill for a temporary purpose; but objected to its permanence, on the ground of militating with the Navigation Act.

Mr. Jenkinson endeavoured to remove the force of the Hon. Gentleman's objection; and leave was granted to bring the bill in.

Lord Beauchamp moved, that an account of the expences of the militia, from 1765 to 1775 inclusive, should be laid before the House. Agreed to.

Col. Fitzpatrick presented a petition from certain electors of Westminster, complaining of violated rights. Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Burke moved, that the resolution of May 3, 1782, on the Journals of the House, might be read.

Mr. Pitt made some objection on the ground of delay, and the derangement of the public business. This called up

Mr. Fox, who supported the motion of his friend; and the report of the select committee appointed to enquire into the administration of justice in Bengal was read, with the consequent order of the House for the recall of Sir Elijah Impey.

Mr. Burke desired to know of the minister, whether there was any truth in the report which he had for some time heard without being able to credit it; that, in violation of the order of that House, Sir Elijah Impey was now going out in the station of Ld C. J. of India.

Mr. Pitt said, it was totally out of his power at present to give a decided answer to that question.

Mr. Burke replied, that he perfectly understood the Rt. Hon. Gentleman.

The House resolved itself into a committee of supply, Mr. Gilbert in the chair.

Mr. Brett moved, that 18,000 seamen, including 3620 marines, be granted for the service of the present year; and that the sum of 4*l.* per month be granted for their support.

Lord Surrey by no means approved of this great reduction in the navy; 8000 cut off at once, with the number of smugglers that to all appearance would be thrown out of employment on the country, appeared to him very alarming. They must either seek employment in foreign service, or quit their profession and become vagabonds, or, what is worse, turn desperate rogues, and rob for a subsistence.

Maj. Scott was pleased, he said, with the features of the times, that held forth such a prospect of peace as to admit so considerable a reduction of our naval force. He declared before the House, that the reports that had been industriously propagated of a disposition for war among the Eastern princes were entirely without foundation: and that the dreadful effects of famine, so pathetically dwelt upon, were by no means so alarming as to create any well-grounded fears for the diminution of the revenues in Bengal.

Mr. Fraser, in contradiction to what Maj. Scott had advanced, said, the war that was apprehended was in the very heart of the country, and he could not see what connection it had with the navy. He was assured, by the last advices he had received, that the revenue of Bengal had fallen considerably; and that there was not a lack of rupees in the treasury of Calcutta, though the immediate demand upon it was 115 lacks, or near a million of English money.

Mr. Burke rose in confirmation of what he had said on India affairs. He insisted, that, by the papers supposed to have been destroyed, it had appeared, that Gov. Hastings had many private secretaries and confidants (besides Major Davy, who died in his passage home), with whom he clandestinely transacted the most momentous business; that he was secretly arranging the affairs of India; and that he had been pledging the faith of the empire to support wars, without saying a word of it to his masters; and of this he would bring forward the proofs. He remarked how seasonably the rains had fallen in India. It was in the heat of last session, when the same sort of rains most opportunely fell, and bedewed the house with the most refreshing coolness.

Sir James Johnson adverted to the motion, and the supply was agreed to without a division.

Thursday, 3.

No debate, but several motions. 1. Lord Beauchamp moved to address for papers relative to the steps taken in consequence of an act for appointing places beyond the seas, for the reception of felons, &c. agreed to. 2. A List to be laid before the house, of felons on board the hulks. 3. List of persons under sentence of imprisonment in the gaols and houses of correction in London, and the six adjoining counties. Ordered.

Friday, 4.

Mr. Welbore Ellis moved, that the order of the day, for the attendance of the High Bailiff of Westminster, &c. be deferred till Tuesday. His reason was, the gentleman, who was most interested in the question, he understood, had, by an accident, strained the Tendon Achillis, and, by the advice of his surgeons, was confined to his chamber for a few days.

Mr. Pitt did not rise, he said, to oppose the motion, but to remark, that, loud as the clamour had been about the city of Westminster being unrepresented, it now appeared, that the electors were in possession of a champion, to fight their battles for them, to debate upon their rights, and to plead in his own cause, without whose assistance they were unwilling to proceed on that very business on which they had grounded their most grievous complaints.

Mr. Pelham expressed his astonishment the construction which the Right Hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to put upon an accident which no man could either foresee or prevent. The question to be agitated was not not peculiar to Westminster alone. Every corporation in the kingdom was equally interested in the issue. Considering it, therefore, as the cause of the people, it was natural for gentlemen, both within doors and without, whom experience had convinced of the great abilities of the hon. member who was absent, to wish not to have a question of such magnitude discussed, when they were deprived of the advantage of having those abilities exerted, which had often, and, he hoped, would, for many years, continue to be exerted in support of the constitution.

Mr. Burke was very severe on the sarcastic manner, in which the unfortunate circumstance of his honourable friend had been treated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He hoped that the privileges of that house would long remain; but there were virtues, which, he trusted, would still exist, when even the house itself should be no more, and those were the virtues of compassion and humanity. As to the private interest which Mr. Fox might be supposed to have in the question, he would take upon him to say, that gentleman had not the smallest objection to its being discussed in his absence on that account; but, as it was the cause of his country that was to be agitated, it would have astonished the whole kingdom, if his honourable friend had not been anxious to give it his best support.

Ordered, that the High Bailiff, &c. do attend the house on Tuesday next.

Mr. Dempster then rose, and said, he had a petition to present, signed by 12000 operative weavers of Paisley, in Scotland, complaining of the injuries they had received by the duties imposed upon muslins, and praying that the act relative thereto might be repealed. It appeared, when read, to be rather a remonstrance and memorial addressed to his Majesty's ministers, than an humble petition to the honourable House of Commons; but, in regard to the situation of the complainants, and that they could not be supposed to be acquainted with the forms of the house, and that they had been unfortunate in employing persons equally ignorant with themselves, the house was pleased to excuse the want of form, and to receive their petition, and promise redress.

Monday, 7.

Mr. Charteris presented a petition from Lord George Gordon, stating, that he had long had connection with the manufacturers of Scotland; and that all their complaints, of the destructive operations of the late taxes, were always directed to him, as their offensive agent, and praying that he may be heard at the house, in support of the remonstrance already mentioned; but, no person being found to second the motion, the petition, of course, was rejected.

Mr. Pitt presented his bill, restricting the trade between the colony of Newfoundland and the United States of North America, permitting the importation, into the former, of bread, flour, and live stock, only in British ships, the property of British owners, navigated according to law, and furnished with licences agreeable to form.

Mr. Eden opposed the bill, not for the pride of opposition, but from an honest zeal to explain to the house a subject which seems very little understood. The situation of commerce, Mr. Eden observed, claimed, at present, peculiar attention. There were no less than five systems for its regulation now pending, or shortly to be agitated, namely, our commercial intercourse with Ireland, France, Spain, Russia, and North America. With respect to Ireland, we should be cautious, in the present instance, lest our jealous sister should suppose, that, in dictating the forms under which we would permit the commerce with Newfoundland to be carried on, we insiduously meant to legislate for her. In the title of this bill, the purport is held forth as a restriction. His argument was, that whatever indulgence it was found necessary to grant, it should be by way of permission. He laid it down as a maxim, that whatever change of dominion any state should undergo, the subordinate executive office of government had nothing to do with the change, until it was formally recognized by act of parliament. On this principle, the United States of North America were precisely. If, therefore, the intercourse between them and Newfoundland was forbidden before the late revolution, as it really was, it must be so at this instant; and the provisions of the intended bill must operate as a permission. In the same predicament are the ports of Dunkirk, St. John, and Riga; for though they have long changed sovereigns, yet have they undergone no alteration whatever for the purposes of the Navigation act. He concluded with moving, that the order of the day, for bringing this bill forward, might be discharged.

Mr. Jenkinson combated these objections, rather from necessity than solid argument. The governor of Newfoundland (Admiral Campbell) had found it expedient to admit the importation of the articles alluded to; and, as the same necessity still subsisted, it remained only for administration to restrain such things as were not absolutely wanted, and to reconcile the permission of those that were, to the principles of the navigation laws. Those laws he held sacred, and, had the provisions of the bill militated against those laws, he would have been the last man in the house to have given it his support. He laid it down, likewise, as an incontrovertible maxim, that whatever was not prohibited by law was permitted; and he called on opposition, to shew any law prohibitory to an intercourse between our colonies and those foreign nations, in which light we stand at present, with respect to the United States. If then there is no law, the commerce is open. He instanced, in proof, the commerce that had been carried on between our Northern Colonies, and the French West India Islands, which, had parliament considered as illegal, they would have ordered confiscations; instead of which, duties amounting to a prohibition were had recourse to.

Lord North remarked, that the cavil, in this case, consisted in the distinction, where the intercourse was only forbidden by the tenor of commercial custom, or municipal regulation. A vessel of the United States, previous to the late permission, which this bill was about to establish, would not have been permitted to enter any port in Newfoundland, not because the officer could, or could not, lay his finger on a prohibitory statute, but because the vessel could not produce the dockets, certificates, &c. which the regulations of the port required. He therefore agreed with his honourable friend, Mr. Eden, that the provisions of the present bill were not restrictive, but the reverse; and proceeded to ask, why the provisions of the bill should be narrowed? why not extended to Nova Scotia, Canada, and the newly-established Colonies? In answer to the argument drawn from the commerce with the French Islands, his lordship said, the traffic was most certainly illicit, but parliament wished to recur to the most lenient mode of prevention.

Mr. Jenkinson observed, that the gentlemen, to support their argument, asserted, that the United States were in the same predicament, with respect to trade, as before the late Revolution; yet they would not, surely, contend that they were still entitled to all the privileges that belonged to them as British colonies. If not, with their situation, they changed their name, and, by consequence, with respect to them the commercial laws were reversed.

Mr. Pitt remarked on the ill-timed mention that had been made of Ireland by the gentlemen on the opposite side, which was not done without a meaning; alarms and jealousies were easily excited, and the well-wishers to the prosperity of both kingdoms should be cautious of throwing out hints to provoke them.

Lord North, who had followed Mr. Eden in recommending caution, rose to exculpate himself from any the most distant idea of other than the obvious meaning of the words he had spoken, which could give ground for no jealousy, but the reverse.

The remainder of the debate consisted of asperity and altercation, and tended in no shape to elucidate the arguments of what is said above on either side.

On the question being put, Mr. Eden's motion was negatived, and the original motion was agreed to; the bill was brought in, and read the first time, and ordered to be read a second time.

Tuesday 8.

The bill for establishing the Intercourse between America and Newfoundland, was read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

The order of the day was then read, for the attendance of the High Bailiff, &c. on the Westminster Scrutiny.

Mr. Welb. Ellis then moved, that the gentleman might be called to the bar.

[Mr. Corbet was introduced.]

Mr. Ellis desired, that, in consequence of the resolution of the House, he should say what he had done in the scrutiny in consequence of the orders of that House.

The H. Bailiff said, he was not prepared with a narrative, but would answer any questions put to him on the subject.

Mr. Ellis said, the question that first occurred was, What had he done in the scrutiny in consequence of the orders of the House?

H. Bailiff said, after settling some regulations, he had proceeded with the scrutiny from day to day, always giving his attendance himself. He began with St. Anne's, where he scrutinized about 100 votes, 25 of which were struck off the poll of Mr. Fox, and 27 from that of Sir Cecil Wray. They then proceeded to St. Martin's, where they had already discussed 212 votes, of which 80 had been struck from the poll of Mr. Fox, and 60 from that of Sir Cecil Wray. The whole number who polled in St. Anne's was 906, in St. Martin's 2268, and on the whole poll 14,200. Being asked, said the principal delay was in long examinations; in still longer cross-examinations; and in long arguments of counsel drawn therefrom.—Had no power to examine upon oath, nor any other means to compel the discovery of truth than by examination, and knows of no compulsory power whatever. Being asked, said, he considered himself as acting under the directions of the House; and thought himself bound to continue so to do, till he received further orders.—Said, he should be perfectly satisfied to make a return, if so ordered by the House, and happy to be released. Being asked by what authority he deemed himself acting, when he first granted the scrutiny to take place? said, Under the authority vested by law in every returning officer.

Did he think every returning officer had it in his option to make a return, or not, at the closing of the poll?

[Master of the Rolls objected to that question, as matter of legal opinion.]

He was again asked, If the restraint of the House was withdrawn, and he was fully at liberty, Would he be content to make his return now, from the experience of what had past? said, He should then require time to consider consider of it. What time?—That would depend on circumstances. He must hear the reasons of the party who demanded the scrutiny.

Being asked, said, He did believe the candidate, who demanded the scrutiny, expected far greater success in the parishes of St. Margaret's and St. John's than elsewhere. Why not begin the scrutiny there? said, He began with St. Anne's, as he had a precedent in a former scrutiny. Why he did not go through with St. Anne's? Because both parties were not satisfied; and the order of proceeding was settled by ballot.

Being asked, If, from what had past, he could form any judgement of what time it would take to scrutinize the whole of the parishes? said, They had been near eight months going through two parishes; those two parishes were near a fourth of the whole; consequently, assuming the same rate of dispatch, it would take up about two years more. Being asked as to the expence, said, Expence there must be, but to what amount he could not answer. His assessor had 10 guineas every sitting-day; his two clerks half a guinea each: this was paid by the agents of Sir Cecil Wray. And he had heard both sides say, they were obliged to pay witnesses. Did he believe the money influenced their votes?

The Master of the Rolls [Sir Lloyd Kenyon] objected to the questions.

He said, all courts suffered payment of witnesses, whose testimonies were not invalidated on that account. And he insisted that all courts had a power of punishing witnesses if they behaved ill. This, however, was flatly contradicted; and it was contended, that the payment of witnesses, not upon oath, differed widely from the payment of witnesses who were liable to punishment if detected in perjury.

Quest. by Mr. Burke. It has been said, that every court has a power of punishment. I ask, If you should think it right to attach a witness for prevarication or contempt, what officers you have to take him into custody? Answ. None. If you had such officer, Do you know of any gaoler who would accept and retain a witness on your warrant? A. I do not know of any. Could he proceed without counsel? Undoubtedly; but he believed not more expeditiously. He was asked, If (now left to his own discretion) he could do justice to the parties by making a return in the present stage of the scrutiny, without proceeding to the other parishes? said, A very doubtful judgement, not at all satisfactory to himself.

Many other questions were asked, which our limits will not permit us to recite. But, upon the whole, it was generally agreed, that the High Bailiff answered to the satisfaction of the House.

Francis Hargrave, esq. was next called.

He was asked by Mr. Fox, How long he had been assessor to the High Bailiff? said, From the latter end of May to the 12th of January, at which time he entertained some objections to a farther continuance. What were those objections? He felt himself hurt, by a paper published by the committee of Sir Cecil Wray and Lord Hood, which evidently pointed at him, and determined him against remaining longer. If he had found it the wish of both parties, he would have continued, and would have endeavoured to accelerate the completion of the scrutiny, though he had not constitution either of body or mind equal to the fatigue of constant attendance.

Q. by Mr. Fox, Have your observations in the course of this business tended to inform you that Mr. Fox's counsel evinced any particular disposition to procrastination or delay? A. I observed no other conduct in this particular than what might be expected from the adverse and hostile dispositions which prevailed on both sides; nor could I observe any considerable difference in this respect between the counsel of Mr. Fox and those of Sir Cecil Wray.

[A number of questions were asked Mr. Hargrave relative to his relinquishing his office of assessor, which all terminated in what he at first declared. He admitted that the court of scrutiny was incompetent to the task of justice, as not being furnished with judicial authority.]

Mr. Arthur Murphy, who succeeded Mr. Hargrave, was then called, and, after many questions respecting the tediousness of the scrutiny, and the causes of it, said, That each vote was tried with as much form and prolixity as a cause before Lord Mansfield in Westminster-hall; that the counsel claimed a right, in some cases, to make five speeches; that, in his opinion, the fewer speeches of counsel, the better for dispatch. And being asked by Mr. Fox, If he was prepared to suggest to the High Bailiff a better mode of dispatch than had been hitherto followed, he hesitated, and, after some pause, not giving so explicit an answer as he expected, Mr. Fox expressed his dissatisfaction; which called up Lord Mulgrave, and a sharp altercation ensued; which, however, was of short continuance, and the question being persisted in, and enforced by the House, Mr. Murphy said, It was his idea to reduce the mode of examination as near as possible to the practice of the committees of that House. And being asked by Lord Beauchamp, whether, upon the whole, it was not his opinion, that justice to all the parties would be more expeditiously, as well as most unexceptionally done by referring the enquiry at once to a committee of the House? said, In his opinion, the best way would be to refer it to a committee. Thus closed the examinations, and at half after two in the morning the House adjourned.

Particular Account of a Voyage in the Atmosphere, from Dover-Castle to France, in a Grand Balloon (see p. 71). See the Plate, fig. 15; which will be illustrated by these references: 1. Dover-Castle. 2. M. Blanchard. 3. Dr. Jeffries. 4. The oars. 5. The hoop, or upper story. 6. The fly, or moulinet. 7. The Balloon.

THOSE skilful and enterprising philosophers, Messrs. Blanchard and Jeffries, after waiting at Dover from the 25th of December, 1784, their apparatus being then ready for the experiment, for a favourable gale to reach the Continent, determined on Friday morning, Jan. 7th, 1785, to prepare for their voyage; the sky being clear, the weather moderate and the wind at N. N. W. At eight o'clock the signal gun was fired, the flag hoisted at the Castle, and it was supposed they would make their ascent in about four hours.—Expresses were dispatched to every place where it was possible that company could have notice, and arrive in time to see the Balloon go off, and a number of the inhabitants went from Canterbury. Soon after twelve o'clock, the Balloon was sufficiently filled for the experiment; the form was a long oval, supposed to be equal to 94 feet in circumference, covered with strong net-work half way over it, from whence the cords were continued, by which the passengers and their carriage were to be suspended.—The Gas was supplied from thirty butts, which it is supposed could have filled the Balloon in much less than two hours if it had been necessary; the inflammable air was conveyed in tin pipes from each butt, which terminated in two receivers at the lower part of the Balloon; the whole apparatus was exceedingly well adapted, and much credit was due to the chemist through the whole process of filling. The cords from the net-work were held by ten or a dozen men, till the boat, which was seven feet and a half long, three feet and a half wide, and two feet nine inches deep, was placed in its proper situation to be suspended. Doctor Jeffries then seated himself at the head, taking with him a barometer and flag, and, pulling off his coat, put on a loose flannel jacket. The active and ingenious little Frenchman, who had on a great coat and flannel trousers fastened to his shoes, soon followed him, and taking up the hoop which was fastened to the boat by eight or ten strong sash lines, about 18 inches long, began to take in the cords from each person who held them, and made them fast at equal distances round the hoop, tying every knot himself, and observing with the greatest care and precision, that every string bore alike on the body of the Balloon, that the boat might be equally balanced; some few articles of provision were taken in, with a pocket bottle of spirits, two large parcels of bladders inflated, and two cork jackets, which latter were intended to have afforded some assistance in case of distress; but these, alas, were trivial aids, if any unfavourable current should drive them to the immense Ocean.—Just at their departure, a paper, the purport of which was to certify to the court of France, that these gentlemen were launched with a Balloon from Dover Cliffs on that day at seven minutes past one o'clock, signed by upwards of 60 spectators, was put into Mr. Blanchard's hand; and now the awful moment came, every remaining cord was loosened, and this large stupendous body seemed struggling to get loose to float in purer climes.—The particular friends of our two Aerial Heroes on each side of the boat, kept it gently gliding on the ground till it came to the utmost edge of the Cliff.—Then was realized that famous description of Shakespeare, in his tragedy of King Lear, when Gloucester is about to throw himself from the Cliff on the other side of the town;

————— “How fearful
“And dizzy 'tis, to cast one's eyes so low!
————— “I'll look no more,
“Lest my brain turn, and the deficient sight
“Turn me down headlong —————

From a precipice like this let the admiring world be told, that these two men were launched to swim in air—or meet inevitable death; and from this precipice, to the rapturous astonishment of thousands of spectators, these bold adventurers floated safe in the atmosphere, buoyed up by a power lighter than air itself.—The sight was truly sublime, the spectators were all eyes, and their hearts all feeling.—The serenity and composure visible on the countenances of these two extraordinary characters, the display of two beautiful flags, the Red Ensign of England and the Royal Standard of France, the elegance of the little wherry that sustained the passengers, the expansion of the silken oars, and the stupendous magnificence of the Balloon itself, with the sun-beams full upon them, was a sight which leaves all description at a distance, and requires, indeed, a thousand witnesses to establish the truth of this most wonderful spectacle to the absent public.

The salutations from the Castle, the Beach, the Forts, and the Town were general, and gracefully returned by the two Aeronauts moving their hats and waving their flags; this was repeated again and again, whilst, by an almost imperceptible transition, they gradually lessened to the eye. At the distance of about half seas over they descended so rapidly, that the spectators were exceedingly alarmed, apprehensive that some accident had befallen them; but in a few minutes they were relieved from their apprehension by their re-ascending higher than before, though the elevation of the Balloon at no time appeared more than half a mile or three quarters from the surface of the sea. The wind at the time of their crossing was favourable, visible, and the sky was so clear that the French land and town of Calais were plainly discernible, and the eye scarcely lost sight of the Voyagers for near an hour and a half, and with good glasses they were seen till late within the opposite coast. When the Balloon first moved, it is supposed to have risen with between five and six hundred lb. wt.

The celebrity of this adventure will perpetuate the fame of Mr. Blanchard and Dr. Jeffries; Philosophy may hereafter improve this science, and accommodate Balloons to some useful purpose, and less astonish the world; but all future ages must applaud the abilities, and admire the cool, intrepid, determined conduct of these two men, who first crossed the Ocean suspended in the æthereal regions by the power only of inflammable air.

On this occasion it is hoped the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports will cause a pillar to be erected on the spot where the Balloon first floated, with the names of the Aeronauts; and on the base, the process of filling, and a view of the distended globe with all its appendages, when crossing the Channel; his Lordship has been known to patronise learning and learned men, and this attention to the philosophy of Acrostatics would contribute to perpetuate his fame. The particular attention and civility paid by Sir Tho. Page, Mess. Fector, Mr. Lane, Mr. Stringer, and many other gentlemen, to Mr. Blanchard and Doctor Jeffries whilst they were detained at Dover, does great honour to the liberality of their minds, and deserves to be publicly recorded.

The following is the Plan of Commercial Intercourse between Great Britain and Ireland, which, on the 7th instant, Mr. Orde, Secretary to the Duke of Rutland, laid before the Grand Committee of the Irish Parliament, and amended on the 11th (we shall forbear the least Comment till it is seen how it is received by the Parliament of Great Britain.)

I. RESOLVED, That it is the opinion of this Committee, that it is highly important to the general interest of the British empire, that the trade between Great Britain and Ireland be encouraged and extended as much as possible, and for that purpose, that the intercourse and commerce be finally settled and regulated on permanent and equitable principles, for the mutual benefit of both countries.

II. Resolved, That, towards carrying into full effect so desirable a settlement, it is fit and proper that all articles, not the growth or manufacture of Great Britain or Ireland, should be imposed into each kingdom from the other reciprocally, under the same regulations, and at the same duties (if subject to duties) to which they are liable, when imported directly from the place of their growth, product, or manufacture; and that all duties originally paid on the importation into either country respectively, shall be fully drawn back on exportation to the other.

III. Resolved, That for the same purpose it is proper that no prohibition should exist in either country, against the importation, use, or sale of any article, the growth, product, or manufacture of the other; and that the duty on the importation of every such article, if subject to duty in either country, should be precisely the same in the one country as in the other, except where an addition may be necessary in either country, in consequence of an internal duty on any such article of its own consumption.

IV. Resolved, That in all cases where the duties on articles of the growth, product, or manufacture of either country, are different on the importation into the other, it would be expedient that they should be reduced in the kingdom where they are the highest, to the amount payable in the other; and that all such articles should be exportable from the kingdom into which they shall be imported, as free from duty as the similar commodities, or home manufacture of the same kingdom.

V. Resolved, That for the same purpose it is also proper, that in all cases where either kingdom shall charge articles of its own consumption with an internal duty on the manufacturer, or a duty on the material, the same manufacture, when imported from the other, may be charged with a farther duty on importation to the same amount as the internal duty on the manufacture, or to an amount adequate to countervail the duty on the material; and shall be entitled to such drawbacks or bounties on exportation as may leave the same subject to no heavier burdens than the home-made manufacture; such farther duty to continue so long only as the internal consumption shall be charged with the duty or duties to balance which it shall be imposed, or until the manufacture coming from the other kingdom shall be subjected there to an equal burden, not drawn back, or compensated on exportation.

VI. Resolved, That, in order to give permanency to the settlement now intended to be established, it is necessary that no prohibition, or new or additional duties, should be hereafter imposed in either kingdom, on the importation of any article of the growth, product, or manufacture of the other, except such additional duties as may be requisite to balance duties on internal consumption, pursuant to the foregoing resolution.

VII. Resolved, That, for the same purpose, it is necessary farther, that no prohibitions, or new, or additional duties should be hereafter imposed in either kingdom, on the exportation of any article of native growth, product, or manufacture, from thence to the other, except such as either kingdom may decide

deem expedient, from time to time, upon corn, meal, malt, flour, and biscuit; and also, except where there now exists any prohibition which is not reciprocal, or any duty which is not equal in both kingdoms: in every such case, the prohibition may be made reciprocal, or the duties raised, so as to make them equal.

VIII. Resolved, That, for the same purpose, it is necessary, that no bounties whatsoever should be paid or payable in either kingdom, on the exportation of any article to the other, except such as relate to corn, meal, malt, flour, and biscuits; and such as are in the nature of drawbacks, or compensation for duties paid; and that no bounty should be granted in this kingdom, on the exportation of any article imported from the British plantations, or any manufacture made of such article, unless in cases where a similar bounty is payable in Britain on exportation from thence, or where such bounty is merely in the nature of a drawback, or compensation of, or for duties paid over and above any duties paid thereon in Britain.

IX. Resolved; That it is expedient for the general benefit of the British empire, that the importation of articles from foreign states should be regulated from time to time, in each kingdom, on such terms as may afford an effectual preference to the importation of similar articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the other.

X. Resolved, That it is essential to the commercial interests of this country, to prevent, as much as possible, an accumulation of national debt; that therefore it is highly expedient, that the annual revenue of this kingdom should be made equal to its annual expence.

XI. Resolved, That, for the better protection of trade, whatever sum the gross hereditary revenue of this kingdom (after deducting all drawbacks, re-payments, or bounties granted in the nature of drawbacks) shall produce over and above the sum of 856,000*l.* in each year of peace; wherein the annual revenue shall equal the annual expence, and in each year of war, without regard to such equality, should be appropriated towards the support of the naval force of the empire, in such manner as the parliament of this kingdom shall direct.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

"The King of France, whose attention is directed to useful objects, has just been turning his views to the improvement of the Sciences. A new establishment has furnished the observatory with instruments and books, and will provide for a constant observation of the stars. Another establishment will soon discover to France, and to the learned of Europe, treasures which have been too long hid; it will make known what the valuable collection of manuscripts in the King's library, and those in other public and private possession, can furnish to the sciences, to history, and to literature. Eight members of the Academy of Belles Lettres are particularly charged with this work, and are to communicate to the public all the important matters of every kind which may be contained in those manuscripts. Two will examine the Oriental manuscripts, three the Greek and Latin, the three others will attend to those manuscripts which concern the history of France, and in general the antiquities of the middle age. They will give these accounts in detail, and in well-digested extracts. Those pieces which may deserve to be printed at large, will be translated, or published in their original tongues, as shall appear requisite. The eight academicians named by the king, are Messrs. de Breguigny, de Guignes, Gaillard, de Theil, de Vilboison, de Keralia, l'Abbé Brotier, de Vauvilliers. The other academicians are called to the same work by the election of the academy, and with the approbation of the King, to fill up places as they may chance to become vacant. All learned men, strangers as well as natives, are invited to examine the manuscripts which are preserved in the different repositories, where they will be allowed access, and to communicate the result of their labours to Mr. Dacier, perpetual secretary to the academy, under cover to M. le Baron de Breteuil. The extracts that may be made by strangers, are to be published by themselves, with the names also of their authors. It is sufficient to announce this great institution. It bears the character of public utility, and gives it a title to be ranked among the most commendable establishments which Kings have made in favour of letters.

REMARKABLE ECCLESIASTICAL CASE.

On Monday evening the Court of Delegates finally decreed in the cause between Dr. Hind and Mr. Martyn, the late rector and curate of St. Anne, Westminster: the subject of appeal was the sentence of the Ecclesiastical court, in a libel of office promoted by Dr. Hind, against Mr. M. in the year 1776, charging him with drunkenness, immorality, and neglect of duty; and also with preaching, reading prayers, and solemnizing marriages, in defiance of him. All the charges, excepting that of defiance, were adjudged by the Ecclesiastical Court to be void of proof; and they appeared, as well by the evidence of Dr. Hind's witnesses, as by the testimony of many gentlemen of rank, who appeared in behalf of Mr. Martyn, to have no shadow of foundation. Dr. Wynne, the judge of the consistory of London, pronounced, notwithstanding, in the year 1779, "that Mr. M. ought to be removed from the curacy of St. Anne, and condemned him in costs;" which, in that court only, amounted to near four hundred pounds.

pounds. From this sentence Mr. M. appealed; and being heard personally in December, 1781, before Dr. Calvert, the judge of the Arches Court of Canterbury, the sentence of the Consistory Court was affirmed, and the costs nearly doubled by the expence of the appeal. The last resort was to the Delegates, to whom an appeal was immediately entered; the hearing of which commenced on the 31st. of January, and final decree was given therein, on Monday last, when the Judges Delegates pronounced for the appeal, and annulled the sentence of the Ecclesiastical courts; by which Mr. M. is delivered from a persecution as cruel, unjust, and oppressive, as ever came before a court. Mr. Martyn, who pleaded for himself, received every indulgence and encouragement from the Court. (Copied verbatim from the Papers.)

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

Constantinople, Jan. 10. The plague still continues here, owing to the most unreasonable weather ever remembered in this country. Gaz.

Accounts published here, respecting the troubles in Georgia, differ widely from those published at Petersburg, (see p. 65); and say that the Russians and Tartars were defeated with great loss.

Naples, Dec. 28. The earthquakes which had ceased in Calabria for some weeks, have again been sensibly felt, and prove a great discouragement to the operations carrying on for the benefit of those afflicted countries, particularly of Messina, which has been declared a free port, and where the buildings were actually begun.

Caserta, Jan. 1. Every precaution is seriously employed here to keep off the plague, which, by the last account, rages at Tunis, and the country round it, with such violence as if it had broke out in the midst of summer. According to accounts, no less than 32000 people have been already carried off by this calamity. Gaz.

Petersburg, Dec. 29. The Count de Boddillon who had been some time at this court, under the title of Marquis de Lamas, and, who, in that character, by his politeness and address, had gained many friends, and, by their means, had access to the dock-yards and arsenals, where he had taken a very minute account of the magazines and works going on there, the ships fitting out, building, repairing, &c. on a sudden was apprehended as a spy, and conducted to the capital, where, on his examination before the lieutenant of the police, papers had been found about him, which, had it not been for the interposition of the French envoy, would have exposed him to the indignity of being sent to the dungeon in the castle. He was, however, by her Imperial Majesty's order, conveyed out of the Russian territories, under the guard of an Exempt, in an open carriage, and his person, name, &c. made known in all the places where he passed.—This affair wants elucidation.

Vienna, Jan. 15. The courier from Hermanstadt is just arrived with an account that the two chiefs of the rebels, Horiah and Klossa, have been taken in the woods of Kadakes, by two Wallachians, their intimates who knowing the paths of the wood, traced them to their retreat, where they found them warming themselves in their cave. On a signal a detachment of troops, which followed them, came forward, and secured both the rebels. When Horiah was taken, he had in his possession property to the amount of thirty thousand florins in gold, silver, and jewels; the seal of his monarchy was likewise found upon him. The device a heart pierced with a spear, with the following words, "Horiah Rex Deciz." The capture of these leaders has put an entire end to the troubles in Transilvania: the insurgents laid down their arms, and again returned to their respective employments.

Vienna, Jan. 29. By virtue of an Imperial edict, the printing of Almanacks and Calendars, specifying days of public devotion and spiritual exercise, is prohibited, unless such productions shall have been examined and approved by an ecclesiastical commission, which also is invested with authority to take cognizance of all publications contrary to the ordinances of the church.

Madrid, Jan. 5. It has been for several days confidently asserted here, that a treaty is on the point of being negotiated between our Court and the emperor of Morocco, according to which that monarch is to attack the Algerines by land, while the confederated Christian powers assault the great piratical depredators by sea; and that after the reduction of the city of Algiers and its dependencies, the emperor of Morocco is to be put in possession of the whole Algerine coast, where the subjects of Spain are to be secured in divers exclusive commercial privileges. (See p. 66.)

The Dutch letters speak of the continuance of operations in Holland, both in the naval and military line. The Amsterdam letters are very profuse on this subject. The conclusion of a postscript from one of the first houses in that city is very remarkable: "The States, says the writer, continue to give the utmost zeal and attention in putting the forces of the Republic on a footing that will be respectable and permanent; their exertions in the naval line are very great, and the rise of our marine will be rapid and unexpected. In the midst of all, we have very forcible reasons to hope there will soon be an end to the differences with the court of of Vienna; but the Republic has reason to fear more powerful enemies, as there does not subsist the best understanding between the States-General and one or two of the naval Northern powers. A coolness is very apparent, and this is generally the forerunner of disputes, which often end rather seriously. These considerations make an attention to the marine the more necessary (though the tax on the provinces is heavy to support it), as the trade cannot otherwise be protected.

Ostend, Jan. 30. The Oriental warehouses at this place are now perfectly empty, all the teas having been purchased by the English East India Company, and were on Friday shipped on board vessels for England, which sailed yesterday from this harbour to proceed on their passage.

Paris, Jan. 30. The Marquis de la Fayette is returned from Philadelphia, and brought with him a young savage of 12 years old, to whom he purposes giving a very good education.

Paris, Feb. 11. A new kind of exhibition is soon to be given to the public. This is an aerostatic giant, of 18 feet in height, ballasted in such a manner as to preserve a perpendicular direction, which is to be set off from one of the windows of the Thuilleries, to ascend into the atmosphere. This colossal figure, will, it is said, be accompanied by several others of a less size. If this flying giant should fall, with his suite, in any of the Cantons where these aerostatic machines are not known, an idea may be formed of the terror of the inhabitants of the country on seeing men fall from the clouds.

EAST INDIA INTELLIGENCE.

It should seem that the death of Major Davey, Persian Interpreter to Gov. Hastings, on his passage home, has deprived Government and the public of much useful information, with which it is confidently asserted by one party, he was entrusted; while, on the other, it is contended, that his dispatches contained nothing but what has transpired. And that the papers which he ordered to be buried with him in the Ocean, were such only as respected his own private affairs.

It was, indeed, asserted, that diamonds to a very considerable amount accompanied his dispatches: and that the diamonds were preserved, though the dispatches were destroyed. To this it was replied, that part of the small fortune which the Major had acquired, he had invested in rough diamonds, which were in the ship with him; that he had besides, a small bullion for a gentleman at Bath from his son, and one bullion, of the value of 1250*l.* the property of Mr. Hastings; and this, it is insisted, is the whole history of the dispatches and the diamonds. Our readers will judge, as it is fit, each for himself, which tale is most probable. But all, we believe, will conclude with us, that if the recall of General Hastings, has actually taken place, the appointment of Lord Macartney for his successor, will cause great revolutions in the affairs of Hindostan. That they may be productive of good, is the general wish of the nation; for of much good or much evil (there is no medium), they will certainly be the cause. On the ballot for the nomination at the India-house, there were 22 directors present, eleven of whom were for the appointment, and eleven for postponing it. And on the Treasurer's drawing lots, both on the motion for the previous question, and on the main question for the appointment, he carried it against the former, and for the latter; thus then chance decided on the appointment to the greatest trust the Company and this (or perhaps any other) Nation have to bestow.

AMERICAN INTELLIGENCE.

New York, Dec. 2. The house of the hon. James Lovel, at Bolton, Continental Receiver of the taxes for the State of Massachusetts, was broke open, and an iron chest containing a sum of upwards of 25,000 dollars, some specie, a number of notes, and other valuables, was taken therefrom.

Richmond, Virginia, Nov. 20. His Excellency Gen. Washington arrived in this city, and was received with the most heart-felt applause that could be expressed on seeing our illustrious and beloved Gen. in the capital of the State, and in the bosom of peace. In the evening the city was illuminated, and every expression of joy was shewn on the occasion.

Col. Martin, lately arrived from the Cherokee Nation, brings the disagreeable news, that all the Indians, from the falls of Niagara, to the Mississippi, have entered into a combination to strike the white people as soon as the leaves fall off the trees. Other accounts from Fort Pitt inform, that a party of Indians, supposed to be Shawanese and Delaware, had fallen in with the inhabitants at the mouth of the Wheeler, and had killed eighteen persons.

Philadelphia, Dec. 4. His most Christian Majesty has sent by the Marquis de Chateaux a very fine collection of books in a present to the University here. That body, at a meeting held on the occasion, came to a resolution, that the President be required to write to the Marquis a letter expressive of their obligation for his good offices, and intreating him to communicate to the Comte de Vergennes their sentiments of gratitude for the interest he has been pleased to take in the prosperity of the University, and particularly for the honour his most Christian Majesty has done them, by turning his royal attention to the progress of the Sciences in that establishment, and enlarging their library by a magnificent present.

INTELLIGENCE FROM SCOTLAND.

Edinburgh, Jan. 29. This day the High Court of Justiciary met, pursuant to adjournment of Tuesday, and pronounced sentence on Lieut. George Storie, convicted of culpable homicide. The court assycted the said George Storie in the sum of 1000 marks to the nearest of kin of the deceased William Stuart; ordained him to be carried back to the Tolbooth of this city, and from thence to be transmitted to the Tolbooth of Paisley, where he is to be confined for eight months; to find bail to keep the peace for two years, under the penalty of 2000 marks, and to be imprisoned till payment of the assythement, and finding caution. [Storie was a relation of the deceased, had a quarrel with him over sight, and next day renewed it in the deceased's own shop, where he gave him some unfortunate blows with a bottle on the head, which killed him.]

At a late annual general meeting of the Edinburgh Society, 100l. Sterling was voted to be laid out by the committee in premiums, for improvements in agriculture and manufactures, and to Authors of Essays of merit on the subject of the fisheries, and other objects of their institution.

COUNTRY NEWS.

The good effects of the Sunday Schools lately established at Wakefield and Barnsley, in Yorkshire, are already apparent to all, and the children surprizingly improved, both in their morals and behaviour. At the latter place such children as have good voices are taught church music, and now sing the praises of that Great Being, whose name they formerly prophaned. It ought to be recorded that this happy change is principally owing to the unwearied pains of Mr. Foljambe Wood, assisted by a few well-disposed neighbours.

About the latter end of January a shew being exhibited at a public house in Winstan, in the county of Derby, some gun-powder scattered on the floor of an upper chamber took fire, and instantly communicated with the remainder of a barrel, out of which it had been carelessly scattered, the whole upper story was blown up, while the people below, to the number of between 50 and 60, remained unhurt.—A similar instance of the blowing up of a shew-house happened some years ago, at Chester, but attended, then, with very deplorable circumstances.

Among the Acrostics, Mr. Harper of Birmingham ought not to be forgotten. On the 6th of January he made his first voyage, amidst an innumerable multitude of spectators. Though it rained incessantly, and the atmosphere was remarkably hazy, yet the balloon rose with increasing velocity, and in a few minutes was out of sight. In the progress of his aerial excursion, he experienced no other inconvenience than what might have been expected from the change of climates, except a temporary deafness. His ascent commenced at 35 minutes after 12, and about 2 o'clock he descended at Whetstone-green, near Newcastle, in Staffordshire, 50 miles from the place from whence he set out. Next day he arrived at Birmingham, amidst the acclamations of the populace, who took the horses from his carriage, and drew him triumphantly through the principal streets.

On the 31st of January he attempted a second aerial voyage from the same place; but the balloon, in ascending, happening to strike against the upper part of an adjoining house, it received so much damage, that Mr. Harper was himself obliged to be taken out, and a boy got into the car, to assist in weighing the balloon down to be repaired; but it was no sooner cleared from the house, than it rose with the boy; who behaved with the greatest courage, waving his hat by way of saluting the company. The balloon being damag damaged, he was soon landed at a small distance, without receiving the least hurt.—This has been differently reported, and the balloon said to be carried to a great distance.

On the 28th of January, Sarah Alsop, wife of Benjamin Alsop, a poor labouring man of Tamworth, was delivered of one dead child, and on Sunday the 30th, she was safely delivered of three more live children, who were all baptized; but soon died.

A gentleman, with one servant, having called at the Angel Inn, at Tunbridge, in his way to Lewes, where he was going to take a survey of part of an estate of which he lately became possessor in right of his wife, was observed to be particularly attentive to a young lad, the nephew of the landlord, whom he enticed, when he went to bed, to sleep with him. This being discovered by the family, they suddenly rushed into the room, and rescued the boy from a situation which justified their taking the gentleman into custody. After a short examination before two of his Majesty's justices of peace, he was by them bound over to appear at the next assizes, himself in 100l. and his two sureties in 500l. each.

Cambridge, Feb. 11. The subjects appointed by the Vice Chancellor for the present year, for Sir William Browne's medals, are,
For the Odes, Parentalia Handeliana.

For the Epigrams, Ut res dant sese, ita magni atque humiles sumus.

Birmingham, Feb. 17. On Monday night the postman bringing the mail to this office, lost the Dudley bag out of his pouch, and being in liquor and late in point of time, he is committed to prison. We do not learn that it has yet been restored; but as the postmaster has offered ten guineas reward on conviction of the person who detains it, it is presumed, it will be speedily recovered.

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE.

January 26.

This day Mr. Middleton of Chirk Castle, came of age. Sir Watkin Williams Wynne, desirous of shewing that all animosities which had formerly subsisted between his family and that of the gentleman whose birth was to be that day celebrated, had entirely ceased, opened his house at Wynnstan, and gave an ox to be roasted at Rhwabon; Mr. Middleton himself likewise gave one to the inhabitants of Chirk; Mr. Owen gave one to those of Ruthin; Colonel Middleton gave one to those of Denbigh; the Hon. Mr. Fitzmaurice gave one to those of Llewenny; and one was given to the inhabitants of Wrexham.

Besides these generous sacrifices to the appetite of hunger, that of thirst did not pass unnoticed.

Mr. Middleton gave fifty pounds to be spent at Denbigh.

Fifty pounds to be spent at Ruthin.

Fifty pounds to be spent at Mould.

Thirty pounds to be spent at Wrexham.

Twenty pounds to be spent at Rhwabon.

Thirty pounds to be spent at Llangothlin.

Thirty pounds to be spent at Chirk.

Twenty pounds to be spent at Llanfyllin.

Twenty pounds to be spent at Llanrhaider.

And five guineas to be spent by his few residing servants in London; amounting in the whole to the sum of three hundred and five pounds five shillings.

Mr. Middleton has hitherto exhibited all the beneficence that has characterised his family; and we trust that no corruptions or follies of the times will seduce him from a path so honourable to himself, and so beneficial to mankind.

January 28.

The ceremony of the knighthood and investiture of Sir Robert Boyd, knight of the most honourable order of the Bath, lieutenant-general of his Majesty's forces, lieutenant-governor of Gibraltar, &c. was performed in his Majesty's closet. Several great officers of the court were present. Gaz.

The Speaker of the Commons informed the House that his Majesty had been waited upon with their address of thanks, to which his Majesty gave the following most gracious answer:

"Gentlemen,

"I return you my thanks for your very loyal and affectionate address; I receive with the utmost pleasure the assurances of your disposition to resume the consideration of public business with the same principles which you have manifested in all your former proceedings. And I trust that result of your deliberations will be productive of the most salutary effects."

This day M. de Simolin, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the empress of Russia had a private audience of leave of his Majesty. He has since appeared at the Court of France.

January 29.

Addresses from the Lords and Commons of Ireland to his Majesty, and also to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, were inserted in this day's Gazette. They were truly loyal, and remarkably expressive of their attachment to their sister kingdom.

January 30.

Between the hours of two and three in the morning a set of daring villains, called water-pirates, broke into the dark part of the house at Whitehall, inhabited by the Speaker of the House of Commons. They cut a hole in the window-shutter of the dining-parlour, and carried off the Speaker's rich gold gown or robe of state, several suits of cloaths, and other wearing apparel, two gold snuff-boxes, one a present from Mr. Flood, remarkably elegant, and a purse with a small sum of money. They were seen to come in a boat from Lambeth.

A duel was fought between the captains Brises and Bulkley; the first fire being won by the latter, he shot and narrowly missed his antagonist, who fired his pistol in the air, and the seconds interposing, the affair ended in the field.

January 31.

The House of Peers met, and having received some appeals, adjourned to Thursday. The Lord Chancellor then proceeded to Westminster-Abbey, attended by the Earl of Suffolk, the only lay lord present, and by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, Bishops of Winchester, Chester, Worcester, Gloucester, Gloucester, Exeter, St. David's, and the Bishop of Bristol, who preached the sermon. His Lordship's text was from Daniel, chap. v. ver. 21.

The House of Commons met, and attended the sermon preached at St. Margaret's church, Westminster, the same being kept as the commemoration of king Charles's Martyrdom. The Rev. Mr. Williams, Chaplain to the House, made a most excellent discourse from Ezek. xx. ver. 4. He has since received the thanks of the House.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 1.

Copies of the last report of the proceedings at the East India Company's tea sales, as stated by their committee, have been, by order of the directors, sent to all the members of both Houses of Parliament, and to the chief magistrates of every Corporation throughout the kingdom. According to this, it is made to appear that upwards of 8,700,000 lb. weight of teas of different sorts were sold at the two last sales, in the Months of September and December last, at a saving of upwards eleven hundred thousand pounds sterling to the public, according to the ratio that teas of the same species have sold at ten years before. The prices have been at these sales on the average as follows: Combrin Bôhea 1s. 8d. halfpenny per lb. including king's duty of 2d. 1-8th; Congou at 4s. 6d. 7-8ths per lb. including duty of 6d. 2-8th per lb.; Souchong at 5s. 8d. 4-8ths, including duty of 9d. 3-8ths, per lb.; Hyson at 6s. 8d. 6-8ths, including duty of 10d. 1-8th per lb. Some copies have also been sent to Ireland.

Mr. Kersley of Micheldover, Herts, returning from London, in the stage was shot, by the carelessness of the guard who was in the basket, whose piece went off by accident, three slugs went through the back of the coach.

Wednesday 2.

This morning a shocking spectacle was exhibited before the debtor's door of Newgate, where 20 miserable wretches were in one moment plunged into eternity. It is truly lamentable, that the safety, peace, and good order of society, should render the sacrifice of the lives of our fellow creatures to the offended laws indispensably necessary. The malefactors who suffered this morning were, John Hamilton, William Astell, John Kelsey, William Finder, William Steward, and Melvin Simmonds, for different burglaries, and George Goldsmith, Richard Hobson, Lawrence Hall, and John Jones, for a burglary at the Black Dog in Shoreditch; Edward Johnson and John Evans, for privately stealing in separate dwelling houses; James Dunn, for publishing a forged seaman's will; William Abbot, for publishing a counterfeit bill of sale with intent to defraud the owners of the Warren Haskings East Indiaman; Allen

Williams, for assaulting and robbing a passenger at Sheppard's Bush; and John Shaw, Thomas Tabbs, George Harris, Thomas Battledore and John Moody, for assaulting Thomas Francis, near Bagnigge Wells, and robbing him of some glass drops, a knife, and some money. They all appeared to die sincerely penitent, and deeply impressed with an idea of the awful change they were about to experience. The concourse of people was much greater than is remembered in the same neighbourhood on any occasion whatever.

Thursday 3.

Mrs. Montague happening to fall at Sir James's, received next day the following lines from Mr. Jerminham:

Ye radiant fair! Ye Hebe's of the day,
Who heedless laugh your little hours away.
Let caution be your guide whene'er ye sport
Within the slippery avenues of Court;
Th'event of yesterday for prudence tells,
'Tis dangerous treading where Minerva falls.

Friday 4.

In the message which was this day delivered by Mr. Orde, to the Speaker of the House of Commons of Ireland, previous to the delivery of the plan for settling the commercial interests of the two kingdoms, is the following paragraph:

"His majesty has observed with great concern, the popular disturbances that have lately prevailed, from the intemperance and indiscretion of misguided men, and confides in the constant and strenuous endeavours of his faithful Commons of Ireland, to prevent their pernicious effects; and their resolution to reject and suppress every assumed authority which may attempt to dictate to the Legislature, affords his Majesty the highest satisfaction. His Majesty is fully persuaded that a proper degree of attention will be shown in the consideration of such internal regulations, as may be necessary for securing the peace and happiness of his subjects in Ireland, as well as for the settlement of all commercial objects between his kingdoms, upon equitable and lasting principles, for the mutual advantage of the different parts of the empire; and they may depend upon his most ready concurrence in the support of such measures, as upon a mature consideration may appear to draw closer those ties of interest and affection between the two countries, which are so essential to their happiness and prosperity."

Saturday 5.

The committee appointed to wait on Mr. Pitt, with the freedom of the city of London, proceeded from Guildhall in procession to Mr. Pitt's house in Downing Street. Being introduced, Sir Watkin Lewes, as chairman of the committee, addressed the minister in a short but elegant speech, assuring him that the city of London would ever stand foremost in supporting government, while the the measures of administration continued to be founded in wisdom and integrity. He then presented the box, in which was inclosed the freedom, which was received with that peculiar politeness natural to Mr. Pitt, thanking the committee, and assuring them that commerce and the true principles of the constitution should ever continue to be the first objects of his attention.

Monday, 7.

This day Lady Strathmore Bowes exhibited articles of the peace, in the court of King's Bench, against her husband, for ill-treatment of her person: her ladyship desired to have the protection of one of the tipstaves to her house, which was complied with.

Wednesday, 9.

In consequence of the examination of the High Bailiff of Westminster and his assessors (see p. 143), Mr. Welbore Ellis moved, "That it appearing to this House, that Thomas Corbett, Esq. High Bailiff of the city of Westminster, having received a precept from the Sheriff of Middlesex for electing two citizens to serve in parliament for this city, and having taken and finally closed the poll on the 17th day of May last, being the day next before the day of the return of the said writ, he be now directed forthwith to make return of his precept of members in pursuance thereof;" which however was negatived. And Lord Mulgrave moved as an amendment, "That the speaker do acquaint the High Bailiff,

"1st, That he is not precluded by the resolution of this house, communicated to him on the 8th of June last, from making a return whenever he shall be satisfied in his own judgment that he can do so.

"2. That this house is not satisfied that the scrutiny has been proceeded on as expeditiously as it might have been; that it is his duty to adopt and enforce such just and reasonable regulations as shall appear to him most likely to prevent unnecessary delay in future; that he is not precluded from so doing by the want of consent of either party, and that he may be assured of the support of this house in the discharge of his duty."

The question being put on this amendment, it was carried. The arguments on both sides shall be reported in our next.

Thursday, 10.

The freeholders of the County of York met, pursuant to notice from the high sheriff, in order to take into consideration a petition to the House of Commons, on the subject of parliamentary reform, when the following petition to the Hon. the Commons of Great Britain was produced, viz.

The humble Petition of the Freeholders of the County of York,

"Sheweth,

"That your petitioners, sensible of the original excellence of the constitution of this country, most ardently wish to have it maintained upon the genuine principles on which it was founded.

"Your petitioners further shew that it is necessary to the welfare of the people, that the Commons' House of Parliament should have a common interest with the nation, and that in the present state of the people in parliament the Commons of this realm are partially and inadequately represented, and consequently cannot have that security for their liberties, which it is the aim of the constitution to give them.

"Your petitioners therefore most humbly supplicate this honourable house, to take into their most serious consideration the present inadequate state of the representation of the people in parliament, and to apply such remedy to this great constitutional evil, as to this honourable house may seem meet.

"And your petitioners shall ever pray, &c."

The above petition appears, by the papers, to have been laid before the freemen and inhabitants of the city of York, at a meeting called for that purpose by Richard Mayer; at which meeting it was

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this meeting, that an additional number of Representatives of counties, if not accompanied with any other reform, will not sufficiently amend the representation of the people.

Friday, 11.

Articles of peace were exhibited in the Court of King's Bench against William Grenville Hoar, Esq. on the prosecution of a Mr. Smith, for sending him a challenge, which he refused to accept, but claimed the protection of the Court. Their Lordships declared their abhorrence of duelling, and that they were determined to make examples of those who under false notions of honour think fit to break the peace. An attachment was granted accordingly.

Same night a watchman gave information that he suspected some clandestine business carried on in a court in Chick-lane. In consequence of which, some peace-officers went to search, and found a press, dies, some gold and other metals, with every implement for coining; and some counterfeit guineas, full weight, and executed so well, that they could only be distinguished by being rather thicker in the middle, and brighter than the real ones. It is supposed that many of them are in circulation; and this is inserted as a caution.

Monday, 14.

A remarkable cause was tried in the Court of Common Pleas.—A man had promised marriage to a woman, and gone from his word. A Bible was produced, wherein an entry was made as follows: "I promise to make—my unlawful wife for 12 months, or forfeit one hundred pounds." It was proved that the parties lived together three years, during which time the plaintiff had two two children by the defendant; therefore, the jury gave 3000 damages to the plaintiff.

Monday 16.

The resolutions presented by Mr. Orde to the House of Commons in Ireland on the 7th inst. were severally read, and agreed to without a division; an address to his Majesty was also agreed to. And the House of Peers, being applied to for their concurrence, returned for answer, That they had agreed to the above resolutions; and also to the address to his Majesty, which they had amended by inserting the words "Lords Spiritual and Temporal."

The Messengers also informed the House, that their Lordships proposed going up with the address the next day, when the Commons agreed to accompany their Lordships.

This day passed the Privy-Seal; the Commission of Ralph Woodford, esq. appointed his Majesty's Commissary to treat with the Members from the Court of Spain, upon New Commercial Arrangements between the two kingdoms; as did likewise the Commission of James Manby, esq. his secretary.

Tuesday 17.

The House of Commons in Committee, Mr. Pitt rose, in pursuance of notice, to lay before them the outlines of the measures taken in consequence of the reports drawn up by the Commissioners of Public Accounts. In the first part of his arrangements he placed the offices through which the Public Money passed into the Exchequer. In the second the offices through which the public expenditure was made, as the Army and Navy offices. And in the third, which he considered as the most important, the manner by which all these sums were to be accounted for. In this investigation he embraced the whole system of finance, with the exorbitant salaries, sinecure places, loss of office, enormous expences in the collection of the public revenue, &c. and concluded with moving, that leave be given to bring in a bill for better examining and auditing the Public Accounts of this kingdom.

This being agreed to, the Chancellor of the Exchequer then moved,

That leave be given to bring in a bill for the better regulating the office of the Treasurer of his Majesty's Navy; and for transferring the custody of the cash for ordnance service, from the Treasurer of the Ordnance, to the Bank of England. This being likewise agreed to; after obviating some objections which had formerly been brought forward to the like import, he moved,

That leave be given to a bill for appointing Commissioners to enquire into the fees, gratuities, perquisites, and emoluments which are or lately have been received in the Public Offices to be therein mentioned; to examine into any abuses which may exist in the same, and to report such observations as shall occur to them for the better conducting and managing the business transacted in the said offices.

Tuesday 22.

The order of the day for hearing counsel on the Westminster Petition being read, it was moved, "That the counsel be now called in;" when Lord Fred. Campbell rose, and moved, that the counsel be restricted to speak only to two points, as given in evidence on the examination of the 8th of Feb. This occasioned a long debate, and was at length decided by dividing the House. Ayes 203. Noes 145. Majority 58.

Mr. Erskine and Mr. Piggott were then called in; but Mr. Erskine refusing to plead under such restraints, which he said they could not do without injury to the electors, whose "rights under the law" they were engaged to defend, they were permitted to withdraw. And Mr. Corbett being called in, and again examined, a motion was made, "that the High Bailiff be desired to make a return." This occasioned a long and violent debate, which, at one in the morning, was closed by a division. Ayes 136. Noes 145. Majority 9!!!

Mr. Pitt rose, and moved, that the official dispatches from Ireland might be read; which being complied with, they then resolved into a Committee, Mr. Giltbert in the chair, and the articles, or propositions, moved in the Irish House of Commons by Mr. Orde on the 7th instant, read, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, after an introductory speech of two hours and a half, concluded with the following motion:

"That it is the opinion of this Committee, that it is highly important, and for the general interest of the British empire, that an intercourse should be finally settled between Great Britain and Ireland on equal terms; and that each country should have a like participation of trade, on Ireland securing to this country, that she will pay, in proportion to her growing wealth, such share of the public expence as may arise from the surplus of her revenue in times of peace."

This motion brought on a general conversation, in which Mr. Matham, Lord North, Lord Petryn, Mr. Dempster, Mr. Dundas, Mr. Fox, Col. Fitzpatrick, Ald. Watson, and Mr. Rose, bore a part.

On the call of the House of Commons, 55 members were found to be absent.

Wednesday 23.

In a Committee of Ways and Means, Resolved, that four shillings in the pound land tax be laid on all lands, tenements, &c. for the year 1785.

Friday 25.

This morning early the mail from Kingston was robbed on Wimbledon Common by two men on foot, for the apprehending of whom a reward of "Two Hundred Pounds," over and above the reward for apprehending of highwaymen, is offered by the Post-Master-General.

Monday

Monday 28.

Letters just received from Rotterdam, bring advice of a violent hurricane at Curaçoa, in which several full laden ships in the harbour had been driven on shore, and others out to sea, which have not since been heard of. Other damages have been sustained to an immense value. A long range of warehouses, full of goods, was blown down, and the goods buried in the ruins.

A short time since four men, who obtained a living by shewing wild beasts about the country, meeting a traveller with his wife and child in the forest of Orleans, in France, after robbing them of their property, cruelly murdered them, and having stripped off their clothes, gave the bodies of these miserable victims of their barbarity to be devoured by their beasts. These inhuman wretches were apprehended; and in a sack in their possession were found the man's head, and one of the thighs of the woman. It is said these atrocious offenders will be punished in the following manner: After being put into an iron cage with their beasts, they will be all burnt together.

The late John Bernard, esq; son and heir to the great patriot of that name (see vol. LIV. p. ...), died worth two hundred thousand pounds; but, dying without issue, he left his real and personal estates to his nephew, Thomas Hanky, esq. Mr. Bernard had promised his servants (who had lived with him many years) to provide for them after his decease: on opening the will, those poor people were disappointed; the generous executor, observing them to be past their labour, has settled a comfortable annuity on each of them for life. Mr. Bernard's father was allowed to be a great patriot; the son may be deemed a prophet, so that he could number his days. Previous to his death, when he was in health and good spirits, he foretold on what day and hour he should die, which event happened exactly as he had prophesied.

Miss Foster (see p. 76) was sister to the late Serjeant F.; to the rev. John F. D.D. rector of Elton, co. Hunt.; and to the Countess of Inchiquin, which last lady, like her sister and younger brother, was born deaf and dumb, but taught by the late Mr. Henry Baker to understand and converse by signs. Mr. Baker's happy method of instruction (for which, if we are not misinformed, he received 1000 l. a year) succeeded so well, that the young ladies were qualified in all the parts of female education; and, besides the advantages of a good person, possessed understandings as improved as could possibly be under the want of two such essential faculties, and the talent of elegant letter-writing, and every other accomplishment. Mr. Baker taught them also geography and astronomy; and they were so capable of the polite instructions, that they appeared with advantage in public assemblies.

BIRTHS.

- JAN. 19. LADY of Mr. Barnardiston, of Feckenham, str. a daughter.
 30. Countess of Aylesford, a daughter.
 31. Countess of Lincoln, a son and heir.
 7. The lady of — Aguilar, esq; at Enfield wash, a son.

MARRIAGES.

LATELY, at Newcastle, Mr. Silvertop, to Mrs Pearson;—this is the third time that this lady has been before the altar in the character of a bride, and there has been something remarkable in each of her three connubial engagements. Her first husband was a Quaker, her second a Roman catholic, and her third is a Protestant of the established church. Every husband was twice her age; at 16 she married a gentleman of 32; at 30 she took one of 60; and now, at 43, she is united to a gentleman of 84.

JAN. 25. Mr. Benjamin Biggs, 2d son of Mr. Peter B. carpenter, of Pudding-lane, to Miss Cowey.

Mr. Thomas Field, horse-dealer, in Gray's-inn-lane, to Miss Fry, youngest daughter of Mr. F. blacksmith, of Enfield.

29. At S. Clement Dunes, Richard Dappa, esq; of Hollingbourn, Kent, to Miss Bos, of Hackney.

31. Charles Monro, esq; son of Dr. M. of Bedford-square, to Miss Jane Bolewen, of Bromley, Kent.

Feb. 1. Richard Vernon Moody, esq; of Southampton, banker, to Miss Mary Nicholas.

3. By special licence, at Wardour castle, James Everard Arundel, esq; count of the sacred Roman empire, eldest son of the hon. James Everard of Ashcombe, co. Dorset, to the hon. Miss Arundel, countess of the sacred Roman empire, eldest daughter of the right hon. Lord Arundel.

Peter Cazalet, jun. esq; of Austin-friars, to Miss Langton, daughter of James Haughton L. esq; of Bedfordsq.

Capt. Tho. Poynton, in the East India Company's service, to Miss Peck, daughter of Thomas P. esq; of Deal.

11. By special licence, Arthur Annisley, esq; of Blechingley, in Oxfordshire, to Miss Hardy, daughter of the late Sir Charles H.

13. Anthony Burton Bennet, of Dorsetsh. esq; to the hon. Miss Monckton, sister of Viscount Galway.

DEATHS.

LATELY, at Palamcottah, in the government of Madras, William Light, esq; late of Baglake, Dorsetsh.

At Kensington, Samuel Torriano, esq.

At Stratford, near Salisbury, aged 100, Roger Warne.

Sir John Stapykton, bart. of Myton-hall, co. York. He had lingered several years under a severe fit of illness from a paralytic stroke; and in the former part of his life had served in the navy under Adm. Keppell 20 years, and had distinguished himself greatly at the taking of the Havannah.

JAN. . . At Tottenham, John Brown, esq; aged 73, many years a wholesale linen-draper in Cornhill, in partnership with Mr. Phillips. He declined the alderman's gown, which he was pressed to accept on the death of Mr. Cockayne, and was afterwards conferred on Mr. Brackley Kennet.

Thomas Wellings, esq; of Hoxton-square, formerly an eminent chemist and druggist in the Poultry; a man of great knowledge in his profession, by which he acquired a considerable estate, which he in a great measure applied to charitable purposes, being overnor of most of the public and private charities, and useful institutions, in London, and a very useful and active member of the same. Of the Dispensary penfary in Aldersgate-street, he was the founder. He was also chairman of the Associated Livery of London.

1. At Falkenfelds, a woman, aged 84 years, whose husband, with whom she lived 63 years and 2 months, still enjoys a robust constitution. She had a progeny amounting to 80 persons, namely, 9 children, 53 grandchildren, and 16 great-grand-children; and of this numerous offspring there are 59 still living.

29. Lady Vincent, relict of the late Sir F. V. bart. She was daughter of Sir John Astley, bart. and sister to the Countess Dowager of Tankerville, and was first married to Anthony Langley Swymmers, esq; M.P.

At Plymouth, in her 79th year, Mrs. Elizabeth Collings.

Of a paralytic stroke, Mr. George Witchell, F.R.S. and head master of the royal academy at Portsmouth. This excellent astronomer, born in 1728, was descended, by the mother's side, from the celebrated watch and clock maker Daniel Quare, and was himself brought up to that business. He, as all his progenitors for many generations had been, was educated in the principles professed by the people called Quakers; but quitted them, on arriving at years of maturity, for those of the church of England, or rather for those which were professed by Sir Isaac Newton, Dr. Samuel Clarke, Mr. Whiston, and many others: and, perhaps, no man ever understood, or could defend, them better than Mr. Witchell did. He cultivated the study of astronomy very early indeed, for a communication on that subject from him may be seen in the first Gentleman's Diary, which was published for 1747. Much about the same time, or soon after, he became a pretty constant correspondent of Mr. Urban, sometimes under his real name, but more frequently under the initials G. W. In 1764 he published a map of the passage of the moon's shadow over England in the great solar eclipse which happened on the first of April that year, the exact correspondence of which to the observations gained him great reputation. In the following year he presented to the commissioners of longitude a plan for calculating the effects of parallax and refraction on the distance of the moon from the sun or a fixed star, for facilitating the discovery of the longitude at sea, and for which he was gratified with a very handsome reward by the said commissioners, and in 1767 he was appointed master of the Royal Academy, on the recess of the late Mr. Robertson.

At Paris, on his way to the south of France, Richard May, esq; leader of the king and queen's band of musicians, master of his majesty's band of musicians in Ireland, &c.

30. In her 88th year, the right hon. Lady Dowager Stourton, daughter and sole heiress of Bartholomew Walmesley, esq; of Durkenhall, co. Lancaster. At the early age of 14

she was married to Robert the 7th Lord Petre, by whom she had one son, father to the present Lord; afterwards she married Charles the 14th Lord Stourton, by whom she had no issue.

Mr. Bolton, master of the Golden-croft inn, Charing-croft.

Feb. . . At Upper Yeldham Hall, Essex, aged 95, Mr. Horrel, farmer and miller.

Mr. John Belcher, surgeon, F.R. & A.S.S. aged 80, in Sun-court, Threadneedle-street. He was buried in the founder's vault in the chapel of Guy's Hospital.

Advanced in years, Joseph Beck, of Lincoln. After he had been laid out for several hours, to all appearance dead, he raised himself up, and called for some tea to drink. His wife, who was then in the room with two or three neighbours, immediately ran out affrighted, but soon returned, and gave him what he wanted, which having drunk, he fell backward, and expired immediately.

2. Mr. Thomas Locking, haberdasher in Fleet-street.

Adolphus, esq; in St. James's-place. Of a paralytic stroke, Mr. Thomas Day, late of the mint and ordnance offices in the Tower.

At Broxborn, aged 77, after a tedious and painful illness, the lady of Stephen Law, esq; formerly governor of Bombay, and one of the directors of the E. I. C.

At his house on Ham-common, Moses Waite, esq; an acting magistrate for the county of Surrey. What is most remarkable in this gentleman is, that, after 70 years of age, he was cut for the stone, which he in a great measure recovered, and survived some years: he had undergone that operation three times.

4. In Hatton-garden, aged 87, Dr. John Andree, scholar, licentiate of the college of physicians, and one of the two projectors and inhibitors of that noble charity the London Hospital, in the year 1740.

In Millman-st. Bedford row, Mr. Christian Wilkins.

In Pall-mall, in an advanced age, Mrs. Strode, relict of the late Col. S. of Southall, co. Somerset.

At Caermarthen, David Williams, esq. His real and personal estates, which are upwards of 2000l. per annum, are all vested in the family of the rev. J. Griffin, rector of Chipstead, in Surrey; and his son, George Griffies, is to assume the name and arms of Williams.

5. In Hatton-street, Holborn, rev. Dr. Chalmers, senior fellow of Magd. coll. Ox.

6. At Hampstead, the lady of Israel Lewis, esq.

Mr. Norfolk, butler and organist of Jesus' college, and senior alderman of the corporation of Cambridge, in his 86th year.

7. At Wentworth castle, Yorkshire, Anne Countess of Strafford. A little before Christmas was left her ladyship had the misfortune to be terribly burnt by her cloaths taking fire as she was sitting too near the fire-side. The fright which this accident occasioned threw her into fits, and at length brought on her death. She was 2d daughter of the celebrated John Duke of Argyll, and sister to Lady Greenwich and Lady Mary Cole. Lady S. is one of the constellation of beauties described by Mr. H. Walpole in his Epistle to Mr. Eckard, the painter.

"The crescent on her brow display'd,
In curls of loveliest brown intend;
With every charm to rule the night,
Like DAWN, STAFFORD wheels the light;
The easy shape; the piercing eye;
The snowy bosom's purity,
The unaffected gentle phrase
Of native wit in all his lays;
Eckard, for these thy art's too faint;
You may admire, but cannot paint."

At Bath, right hon. Lady Camilla Wake, wife of Mr. W. of that city, and aunt to the Earl of Tankerville. She first married Gilbert Fleming, esq.

At Bath, Lieut. Gen. George Preston, of the 2d regiment of North British dragoons.

Jacob Albert, esq; of Hackney; aged 82.

Mrs. Joseph Moorhouse, son of Mr. M. banker, in Lombard-street.

At Hampstead, Mr. Cozen.

In Bedford-row, aged 82, Matthew Deane, esq; of Lincoln's-inn, F.R. & A.S. and a Curator of the British Museum; a gentleman universally esteemed for his profound knowledge, great abilities, and unsullied reputation in the profession of the law; as well as for his extensive learning, happy taste, and critical discernment in polite literature and the fine arts; nor less distinguished for his many excellent qualities, and the practice of every virtue that adorns the character of an honest man and a good Christian. His death was occasioned by a paralytic stroke, with which he was attacked about 6 o'clock in the evening: Dr. Watson, and other medical gentlemen, attended, and administered their good offices towards his relief, immediately after he was taken ill, but without success. He expired in two hours. The principal part of his fortune, which is very considerable, is settled on his nephew, Michael Bray, esq; of Lincoln's-inn, subject to his widow's jointure.

9. At his house in Conduit-street, in the 71st year of his age, Sir William Chapman, bart. of Lowdham-hall, in co. Suffolk. The grandfather of this gentleman, descended from a family anciently of Shropshire, was Sir John C. Bart. an alderman and eminent merchant of London, who had the honour of being Lord Mayor at the memorable era of the Revolution, and during his mayoralty committed to Newgate Sir Robert Wright (chief justice of the king's bench) for having "endeavoured the subversion of the established government by allowing a power to dispense with the laws," and for being "one of the commissioners for ecclesiastical affairs." In 1683 was published, in 4to "London's Anniversary Festival, performed on Monday, October 29th, 1688, for the entertainment of the right honourable Sir John Chapman, knrt. Lord Mayor of the city of London; being their great year of jubilee, with a baneyric upon the restoring of the charter: and a sonnet provided for the entertainment of the King. By M. Teubman." This worthy magistrate died in his high office, March 17, 1688-9, leaving an only son, William, who was knighted in 1714, created a baronet in 1726, and figured in that memorable year as a South Sea Director. He died May 7, 1737, being at that time Governor of Christ's and St. Bartholomew's hospitals; and chairman of the society of trustees and trustees of all the charity schools within the bills of mortality. He left two sons, successively his successors in the title of baronet; Sir John, who died Jan. 29, 1781; and Sir William, the subject of the present article; by whose decease without issue male, the title becomes extinct, and a considerable estate in Suffolk, of which he took possession in 1757 by virtue of the will of Robert Onsey, esq; devolved to the lineal descendants of the four daughters of John Onsey, esq; counsellor at law, of Hinkley, whose epitaph may be seen in vol. XLVII. p. 316.

Mrs. Myers, wife of Mr. M. an eminent Jew merchant. She dropped down dead in going out of a cheese-monger's shop in Bishopsgate-street.

Mrs. Gordon, wife of Mr. John C. of Eastwood. She was undressing herself, in order to go to bed, whether her husband had retired about half an hour before, when she unfortunately fell to one of her tuffets; in endeavouring to extinguish the flames, she set the other in a blaze, and that communicated to her cloaths, head-dress, &c. Her cries awakened Mr. C. who instantly got out of bed, and with great presence of mind wrapped a blanket round her, which had the desired effect, but not before she was much scorched. A surgeon and physician were sent for from Nottingham, who brought with them the necessary aids on such occasions; and there is no doubt but her life would have been saved, had not the flames much injured her bosom, from whence, a few months ago, one of her breasts had been cut off for a cancerous complaint. This brought on a speedy mortification, that put a final period to her miseries, to the inconsolable loss of the widow and orphan, to whom she was at all times a liberal benefactress.

10. At Northop, Flintshire, aged 105, Christian Jones.

11. At Fordham, Suffolk, aged 98, William Metcalf, esq.

At Chebsey, in his 85th year, the Rev. Mr. Walker, vicar of that place. This prebend is in the gift of the dean and chapter of Ely; but was in the year 1735 chosen sen as an option by Mr. Seward; the dean and each of the then chapter fixing upon the Irving that best suited them, according to seniority. The late dean and each of the other gentlemen have some years since presented to their options, and Mr. Seward's, which was the last remaining, is bestowed on his nephew, the rev. Mr. Henry White, the worthy sub-librarian of the cathedral of Lichfield. The present dean and chapter have abolished the choosing of livings by individuals.

In Little-street, Leicester-square, Mr. Sibbels, an eminent engraver, particularly of botanical subjects, on which he was much employed by Sir Joseph Banks.

12. At Hittleham-hall, near Ipswich, in her 29th year, Miss Crespigny, eldest daughter of P. C. Crespigny, esq; M.P. for Aldbro.

13. Mrs. Anne Otwald, relict of the late bishop of Raphoe.

In Pater-noster-row, Mrs. Martha Bridgen, wife of Edw. Bridgen, esq; F.R. & A.SS. She was the second daughter of the late Mr. Samuel Richardson, author of Pamela, Clarissa, &c. by his 2d wife Elizabeth, daughter of Mr. Leake, bookseller, of Bath, and married to Mr. B. in 1768. It has been said by many, that she assisted her father in his Clarissa, but Richardson's works were undoubtedly all his own; though, for several of the last years of his life, this lady answered all the letters he received from his foreign correspondents, as well as many of his English ones. She is said to have written with great judgement, refined sentiment, and in a style remarkably elegant and correct. There is now only one of Mr. Richardson's daughters living; she is single, and a lady of exceedingly good understanding.

In Goodman's-fields, Charles Eyles, esq; deputy clerk of the peace for Middx.

Hon. Lady Dowager Fitzdrake, of Ireland.

14. At the Friary, Lichfield, in the 47th year of his age, William Inge, esq. Mr. Pennant in his Journey from Chester to London (under Thorp, of which church Mr. Inge was the patron and lord) says, that "he was the first of justices;" and it may be safely added, that he was one of the best of men. His loss will be severely felt, not only by his family and friends, but by the community. His private character was not less amiable for affability, politeness, hospitality, sweetness of disposition, and the sincerity of his friendships, than his public character, as a magistrate was respectable for knowledge, assiduity, firmness, impartiality, and humanity.—In short, he was universally beloved for his virtues as a man, and revered for his endowments as a magistrate, in which capacity he acted with distinguished honour to himself, and essential utility to the counties of Stafford and Warwick, and the city and neighbourhood of Lichfield, upwards of 20 years. He was buried, on the 19th, at Thorp.

Mr. Cleveland, in Dorset-str. Salisbury-sq.

15. Hon. Michael White, Lieut. Gov. of Montserrat.

At Stafford, sincerely lamented, the rev. Mr. Uact, prebendary of Tachbrook, in the cathedral of Lichfield, and rector of Copenhall, in Cheshire. This worthy man has left behind him a widow, with a large family. The valuable living of C. was given him, by the bishop of Lichfield, about half a year ago.

At Staines, of a mortification in his foot, Mr. Willoughby Stoe, formerly a callico printer there, but retired from business some years.

16. This day was buried at Midfomer Norton, Hannah Deal, aged 99 years and 15 months, who retained her senses to the last. She was carried to church by four of her great-grand-children, below which there are two generations. It is supposed that her children, grand-children, &c. are little short of 500.

17. At Lichfield, aged 27, the wife of rev. Richard Robinson (see p. 135.) In making the vault for this lady, in the body of the cathedral, two stone coffins were found; the one containing fragments of a pair of slippers, much gold fringe, a curious, though broken, chalice of pewter, and a crucifix of Kennel coal, an inch and quarter in length, carved with extreme neatness, on each side the cross, with our Saviour on the one, and the Virgin Mary with the Infant Jesus on the other: the other coffin contained only ashes. Of these curious articles we hope to hear further.

18. At Bethlem-green, John Bugge, esq; clerk of the West-road, General Post-office.

At Cheapstead, Kent, in her 87th year, Mrs. E. Pophill, relict of David P. esq; representative in many parliaments, in the last reign, for Rochester.

19. Lord Viscount Kilcourse, only son of the Earl of Cavan.

At Bill-hill, near Windsor, aged 84, the Dowager Lady Mary Gower, of a mortification occasioned by her cloaths taking fire as she was standing by the fire, three weeks ago, when her cries brought her butler to her assistance just in time to extinguish the flames by rolling her up in the carpet—this is the third instance of this terrible accident in the course of three months. Her ladyship, born July 6, 1701, was fourth daughter and coheir of Thomas Tuston esq; of Thanet, and widow of Anthony earl of Harold, son of Henry duke of Kent, to whom she was married in 1718, and who died in 1723; in 1736 she was remarried to John first and late earl Gower, by whom she had issue a daughter, Mary, who died in the 7th year of her age, and three sons: 1. Thomas, born 1738, died 1740; 2. John Leveson (now one of the Lords of the Admiralty) born 1743, appointed a captain in the navy 1763, and married 1773 to Frances eldest daughter of the late Admiral Boscawen, by whom he has one son, born 1774; and, 3. Thomas, born 1743, died an infant. By her death an annual income of 1000l. falls to the present Earl of Hardwicke, who married her first husband's only only sister's daughter by the Earl of Bredalbin. Of her ladyships four sisters, 1. Catherine married Edward viscount Sondet, son and heir to Lewis earl of Rockingham, and died 1734; 2. Anne, married to James earl of Salisbury, died 1757; 3. Margaret, married to Thomas Coke late earl of Leicester, and was in 1734 declared Baroness Clifford, and died in 1775, aged 74; and, 5. Isabel, married to Lord Nassau Powlet, uncle to the Duke of Bolton, and afterwards to Sir Francis Blake Delaval, K.B.

20. In Charles-st. Berkl. squ. Philip Honeywood, esq; of Markes-hall, Essex, a general in the army, colonel of the 4th regiment of horse, and governor of Kingston upon Hull. He was nephew to the late Sir Philip Honeywood, K.B. and represented Appleby in several Parliaments. General H. rose gradually to the highest rank in his profession with great reputation, acquired by painful service. At the battle of Dettingen, in 1743, he was desperately wounded, as he was also at the skirmish of Clifton, in 1745. He married Miss Wastall, by whom he has left no issue.

At Chelsea, aged 71, Mrs. Henrietta Spindel, mother of Mr. S. blackwellhall-factor, in Basinghall-street.

Suddenly, at Retford, co. Nott. on his way to London, Sir Rowland Winn, bart. of Nuffall, co. York, in the prime of life. He has left a disconsolate lady and two children, a son about ten years old, a promising youth, and a daughter, a fine young lady, about fifteen. The news of his death was received at Pontefract with the greatest consternation.

21. At his house in Lincoln's-inn-fields, Thomas Harris, esq; late one of the masters in chancery, younger brother to the author of Hermes, &c.

22. William Hayntun, esq; of Gray's-inn, F.A.B. He married the eldest daughter and coheir of Windsor Sandys, esq; of Milsenden, co. Gloc. whose widow, the daughter of Rich. Brown, of Gonthorpe, co. Nott. and Ilkington, co. Middx. died a little time ago.

In Horton-square, aged 64, the rev. Tho. Gibbons, D.D. 41 years pastor of a congregation of Protestant Dissenters in London. In the sacred services to which his early and his latest years were devoted, he was respectable, zealous, and useful: in the intercourses of private life, he was serious, amiable, and benevolent. As a Christian teacher, preferring the venerable language of scripture to the distinguishing phrases of a party, it was his constant solicitude (under the influence of Heaven) to form his hearers to the knowledge and practice of piety, by an animated display of the sublime discoveries, and the peculiar obligations, of their holy faith. As a private citizen, the many who valued his friendship, and who will long cherish his remembrance, have beheld him, in the various engagements and vicissitudes of life, exemplifying all the graces of the Christian character. To say more, might seem superfluous; to say less, would be unjust.

"Suddenly, at Mr. Cowden's, in the King's Mews, where he was upon a morning visit, Captain James Batterby, a native of Ireland. He commanded the flank companies of the 29th regiment on the unfortunate expedition under Gen. Burgoyne. Cool and determined in the hour of danger, he knew no obstacle not to be surmounted in the way of his duty. A brave and intrepid officer—he was beloved, honoured, and obeyed by his men. Tremblingly alive to a sense of honour, he could not endure the least surmise of indignity. The soldier and his weapon rust alike with inactivity. His martial and uneasy spirit frequently involved him in unnecessary broils and disputes. Under prosecution for several breaches of the peace, he, who could smile at captivity in a military prison in America, could not brook confinement in a civil gaol in London. That he had a serious sense of the enormity of the crime he committed on himself, a paper, superscribed with his own hand, found stuck upon the point of the penknife (which he had taken up unobserved in the house he was in, and with which he perpetrated the act of desperation) will shew. It contained the following words and marks:

An Apology (if any there can be) for Suicide, Death before dishonour! !"

Thus far in the words of a correspondent.—— Capt. B. was an officer on half pay, and had lately fought a duel with young Mr. Drummond. The coroner's inquest sat next d.y on the body, and brought in their verdict Lunatic. This new mode of palliating suicide is certainly one great cause of encouraging self-murder!

23. Mrs. Thirkle, relict of Michael T. esq; late of Ipswich; aunt to Lord Chedworth; and sister to Thomas White, esq; of Tatlingstone-place, co. Suff.

Gentleman's Magazine;

For MARCH, 1785.

BEING THE THIRD NUMBER OF VOL. LV. PART I.

MR. URBAN,

March 3.

 I N support of the assertion in p. 94. that "bp. Maddox was not the first bp. who preached before the sons of the clergy," let me observe, that Dr. Geo. Rust, bp. of Dromore in Ireland, certainly preached in 1682, bp. Turner of Ely in 1684, bp. Fowler of Gloucester in 1692, and in 1691 Dr. Temison; before his election indeed, but after his nomination, to the see of Lincoln. Whether bp. Beveridge of St. Asaph preached before his being raised to the episcopal bench, I am doubtful, not knowing the date of his sermon, which, according to Letfome, is printed in the folio edition of his works, vol. II. p. 169, text Matt. v. ver. 16. Bp. Smalridge also preached upon the like occasion, but I believe it might be at the anniversary meeting in his diocese of Bristol. His sermon is printed* in an 8vo vol. 1717, p. 437, text Prov. xxii. ver. 1.

The relation which Mr. Edward Wake (see p. 94.) bore to a clergyman, and the knowledge he had how numerous were the relicts and children of the clergy† reduced to great indigence from their departed friends having been fellow-sufferers with his own father, on account of their loyalty to their king, and steady attachment to the constitution of their country, prompted him to be thus zealous and active in his exertions for their relief. He was the second son (William †, the father of the archbishop, was the eldest) of Mr. William Wake, who was bred at Westminster school, went from thence to Emanuel College, afterwards removed to Trinity Hall, in Cambridge, and in 1625 was presented, by Sir William Pitt of Hartley Waspel in the county of Southampton, to the two small benefices of Trinity Church, and St. Michael, in Wareham, in Dorsetshire. Having engaged early in the Royal cause, he, by that conduct, incurred the resentment of the opposite party, who used him with much rigour and cruelty, being shot in the head by the governor of Wareham, poisoned in another garrison, and imprisoned about twenty times. He was also deprived of his preferments, but had re-possession of them after the Restoration. He, however, enjoyed them only a short time, for he died within the year, and was buried in his own church of Trinity, Wareham. Mr. Edward Wake, who died Oct. 2, 1686, at Charkton, in Dorsetshire, was buried in that church-yard, where a monument

* This is not collected in the folio edition of his Sermons, 1724.

† In the list of Preachers at the Meetings of the Sons of the Clergy, p. 95, 1708, "Dr. Philip Bisse, bishop of Hereford," should have been "afterwards bishop of St. David's and Hereford;" as he was not promoted to the former see till November, 1710, nor translated to the latter till February, 1712-13. Bishop Burnet, in the History of his own Times, (vol. II. p. 570) has remarked, that "Dr. Bisse had had no ecclesiastical preferment before his being raised to the episcopal bench;" when he preached, therefore, he could only have been fellow of New College, Oxford.

P. 95, add, to "1775, Sim. Salter, D. D. &c." [†], the note so marked referring to this sermon. Sir Gilbert Williams's sermon was not printed.

‡ A remarkable transaction between this gentleman and Judge Nicholas (it is supposed) may be seen in the Spectator, N^o 314.

is erected over his remains. Besides other children, he left a son Edward, collated by archbishop Wake, in 1721, to the sixth prebend in Canterbury cathedral, in which stall, on his death in 1732, he was succeeded by his son Edward, who was also rector of Monks Risborough in Bucks. Mr. Edward Wake, the grandson, died in November 1738, and was interred in Canterbury cathedral.

In note [D], p. 96, the first article of each year's expenditure is the money given to the widows of sequestered clergymen; the second, the money given to other clergymen's widows; and the third (in 1684) 100l. for binding children apprentices. In the accounts of the following years, this last appropriation is not mentioned; but the third entry is for money given to the children of deceased clergymen, with an exception in 1685, when nothing was given. At page 32, it is, however, noticed, that for fourteen years the Stewards of the annual feast had bound out children every year with the money collected on the several feast days, which was not reckoned. W. & D.

MR. URBAN,

IN an 8vo pamphlet, intituled, "Some Memoirs of the Life and Character of the Rev. and Learned Thomas Manton, D. D."—(prefixed to the second edition of his Sermons on the 119th Psalm), is the following paragraph.

"He (Dr. Manton), being generally esteemed an excellent preacher, was often employed in that work, in London, on the week-days. The custom of preaching to the sons of the clergy began in his time; Dr. Hall (afterwards bp. of Chester, and son of the famous bp. Hall of Norwich) preached the first sermon to them, as Dr. Manton did the second. The sermon is printed at the end of Vol. III. (of his works) in folio, upon Psalm 102, ver. 28." Yours, &c. S.

Our Readers will find the following Letter so frequently cited in the Debates, that, though a little out of time, it must not be omitted.

Nero's Hotel, King-street, St.

SIR, James's, Dec. 27, 1784.

I AM authorised by Mr. Pitt to declare, that he will bring the subject of parliamentary reformation before the H of C. as early as possible in the next [this present] session; that he will support his intended propositions to the utmost of his strength; and that he will exert his whole power and credit, as a man, and as a minister, honestly and boldly, to carry such a meliorated system of representation as may place the constitution on a footing of permanent security. I am happy to communicate this intelligence, which, I trust, will give pleasure to you, Sir, and to every other firm and unquestionable friend to the rights of the people. And from recent communication in Yorkshire, I can venture to assure you, that it is highly probable if the borough of ———, and other respectable bodies, should be heartily disposed, on this occasion, to testify their sentiments in favour of political reformation, a vigorous effort would be made in Yorkshire, in concurrence with them, to give effectual support to that necessary measure, the improvement of our representation. I am, with great respect, your most obedient, humble servant, C. WYVILL.

P. S. As the appearance of this intelligence in the news-papers for some time would do infinite disservice to the cause, I would request you to avoid that with caution; though, short of publication, I think it cannot be too generally known.

MR. URBAN, Woodbridge, Dec. 8.

I CANNOT behold, without much regret, so illiberal a signature in your valuable Magazine as that of Anti-Scot, especially when it is assumed by a man of taste and a friend to science. Why should one profess himself an enemy to so large a body of his fellow-subjects, merely because two or three of them may have been guilty of some literary impositions? For my own part, I as sincerely abhor all literary impositions as your correspondent; and think it would be much to the honour of the editor of Ossian's Poems, if he would ingenuously tell the public, whether he be really the original author of them all, or, if not, what part of them are his, and how far we may with confidence consider them as the works of Ossian, or other former bards. Why should we feel less pleasure in perusing them, after knowing that they are the production of modern times? We should doubtless still continue to admire them, as a work of imagination; and the cloud of uncertainty, which rests on their origin, even now prevents their being considered in any other light.

As to Mr. Pinkerton, I look upon myself myself as very much obliged to him, for the high degree of pleasure which his Scottish Ballads afforded me; and, though I always believed the second part of Hardyknute to be entirely his own, it gave me no less pleasure on that account. I should be glad, however, that he would, in a future edition of these Ballads, distinguish, by some means or other, those parts which are his own, and, as much as possible, assign the rest of them to their real authors. As Mr. Pinkerton is not only a very good poet, but likewise an antiquary, and a gentleman of independent fortune, I should humbly recommend to him a work for which I think he is well qualified; I mean, a complete edition of the Scottish Poets, such as Sir David Lindsay, Lord Stirling, Drummond of Hawthornden, Blind Harry, &c. &c. They are seldom to be met with in England, and those editions of them which I have seen are intolerably faulty. I should propose one edition, from a faithful collation of the most early copies, retaining even the old spelling, to be published in 8vo, for the use of the learned and curious. Some notes might be added, and a general glossary to the whole, in one volume, at the end. Another edition might be published in 12mo, for the use of those who look for entertainment only, without ever troubling their heads with enquiries from whence it comes, with the words and spelling modernised as much as the time would permit. It is needless to say that some account of the respective authors would be necessary. I sincerely hope, whatever regard Mr. Pinkerton may pay to this hint, that it will not be entirely thrown away on the public; as I think it a disgrace to the Scotch, to be so negligent of the fame of those men of whom they may justly boast, and with whose writings they sometimes affect to be so much delighted.

I should be glad, Mr. Urban, to see some account in your Magazine of R. Ferguson, the poet. He was a wonderful genius; and in some things resembled poor Chatterton; whose memory, by the by, I was sorry to see treated with so much contempt in your Review of Michael Bruce's Poems. The contemptuous expression of the boy of Bristol, and the cruel comparison between his views of death and those of Michael Bruce, wounded me to the soul, and almost forced tears from my eyes. The will, supposing it to be really his, as appears by the date, must have been written before he left Bristol, almost six months before his unhappy fate, and when the thoughts of really making his exit in the way which he did was certainly far from his mind. It was written doubtless in an hour of mirth and levity, when his heart was elated with the gay prospects which his intended journey to London created in his imagination; and we may be sure, that one of his fine genius and exquisite feeling had very different ideas in those last awful moments which preceded his entrance on eternity. Yours, &c. J. BLACK.

MR. URBAN,

I N Dr. Burney's late Sketch of the Life of Handel (enlarged from the Memoirs published by Mr. Maynwaring in 1760, which you abridged in the vol. for that year), this ingenious biographer has omitted to mention, that when he first came to England in 1710, he wrote his name Hendel. This appears from the Spectator, No V, and also by a letter in Mr. Hughes's Correspondence vol. I, from Mr. Rorer, a teacher of music, of which, as it relates to an early period of Handel's life, and is unnoticed by Dr. Burney, I have sent you a translation.

MR. RORER to MR. HUGHES.

"SIR, Tuesday, July 31, 1711.

HAVING received this morning a letter from Mr. Hendel*, I thought it my duty to send you, as soon as possible, an extract of it, which relates to you, in answer to the compliment which you conveyed by me. I shall write to him next Friday, so you need only send me, if you please, what you intend for him; and I can assure you, Sir, that if the honour of your acquaintance is particularly pleasing to him, I am no less pleased with being the means of promoting your correspondence; and of giving you a proof of the extreme regard with which I have the honour to be, Sir, &c."

Extract from Mr. HENDEL's Letter.

"PRESENT my best compliments to Mr. Hughes. I will take the liberty of

* This great master (who was born at Hall in Upper Saxony, Feb. 24, 1684,) arrived at London in the winter preceding the date of this letter. There cannot be a more eminent proof of Mr. Hughes's acknowledged skill in the two sister arts than his being so soon noticed and distinguished by this modern Orpheus, who, probably in consequence of this introduction, composed Mr. Hughes's "Cantata of Yeaus and Adonis." writing to him the first opportunity. If, in the mean time, he will honour me with his commands, and add to them one of his charming English poems, he will lay me under the greatest obligations. Since I left you, I have made some progress in that language, &c."

MR. URBAN,

THE invitation given in p. 108, to furnish any particulars relating to Dr. Partridge, the famous almanack-maker, occasions my sending you the following copy of a letter written by him; the original now lies before me in his own hand-writing, and is as follows:

"OLD FRIEND, Lond. April 2, 1708.

"I DON'T doubt but you are imposed on in Ireland also by a pack of rogues about my being dead; the principal author of it is one in Newgate, lately in the pillory for a libell against the State. There is no such man as Isaac Bickerstaff; it is a sham name, but his true name is Pettie; he is always either in a cellar, a garret, or a gaile, and therefore you may by that judge what kind of reputation this fellow hath to be credited in the world. In a word, he is a poor scandalous necessitous creature, and would do as much by his own father, if living, to get a crown; but enough of such a rascal.

"I thank God, I am very well in health; and at the time he had doomed me to death, I was not in the least out of order. The truth is, it was a high flight at a venture, hit or miss; he knows nothing of astrology, but hath a good stock of impudence and lying.—Pray, Sir, excuse this trouble, for no man can better tell you I am well than myself; and this is to undeceive your credulous friends that may yet believe the death of "your real humble servant,

"JOHN PARTRIDGE"

"This to Isaac Manley Esq. Post Master of Ireland, at his house in Dublin, Ireland."

The above original letter is now in the possession of the immediate descendant of Mr. Manley, and this copy is forwarded to you by him.

MR. URBAN,

THE following epitaph on Gilbert Walmesley, Esq. the early patron of Johnson and Garrick, was inscribed by the Rev. Thomas Seward, now canon of the church of Lichfield, on a temporary monument, resembling the morai of the Otaheiteans, which stood over Mr. Walmesley's grave during a twelve-month after his decease, in one of the cathedral ailes, and was raised out, and ornamented with escutcheons.

Reader, if science, truth, and reason charm;

If social charities thy bosom warm;
If smiling bounty ope thy heart, and door;
If justice style thee guardian of the poor;
Firm to the British liberties and laws,
If freedom fire thee in their sacred cause;
With sympathetic grief these relics see!
Yet think not Walmesley dead; he lives in thee.

But if thy country's claims thou wouldst betray,

And barter laws for arbitrary sway;
If, Briton born, thy soul's a Gallic slave,
Start from his tomb he would, and call thee fool and knave.

MR. URBAN,

WHETHER the golden fibula, or breast buckle, of which there is an engraving in your miscellaneous plate published with the Supplement to your last volume, was a present from a friend to a friend, or from a lady to her lover, it is in vain to enquire; but in either case, as I conceive, the legend non detur petenti seems to have been equally applicable, and designed to convey a caution, or prohibition, to the receiver, not to part with this token of remembrance to the most importunate beggar.—Love me, and leave me not, was the posy of the ring, which Nerissa the maid gave to her merry sweetheart Gratiano; and the motto under review would have been as pertinent, and more concise, for the ring presented by the mistress to her lord elect: nor is there a person who will deny that Bassanio, by offering the ring, in lieu of a fee, even to the civil doctor who had by her ingenuity and eloquence saved the life of his friend, merited from Portia this keen retort:

If you had known the virtue of the ring,
Or half the worthiness that gave the ring,
Or your own honour to retain the ring,
You would not then have parted with the ring. (Merchant of Venice, A 4

V. scene the last.)

W. & D.

MR. URBAN, Darlington, March 15.

I thank you for the very accurate engraving, in your last Magazine, of the gold ring now in my possession, and hope your next number will contain some explanations thereof*. In the mean time,

* See one attempted, p. 189. EDIT.

I send you the conjectures of an ingenious correspondent of mine. You forgot to remark, that the ring is hollow, ten-twentieths of an inch in diameter, and weighs 4 pts. 9 grains.

Yours, &c. GEO. ALLAN.

"When I returned the ring, I told you that I made out the motto at first sight, only that I wished to be more certain as to the word POET. It is hard to work without tools, and I have no dictionary of old Norman French. I made myself sure, however, that the meaning of the motto could be nothing else, but, There are no lovers so faithful as to be able to guard themselves against evil-speakers. Perhaps no people were more licentious either in spelling or syntax, and breaking all rules of grammar, than the French in the barbarous ages. The word POET is certainly put for PEVT, and I think I have seen it somewhere written so. Supposing it to stand so, if it removes one difficulty, it plunges us into another, because that PEVT is the 3d person singular, and to make grammar ought to be PEVVENT the third person plural. By examining some charters or grants in Norman French, it might have been found perhaps whether POET was not an abbreviation of some tense of the verb POVOIR, in common use at that time.

"Having thus far explained the motto, I think we are but shabby antiquaries, if we do not endeavour also to make out to whom this ring belonged; which I do in this manner. No Englishman of rank fell at Flodden-field, but Sir Marmaduke Tunstall. A boar's head is upon the ring between every two words; Tunstall's crest was not a boar's head, therefore it was not Tunstall's, nor any Englishman's, because, as I said, no Englishman of rank fell that day; therefore the ring belonged to a Scotchman. A boar's head is the crest of all the Campbells; but not a Campbell was at that time worth a gold ring, except the Earl of Argyle, who fell that day; therefore this ring belonged to that Earl of Argyle. So far our way is cleared: now again for the motto. This same earl was suspected of not being faithful to his countess, and scandal was busy with him, and this accounts for the motto.—You will say all this is stuff, but I desire you will approve of my arguments, and think them as conclusive as the arguments of antiquaries generally are.

"You again name my being a member of the Society; I told you, that, except stumbling sometimes upon the true reading of a Roman inscription or coin, I had no knowledge of any thing else that was antique, and was so lazy that I should only be a disgrace to my godfathers.

"Yours, &c. D. W."

MR. URBAN, Barbach, March 12.

THE gold ring in your last, fig. 7, is a posy in old French; the words,

OV. EST. NVL. SI. LOIAVLS. AMANS.
QVL SE. PORT. GARDER. DES. MAVX-DISANS.

Which may be thus translated:

In sacred bands though Love may weave
the chain,

From Slander's tongue how few can ward
the pain!

The supposed seal of the abbey of Evesham, fig. 12, in the same plate, is not so easy to be made out; I read it thus, Rinaltus Donatus Lucius votum facientes ut opus placeat.

The greatest difficulty in decyphering old inscriptions proceeds from the numerous abbreviations there made use of, which we observe in a still greater degree in all MSS. prior to the art of printing. This is no way surprising, when we consider the prodigious labour of transcribing; and though less excusable when types were employed, yet we find the first printed books full of these curtailed words, being then quite familiar to all readers. A person must be well versed in the Latin tongue, that can read fluently some old Breviaries and Missals which I have seen.

Yours, &c.

Plan for one general Illustration of the Bible.

WOULD any person be so good as to favour me with an account of Dr. Willoughby's and Dr. Wright's Bibles, and some information of the Authors of them? They seem both to be very good books, but particularly the former, which is much the more useful and instructive. I should think it a service done to religion, if either of those writers, or any other person, would undertake to write in one volume the notes of each, and print them without the Bible, which would be very useful to the clergy as well as laity. It would be the first work of the kind, and I should think would answer. It is an unnecessary and unwelcome expence to be obliged to buy the Bible for the sake of the notes. Within the course of these last twenty years, there have been eight or ten Bibles with notes published; many of them, it is true, booksellers jobs. But, if their several notes were judiciously culled and selected, the whole together would be by far the most useful illustration of the Scrip.

Scriptures extant, and form a complete treasure of elucidation. The idea I mean to throw out is, that within a few years last past, very great treasures of Divine learning have been presented to the public, under the form of notes upon the Bible; and that it would be a very acceptable present to the public, to incorporate them together into one or more volumes folio, without printing the Bible with them.

CHRISTIANUS.

MR. URBAN,

ALTHOUGH I am no practical road-maker, and a total stranger to the place alluded to by your correspondent H, mentioned p. 87 of your Magazine for February, and absolutely unacquainted with the nature of the soil there; yet, from observations I have been able to make in my own travelling, I will venture to mention a few general matters relating to roads. Most certainly good roads are desirable to all travellers of every denomination, and the improvements thereon within a few years must be obvious to every the most incurious observer, in so much that in many places they are now brought to greater perfection than could almost have been imagined. As I apprehend, the best method is, first, to form the road barrel-wise of such materials as are produced near the spot, sufficiently raised to carry off the water; and then, if stones can be procured, to cover it entirely there with, having broken them to pieces of equal size, not bigger than an egg, spread thereon to a reasonable depth, according to your own judgment. And although your stones are none of the hardest, they will generally bind in a most surprising manner; and the harder your stones the thinner they may be laid, and a regard must be had to the weights that may be supposed to pass upon the road. I have known places where they burn bricks and stones on purpose to lay upon the roads; and the dross of lime kilns, iron founderies, or furnaces, or refuse of stone or slate quarries, or mines, or any sort of cinders, are good materials for roads; but this depends upon circumstances and situation. I have even known a good road created from a bog in a clay soil, the worst sort of soil for roads, made by laying bushes, and upon them a layer of the common earth formed barrel-wise, as above, with proper drains to carry off the water, which, when covered with stone broken as above, made a good road of many years duration, where at the outset it was imagined it could not be done; all these matters are prescribed where gravel is not to be had, for that is the best material, tho' sometimes even that will not bind or form a compact mass like broken stones. And all roads must be made in such form as to carry off the water. N. E.

[Green bushes tied in small bundles, pressed close, and covered thick with any kind of rubbish, is an excellent amendment in swampy places. EDIT.]

MR. URBAN,

BEFORE your correspondent Y (see vol LIV. p. 982.) had apprised the public that the late Dr. Johnson had the misfortune to be monocular, I had my doubts whether Mr. Tyers's information of his learned friend's "seeing better with one eye than the other," was an anecdote so worthy to be recorded for its peculiarity, as he seems to have supposed. Indeed, I am rather inclined to believe it is a circumstance far from being uncommon, and I am satisfied of its being my own case. For, a few months ago, by accidentally covering my left eye, I found I could not read, without the aid of a glass, what I had just before seen distinctly with both my eyes open. And when, soon after, I mentioned to two of my acquaintance my having discovered this partial confusion and dimness in my sight, they confessed, on trial, they were, to their no small surprise, sensible of the like disability in their right eyes. With the view of procuring evidence to confirm or disprove the truth of my surmise, I send you this account, to be inserted, when most convenient, in your Magazine; and should the fact be ascertained by a competent number of witnesses, I am willing to hope that some of your ingenious correspondents will assign an adequate cause for it. To me it appears not unlikely, that this comparative defect may be owing to a more frequent and intent use, and consequently to a greater wear and waste, of the right eye than of its companion; and this involuntarily and from habit, in the same manner as most of us accustom ourselves to employ the right hand oftener than the left. As possibly the perusal of this letter may induce many of Mr. Urban's readers, from the age of twenty to fourscore, to be blinking their eyes alternately by way of experiment, it may be requisite to intimate further, that I am apt to imagine, no very material difference between them will be easily discernible (and for an obvious reason) except by those who are not on the bright side of fifty—as certainly is not

W. and D.

MR. URBAN,

YOUR Magazine is a proper and honourable repository for every thing curious in nature, in science, and in art. Therefore I transmit to it the ensuing account of a being in whom the lustre of native genius shines through the mists which were thrown around him by obscure birth, the total absence of all refined instruction, and by the daily necessity of manual labour.

WILLIAM NEWTON was born at Wardlow, in Derbyshire, a small hamlet on Tideswell-Moor, which extends along the tops of some of the Peak Mountains. This hamlet parishes to the village of Eyam, of which my father is rector, and Mr. Cunninghame curate. The inclosed specimen of William Newton's poetic talent is addressed to the last-named gentleman, whose poems are not unknown or unadmired. I give my word of honour that it has not received any correction from me. I send it in his own handwriting. Mr. Cunninghame assures me, that neither himself, nor any other person, has altered a single syllable of these verses; and indeed the style of their author's letters evinces that his imagination has no rude asperities which demand the critical chisel.

William Newton's father was a carpenter, too ignorant to give his son any literary advantages, and too indigent to procure them for him. A dame-school and a writing-master formed the boundaries of our Minstrel's education. He worked at his father's trade, and very early became so ingenious, skilful, and industrious, as to be employed by some few genteel families of the neighbourhood. On these occasions, I have been told, he used to examine books which accidentally lay about in the apartments where he was at work. They awakened into sensibility and expansion the internal fires of his spirit. Every species of fine writing engaged his attention, but poetry enchanted him. From that period all the earnings of his ingenious industry, which he could prudently spare, were expended in books.

Some five years since, Mr. Cunninghame by accident discovered this literary flower of the desert. A retired disposition, and the most unobtrusive modesty, had cast a veil over his talents, which few had possessed sagacity to pierce, though his inventive industry had raised his reputation as a workman. He was employed, I am told, not only to execute, but to construct, machines for the Derbyshire Cotton-mills, besides being one of the head carpenters at the Duke of Devonshire's splendid buildings at Buxton. He married, early in life, a young woman of his own rank, and is known to make a kind husband, a tender father, and to be, in all respects, a just and worthy man.

When I was at Eyam with my father in the summer of 1783, Mr. Cunninghame told me, that William Newton had a considerable number of well-chosen books on poetic, historic, philosophic, and religious subjects. That gentleman introduced him to me as the Minstrel of my native mountains. This self-taught Bard is rather handsome, but aims at nothing in his appearance beyond the clean and decent. When the first embarrassments were past, produced by a conscious want of the manners of the world, he conversed with perspicuity and taste upon the authors he had read, the striking scenery of the few countries he had beheld, and the nature of his own destiny, perceptions, and acquirements.

The ease and elegance of his epistolary style are wonderful. I have extracted the following sentences from a letter of thanks which I received from him in the last autumn, upon my having presented him with the four Poems I have published, bound up together.

"All that your pensive, your lonely
"Friend can return for this unmerited
"kindness are the warm effusions of a "grateful heart. My walk through the "darkling vale of toilsome life has not "been through a wilderness of sweets.
"Your having scattered, in my solitary
"path, flowers of so agreeable an odour,
"culled from the bowers of the Muses,
"will lighten, in many an irksome hour,
"the iron weight of labour. Indeed,
"since I received this testimony of your "amity, young Hope and Joy have aided "the hands of the Mechanic. Every "sublime and beautiful object, which I "used to view with a melancholy languor,
"have now acquired the most animating charms in my sight. As a "warm sunbeam dispels the heavy dews,
"and raises the head of a drooping field-flower,
"so has your kind attention dispersed the clouds which were cast about "me by adverse and wayward Fortune.

"I have lately added to my little poetical collection the Works of that sublime Bard, and learned and judicious Critic, Mr. Hayley; and I now live in

"the

“the midst of that charming Monsfaldale
 “whose graces you have so faithfully “described in the poem which you are “so good to address to me. Last week
 “Mr. Cunninghame found me in this “lovely valley, surrounded by wheels,
 “springs, and various mechanical operations.
 “To his creative fancy they “appeared as the effect of magic, and
 “he called me Prospero.”

To have found, in the compositions of a laborious Villager, some bright sparks of native genius, amidst the dross of prosaic vulgarity, had been pleasing, though perhaps not wonderful; but the elegance and harmony of William Newton's language, both in prose and verse, are miraculous, when it is remembered that, till Mr. Cunninghame kindly distinguished him, he had associated only with the unlettered and inelegant vulgar. He is now only 30 years old.

I have inclosed a little poem of my own, addressed to this creature of inspiration, chiefly because it describes Monsfaldale, the loveliest among the vales of Derbyshire. If its features are not so sublime as those of Dovedale, they are more soft and smiling, and not less picturesque. Strange! that Monsfaldale should seldom or ever be included in the chart laid down for the curious who mean to make the tour of that county.

If you think my rhymes worth publishing, be so good as to insert them in the same Magazine*, with those of the Minstrel. Yours, &c. ANNA SEWARD.

MR. URBAN, Selburne, Feb. 16.

SOME extraordinary circumstances that occurred in the frost of December last at the village where I was visiting, induced me to send you the following observations, which I made at the time, and on the spot.

The severity of this frost was not in general apprehended by the inhabitants of this village, as the air was still; but its effects appeared on two young men, who had their feet frozen in two hours time, as they were tracking hares in the snow. They got home with great difficulty, and lost their toe-nails. Two poor men, who were much more to be pitied, had the tops of their fingers frozen, and mortified, as they were at the honest labour of threshing.

The warning that the rapid fall of the thermometer gave, preserved the winter-store of roots and fruits, by shewing the necessity of removing them out of the reach of the frost into the cellar. They who had no cellars, or did not take this precaution, had their whole stock destroyed; a loss of more consequence, in a distant village, than those who live near regularly supplied markets are aware of. During the intenseness of the cold, shining spiculae of ice were seen floating in the sunshine, like the particles of dust in a ray of light admitted into a dark room. Middleton observed this appearance in the severe weather at Hudson's Bay.

But the most remarkable circumstance relating to this frost, is the very great difference between the degree of cold at this village and at a gentleman's house at Newton, situate on a hill about two hundred feet higher, and a mile and an half distant. When the thermometer was one degree below zero, or thirty-three degrees below the freezing point of Fahrenheit's scale here below the hill, that at the house above descended only to seventeen, that is, fifteen degrees below the freezing point. On succeeding days, when the weather grew milder, the thermometers nearly agreed; but that on the hill was never lower than that in the valley. On Christmas day, when the thermometer was here at ten, that on the hill was at twenty-one.

The different degrees of cold in the two places appeared also by its freezing in every room in the house, and even near the fires, below the hill; whereas, on the hill, the frost scarce penetrated into the garrets. This partial cold, at such a small distance, cannot be attributed to a current of air, for there was so little wind that two well-constructed vanes stood different ways. The smoke inclined gently from the North-east.

When the thermometer is much below the freezing point, a fog coming on, or a cloud passing over, will raise the mercury several degrees. During this frost a cloud very high in the atmosphere, and so thin that the moon cast a strong shadow through it, raised the thermometer six degrees, while it was passing over, but there was no cloud or fog in the valley, or over the hill, when these observations were made.

The laurels, bays, and laurustines below the hill, were much injured, if not killed to the ground; even the native Ivy never sere was scorched, while those of the same sort above remained unhurt. It has often been remarked, that tender evergreens in high situations suffer less from from frost than those in the valleys; because, say the gardeners, they are less injured by remaining in a constant frozen state, while those in the valleys are thawed by the sun, and again frozen at night; by which sudden changes their texture is destroyed. This, in many cases, may be true; but, in this instance, the evergreens in the valley appeared to be injured, and turned brown immediately, while the air was constantly frozen, and the influence of the sun was at all times full as strong on the hill as in the valley.

I am far from asserting, that there is not a considerable degree of cold in very high situations, for the tops of the loftiest mountains in every part of the world convince us of it; but the state of the thermometer on the hill during this frost, the general uninjured appearance of evergreens on hills, and the ingenious remarks of Mr. Six on local heat, in the last volume of the Philosophical Transactions, seem to countenance the conjecture, that the air, at a few hundred feet high, is not liable to so great a degree of cold as it is below, during the severity of a frost.

The thermometers these observations were made with, were hung abroad to the North; two of them were by Martyn, and one by Dollond. They were compared together, and agreed. But one of those by Martyn was not graduated low enough; so that, when the remarks became most interesting, the mercury was fallen into the ball. Every thermometer in this country ought to be graduated at least ten degrees below zero, to prevent the same disappointment I should have met with, if I had not had two other instruments.

1784. Dec. 6.	Selburne.		Newton.	Fyfield, near Andover.		S. Lambeth.	London.	Winchester.
	4	1	17	10	5	11	15	2

This village in the valley (Selburne) is, I apprehend, near three hundred feet higher than high-water mark; a spring that rises in it, and runs into the Thames, falls at least fifty feet the first mile; and the barometer is usually between two and three degrees lower than it is in the lowest situations in London. It is fifty miles south-west of London; the soil a pyrous freestone, marble, and clay. Newton is on the hill, a mile and a half from Selburne. Fyfield is seventy miles south-west by west of London. The soil of Newton, Fyfield, and Winchester is chalk. At Fyfield, where the thermometer fell five degrees below zero, that is, four degrees below the cold of Selburne, the evergreens were destroyed, or much injured, and even the hollies were scorched; but on the neighbouring hills none of them were hurt.

The greatest degree of cold in the year 1740 was one degree below zero. It was not so cold in 1729-30 by ten degrees, according to the thermometers of those times. Yours, &c. T. H. W.

MR. URBAN,

IN an "Address to the Reader," prefixed to a lately-published edition of "Poetry by Richard Crashaw, who was a Canon in the Chapel of Loretto, and died there in the year 1650, with some Account of the Author," &c. are some extracts from Pope's Letters concerning this too-much neglected poet; in one of which is a quotation from Crashaw, and on it the following note: "This is the only quotation the editor has ever met with, though he has carefully inspected many books with that view." I trouble you with this, Sir, to observe that, in the Supplemental Notes to an edition of Ben Jonson's "Sad Shepherd, with a Continuation thereof," said to be written by Mr. Waldron, of Drury Lane Theatre, and published a year or two ago, are, among many others, three quotations from Crashaw. The book I advert to having been commended by Mr. Urban*, and criticised and applauded by the Reviewers, it is matter of surprize that the new Editor of Crashaw has not perused it; as, allowing for a confessed want of method and arrangement in the Appendix, I think I do not over-rate Mr. W's publication in saying it is entitled to the perusal of all admirers of old English poetry.

Among other curious matter annexed to "The Sad Shepherd" are some scarce Poems by R. Southwell, and extracts from a very rare Morality, by W. Bulleyn, written in the 16th century. If the reprinting all Southwell's Works, and Bulleyn's entire Dialogue, as it is called,

(which,

(which, from its extreme scarcity, is in danger of being lost to posterity,) would not be attended with loss to the Editor, it were to be wished that Mr. W. would oblige the world with new editions of them; for which undertaking he seems, by the specimens he has given, to be not ill qualified. PAULO-PORTICUS.

MR. URBAN, Jan. 31.
IN looking, the other day, by mere accident, into an old Magazine for January, 1733, p. 59, I met, among other articles, with the most extraordinary will of one Mr. Norton, and in which are bequeathed some very extraordinary legacies; but that which struck my admiration, and indeed my approbation, the most, was one at the bottom of p. 63, wherein is bequeathed to a Mr. John Chicheley a gold chain medal, originally belonging to Mr. N.'s grandfather, a Sir John Lawson.

Now, Sir, be it known to you, and the readers of your admirable repository, that the writer of this article has had in his possession, for between 40 and 50 years, the original Commission for the Captaincy of the Fairfax Frigate, under the name and hand-writing of the famous Robert Blake, appointing this Captain Lawson to the command of it. And at the same time he has been as long in possession of another, and a very elegant piece it is, as well as curious, viz. a commission under the seal and signature of Charles the Second, for the command of a man of war, to this very gentleman, who afterwards, in an engagement with the Dutch fleet, on June 3, 1665, received his death wound, as did several other great commanders at the time, in particular the Dutch admiral, Opdam, whose ship, with himself and crew, were all blown up at once.

How either of these, with an exquisitely written copy upon vellum, containing a list of all the English nobility in 1690, came into my family, I know not. I know, indeed, how they came to me, and that is all I do know or care about them. However, Sir, if either yourself, or any one of your curious correspondents, have any inclination to see all or any of them, either for taking a written copy, or as an engraving for your excellent reservoir of curiosities, and will engage, upon honour, to return them safe to the gentleman I shall transmit them by, they shall be heartily welcome, and I shall think myself highly honoured by the request.

The number of the nobility in the date above was 168; to what number they amount at this day I know not*. However, I am inclined to believe that, story-like, they have not lost by telling.

I am, &c. VIRTUOSUS.

P. S. The commission from the king is on vellum, in Latin, and finely emblazoned; that of Admiral Blake is on a small piece of very bad parchment, and, from the needle-holes on the back, seems to have been used as a cover to some school-boy's copy-book.

(We thankfully accept this gentleman's offer, and engage for their safe return.)

MR. URBAN, Kazimof, Sept. 15, 1784.
BEING here, in my way to Vlodimir, I complete my design of sending you such remains of the buildings of the ancient Tartars in these parts as are still in good preservation. I shall trouble you with no more than the present; which, if it answers no other purpose, will at least make a very handsome embellishment to your Magazine. I sat down yesterday on the loose stone which you see lying on the ground in the drawing annexed, and made a draught of the burial-place of the khans. The view is taken on the south side; and I have added at bottom a scale of 40 English feet.

This sepulchre of the ancient khans is in form of an oblong square, and there is nothing Gothic to be perceived in any part of it. It is built of very smooth hewn stones, with a handsome cornice round the top. Towards the western extremity is a small chamber, which seems to have been an oratory, after the Mohammedan fashion. To this there is an entrance in the western wall, and a small light hole in the northern, blocked up with loose stones. The other part consists of a vault, wherein are a number of grave-stones. On the top of this vault is a decayed roof, which, having a good deal of earth upon it, the whole is covered with birch and fir trees, that grow to a considerable height, and give it a picturesque appearance.

The length of the whole building, from east to west, is something more than twenty arshines, the breadth above eleven, and the height of it is seven.

The little vault is, on the inside, not much above five arshines and an half wide, from east to west. The door-way to the great vault is in the south side, nearly in the middle of the whole building, and therefore near the party-wall that divides the two vaults. This door-case projects almost half an arshine from the wall, and the entrance is about two arshines wide, and has not the least trace of hooks whereon a door might formerly have hung. Over the entrance is a stone table, placed in the wall, with an Arabic inscription to this effect:

* See vol. LIV. p. 396.

TO THE GREAT AND ONLY GOD,
THE SOVEREIGN OF THESE PARTS,
SHAGALI KHAN,
SON OF THE SULTAN SHICK AULEAR.
THE XXIST OF THE MONTH RAMASAN, IN THE YEAR
962.

That is, 962 of the Hegira, which, if I am not mistaken, answers to the year 1520 of the Christian æra.—The width of the vault, from east to west, is nine arshines and about one quarter, the breadth something less than eight arshines and a half, and the height, to the rim of the vault, a little more than five arshines. In the north wall are two window-holes; in the east but one, which has been secured by iron bars, now broken away by people that have entered the place in hopes of plunder. Within the place are eight conspicuous tumuli. Close to the eastern wall lie five of them near one another; and a sixth hard-by the entrance. They are all done over with a reddish lime, which, as far as I could judge, has been burnt. The seventh lies exactly in the middle, is more than seven feet long, and near an arshine high. A little way from this is the eighth, much about the same size with the latter, but almost four square, and appears to have been for two bodies; and, in fact, I found nine skulls in the cavern below. At the west, or head end, of each grave-hill, has been a plain stone, from five to six feet high, and a foot-stone to the four-square one. Only two of these now remain, the rest having been broken away. One part of the surface of the stones is ornamented with various devices, and the other contains an Arabic inscription, all neatly cut.

Under this vault is a great cavern, the mouth of which is exactly delineated in the drawing, not far from the entrance to the building. Nothing but skulls, bones, hair, and rags of yellow, green, and brown thin taffety, in which the bodies probably were wrapped, when smeared with some preservative, is now to be seen in this cavern; as the virtuosi of the neighbourhood have a great passion for removing every thing of value from any place they can get at.

MR. URBAN,
THE following account of Dr. Johnson at Cambridge, in the year 1765, in an extract of a letter from the late Dr. John Sharp, may not be an unacceptable addition to your other anecdotes of that truly great and good man.

Yours, &c. A. B.

“Cambr. Mar. 1, 1765.

“As to Johnson, you will be surprised to hear that I have had him in the chair in which I am now writing. He has ascended my aerial citadel. He came down on a Saturday evening, with a Mr. Beauclerk*, who has a friend at Trinity†. Caliban, you may be sure, was not roused from his lair before next day noon, and his breakfast probably kept him till night. I saw nothing of him, nor was he heard of by any one, till Monday afternoon, when I was sent for home to two gentlemen unknown. In conversation I made a strange faux pas about Burnaby Greene’s poem‡, in which Johnson is drawn at full length. He drank his large potations of tea with me, interrupted by many an indignant contradiction, and many a noble sentiment. He had on a better wig than usual, but one whose curls were not, like Sir Cloudesley’s, formed for “eternal buckle§.” Our conversation was chiefly on books, you may be sure. He was much pleased with a small Milton of mine, published in the author’s lifetime, and with the Greek epigram on his own effigy, of its being the picture, not of him, but of a bad painter. There are many manuscript stanzas, for aught I know, in Milton’s own hand-writing, and several interlined hints and fragments. We were puzzled about one of the sonnets, which we thought was not to be found in Newton’s edition, and differed from all the printed ones. But Johnson cried, “No! No!” repeated the whole sonnet instantly, memoriter, and shewed it us in Newton’s book. After which, he learnedly harangued on sonnet-writing, and its different numbers. He tells me, he will come hither again quickly, and is promised “an habitation in Emanuel College.” He went back to town next morning; but, as it began to be known that he was in the University, several persons got into his company the last evening at Trinity, where, about

MR. FOX being upon a visit to his brother, Lord Ilchester, Mr. Calcraft called at Holland House, according to his usual custom, to enquire, before he wrote to his patron, whether there were any letters for him, or any other business to inform him of. One day, as he called, he found Fanning (whom Mr. Fox had now made his steward) in conversation with a man who had the appearance of a farmer. Just as Mr. Calcraft entered, he heard Fanning say, 'I'm 'sure 'tis not my master's hand; but here 'comes a gentleman who can inform you 'better than I can.' Saying this, he delivered into Mr. Calcraft's hand a lease. When Mr. Calcraft had looked over it, he declared that the signature was not Mr. Fox's; "Nor," continued he, "can 'there be such a lease really existing; for the late Mrs. Horner discharged "Ayliffe from her service upon account 'of his having married a person whom "she did not approve of. And it is not "to be supposed she would grant him a "lease for the life of himself, his son, "and that very wife for the impudent 'choice of whom she had dismissed "him." The farmer no sooner heard this, than he exclaimed, 'Then I am 'undone; the villain has robbed me of 'what I had saved for my daughter's 'portion.'—Upon a further investigation of the affair, Mr. Calcraft found that the lease given to the farmer had been forged, purposely to raise money upon. Mr. Fox had made this Ayliffe a riding commissary. The income arising from this employment was alone more than sufficient to support such a family as his; but he had, in addition to it, adopted the profession of buying estates. As he was supposed to be a good judge of the value of land, Mr. Calcraft had empowered him to purchase estates for him in Dorsetshire; and Ayliffe had already received the sum of eleven thousand pounds from him for that purpose, else, in all probability, he would have continued his depredations for some time longer. Mr. Calcraft no sooner discovered, by this accident, what Ayliffe had been doing, than set out in pursuit of him. He found him at Salisbury, where, under pretext of the forgery, he had him taken, by proper persons, into custody. This had the desired effect. In the first emotions of his terror he refunded the whole of the eleven thousand pounds. Mr. Calcraft had him then immediately secured by Justice Fielding's men, who had come in pursuit of him. In consequence of an application from the farmer, they clapped a pair of handcuffs on him, and brought him to town, when he was committed. An express was sent to Mr. Fox, who still continued at Lord Ilchester's, to inform him of the transaction; and I can take upon me to affirm, that the first knowledge that gentleman had of it was after Ayliffe stood committed for trial.—Mr. Fox was unjustly censured upon this occasion, as indeed he was upon many others, where his commissaries had all the emoluments, and he all the odium. The unhappy man, solicitous for his life, sent his wife to me, after his conviction, to intreat that I would use my interest in his favour with his injured master, and request of him that he would apply to his Majesty to extend his mercy towards him. At the same time he wrote to Mr. Fox, who was now in town, and whom I perceived to be greatly shocked at the affair. In his letter he requested that gentleman's forgiveness, and, acknowledging himself the most ungrateful of men, promised, if he would but save him from his merited sentence, his whole life should be employed in endeavouring to deserve the mercy, and to atone for the enormities he had been guilty of. But the very same hour he wrote to Mr. Pitt, who was then minister, to inform him, that if he would rescue him from his approaching fate, he would discover such iniquitous practices of his late employer as should fully repay the saving him.—Mr. Pitt, with a liberality of sentiment which does honour to his memory, sent the wretch's letter immediately to Mr. Fox. That gentleman received it as he was preparing to go to court, on purpose to solicit the prisoner's pardon; but this discovery of his baseness now rendered it impossible, as such an application would have carried with it a declaration of his being in the villain's power, and that he was apprehensive of his putting his threats into execution. No intercession was of course made for him, and he suffered the due reward of his crime.

Thus did this wretched being fall a victim to his unparalleled ingratitude and duplicity, and by him was this best of masters repaid for all his kindness, in the same manner as he was by the generality of his dependents. To wind up the tragical story, I must add, that poor Fanning, who was the innocent cause of bringing the affair to light, was deprived of sense and life in consequence of it.—I need not inform you, that a very different turn has been given to the foregoing incident by Mr. Fox's enemies. Prejudice and enmity have painted his conduct upon this occasion in the blackest light; but the good man, armed with that strongest of breast-plates, a heart untainted, set the shafts of calumny at defiance.

An Account of Mademoiselle THERESA PARADIS, of Vienna, the celebrated Blind Performer on the Piano Forte.

THIS young person, equally distinguished by her talents and misfortunes, is the daughter of M. Paradis, secretary to his Imperial Majesty, in the Bohemian department, and god-daughter to the late Empress Queen.

At the age of two years and eight months she was suddenly deprived of sight by a paralytic stroke, or palsy in the optic nerves.

At seven years old she began to listen with great attention to the music she heard in the church, which suggested to her parents the idea of having her taught to play on the piano forte, and, soon after, to sing. In three or four years time she was able to accompany herself on the organ in the Stabat Mater of Pergolesi, of which she sung the first soprano, or upper part, in the church of St. Augustin at Vienna, in the presence of the late Empress Queen, who was so touched with her performance and misfortune, that she settled a pension on her for life.

After learning of several masters at Vienna, she pursued her musical studies under the care of Kozeluch, who has composed many admirable lessons and concertos on purpose for her use, which she plays with the utmost neatness and expression.

At the age of thirteen she was placed under the care of the celebrated empiric Dr. Mesmer, who undertook to cure every species of disease by animal magnetism. He called her disorder a perfect gutta serena, and pretended, after she had been placed in his house as a boarder for several months, that she was perfectly cured, yet refused to let her parents take her away, or even visit her, after some time, till, by the advice of the Barons Stoerk and Wenzel, Dr. Ingenhousz, Professor Barth, the celebrated anatomist, and the express order of her late Imperial Majesty, she was taken out of his hands by force; when it was found that she could see no more than when she was first admitted as Mesmer's patient. However, he had the diabolical malignity to assert that she could see very well, and only pretended blindness to preserve the pension granted to her by the Empress Queen; and since the decease of this princess, the pension of Mad. Paradis has been withdrawn, indiscriminately, with all other pensions granted by her Imperial Majesty.

Last year Mad. Paradis quitted Vienna, in order to travel, accompanied by her mother, who treats her with extreme tenderness, and is a very amiable and interesting character. After visiting the principal courts and cities of Germany, where her talents and misfortunes procured her great attention and patronage, she arrived at Paris early last summer, and remained there five or six months, and likewise received every possible mark of approbation and regard in that capital, both for her musical abilities and innocent and engaging disposition.

When she arrived in England, the beginning of this winter, she brought letters from persons of the first rank to her Majesty, the Prince of Wales, the Imperial Minister Count Kageneck, Lord Stormont, and other powerful patrons, as well as to the principal musical professors in London. Messieurs Cramer, Abel, Salomon, and other eminent German musicians, have interested themselves very much in her welfare, not only as their countrywoman bereaved of sight, but as an admirable performer.

She went to Windsor, to present her letters to the Queen, and had the honour of playing there to their Majesties, who were extremely satisfied with her performance, and treated her with that condescension and kindness which all who are so happy as to be admitted into the presence of our gracious Sovereigns, in moments of domestic privacy, experience, even when less entitled to it by merit and misfortunes than Mad. Paradis. Her Majesty was not only graciously pleased to promise to patronise and hear her frequently again, in the course of the winter, but to afford her all the protection in her power; as did his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, to whom she has since performed, at a grand concert at Carleton House, to the entire satisfaction and wonder of all who heard her.

Besides her musical talents, which are indisputable for neatness, precision, and expression, particularly in the great variety of admirable pieces she executes of her master Kozeluch, Mad. Paradis has been extremely well educated, and is very ingenious, as she is able, with printing types, to express her thoughts on paper, almost as quick as if she could write.—She understands geography, by means of maps prepared for her use, in which she can find and point out any province or remarkable city in the world; and is likewise able, by means of tables formed in the manner of draught-boards, to calculate, with ease and rapidity, any sums or numbers in the first five rules of arithmetic. She is likewise said to distinguish many colours and coins, by the touch; plays at cards, when prepared for her by private marks, unknown by the company; and in her musical studies her memory and quickness are wonderful, as she learns in general the most difficult pieces for keyed instruments, however full and complicated the parts, by hearing them played only on a violin: and since her arrival in this kingdom she has been enabled, in this manner, to learn to perform some of Handel's most elaborate and difficult organ fugues and movements in his first book of Lessons, as well as his Coronation Anthem, and more popular compositions.

Since her arrival in England she has received a cantata*, written for her, in the German language, by the celebrated professor of mathematics, M. Plettel, of Colmar, who is himself blind. This cantata has been admirably set to music for her own voice and accompaniment on the piano forte, and she executes it in a truly pathetic and able manner. Her voice is not so powerful as her hand, but it is touching in itself, and her knowledge of music and its circumstances render it doubly interesting.

* J. B. requests some particulars of ERASMUS KING, who read Lectures on Natural Philosophy, about 40 years ago, at Lambeth Wells.

* Madame Paradis having intreated Dr. Burney, who has had letters from Germany in behalf of her ingenious daughter, and is very zealous in her service, to translate this cantata, we have procured a copy of his version, which will be found among our poetical articles, p. 215.

MR. URBAN,

I DO not think H. W. has explained the altar-piece as it ought to be; for the figure with the pilgrim's staff is undoubtedly St. Roch. He lived in the 14th century, was lord of Montpellier, but abandoned his fortunes to turn pilgrim. After curing many persons of the plague, he was himself attacked, but cured by a dog's licking the ulcer. For this reason he is, in France, invoked, in order to avert that calamity, and is always represented with a sore thigh and a dog.—The compartment opposite, which answers to this, represents St. Francis of Assisium receiving the stigmata, or impressions, of Christ's wounds. It is therefore probable these two saints were the patrons of the church where the altar was erected. I have seen many similar altar-pieces abroad, in which the particular patrons were placed in this manner.

Yours, &c. PORTIUS.

MR. Lewis, in his Life of Reynold Pecock, bishop of Chichester, p. 176, after relating that about 30 Germans perished from want of food, and the inclemency of the weather, in consequence of a sentence of excommunication pronounced against them as Hereticks by a Synod held at Oxford, in the presence of Henry the Second, subjoins,

“This was in the year 1161; but of this cruelty the king seems to have lived long enough to repent; since, in 1182, one and twenty years after, and but seven before his death, he would not consent that they should be burnt anywhere in his dominions, though there were great numbers of them.”

For this anecdote concerning Henry the Second, Mr. Lewis has not cited any authority, nor, in Lord Lyttelton's History of the Life of that Prince, can I discover any passage that has the least reference to it. Should any of your readers be apprised on what grounds Mr. Lewis may have advanced a fact so much to the credit of Henry, and will be pleased to communicate the same in your instructive Miscellany, he will confer an obligation on your occasional correspondent,

MR. URBAN,

EVERY particular relative to the translations of extraordinary or ingenious men merits attention and preservation. The following are in consequence of enquiries made by correspondents, dents, whom the writer of this is happy in the opportunity of obliging, as he has himself received many informations relating to subjects totally inaccessible to him without the intermediate help of your excellent biographical and philosophical Miscellany.

Yours, &c. H. LEMOINE.

A correspondent (I cannot immediately quote the page, but it is some months since) desires memoirs of that learned but doubtful character, Archibald Bower, the papal historian. Mr. S. Ayscough, the Museum bibliographer, very kindly obliged the public with notices relating to this author in that celebrated repository, but has not favoured us with any account of his life: to supply this deficiency, the present sketch is attempted, mostly taken from papers written by himself, or under his eye. He was a native of Aberdeen, and born about 1688. His parents being Roman Catholics, he was carefully brought up in that persuasion, and at a proper age sent over to the college of the Scotch Jesuits at Doway in French Flanders, to be educated for the church. The time when he took his first vows is uncertain. However, he early entered among the Jesuits, and then removed to Florence, where he taught theology with great applause, till he received an invitation to settle at Bologna. In that city his character rose to the highest degree of fame, which induced the superior of his order to send him to Rome, where he was well received, and for some time taught philosophy and theology. His fame was now spread all over the Italian States, and he had many invitations to reside in different places, to none of which he seems to have acceded till the College of Macerata chose him for their professor. The time he sat in that chair appears quite uncertain; but about 1726, being appointed occasional spiritual father, and confessor, to a nunnery in that city, he attempted to debauch a nun of the family of Buoncorfi, and it was imagined they intended to make an elopement together. Be this as it may, Bower was obliged to fly, and it appears probable he travelled through Switzerland, part of France, and Lorrain, and arrived at Calais, in great trepidation, just as Lord Baltimore was embarking for England. His lordship brought him to London*,

* I have seen a printed account which places this fact in 1731; but by his own papers it happened in July, or August, 1726.

GENT. MAG. March, 1785.

and Bower, who had not left Italy for conscientious scruples, took lodgings in Wicl-street, near Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, where he spent most of his time in writing for the booksellers, and in company with his brethren the Jesuits, who, notwithstanding the affair with the lady, continued still to treat him with every mark of respect. He acquired property by his literary labours; and in 1730, he published the Historia Literaria, a work which contains passages which favour the opinions of the author's being then a proselyte to protestantism. About this time he lived with Lord Avlmer, and was employed from 1735 till 1744, upon the Universal History, during which time he passed a year with Mr. Cooley, in Berkshire, as tutor to his son, and afterwards undertook, at Lord Avlmer's desire, the education of his two sons, one of whom is now a prebendary of Bristol†. The year 1747 he employed upon the correction of the whole of the Universal History preparatory to a new edition; and it appears Andrew Millar would have engaged him to write the Modern History, but he declined the offer, that he might apply himself wholly to the History of the Popes. In 1748, he placed about two thousand pounds in the hands of the Jesuits, for the consideration of an annuity of seven per cent. to be paid him by their banker near Covent Garden. But the money had not been deposited above two years, when he formed the resolution of marrying, and, under the pretence that the money belonged to a woman to whom he was guardian, he obtained it back out of the hands of the fraternity. The history of this money contract is the most entangled affair of his life. However, the sum was repaid him, deducting only what interest he had received above four per cent. and this would not perhaps have been the case, had it not been previous to his publishing proposals for the History of the Popes; for when this work was announced, it spread such an alarm among the whole body of Roman Catholics, that they employed a divine of the Church of England to expose him‡, by tracing him through every stage of his life; and although there is reason to believe, that falsehoods were charged upon him, yet

† And rector of St. Alban's Wood-street. Q. Is he not Lord A. by the death of his nephew? EDIT.

‡ This will not be credited by those who know Dr. D. and therefore are certain that truth only was his motive. EDIT.

he cannot be thought totally innocent of all that was alleged against him. If we view him through the medium of his adversaries, his character appears very dark, and the contrary if we implicitly credit his defence. He has been charged with attempting to make proselytes to Popery, and with other mal-practices, from all which he has defended himself with great skill and ability; and which cannot be too much admired, whether guilty or not; and this perhaps will ever remain doubtful.

Calumny and scandal are part of the artifices of the Roman communion; and these they never fail to practise, against those who dare to step out of the pale of their Church. But they were not the only machinations levelled against him; they attempted, and were very near succeeding, in carrying him off by water from Greenwich, and, according to his own account, other means were tried to put a period to his existence. They then had recourse to another method; they translated from the French a voluminous History of the Popes written by a Deist, for they cared not what became of their favourite notions if they could but ruin Bower; but this proved as ineffectual as the rest of their conduct, for the most eminent of the Protestant nobility adhered to his interest, and subscribed to his work, and George Lord Lyttelton was his friend to the last. He died in Bond-street, in 1766, aged 78 years. H. L.

MR. URBAN,
I HAVE lately read a most illiberal and abusive letter, addressed to the Rev. S. Badcock, by Dr. E. Harwood. When I first glanced at its extraordinary title, I immediately guessed at its contents, and at the spirit which dictated them; and hesitated for some time, whether I should give it a perusal, or not. Reflecting, however, that frequently things are better in reality than in appearance, I resolved to try the experiment on the present performance. But having tried it, I am obliged to alter the old motto, and instead of Fronti nulla, to say multa fides. I found my conjecture but two well grounded. The contents are perfectly of a piece with the title; and though deficient in every other respect, yet at least the pamphlet hath the merit of CONSISTENCY, simplex ductat & unum; for, as I am writing about Dr. Harwood, I cannot avoid introducing a scrap of Latin, though perhaps it may add no weight, and give no beauty to what is said in plain English before. But as nothing will do with a pedant without a phrase, I am willing to humour the man in his own way.

Now, Mr. Urban, by your permission, I will present the public with some few specimens of the liberality, meekness, and piety of this candid and Christian divine, who informs us that he has written Treatises upon Religion, which he says, "have done him much credit," and amongst the rest, "a pious little Treatise, on the great duty and delight of contentment." How far his own conduct hath illustrated his doctrines, I will leave to be decided by others. I have no concern but with his present letter, and, therefore, must form my judgement of the man from what is immediately before me. Now, what opinion can I form of a man's candour, who will peremptorily say (and make only his own father, because Dr. Harwood's father! an exception to this general reflection), that "there is no humanity in the soul of a Calvinist, but every thing there is as dark as Erebus?" What can we think of the candour of a man, who, without the least personal knowledge of Mr. Badcock, says, in direct terms; "were I to walk to South Molton, and tired, and hungry, at the door of the youngest of the Scaligers" (meaning Mr. Badcock) "were I to ask for bread, you would give me a stone; or to beg your maid to fry me a fish, you would come out from your closet, upon hearing my name, and thrust a serpent in my face."

What can we think of the Christian piety of a man, who, tickled with his own wit, could suffer such expressions as the following to fall from his pen? "With regard to my temporal concerns it is the same thing, should it be proved, as some heretics believed of old, that Christ was purely the son of Joseph, and Mary Carpenter." Mary Carpenter! Again. "Not to mention, irreverend sir, the amazing partiality and predilection, with which you have managed this Trinitarian controversy, the Holy Spirit has very much reason to complain of neglect. I have read the controversy carefully; for I am at home in these curiosities, and do not remember his name once mentioned. I know of old the jealousy of Calvinists; your congregation must surely suspect your unsoundness. If he be copartner in a very great house, that does a great deal of business, with two other persons no higher than himself, and be as great an agent in transacting it as the best of them, why should he be regarded as a mere cypher, on this bufling occasion? Ever since since Tom Emlyn made a convert of me, at sixteen, I thought he never had any share at all in the business; and you, Sir, seem either to think so too, or at least to think he hath left off business, and that the partnership is now dissolved. You remind me (for I must quote if you blast me) of the consulship of Julius Caesar and Bibulus; when the latter was so insignificant a fellow, that the wits of Rome, in those days, when a contract was made, or a deed signed, did not register in the year when Julius Caesar and Bibulus were consuls, but in the consulate of Julius and Cæsar."

What can we think of the meekness of a man, who, immediately after mentioning his "pious little Treatise on the great Duty and Delight of Contentment," gives the following illustration of the duty, which, it seems, it is the design of this same pious little Treatise, to recommend and enforce. "Now since it hath pleased God, after languishing two years in the palsy, that I should have received such wonderful benefit from electricity, permit me to treat you, Rev. Sir, with the like hauteur."

Specimens of his modesty and decorum would be endless; this modesty is particularly apparent in the easy and familiar style, in which he treats the first characters in the nation, and while he talks of the "Hierarchy's playing the Devil with Arians," he calls himself an Arian, and says, others call him an "Arian puppy;" and almost in the same breath, calls the Bishop of London, the Bishop of Salisbury, and the Bishop of Carlisle, and other venerable Bishops, his friends and acquaintance. Now supposing, that those friends of his, thinking he had carried his modesty a little too far, should "order their footmen," as he says, "to shew him the door," might he not exclaim in his own language, "I deserve such treatment, for being so miserably defective; I wish I had proceeded upon another plan, κατ' ἄλλον τρόπον; as I have so often said?" However, it is not difficult to conjecture what sort of an illustration the Dr. would give of his own argument upon contentment, if his modesty should receive this recompence; which, in another case, he confesses would be his due; though in my opinion no case would be more deserving of it than the present.

But to be serious with this writer, if it be possible to keep one's countenance for a moment when talking with Dr. Harwood, where can he find a trace of Calvinism in the writings of Mr. Badcock? He is unacquainted with any writings of his, but those, which are supposed to have been written by him, in the Monthly Review. Let him point out a single passage, which bears any resemblance to that cant, which he hath put into the mouth of a Calvinist, and I will never again interrupt him in his ravings.

The Doctor, as he proceeds, writes of "Cerberus," and though by no means as accurate as "an old school-master" ought to be, in his account of the "serpents," or of Hercules's mode of carrying off this ancient Emblem of the Trinity, as he profanely calls the three-headed dog of Hell, yet he seems to have imbibed a large quantity of the venom, which issued from his mouth, and to have made the wolfes bane, which grew on the spot, where this venom flowed, his daily salad.

When any person makes a full and round assertion, he ought to be well assured that what he asserts is founded on fact. To charge Mr. Badcock, as a person of an "ignoble soul, as being a mercenary scribbler, who cannot cherish a single idea of any nobler motive than money," is so grossly illiberal, and so totally false, that if Mr. Badcock thought it worth his while to appeal from the accusation, I am thoroughly convinced, from what I myself know, and from what general report says of him, that he need only appeal to his greatest enemies to vindicate him from so foul, so malignant, and groundless an assertion.

Ought the phrases "blundering blockhead, dark and illiberal villain, wretch, rascal, dirty scoundrel," (and for no reason that I can perceive, but because he hath delivered his free and unbiassed sentiments, on a subject, which he esteemed of the greatest consequence to the Christian Religion) to proceed from the mouth of a man, who boasts of his candour, and talks of religion and liberty, and hath published a treatise upon Christian contentment? Would any one suppose that this man hath kept company with Bishops? Can it be imagined that this man, though he hath "kept school in Cheshire with Dr. Priestley," and "spent many happy evenings with him at Mr. Edward's," "visited him at Nantwich," "received him at Congleton," "made an excursion with him to Wrexham," and went together with him "to drink ale with a Welch parson, who read prayers in a waggoner's frock," can it be imagined, I say, that this man is in the habits of any any intimacy with either dignitaries of the church, or "families of distinction?"

The Doctor boasts of his knowledge of the elegancies of style, and the propriety of language; the only language, however, which he seems to be a proficient in, is the language of Billingsgate: Were we to judge of his company from his address, one would be led to imagine, that he had principally associated with the canaille of Broad St. Giles's, for, to use his own words, he seems, "here to be at home."

The following is a rare instance of the Barbas; and perhaps Dr. Priestley, in his second edition of "Lectures on Oratory and Criticism" (if they ever should see a second edition) may place it among the specimens of the true Presbyterian sublime. "Sir Reverence,—for I must now change my style, I want words to express my contempt both of your ignorance, and uncharitableness.—A Dissenter! Yet with a traitor's perfidy, forming an alliance with a learned and powerful defender of an establishment, and pertly spring your little popguns against Dr. Priestley's omnipotent battery, which you and all the combined troops of Hell and Geneva cannot silence, if you were to ring your little dirty flinkpots at it till the Millennium. A Dissenter! Sir, and at this time of day, warm up old mother Church's cabbage, to be a savoury mess in a country where Pierce and Hallet flou-rished, and where immortal Towgood reigns with all his honours thick upon him."—Now tell us, Oh! thou Quintilian of the Presbyterians, what species of rhetoric is this?

Dr. Harwood tells us that he hath "once more drawn his old theological sword;" though it would have been much more for the credit of his head and heart, if he had suffered it to consume away in its own rust; it is truly an imbellis telum, and with regard to its effects frax ictu.

There is only one thing in his letter which afforded me satisfaction, and as it is the testimony of an enemy, it carries more weight with it. Dr. Harwood informs us, that Bishop Bull's works, which he some years since purchased for three billings, at a late auction were sold at the advanced price of fifteen.

This increase of the price of the Bishop's works he solely attributes to the influence and recommendation of Mr. Badcock. Now, I ask, if Dr. Harwood, or even his great Goliath Dr. Priestley, could gain sufficient credit from the world to advance the price of the huge pandect of Socinianism, the FRATRES POLONI? Eight folio volumes of rare erudition and scripture criticism, price only one guinea, and sometimes less, in very good condition!

The high estimation, in which the writings of Bishop Bull are now generally held is a subject of lamentable complaint with Dr. Harwood and Co. But he attempts to veil the mortification of himself and his party under the mask of ridicule; a mask so awkwardly contrived, and so badly made, that it rather shews what it was designed to conceal. "This great man," to wit, "Bishop Bull, is now in so much vogue, that I should not wonder, the first of January 1785, when the biblical manufactory opens, to see it republished in sixpenny numbers, with a new set of copper plates, adorned with your critical elucidations (viz. Mr. Badcock's), and stuck up in every bookseller's window, with this title in elephant capitals, BISHOP BULL'S WORKS THE BELIEVER'S BEST BIBLE, with the Annotations and Perpetual Commentary of the Rev. Mr. Badcock, the Monthly Reviewer. N. B. All Bibles that have not my arms, a three-legged stool with a glory round it, are counterfeit. Beware, there are many such abroad. Those Bibles, which are without my arms, will damn the reader."

Mr. Badcock, I find, is repeatedly accused of a species of apostacy which the zeal of Dr. Priestley, and the rage of Dr. Harwood, have magnified into an unpardonable sin. Dr. Priestley, in his late letters to Dr. Horsley, hath informed the public that "Mr. Badcock hath now no communion or connection with those who are usually called rational Dissenters!" Dr. Harwood brings forth this heinous charge, and prints it in capitals, rational Dissenters. Pray, Mr. Urban, do you know who these rational Dissenters are? Being a clergyman of the church of England, I must acknowledge, I am not thoroughly acquainted with all the niceties of distinction, by which this class of people is characterized. Dr. Harwood, I find, is a rational Dissenter; and if he be a specimen of his brethren, I am not at all surprised that Mr. Badcock should have dropt such company.

Doctor Harwood would fain persuade his readers, that he hath read every thing, and that he is "at home" every where; but he who hath read all the classical authors, both Greek and Latin; historians, poets, orators, philosophers, philologists, critics, and biographers, and some of the most bulky of them five, six, nay ten times times over, can scarcely be supposed to have found time for more modern reading; and, therefore, it is a matter of no surprize that he should be ignorant, that the merit of what he thinks the most ingenious allusion should have been attributed to one of his predecessors, while he himself flatters his own vanity with the fond presumption of an original idea. "Cerberus," says he, "a famous old Tray, Pluto's great mastiff, formed and fashioned by the fruitful fancy of the Heathens, in the Trinitarian style; TRICEPS CERBERUS, Virg. ORB TRI-LINGUI, Horat. I wonder, that among other resemblances, the TRINITY has never been illustrated by an animal of his peculiar figure, occurring so frequently among the classics." Now, it was one of the charges brought by Calvin against Servetus, that he had blasphemed the Trinity by this very comparison; the merit of which Dr. Harwood is so eager to take to himself. Some of the apologists of Servetus have laboured to defend him from this accusation; and have supposed that it was the slander of his enemies, who first made the blasphemy, and then charged it on him, in order to alarm the minds of the people, and give some colour to their sanguinary proceedings, Dr. Harwood, however, though he hath not the merit of inventing this piece of profaneness, yet, for aught I know, he may be the first person who hath taken a pride in adopting and owning it.

Mr. Urban, I am apprehensive that I have intruded too much on your patience, and on that of your readers; but an honest indignation hath impelled me to take up my pen, to chastise this old pedant for his illiberality and irreligion; and to discharge at the same time the duty which I owe to my profession, as a clergyman of the established church, whose doctrines, discipline, and constitution are so vilified, so indecently outraged, by a man who hath thrown off all the restraints of common decorum, and in his "eyeless rage" spares no character, and levels all distinctions, yet boasts of the benevolence of his heart, and hath the presumption to call himself a Christian. As I am not ashamed of the cause which Dr. Harwood attempts to expose, nor under the least fear of his vengeance, even though collected in a full stream, and replenished with additional supplies from the fountain-head, I hesitate not to give my name to the public; and subscribe myself, Mr. Urban, your very humble servant,

JOHN OLIVER, M. A.
Late of Exeter College, Oxford.

MR. URBAN,

I SEND you a bit of humble biography: an account of a man well known to many dealers in old books, and black letter, now living, who probably will not be displeased with this remembrance of an old acquaintance. This was Andrew Jackson, who for more than forty years kept a shop in Clare Court, Drury Lane. Here like another Magliabecchi, midst dust and cobwebs, he indulged his appetite for reading; legends and romances, history and poetry, were indiscriminately his favourite pursuits. Unlike a contemporary brother of the trade*, he did not make the curiosity of his customers a foundation of a collection for his own use, and refuse to part with an article, where he found an eagerness in a purchaser to obtain it. Where he met with a rarity, he would retain the same till he had satisfied his own desires in the perusal of it, and then part with it agreeable to his promise. Though placed in an humble rank in life, he was easy, chearful, and facetious. If he did not abound, his wants were few, and he secured enough to carry him to his journey's end. He was a retainer to the Muses, but rather traversed the plains than ascended any steps up the hill of Parnassus. In 1740 he published the first Book of Paradise Lost in rhyme: and ten years afterwards, with some what better success, "Matrimonial Scenes; consisting of the Seaman's Tale, the Manciple's Tale, The Character of the Wife of Bath, The Tale of the Wife of Bath, and her Five Husbands. All modernized from Chaucer. By A. Jackson.

The first refiner of our native lays Chanted these tales in Second Richard's days;
Time grudg'd his wit, and on his language fed!

We rescue but the living from the dead;
And what was sterling verse so long ago
Is here now coined to make it current now.

London, 1750; 8vo."

The contents of his catalogues of the years 1756, 1757, 1759, and one without date, as specified in their titles, were in rhyme. In 1751, in conjunction with Charles Marsh, he republished, as Shakespeare's, a "Briefe conceipte touching the Commonweale of this Realme of England; originally printed in 1581." He quitted his business about a year before his death, which happened on the twenty-fifth of July 1778, having completed his 83d year the fourteenth of May preceding. Yours, &c. N. E.

MR. URBAN,

WHILE our theological writers are loud in their apprehensions of danger from the scepticism of the present age, I hope it will not be thought wholly unseasonable in a Layman to suggest some few cautions against that disposition to allegorise, or explain away the clearest facts, which bids fair soon to reduce Scripture to a level with the Milesian Tales.

I might here enter on a large field; but will at present confine myself to the subject of human sacrifices, particularly that of Jephthah's daughter, whom, it seems, many fashionable Divines are pleased to represent as not bleeding at the altar, but merely consecrated to a state of perpetual virginity: thus assigning to the Vestals of ancient, and the Nuns of modern Rome, a length of pedigree which in the times of our forefathers they scarcely presumed to lay claim to.

Among the usages of the Jewish nation, there is none of which we meet with clearer proofs in Scripture, both from their legal and historical writings, than the frequency of human sacrifices; and that, not only among the deluded votaries, who worshiped at the bloody shrine of Moloch, but among such of their countrymen, as adhered to the established religion, and never deviated into the idolatry of those nations which surrounded them. The Levitical law on the subject is very express; "no devoted thing that a man shall devote unto the Lord, of all that he hath, both of man and beast, and of the field of his possession, shall be sold or redeemed; every devoted thing is most holy unto the Lord. None devoted which shall be devoted of men shall be redeemed; but shall surely be put to death." Levit. last chapter, ver. 28, 29. Nor is Jephthah's vow couched in terms which admit of the smallest ambiguity. "Then shall it be that whatsoever cometh forth of the doors of my house to meet me, when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up for a burnt offering," Judges c. 11. ver. 31. The sacred historian indeed mentions the accomplishment of this rash vow, as it is most justly called, in concise but emphatic terms, in assuring us that Jephthah "did with his daughter according to his vow which he had vowed:" he hath not, like the poets, described the priest raising the knife, the virgin meeting her doom with heroic resignation, and the distracted Sire standing as a spectator of the bloody rite, but judiciously draws a veil over the affecting scene, and immediately proceeds with mentioning the solemn lamentations of her virgin comrades. With the Hebrew language I pretend not to be conversant; but, after examining the Rome editions of both the Greek and Latin Septuagint, I find them both concur with the English version received in our churches. Our collections of various marginal interpretations inform us that the same Hebrew word signifies to talk with as well as to lament. In all languages there are many ambiguous words; but in order to ascertain their meaning in any given passage, there can be no surer clue than the taking in every circumstance of the transaction to which they relate, at the same time referring to the laws of the country and history of the times. To him who first broached this new dialogue of the dead, and represented the virgins of Israel as holding conversation with Jephthah's daughter, after the fulfilment of his vow, I feel myself as little inclined to give credence, as I should to a translator of Horace, whom I found contending that mundus victus in his fourth epistle there means the "conquest of the world," instead of "clean and wholesome food."

On advancing into the accounts of what passed soon after under kingly government, we find Agag, after Saul who took him prisoner, had spared his life, brought forth by the command of Samuel, and hewn in pieces before the Lord, which evidently means a solemn religious act: however low men are disposed to sink regal power in those ages for the purpose of exalting that of the priesthood, which here unfortunately stands in competition with it (the boasted alliance between Church and State not always holding inviolable), we must surely in this instance consider the Amalekite, as a devoted victim, and not merely as an enemy taken in battle, if we are disposed to give such an account the degree of consistency which is expected from every historian.

Under David, whose merits, though in some instances disputable, are universally

* In the margin of our Bibles is, which the best commentators consider as the true translation. EDITOR.

versally acknowledged to have been such as gained him the highest of all encomiums for his zealous opposition to every inroad of idolatry, we have an account of seven young men, the descendants of Saul, given up to the Gibonites for the express purpose of being put to death, in order to avert a famine. They were neither criminals nor captives, nor is it possible to consider them in any other light than that of such expiatory victims as are distinguished by the term ἀνολοκτατοι in Plutarch and other ancient writers.

From what I have here advanced, I by no means wish to cast any peculiar odium on the Jewish nation. Wherever a persuasion that the anger of the Supreme Being, can no way so efficaciously be appeased as by shedding blood has been adopted, we frequently read of men as well as beasts being dragged to the altar; not only the historians of Greece and Rome, but even their poets, whose employment it is to present objects in their fairest light, swarm with these horrors: and if we could for a moment suppose ourselves under no other obligations to the Christian religion, the circumstance of its having for ever done away the practice of slaughtering living creatures, of any species whatever, as a due atonement for our sins, would have evidently intitled it to the most grateful acknowledgements from every friend of justice and humanity. Yours, &c. L. L.

MR. URBAN,

I With some of your Correspondents learned in the antiquities of their country would give us, or point out where we may obtain, a particular account of the several HONORS in this kingdom. Those which I at present more particularly inquire after are that of Magnaville, comprehending the possessions of the family and earls of that name, in more counties than one; and that of Benonia, or Bologne, which took its rise from Enstace earl or consul of *Bologne, so whom the Conqueror granted lands in the counties of Cambridge, he having been one of his principal commanders in the conquest of England.

Sir William Blackstone † defines an honor to be a manor granted out by one of the greater barons to inferior persons, to be held of him as lord paramount under the crown; and this style is assumed particularly when the land so granted has belonged to an antient feudal baron, or been at any time in the hands of the crown. Mr. Madox ‡, more concisely, “the fee or seigniority of an earl or baron relieving of the crown.”

Sir H. Spelman § mentions the honors of Donnington, c. Leicester.

In a charter of the Conqueror cited by him Ramsay, c. Hunt. is styled an honor. There was the honor of Raleigh, c. Essex; of Eye, c. Suffolk; of Richmond, c. York; of Leicester and of Hinckley, c. Leicester; of Pevensey, c. Sussex, called the honor of the Eagle, from the family of Aquila, which held it; Holderness and Skipton in Craven in the county of York were also honors; the two last were subject to William de Fortibus lord of the honor of Albemarle in Normandy, as that of Richmond in England was joined with that of Bretaigne in France.

These were all denominated from places in England. Those whose fiefs were also in England, but denominated from Norman lords, were the honors of

England relieved of his foreign honor, had his castle, or the seat of his barony, abroad, as well as in England *, as in the case of the earl of Bologne, whose honor in England was called Honor Bolemie, or bononia, or comitis Bolemie, which arose from the intercommunication of English and Norman lords and English and Norman lands, which began at the Conquest, and ended with king John, who lost Normandy, and disseized the Normans of their lands in England, and the king of France returned the compliment to the English landholders in Normandy.

"The manor of Witham magna in Essex was some time part of the estate of Eustace earl of Bouillon [Bologne], who married Goda sister of Edward the Confessor, and was afterwards called the Honor of Bononia, being one of the four antient honors in this kingdom. The three others were Dover Castle, in Kent, Hawley, or Hageneth Castle, in Suffolk, and Peverell, in Nottinghamshire, of either of which whoever held lands by knight's service, held the same in capite. Afterwards it descended to Stephen king of England, who gave it to the Knights Templars, and it was confirmed to them by his son Eustace, earl of Bouillon [Bologne]." Morant, Essex, II. 106. 311. who writes it Bouillon, Buloin, and Bologne, but ofteneft and most correctly the latter way.

It is believed the last earl of Bologne who had property in England was Eustace, the fourth of the name, son of king Stephen, who died 1152 at the age of eighteen; and his widow Constance, daughter of Louis Le Gros king of France, re-married to Raymond count of Toulouse, whose brother William became earl of Bologne, 1154, but it is probable the honor of Burgundy in England merged in the crown of England, for parcels of it in Essex were held of the king, 1349 †.

It is a great defect in our county historians that they do not always, or sufficiently, settle preliminaries. Mr. Hutchins has done this to the best purpose. The rest perplex us with terms, without the least explanation.

The term Honor was controvertible, and frequently applied to lesser baronies.

* The service of Alresford manor in Essex was to be paid at the court of Bologne, Morant I. p. 452.

† Morant II. 349.

Amphill, Hampton-court, and Grafton were erected by Henry VIII. into honors more for parade than any real reason. They were the first land-honours that were created, or erected by statute, and probably will be the last.

MR. URBAN,

I THANK you for the account of the compilers of Universal History in vol. LIV. p. 891. Some account of Mr. Thomas Osborne, a splendid pushing man, would no doubt be acceptable for many reasons, and especially as he was so closely connected with that work. Who were the authors of Modern Universal History? Is it not necessary to give the world some information concerning them? [See p. 177.]

SOME MEMOIRS OF THE LATE REV.
JONATHAN TOUP.

MR. TOUP was descended from a family formerly settled in Dorsetshire. His grandfather, Onesiphorus Toup, had been a man of good property, and patron, as well as incumbent, of Bridport, in that county; but he appears to have been embarrassed in his circumstances before his death, as he parted with the advowson, and left a numerous family very slenderly provided for. His 2d son, Jonathan, was bred to the church, and was curate and lecturer of St. Ives in Cornwall. He married Prudence, daughter of John Busvargus, esq; of Busvargus in Cornwall, and by her had issue Jonathan, the subject of these memoirs, and one daughter.

Mr. Toup lost his father while he was a child; and his mother some time after marrying Mr. Keigwyn, vicar of Landrake in Cornwall, his uncle Busvargus (the last male of that family) took him under his care, and considered him as his own child. He bore the whole charge of his education both at school and at college, and procured for him the rectory of St. Martin's near Looe.

Mr. Toup was born at St. Ives in Cornwall in the year 1713. He received the first rudiments of his education in a grammar school in that town; and was afterwards placed under the care of Mr. Gurney*, master of a private school in the parish of St. Merryn. Thence he was removed to Exeter College in Oxford, where he took his degree of B. A. His master's degree he took at Cambridge in the year 1756. He obtained the rectory of St. Martin's in 1750; was installed prebendary of Exeter in 1774; and instituted to the vicarage of St. Merryn in 1776: the two last preferments he owed to the patronage of Bp. Keppel of Exeter. By the death of his uncle Busvargus without issue in 1751, Mrs. Keigwyn (sister to Mr. Busvargus, and mother to Mr. Toup) succeeded, as heir at law, to his estate and effects. A will was found, supposed to have been signed by old Mr. Busvargus two days before his death; but there were so many suspicious circumstances attending it, that the persons who would have been benefited by it never ventured to prove it. Mrs. Keigwyn died in 1773, and left a will, bequeathing the whole of her estates to her son Mr. Jonathan Toup.

In the year 1760 Mr. Toup published the first Part of his Emendationes in Suidam, and in 1764 the 2d Part of the same work. These books procured him the notice of Bp. Warburton, who from the time of their publication honoured him with his correspondence and patronage. The Bishop, in one of his letters, laments his having a see without any preferment on it; "had it been otherwise, he should have been too selfish to invite any of his brethren to share with him in the honour of properly distinguishing such merit as Mr. Toup's." All however that the Bishop could do, he did with the warmth and earnestness of sincere friendship. He repeatedly recommended Mr. Toup to Abp. Secker, to the Trustees for disposing of his Options, to Lord Shelburne, and to Bp. Keppel; and the favours this Prelate bestowed on Mr. Toup were owing to the solicitations of Bp. Warburton. The 3d Part of the Emendationes in Suidam was published in 1766. In the following year Abp. Secker expressed a desire that Mr. Toup would lend his assistance towards a new edition of Polybius, which was then in contemplation. Bp. Warburton strongly pressed his compliance with this wish, and that he would lay by for a while the Notes he was preparing for Mr. Warton's edition of Theocritus. Whether this edition of Polybius was ever completed, is not known to the writer of these slight memoirs. In the year 1767 Mr. Toup's Epistola Critica ad virum celeberrimum Gul. Episcop. Glouc. made its appearance. In the year 1772, Mr. Warton's edition of Theocritus was printed at the university press in Oxford. Mr. Toup was a large contributor towards the corrections and annotations of this edition. A note of his on Idyll. xiv 37. gave such offence to some persons, that the Vice-chancellor of Oxford prevailed on the editor to cancel the leaf on which it was printed, and substitute another in its room. In vindication of Mr. Toup, it is sufficient to say, that Mr. Warton had not stopped this note from going to the press, and that a respectable friend, in a letter on this subject, declares his persuasion of Mr. Toup's sincere veneration for religion, and adds, that "no malignant

* Mr. Samuel Gurney, one of the sons of this gentleman, now keeps the grammar school of Fregony.

" censures could abate his regard for his merit, or friendship for his person *." This matter is now before the public, who may form their own judgment upon it. The race of critics are well known to be no less irritable than that of poets. In 1772 Mr. Toup published his Appendiculum Notarum in Theocritum, in which the substance † of the cancelled note was inserted. He concludes his preface to this work with these words:

" Quod vero scripsimus ad XIV. 37. VERUM est et HONESTUM. Sed rem pro singulari suâ sagacitate minùs ceperunt nonnulli Oxonienses; qui et me sugillare haud erubuerunt; homunculi eruditione mediocri, ingenio nullo; qui in Hebraicis per omnem ferè vitam tarpiter volutati, in literis elegantioribus planè hospites sunt."

Mr. Toup's next work was the Appendiculum Notarum in Suietam, published in 1775. In 1778 his Longinus was published from the Oxford press in quarto. A second edition has since been printed in octavo.

As a writer of great learning and of singular critical sagacity, Mr. Toup needs no encomiast. The testimonies of Mr. T. Warton ‡, of Bp. Warburton, and of every person in any way distinguished for classical learning, at home; of Ernestus, Hemsterhusius, Runkhenius, Valckenæer, Brunck, Kluit, d'Anse de Villosion, l'Archer, &c. &c. in all parts of Europe, sufficiently establish his reputation as an author. To most or all of these he was assisting in the several works they published.

* The words here quoted were found in a copy of a letter, without any signature, but dated April 1770. This copy is immediately followed, on the same half sheet of paper, by the copy of another letter, in Mr. Toup's hand-writing, which was address'd by him to the Abp. of Canterbury, and was plainly occasioned by the foregoing letter. Dr. Cornwallis was at that time Abp; Dr. Secker having died the August preceding.

† Not improbably, all of that note which was omitted in the substituted leaf.

‡ Mr. Thomas Warton for above 30 years past has ranked amongst the foremost of the age as a man of genius and of learning. He is not known, even by person, to the writer of these pages; but those who do know him declare his private character to be as amiable as his talents are respectable. He was private tutor, for a length of time, to the eldest son of a prime minister of Great Britain, while in the meridian of his power; and he is now fellow of Trinity College in Oxford.

As his whole life was pass'd in literary retirement, his character as a man was known but to few. It will appear from his works that he was not wholly unfractured with that self-complacency, which is the almost inseparable companion of too much solitude §. But this trifling infirmity was amply compensated by many virtues. He was a kind neighbour, an indulgent master, an affectionate and tender relation. The writer of this paper will venture to enumerate among his virtues his distinguished humanity to the inferior animals. The children of his tenants were restrained from taking birds' nests on his extensive glebe of St. Martin's, or from confining birds in cages; the cow that had long supplied his family was preserved from being killed, and was supported in her old age; the dog, who was the guard of his court, or his companion in the parlour, was an object of his care and attention. His theological studies were well-directed: he sought for the truths of religion where only they can be found; in the Scriptures, not in the glosses and comments of men: it will be needless to add, that he was a liberal and a tolerant divine. He was punctual and serious in the discharge of the duties of his profession; and in his preaching singularly plain and forcible. He died on the 19th day of January, 1785, just entering into the 72d year of his age, and was buried under the communion-table in his church of St. Martin's.

Mr. Toup never was married. For the latter years of his life a half-sister of his, by the same mother, a widow gentlewoman, with her three daughters, lived in the house with him; and they inherit, by his will, what he has left.

It is remarkable, that though his name was Jonathan, in his later writings, he always calls himself in Latin Joannes Toup. In some of the books he had when young, he has written E Libris Jona. Toup.

Mr. Toup was a Christian from conviction; not merely from the accident of having been born in a country where Christianity was professed. He fulfilled the duties of life conscientiously, and from principle; without parade or ostentation. In his pursuit of learning he was actuated by the most honourable infectives;

motives; by the desire of improving his own mind, and of amusing himself and others. If in Bp. Warburton he found a patron, capable of distinguishing merit, and zealous to reward it, let it be remembered, to the honour of both parties, that the Bishop's patronage was offered; not solicited. In the year 1764 he was repeatedly pressed by another Prelate, well known in the literary world, to quit his retirement at St. Martin's, and to settle either in London or in Oxford, where he might have access to books, and might place himself in the way of notice and preferment. He was assured, at the same time, that the Bishop of his diocese would himself make a tender of his connivance at his non-residence, without any application from Mr. Toup on the subject. But every proposal of this nature he constantly rejected. What his sentiments on the subject of residence were will appear from the following letter, sent by him to the London Chronicle, at the time of the controversy occasioned by Bp. Sherlock's last Charge to his Clergy.

"SIR,

"THE Bishop of London's late Charge against Non-residence is such a masterly, sensible, and seasonable piece, that it deserves the attention of every clergyman; nay I could wish that every parish would get a copy of it to be kept in the vestry-room, for the service and inspection of future incumbents. For I am of the same opinion with the author of a late spirited Letter to the Bishop of E —, that the residence of the clergy is absolutely necessary to the well-being of Christianity. The apology which Dr. — has lately published in answer to the Bp. of London, is not properly an apology for the clergy, but an apology for a set of worthless insignificant ecclesiastics, who scarce deserve the name of clergymen; who, instead of residing upon their proper cures, where they are in duty and conscience bound to reside, and living decently and hospitably in their several parishes, are idling away their time in borough towns, and busying themselves there about matters which do not concern them. These are the men that Dr. — has set himself up for an apologist for. And a pretty apologist truly he is. For I will venture to say, a more shallow and frothy performance has not made its appearance this great while; in which the good man, for reasons best known to himself, has laid out a great deal of pains to wash a black-moor white. I will only mention one argument of his, from which a judgement may be formed of all the rest, viz. * that the learning and abilities of a rector should not be thrown away upon a country parish, which might be more usefully employed in a large and learned congregation." Where, by the by, the Dr. takes one thing for granted, which, I believe, will scarce be allowed him, that the Rector of a parish has always more sense than his Curate; a point which I leave to Dr. — and his Curate to settle between themselves. I am, Sir, your most humble servant.

A West-Country Clergyman."

Perhaps in a passage towards the conclusion of Mr. Toup's Epistola Critica, he might intend some reference to his own voluntary retirement at St. Martin's, where he lived in the pursuit of literary amusement, and in the unnoticed exercise of the duties of his profession. Having, on the authority of Eusebius, restored Hebr. xi. 37. to its proper order in the following manner:

Περὶ ἁλθὼν ἐν μηλῶταϊς, ἐν αἰγυρίῃς δέρμασιν ὑπερέμειοι, θλιβόμενοι, κακὸν χέμενοι· ἐν ἐρημίαις πλανώμενοι καὶ ὄρεσι καὶ σπηλαίοις καὶ ταῖς ὁπαῖς τῆς γῆς, ὩΝ ΟΥΚ ἮΝ Αἴτιος ὁ Κόσμος.

He adds, "Notandus Exitus Orationis, et Acumen perveniendum: They wandered about, and lived IN DENS AND CAVES OF THE EARTH, of whom THE WORLD was not worthy."

"MAGNANIMI HEROES.

"Sit anima mea vobiscum!"

Yours, &c.

* * * Mr. Thomas Amory, mentioned in your Magazine for January as the author of the Life of John Buncke, esq; (though I know not upon what authority) is still living. His father was a gentleman of large fortune in Ireland: his mother, the daughter (it is apprehended) of an Irish earl. His son, Dr. T. Amory, is a worthy and respectable physician at Wakefield in Yorkshire.

MR. URBAN,

AS every thing which has fallen from the pen of that great luminary of learning, Dr. Johnson, is sought with avidity, and will be perused with satisfaction, I here present you with a letter which he wrote to the author of the Archæological Dictionary. T. W.

To the Rev. Mr. Wilson, Clitheroe, Lancashire.

Bolt-court, Fleet-street, London, Dec. 31, 1762.

Reverend Sir,

THAT I have so long omitted to return you thanks for the honour conferred upon me by your Dedication, I entreat you with great earnestness not to consider as more faulty than it is. A very importunate and oppressive disorder has for some time debarred me from the pleasures, and obstructed me in the duties of life. The esteem and kindness of wife

wife and good men is one of the least pleasures which I can be content to lose; and gratitude to those from whom this pleasure is received, is a duty of which I hope never to be reproached with the final neglect.

I therefore now return you thanks for the notice which I have received from you, and which I consider as giving to my name not only more bulk, but more weight; not only as extending its superficiality, but as increasing its value.

Your book was evidently wanted, and will, I hope, find its way into the schools; to which, however, I do not mean to confine it; for no man has so much skill in ancient rites and practices as not to want it.

As I suppose myself to owe part of your kindness to my excellent friend Dr. Patten, he has likewise a just claim to my acknowledgements, which I hope you, Sir, will transmit.

There will soon appear a new Edition of my Poetical Biography. If you will accept of a copy to keep me in your mind, be pleased to let me know how it may be conveniently conveyed to you. The present is small, but it is given with good-will, by, Reverend Sir, your most obliged and most humble servant,
SAM. JOHNSON.

MR. URBAN,

YOU have invited the friends of your agreeable Miscellany to contribute the correspondence they may possess of the matchless Johnson. The following nervous address to his late Majesty, prefixed to Mr. Adams's "Treatise on the Globes," is ascribed to him on the authority of his late friend and neighbour Mr. Edmund Allen. It needs, however, no other testimonial than its internal merit. M. G.

"TO THE KING.

"SIR,

"IT is the privilege of real greatness not to be afraid of diminution by condescending to the notice of little things; and I therefore can boldly solicit the patronage of your Majesty to the humble labours by which I have endeavoured to improve the instruments of science, and make the globes on which the earth and sky are delineated less defective in their construction, and less deficient in their use.

"Geography is in a peculiar manner the science of Princes. When a private student revolves the terraqueous globe, he beholds a succession of countries in which he has no more interest than in the imaginary regions of Jupiter and Saturn. But your Majesty must contemplate the scientific picture with other sentiments, and consider, as oceans and continents are rolling before you, how large a part of mankind is now waiting on your determinations, and may receive benefits, or suffer evils, as your influence is extended or withdrawn.

"The provinces which your Majesty's arms have added to your dominions, make no inconsiderable part of the orb allotted to human beings. Your power is acknowledged by nations whose names we know not yet how to write, and whose boundaries we cannot yet describe. But your Majesty's lenity and beneficence gives us reason to expect the time when science shall be advanced by the diffusion of happiness; when the desarts of America shall become peevish and safe, when those who are now restrained by fear shall be attracted by reverence, and multitudes who now range the woods for prey, and live at the mercy of winds and seasons, shall by the paternal care of your Majesty enjoy the plenty of cultivated lands, the pleasures of society, the security of law, and the light of Revelation.

"I am, Sir, your Majesty's most humble, most obedient, and most dutiful subject and servant, GEORGE ADAMS"

Insertion for the Sketch of Dr. Johnson, vol. LIV. p. 901.

THIS writer has sufficient proof that Doddsley suggested the first idea of this great collection. Johnson wanted a long and large literary employment. The proposal rather took him by surprise. Tanta molis erat The pecuniary bargain was necessary to him, and the engagement for time and payment at last concluded. But the work went on slowly. The money was all gone (for time and money are the most valuable things in the world) before the task was completed. Illness, weariness, or dissipation, clogged the wheels of this machine. A refreshing fee was perpetually necessary; or, to use classical instead of legal allusion, golden showers were to be thrown into the lap of this literary Danai, to the amount of three hundred additional pounds. It required the purses of five eminent booksellers to be opened, to pay for the labours of this Hercules. When Johnson came to settle (said Andrew Millar) with his employers, they produced his receipts for money, several of them for very small sums, they had advanced him. He was confounded on finding the balance against himself, for he kept no account, and that he had been working for some time for nothing. The creditor instantly became the debtor. The booksellers generously made him a present of the difference, and paid his reckoning for him. T. T.

In p. 26, of last Mag. I penult. for Patt read Adam:—this gives much greater force to the allusion—"Yes; by many a Adam," &c.

MR. URRAN,

IN turning over MSS. in pursuit of some subject, it frequently happens, that curious anecdotes present themselves which are very foreign to our enquiries; by these means, the following additions respecting the founder of Winchester and New Colleges fell in my way, after they had escaped the vigilant researches of the Right Reverend, truly learned, and accurate historian of his life; which being thought worthy of the employment of so able a writer, I suppose it must be agreeable both to his lordship, and the fellows of the Colleges founded by W. of Wickham, to have any circumstances brought forward to public view, tending to elucidate a subject, which revolving ages had rendered obscure.

The Bp. observes, (p. 27. edit. 3.) "That there were several other preferments, both ecclesiastical and civil, which he is said to have held; but I do not mention them, because the authorities produced for them are such as I cannot entirely depend upon." Perhaps some of the present notes may add authority to that which was before doubtful. I shall not give the preferments of that great pluralist, which are recorded by the Bp. except I find a difference either of date, or of some material circumstance. The resources from which I chiefly extracted the notes are collections made by Dr. Hutton* from patent rolls in the Tower and from registers of various Bps.

The doubt of the family name appears still to remain. I find that in the 13th of Edw. I. (about four years before the birth of William of Wyckham) John Wickham granted to the prioress of Wickham, "1 mess. 18 toft. 9 bovats. 30 acr. terr. 15 acr. prati non. 20s. redditus pro cantaria 2 capellanorum in cap. beate Mariæ & S'ctæ Elizabethæ;" and that 13th of Edw. II. he granted to the same prioress, "2 toft. 3 bovatas, & 4 acr. terr. in Roston, Aron, & Irton." Harl. MS. 744, fol. 1167, 1170.

The first church preferment mentioned by the Bp. is the rectory of Pulham. Nov. 30, 1357, 31 Edw. III. I find "Will de Wyckham, Capellan, habet lit. Regis de presentatione ad Ecclesiam de Irstede, Norw. Dioc. ratione temporalium Abbatiz de Hulm in manibus Regis Jul. 21 E. III. [1350] Harl. MS. 6959, f. 276.

The information given to the Bp. respecting W. de Wyckham having 200l. a year, settled on him until he got possession of Pulham, or some other benefice of the value of 100 marks, appears to have been a mistake, as the notes of Dr. Hutton say only 20l. a year, which appears more likely, as the value of the benefice, he was in expectation of, was confined to 100 marks. Harl. MS. 6960, f. 76.

W. of W. was appointed "Superior Operationum in Castro Windsor." 26 Ap. 33 E. III. H. M. 6960, f. 76.

H. MS. 6945, f. 6, 7, and 6960, f. 128.

W. de W. was made prebendary of Trathelan in the church of Aberwilli 13 Jul. 35 E. III. and prebendary of Rayl in the same church, 24th Dec. in the same year, H. MS. 6960, f. 98, 119.

The next extract I shall give as it appears in Dr. Hutton's MS. It shows that what would have been simony in a poor clergyman had been practised by a Bp. towards a King, and is also a different reason for W. of W's advancement to the see of Winchester, from any that has yet been made public.

In the 43 of Edw. III. the King gave to W. de W. the lands and tenements at Michelham in Surry, of John, son of Roger de Apaldale the younger, who committed felony and was outlawed. H. MS. 6960, fol. 176.

These, Mr. Urban, are the discoveries which I have made concerning William and others of the name of Wickham.

I have collected some notes of Chaucer, Robert of Gloucester, Drayton, &c.
but shall defer sending them until I have had an opportunity of examining the historians of their lives, whether they are already known. I am, Sir,
Yours, &c. S. AYSCOUGH.

MR. URBAN, Montrose, March 4.

THE following letter, which lately came into my hands, deserves a place in your miscellany, which is the repository of every thing curious. I do not think it has been printed before, and I have reason to deem it authentic.
Perhaps it has come abroad without the knowledge of the possessor; but I was laid under no restrictions by the gentleman from whom I received it. I am,
Sir, yours, &c. T. C.

DAVID HUME TO DR. CAMPBELL.

"DEAR SIR, Edinb. 7 Jan. 1762.

IT has so seldom happened that controversies in philosophy, much more in theology, have been carried on, without producing a personal quarrel between the parties, that I must regard my present situation as somewhat extraordinary, who have reason to give you thanks, for the civil and obliging manner in which you have conducted the dispute against me, on so interesting a subject as that of miracles. Any little symptoms of vehemence, of which I formerly used the freedom to complain, when you favoured me with a sight of the manuscript, are either removed or explained away, or atoned for by civilities which are far beyond what I have any title to pretend to. It will be natural for you to imagine that I will fall upon some shift to evade the force of your arguments, and to retain my former opinion in the point controverted between us; but it is impossible for me not to see the ingenuity of your performance, and the great learning which you have displayed against me.

"I consider myself as very much honored in being thought worthy of an answer by a person of so much merit;
and as I find that the public does you justice with regard to the ingenuity and good composition of your piece,
I hope you will have no reason to repent engaging with an antagonist, whom perhaps in strictness you might have ventured to neglect. I own to you that I never felt so violent an inclination to defend myself as at present, when I am thus fairly challenged by you, and I think I could find something specious at least to urge in my defence; but as I had fixed a resolution, in the beginning of my life, always to leave the public to judge between my adversaries and me, without making any reply, I must adhere inviolably to this resolution, otherways my silence on any future occasion would be construed an inability to answer, and would be matter of triumph against me.

"It may perhaps amuse you to learn the first hint which suggested to me that argument which you have so frequently attacked. I was walking in the cloysters of the Jesuits College of La Flecke, a town in which I passed two years of my youth, and engaged in a conversation with a Jesuit of some parts and learning, who was relating to me, and urging, some nonsensical miracle performed in their convent, when I was tempted to dispute against him;
and as my head was full of the topics of my treatise of human nature, which I was at this time composing, this argument

gument immediately occurred to the mind I thought it very much gratified my compassion; but at last he observed to me, that it was impossible for that argument to have any solidity, because it operated equally against the Gospel as the Catholic miracles, which observation I thought proper to admit as a sufficient answer. I believe you will allow that the freedom at least of this reasoning makes it somewhat extraordinary to have been the produce of a convent of Jesuits, though perhaps you may think the sophistry of it favors plainly of the place of its birth. D. H.

MR. URBAN,

THE Rev. John Spicer was born in Reading, in September 1711. His father was a man of property, and an alderman of that town. He was educated in Reading school under Mr. Hiley, a name still remembered and revered in that neighbourhood, as the Busby of that seminary. He was thence removed to St. John's College, Oxford, where he was ordained Deacon by Bp. Potter, Dec. 21, 1734. The next year, Mr. Hiley, who had been a witness to his abilities, and had directed them with so much advantage, received him as an usher, and gave him an opportunity of securing those talents which seem to have been given him for the instruction of youth. In 1737, he took the degree of M. A. and was ordained priest by of it's situation made it a valuable object to a man of learning and industry. And Mr. Spicer was possessed of these qualities in an eminent degree. Several, in church and state, are the living instances of the success of his labors. The first chancellor's prize, which was given at Oxford for poetical compositions, was obtained by one of his scholars. He resigned, in 1762, the school, of which he had been so long the pride, as scholar, usher, and master. In 1779 he was installed into the prebend of Preston in the church of Salisbury.

To the hour of his death, his life was marked by zealous endeavours to promote the temporal and eternal welfare of his flocks, and the prosperity of his country. The innovations, which the corruption of the times attempted to introduce in the religious tenets of this country, met with his steady abhorrence and opposition; and the last paper, which he wrote (see a letter signed C—n in Gen. Mag. vol. LIV, p. 285) was fully expressive of his sentiments. Formed on classical models, his style was chaste and animated. His sermons were no less distinguished for their intrinsic purity, and that glow which the French call enthousiasme, than for the commanding eloquence with which they were delivered. Had he run in the race of a Pegasus, he scarcely would have failed to obtain an equal prize. In a civil capacity, his services were great to his friends and to his country. Often has he undertaken the cause of the poor oppressed, and obtained their redress, at the expense of no inconsiderable share of his time and fortune. It would perhaps be difficult to find an instance, in which distress in any shape was known to him, and left unrelieved. Plans of public improvement, which he formed, have often proved, on the experiment, his knowledge and penetration.

Few of his writings were printed, except occasional poems, in Latin and English, spoken by his scholars at the triennial visitation of the school; and different public subscriptions, and boasting a cardinal among it's masters, it is perhaps inferior in endowment to every other foundation. But the excellence

* "In this situation," says another correspondent, "he acquired great credit, and very considerable emolument. His two rectories, the adjoining parishes of Polham and Tidmarsh, are situated about 5 miles from Reading; and he did the duty (as it is commonly expressed) by riding over from Reading on a Sunday morning. He gave up his school several years before his death, but continued to reside at Reading, and was very active in turnpike and navigation business, in which his opinion was much regarded. He died worth £. 10,000 or more, the interest of which he gave to his wife (by whom he had no children) for her life, and, after her death, to a numerous set of distant relations of his own." S. H.

those

those were only distributed among his friends. To this Magazine, indeed, he was a frequent contributor. One only article will be here pointed out, to introduce a wish that he had been as prophetic in his poetry, as he was sincere in his wishes. (On the expedition to America, Vol. XLVI. p. 178.)

To record any circumstance, which may tend to the edification of mankind, cannot be an unpleasant task. In this view, the following, which may be considered as his dying words, ought not to be unnoticed. It was left to the writer of this sketch to inform his friend, a few days before his death, of his real situation with respect to this world. With perfect composure he addressed him in these words: "The will of God be done! I have spent a life of more than seventy years, without one serious illness. I am fully satisfied, and thankful to the Almighty for his various blessings. A course, which to you appears so long, to me now seems like a span. I consider this world as nothing: to the mercy of God, and to the great realities of another world, I now commit myself." In this frame of mind he died on the morning of the 27th of Nov. He married in 1752 Margaret, daughter of Mr. Chapman, rector of Stradfieldsay, a sister to the late learned Archdeacon of Sudbury; but he left no issue.

This sketch cannot be better closed, than with the following extract of a letter from a gentleman of distinguished worth and learning:

"I cannot but most sincerely condole with you on the loss of an ardent friend. I own myself most sensibly affected by it, when I call to mind the many years I was under his tuition, the many instructions I received from him during that period, and the uninterrupted harmony that has subsisted between us. In his public character as a schoolmaster, he exhibited true genius and sound abilities; and, when retired from that honorable station, he constantly proved himself an active member of society, ever ready to assist the distressed, and relieve the indigent. His conduct through life was open and undisguised; and whoever has any thing to say against it, let him endeavour to act better upon the whole—ut sit mihi magis Apollon."

MR. URBAN,
YOUR correspondent who sent you the paving tiles, in your last Magazine, p. 89. may find many varieties of the same kind compounded together in Mr. Carter's sixth number of Antient Sculptures.

The inscription, or poem, on the ring found in Fledden field, is old French, to be read thus:

OU. EST. NUL. SI. LOIAUL. AMANS.
QUI. SE. FORT. GARDEN. DES. MAUX-DIXANS.

q. d. Where are the constant lovers who can keep themselves from evil-speakers?

It was, probably, a wedding ring.

I suspect the inscription round the seal (fig. 8.), is incorrectly given: it certainly does not read as your correspondent thinks; but,

STRECVRH TDH DEPECEM6T.

The first letter stands for Sigillum but I despair of the rest. The figures are, a king with a sword in his right hand, and a globe or mound in his left (where did your correspondent find the crown of thorns?) and a monk holding in his hands, perhaps a stone and a piece of timber, for the building of some religious house: or a book and roll.

The stone at Barnston, p. 92. may have contained only some lines from the ancient poet, Vix ea nostra fore.

Q. If the letters on the British coin are not to be read the other way upwards, ASIE for TASCIE? They resemble no British coin hitherto published.

Q. If the seal found at Evesham does not belong to some foreign house? The inscription, as you give it, is not easily separated.

The subject is a priest praying to the Virgin and Child, and an angel hovering in the air with a censer; incense representing the prayer of the saints.

the sentence of a traitor, and compelling it with the sense given by Du Cange to devallare, and the French word devaler, I cannot help thinking it means that the body was to be let down, instead of being left hanging; and the rest of the sentence was afterwards regularly executed upon him.

MR. URBAN,

YOUR engraver has done justice to the grotesque figures, Fig. 13, in your Magazine of February last; but your correspondent is much mistaken when he calls the medallion a cast in plaster, for the substance is a piece of ivory much tarnished by time, and probably much older than the method of taking casts in plaster; it was found in the ditch of that castle in Wales, to which, if I mistake not, the gallant Essex used to retreat from the perverseness and insolence of his wayward old mistress. Yours, &c. M.

MR. URBAN, Hitchley, March 1.

THE engraving of the Air Balloon, in your last, pleases me better than any I have yet seen. The English and French flags, displayed at the head and stern of the boat, shew the current of air in a right direction to waft the traveller from Dover Castle to the Continent. It is somewhat remarkable, that they should take so high a flight from the English coast, and then descend towards the sea; and then, upon their approach to the French coast, that they should rise to a greater height than ever. It may not perhaps be thought impr-bable, that at certain times, the atmosphere over the sea may be of much less specific gravity than over the land; this aerial tour, at least I think, is a sufficient hint on the subject.

We have had here a great fall of snow, and for some days past it has frozen intensely. Last night at ten o'clock my mercarial thermometer, hanging in the open air, divided to Reaumur's scale, was eight degrees and a half below zero, that is, nineteen degrees of Fahrenheit's below the freezing point. Yours, &c. J. ROBINSON.

MR. URBAN,

Bridgnorth.

FOR the cure of the epidemic ague described in your last, p. 83, the Peruvian bark was the sovereign remedy; and no medicine was ever given with greater success. It failed in no instance*. In ordinary cases it was the only remedy employed; and in the most obstinate, with an emetic, and a full diet in the intermissions of the fever, it was always successful. In no case where this medicine was used, were paroxysms protracted longer than three times; and many had no paroxysm after taking a few doses only, a vomit having been premised at the accession of the cold stage, which in most instances of the disease was recommended. The medicine was administered commonly in the form of powder, and the red bark was sometimes employed; but it did not appear, from attentive observation, that the latter† had any preference to the common bark. Very large doses were also at times employed, as four scruples or two drams, and in no instance were less than half a dram or two scruples administered to an adult; and these doses repeated every two or three hours, according to the different type of the disease: the smaller doses‡, however, in every case wherein they were employed, appeared

* It is to be observed, that I speak only of my own practice. The bark did fail curing in some cases, but which evidently were owing either to the mismanagement of the practitioner, or of the patient. I had occasion to see some cases of this kind, wherein amazing quantities of the bark had been used, and that with the effect of aggravating the complaint, of turning tertians into quotidians, which it will never fail to do, if improperly administered! But even in these cases, a few doses of the same medicine judiciously administered, with a proper regimen, soon put an end to the disease.

† These experiments, however, only prove the mildness of the disease, and shew what small powers were sufficient for its removal. On other occasions, I have satisfied myself with much pleasure in observing the superior tonic powers of the red bark.

‡ It may here be observed that there are agues now and then occurring (though they did not appear in this constitution) which cannot be cured by the ordinary doses of the bark.

proved to be full as effectual as the larger quantity; which latter was always a disagreeable medicine to the patient. To suit the palate and convenience of some people, the medicine was occasionally exhibited in the form of decoction, combined with a small portion of the tincture; and this preparation, which was given to many patients, appeared to be a powerful medicine, as it failed in no instance. Here too the red bark was sometimes used, but I could not distinguish its preference in point of effect. In one case, that of my own servant, by way of experiment I administered the extract in the form of pills; it cured the disease, but required a longer time, and the patient had a relapse which afterwards yielded to the decoction with tincture. The tincture, however, by itself, or combined with aromatics and bitters, was found ineffectual in many instances, where the cure was attempted by such method; though this medicine, or such a combination, had evident good effects administered after the removal of paroxysms, in creating appetite and confirming the strength of the patient. But it is to be noted, that in some few cases, however treated, relapses occurred, especially in very weakened people; though they were so seldom that not more than one in 30 had the disease twice; and in most of these instances it was evidently owing to the remedies having been discontinued too soon. Hardly any instance occurred of the disease being succeeded by any other complaint. It was, however, on different occasions combined with diseases of a different kind. Such combinations, however, were not general, as they appeared but in few instances. Some cases, which had continued a long time without proper (or perhaps without any) remedies having been administered, were combined with oedema of the lower extremities, and appearances indicating dropsy; indeed, a more general anasarca occurred in two or three cases; and I had one instance of an incipient ascites. But these symptoms were removed by the same tonic remedies which proved effectual for the ague. In some few instances, the disease was conjoined with a pleurisy, which required the free use of the lancet, so much so, that, bleedings having been cautiously employed in the first days of the disease, it was found necessary even in the advanced stage of the complaint (though blistering had been freely used) to have recourse again to venesection, by which the cough and pain were most effectually removed. The ague was afterwards cured by the common method. But the most general complaint with which the disease was conjoined, was a common cold or catarrh; but this required no particular treatment; as the strength recruited, the catarrh went off, commonly by a very kind expectoration.

W. COLEY.

And perhaps it may be an improvement in practice to know that, in these cases, very large doses have been found of singular efficacy. Dr. Mosley, of Ludlow, told me some time ago that he had cured by this method a most obstinate ague, that had resisted the bark in small doses, to the quantity of several pounds: he gave the patient three or four drams at a dose, and repeated it every hour, or as often as the stomach would bear it, beginning a few hours before the expected accession. And a few doses thus administered made a complete cure. I too can vouch for the superior efficacy of this practice in similar cases, from my own experience.

It might here be added, that some symptoms of Dysentery appeared in the months of May, June, July and August, both in those who had been affected with ague, and in those who had not. This disease was brought into this neighbourhood by a pauper, who with the disease from Birmingham (in which place it had long raged) came at Woodfield, a small village near Ash-burnham. Soon afterwards, two living over the workhouse were seized with the disease, even before it affected the hospital; but at length one person in the workhouse was seized with it, and then I recommended both the patients to be removed, and placed in ships which means the disease was prevented from spreading farther amongst the neighbourhood. Notwithstanding every precaution, many people living within the distance of miles were affected with the disease, which was most evidently and violently contagious. The gripes with which it was attended were peculiarly painful and troublesome, proved fatal to some patients, and in every case was either very easily, or very difficultly, cured. A smart purgative given at the beginning of the symptoms was a powerful remedy in some cases; and in others, that were brought to the very verge of death, a large blistering plaster applied to the abdomen had the most happy effects. Vomiting did not appear to be commonly serviceable, and never but in those instances where the medicine operated by stool.

Mr. Ussan,

I send you herewith, copied from an ancient MS. in my possession, an account of the death of K. John, which Rapis reports (and his translator after him), boasts no contemporary writer mentions the same, and on the improbability to be on the (whose is of the good result, which will mention a monk.

It should seem from the dissertation on this reign, that Rapis had wrote Wyndesore, and it would be kind of any correspondent at the former city to settle this matter, as there is this remarkable agreement betwixt Rapis's account and the monkish Author.

Mr. Ussan, Felling-Place, Berks.

I If you will take the trouble to revise your Magazine for the year 1766, p. 135, you will find the second line in four of an epitaph, on an infant, that the words adopted by T. W. amongst others, To the Memory of Edward W., are, Esq. are unjustly attributed to Mrs. Carter. "The vain parade of monumental fame." I would not by any means detract from the praise due to that lady; but, I am compelled to say, if that line is to be found in any of her productions, she has borrowed it from your work, as I had the pleasure of transmitting the short epitaph to you, and it may be seen on a grave-stone in the Cloisters of the Cathedral church at Canterbury. F. A. PIGOTT.

See p. 53. Our correspondent is mistaken; the epitaph he mentions, though not in Mrs. Carter's poems, being undoubtedly by that lady. It is on master Hall, who was the son of a particular friend, 1740. East 1760.

" In Plate VIII. are seen two remarkable fig-trees, nailed against the wall. These are of the white Marcelline, and still bear delicious fruit. Tradition says, they were planted by Cardinal Pole. They cover a surface of fifty feet in height, and forty in breadth. The circumference of the southernmost is 28 inches, of the other 22. On the south side of the building is another tree of the same age, but not seen in this view. Its circumference at bottom is 28 inches.

" The tradition relative to these trees is rendered extremely probable from many circumstances. Fig-trees were, it is generally allowed,

allowed, brought into England in the reign of Henry VIII.; and it seems not unlikely that Cardinal Pole, who had long resided in Italy, would be fond of cultivating those fruits to which he had been there accustomed. And to the objection arising from their great age it may be answered, that we do not well know how long a fig-tree will flourish, if properly cultivated. And, besides, there is a concurrent tradition of an older tree, and the following instances of two very ancient ones, the times of whose plantation are well ascertained.

"The first of these stands at Mitcham, in Surrey, in the garden of the manor house, formerly the private estate of Archbishop Cranmer, and now belonging to one of his descendants. It is likewise of the white sort, and is confidently asserted to have been planted by Archbp. Cranmer. Its branches are very low; but its stem, which measures 30 inches in girth, has every possible mark of great age.

"In the Dean's garden at Winchester there was also, in the year 1757, a very ancient fig-tree, whose fruit was of the small red sort. It was inclosed in a wooden frame, with a glass door and two windows on each side of it, for the admission of sun and air. The frame protected it from wind and rain.

"On the stone wall to which the tree was nailed there is a maitering, and several inscriptions in the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages; one of them, in the latter, mentioning, that in the year 1623 King James the First, as is there said, 'tasted of the fruit of this fig-tree with great pleasure.' The other inscriptions were passages in the Old and New Testaments, all alluding to fig-trees. This tree has been suffered to parish, for want of necessary repairs to the frame-work.

"At Oxford, in the garden of the Regius Professor of Hebrew, is a fig-tree brought from the East, and planted by Dr. Pocock in the year 1648, which is at this day in a thriving condition. It bears a black fig.

"As the digression respecting these trees is a piece of horticultural history, it is hoped the reader will pardon its being here inserted."

To this work the abstract (or report) of the Yurt mentioned above is a valuable addition, as it contains many curious facts, cases, and arguments, that we do not remember to have seen so amply discussed. Mr. Serjeant Hill and Mr. Dunning were counsel for the archbishop; and Mr. Bearcroft and Mr. Serjeant Kemp, for the parish. And it should be recorded, that, "in consequence of this verdict, the parish was "condemned in costs amounting to 150l. "which money was raised by an assessment on all the inhabitants, and paid "to Archbishop Cornwallis, who, a few "months after, very generously presented the whole sum to the parish, and "paid his solicitor's bill out of his own "pocket." On reading the above, we cannot help observing, that one of the principal arguments to prove the palace to be "in the parish" (weak as it is) was founded on an entry made by Alp. Secker ["a very exact and careful "man," (as Mr. Bearcroft styles him), "a man not likely to blunder and mistake, still less against himself, more "likely to mistake in any other cause "than where his own interest was concerned," &c.] in which those words were added. And though the late Archbishop did not use that phrase, he styled himself, when celebrating a marriage in his own chapel, "Frederick "Cant. Curate." And we cannot help wondering, that, on a former entry, in 1743, being mentioned as made by "Thomas Tanner, the Archbishop's "chaplain," Mr. Dunning should say, "who he was we don't at all know," as almost any clerical friend could have informed him, that he was Archbishop Potter's son-in-law, and is now the very respectable rector of Hadleigh, &c.

Portraits of the Author, Archbishop Chicheley, Bishops Gibson and Smallbroke, and Plans and Views of the Palace and Gardens, are inserted, one of the latter by Miss Hartley.

A few unnoticed errata we will beg leave to subjoin, for correction.

THIS Collection, which consists of XVI Sonnets, V Odes, some Translations of Horace, &c. besides the "Six "Bards," gives us a very favourable idea of the poetical abilities of this young bard, and shews that he has drunk deep of the Pierian spring of the best authors, Milton in particular. "SONNET XII.

To Miss M——, of N——.

Aug. 4, 1784.

"Sweet is the gleam of morn; and sweet on high
The wandering moon; with sweets all nature blest:
But most the virgin's beauty strikes the breast;
The tender voice, white neck, and full black eye
Drowsily sweet, like Sol through clouds; the dye,
That paints the cheek, by dark brown locks caress'd;
The slender form, that grace and ease invest,
Yet shrinking from the sight with modesty;
The manners form'd to shine in courts; yet meek,
And pleas'd with all, and wishing all to please,
Erupture; but when join'd in one they speak,
The Bard with joys unutterable seize:
Yet such he fear'd but in his dreams to seek,
Till Mary blest'd his gaze with living charms like these."

"VERSES inscribed in a Book, a Legacy to a very young Lady from an old Man, who had been a Servant in her Family, and died, aged 96, March 1781.

"When a few moons (Heaven grant the lot!)
have shed
Their rip'ning lustre o'er thine infant head,
And Shakespeare's page, my Lucy, shall unroll
To thy rapt sight the mirror of the soul;
There, 'mid his scenes with thousand colours fraught,
Old Adam shall exclaim thy wond'ring thought.
Such was the man who bade thy mother bear
This small memorial to thy future care:
From youth to age her grateful house he serv'd,
Nor from strict Virtue's path a moment swerv'd.
When life's dark winter, as it 'gan to lour,
Dimm'd his sight, and bound up every power
For active good, yet many a lengthen'd day
With meek content he smil'd beneath its sway;
And still with kindest thoughts his time beguild,
And blest the race, for whom he once had toil'd;
Till ninety years being past, in measure even,
He sail'd, with conscious triumph, up to Heaven."

If such are the "buds" of twenty-two, what may we not expect from the

"ripened fruits" of thirty, unless they should be blasted by the ungenial damps of the law, as the Aluses and Themis seldom long agree, and even a Yorke, a Blackstone, and a Browne, found it impossible to reconcile them!

WE shall now give (as was proposed) some extracts from the Doctor's entertaining Life of Handel.

"His government of fingers was father-what despotic; for, upon Corelli's instantly refusing to sing his admirable air, Passez Angine, in Osbo, he told her, that he always knew she was a very Droll; but that he should now let her know, in his turn, that he was Baruchah, the Prince of the Druth. And then, taking her up by the waist, snore, if she did not immediately obey his orders, he would throw her out of the window." . . .

"When Handel went through Chester, in his way to Ireland, 1741, I was at the public school in that city, and very well remember seeing him smoke a pipe over a dish of coffee at the Exchange Coffee-house; for, being extremely curious to see so extraordinary a man, I watched him narrowly as long as he remained in Chester; which, on account of the wind being unfavourable for his embarking at Park-Ole, was several days. During this time, he applied to Mrs. Baker, the organist, my first music-master, to know whether there were any chorists in the cathedral, who could sing at figé, as he wished to prove some books that had been hastily transcribed, by trying the chorists, which he intended to perform in Ireland. Mr. Baker mentioned some of the most likely singers then in Chester, and, among the rest, a printer of the name of Janson, who had a good bass voice, and was one of the best musicians in the choir. At this time Harry Alcock, a good player, was the first violin at Chester, which was then a very musical place; for, besides public performances, Mr. Puckendary Prescott had a weekly concert, at which he was able to muster eighteen or twenty performers, gentlemen and professors. A time was fixed for this private rehearsal at the Golden Falcon, where Handel was quartered; but, alas! on trial of the chorus in the Messiah, and with his stripes we are beset, poor Janson, after repeated attempts, failed so egregiously, that Handel let loose his great bear upon him; and, after swearing in four or five languages, cried out in broken English, 'You schoun-trel! did not you tell me dat you could sing at foite?'—"Yes, Sir," says the printer, "and so I can; but not at figé." . . .

"The last lesson of Handel's personal attendance, and of his life, was remarkably successful. One of my friends, who was generally at the performance of each Oratorio that year, and who used to visit him, after it was over, in the treasurer of the theatre's office, says, that the money he used to take to his carriage of a night, though in gold and silver, was as likely to weigh him down, and throw him into a fever, as the copper-money of the painter Correggio, if he had had as far to carry it."...

"Sometimes I have heard him, as pleasantly as philosophically, console his friends, when, previous to the curtain being drawn up, they have lamented that the house was so empty, by saying, "Nevra moind; de moosic vill sound de petter."....

"A nobleman, still living, going one night to the Oratorio at Covent Garden, met Lord Chesterfield coming out of the theatre.— "What! my lord, are you dismissed? Is there no Oratorio to-night?"—"Yes," says his Lordship, "they are now performing; but I thought it best to retire, lest I should disturb the King in his privacies!"...

"Handel expired on Good Friday, April 23, (not the 14th, as was at first asserted,) 1759. He had most seriously and devoutly wished (as Dr. Warren, who attended him, remembers,) for several days before his death, that he might breathe his last on Good Friday, 'in hopes,' he said, 'of meeting his good God, his sweet Lord and Saviour, on the day of his resurrection,' meaning the third day, or the Easter Sunday following."....

"Besides seeing Handel myself at his own house in Brook Street, and at Carlston House, where he had rehearsals of his Oratorios, by meeting him at Mrs. Cibber's, and at Fraſi's, who was then my scholar, I acquired considerable knowledge of his private character and turn for humour. He was very fond of Mrs. Cibber, whose voice and manners had softened his severity for her want of musical knowledge. At her house, on a Sunday evening, he used to meet Quin, who, in spite of native roughness, was very fond of music. Yet the first time Mrs. Cibber prevailed on Handel to sit down to the harpsichord, while he was present, on which occasion I remember the great musician played the overture in Siroe, and delighted us all with the marvellous neatness with which he played the jig at the end of it, Quin, after Handel was gone, being asked by Mrs. Cibber, whether he did not think Mr. Handel had a charming hand? replied, "a-hand, Madam, you mistake, it's a foot." "Poh! poh!" says she, "has he not a fine finger?" "Toss, by G—, Madam." Indeed his hand was then so fat, that the knuckles, which usually appear convex, were like those of a child, dented or dimpled in, GENT. MAG. March, 1786.

"Handel wore an enormous white wig, and when things went well at the Oratorio, it had a certain nod, or vibration, which manifested his pleasure and satisfaction. Without it, nice observers were certain that he was out of humour."....

"If the maids of honour, or any other female attendants, talked during the performance at Carlton House, I fear that our modern Timotheas not only swore, but called names; yet, at such times, the Princess of Wales, with her accustomed mildness and benignity, used to say, "Hush! hush! Handel's in a passion."....

"His general look was somewhat heavy and sour; but when he did smile, it was his fire, the sun, breaking out of a black cloud. There was a sudden flash of intelligence, wit, and good humour, beaming in his countenance, which I hardly ever saw in any other."....

"He died worth upwards of 20,000*l.* which, except 1000*l.* to the fund for decayed musicians and their families, he chiefly bequeathed to his relations on the continent."

One or two passages from Count Benincasa's letter (mentioned before) are too flattering to our nation to be omitted.

"To honour, in this manner, the memory of an author, who has signalised himself so much in the divine art of music, though [he was] a foreigner; an author, who had the merit of breaking up new ground, and sowing it with the immortal seeds of knowledge and genius, which time, and the limits assigned by nature [to every inventor, however astonishing he may be, did not allow him to carry] to their present degree of perfection, is an event the most honourable to that nation, which renders such public and disinterested justice to the simple and silent merit of an illustrious mortal, who is now no more. Why did not his shade hover round his portrait, and enjoy the triumph?"

"I shall long have before my eyes that temple whose pointed vaults ascend to heaven, that numerous and select crowd of the beautiful and wealthy inhabitants of the first city in the universe; the interesting sight of a Royal Family, whose beauty charms every eye, and whose goodness captivates every heart, and that prodigious orchestra, which never before existed on earth, and which, by

We have taken the liberty, in a few instances, to make the translation more close to the original.

This work, we may add, is embellished with seven plates, representing the medal struck and worn on the occasion, Handel's monument in the Abbey, the three tickets of admission, and two perspective views, 1. of the gallery prepared for their Majesties, &c. and 2. of the orchestra and performers, all (but one*) extremely well drawn by Mr. E. 43. Oberon, Une Poème, heroi-comique. Traduite d'Allemand de M. Wieland. Par M. de Boaton. Berlin.

TO the brief account we gave of this celebrated German poem in our last volume, p. 837, we will now add a sketch of the subject.

Huon, heir to Guyenne, sets out for Paris, to do homage for his dukedom to Charlemagne, but is intercepted, in his way, by the Baron of Hohenblat, who had long been his enemy, accompanied by Sharlot, a son of the Emperor. Huon defends himself, kills Sharlot, without knowing him, and proceeds to the palace. Soon after, the Baron arrives, with the corpse of Sharlot, and accuses Huon of the murder. Huon vindicates himself, and recriminates on the Baron. A trial by single combat ensues, in which Huon kills his adversary. Charles, still inexorable, consents to pardon him only on these terms: that he should go to Bagdad; approach the Caliph, while he is seated at a royal banquet, smite off the head of him that sits on his left hand, kiss twice her who sits on his right, and then ask of the Caliph himself four of his hinder teeth and a lock of his grey beard, as a present to the Emperor. This, in a fit of frenzy, Huon undertakes; receives a blessing from the Pope, his uncle; goes on a pilgrimage to the holy sepulchre; and from thence sets out for Bagdad. In his way thither, passing Mount Lebanon, he finds Sherasmin, an old, faithful follower of his father, who becomes his attendant and squire, and to whom he relates the occasion of his journey,

* Viz. the third ticket, which was painted by R. Smak, R. A.

which is thus disclosed to the reader. Soon after, they enter an enchanted forest, the residence of OBERON, King of the Fairies, who appears to them, takes Huon under his protection, and gives him a magic cap and a bugle horn, with a strict injunction to be upon his guard against every weakness, as, the moment he gives way to that, he loses the favour of OBERON. Huon then meets a prince of Lebanon, delivers his bride from a giant, who had stolen a ring from OBERON, gets possession of this ring without knowing its virtues, and kills the giant. He next sees, in a dream, Retzia, the Caliph's daughter (converted and baptised afterwards by the name of Amanda), with whom he falls passionately in love. She is equally enamoured of him. Huon and Sherasmin arrive at Bagdad, and meet with an old woman, who lodges them the first night. She proves to be mother to Fatme, Retzia's nurse. By her means Retzia and Huon have an account of each other's dreams, and, recognising each other by the old dame's description, conceive hopes of those dreams being realised. The next day had been fixed, by the Caliph, for the celebration of his daughter's nuptials with Babeken, a prince of Drusia, whom she detests. The Caliph is seated at the nuptial banquet, in all his state, with Retzia on his right hand, and Babeken on his left, when Huon enters the palace, approaches the Caliph, beheads Babeken, salutes Retzia twice, puts on her finger the ring of OBERON, as a pledge of his honourable love, requests of the Caliph four of his hinder teeth and a lock of his grey beard, and, by the assistance of OBERON and the horn, gains his request, and carries Retzia off, attended by Fatme, her nurse. OBERON gives, this second time, a more explicit admonition, enjoining Huon to treat Retzia no otherwise than his sister, till the Pope's benediction shall have sanctified their union. They embark. Huon makes the best resolutions, and adheres to them strictly at first. As trusty Sherasmin keeps a strict eye upon the lovers, his presence becomes irksome; an occasion offering, Huon sends him, on a frivolous pretence, to Paris, and at length, surprised and overcome by passion, yields to its dictates. The cap and horn instantly vanish. A dreadful storm arises. The captain, after struggling with it in vain, attributes it to the wrath of Heaven directed against some guilty wretch wretch on board, and makes them all cast lots to discover him. The lot falls upon Huon, and he, like another Jonah, is condemned to be thrown into the sea. Retzia clasps him in her arms, and leaps into the sea with him. The unknown virtue of the ring saves them. They float to the strand of a desert island, where they pass some months in great want and misery. At length, Huon climbing some rocks, which he till then had thought inaccessible, finds a fertile spot and the cell of a hermit, into which he receives them, inculcating resignation to their fate, and penitence for their fault. They pass a considerable time in this delightful retreat. By the assistance of Titania, Queen of the Fairies, a little Huonnet comes into the world. At length the hermit dies. Titania, foreseeing evil at hand, steals Huonnet away, and gives him to her nymphs, to be educated in her immortal bowers. His parents, wandering in quest of him, separate near the shore, where a Tunisian galley happens to be watering. The Moors see Retzia, seize her, and force her on board their vessel, in spite of the efforts of Huon, who, hearing her cries, runs to her assistance. He is overpowered by numbers. They strip him, tie him hand and foot to a tree, and set sail for Tunis. When they are near their port, Titania raises a storm, strikes the ship with lightning, and drowns all the crew. Retzia floats miraculously to the shore, just at the foot of a terrace of the royal gardens. Almanzor, King of Tunis, happens to be walking there; sees her, falls violently in love with her, and lodges her, with every mark of respect, in an apartment in the palace of Almanfari, his queen. Mean time, Fatme, left unprotected in the ship from which Huon and Retzia had leaped into the sea, has been sold for a slave by the treachery of the captain, and bought by old Ibrahim, Almanzor's chief gardener. Sherafmin, when within sight of Paris, beginning to consider that he was sent on a frivolous errand, had turned short, and set out to meet his master at Rome. Not finding him there, he had wandered about the world in quest of him. He passes one day by the gardener's door at Tunis, sees Fatme, hears her story, and being totally at a loss how to proceed, hires himself as a day-labourer to Ibrahim. Huon, after remaining some time bound to the tree, is loosed by one of OBERON's spirits, who conveys him likewise to the door of Ibrahim. There Sherafmin finds him. He hears the story of the beautiful stranger received the night before into the queen's apartment; he suspects her to be his Retzia, and with this hope prevails on Ibrahim to adopt him as his nephew, and permit him to work in the gardens of the Seraglio, under the name of Hassan. Almanfari accidentally sees him there, and conceives a violent passion for him. Fatme undertakes to convey to Amanda [Retzia] from Huon an Eastern billet-doux; this, by a mistake, falls into the hands of Almanfari, who receives it as for herself, and immediately makes an assignation with Hassan, which he, believing this answer to come from his Amanda, punctually keeps. Here Almanfari practises all the arts of seduction, but in vain. Retzia resists Almanzor with equal constancy. Almanfari makes a second attempt upon Huon, but with no greater success; when being surprised by Almanzor, she accuses Hassan, who, in consequence, is condemned to be burnt alive the next day. Almanfari visits Hassan in prison, offers him liberty, and, by her means, the crown of Tunis, if he will return her love. This he rejects with disdain. Almanzor, in like manner, offers Retzia his hand and the throne, which she rejects with equal disdain; and being informed, by Fatme, of the dreadful situation of her Huon, she flies to Almanzor to beg his life. Her agitation and zeal in the cause of Hassan surprise and pique Almanzor. He refuses, she still intreats, and, when interrogated by the King, avows the relation she bears to Hassan, and her resolution to share his fate. At length, Almanzor, incensed, condemns her to be burnt with Hassan. The lovers are brought out, bound to the stake, and the fire kindled; when, their probation being now completed, and their constancy tried to the utmost, Titania extinguishes the flames. Huon finds the horn again at his side, by the aid of which, and that of the King and Queen of the Fairies, Huon, Retzia, Sherafmin, and Fatme are miraculously conveyed to Paris. There Retzia receives Huonnet from Titania. Huon presents his bride and casket, with the teeth and beard of the Caliph, to Charlemagne, whose anger, at length, gives place to admiration and esteem.

It may be necessary to add a few words on the machinery of this poem.

It is founded on the story of January and May, altered by Chaucer from Boccaccio, and modernised by Pope from Chaucer. Oberon and Titania are witnesses to the scene of the pear-tree; he, incensed at the impudence of May, restores January to his sight; she instantly puts an excuse into the mouth of May, which January believes rather than his own eyes. Oberon, provoked, swears an irrevocable oath to Titania, that he will never see her more till one faithful woman re-establish the credit of her sex. Oberon's resentment subsides, but he and his queen are still severed by this fatal oath; till at length, thinking they have discovered, in Huon and Retzia, the faithful pair whose constancy will annul it, the Fairy sovereigns deeply interest themselves in all that concerns them. The tale itself of January and May is interwoven in the work, and is put into the mouth of Sherafmin, who, far from suspecting its immediate connection with the adventures of his Knight, relates it as a pleasant story to amuse and divert the lovers. The cup, given by Oberon to Huon, has a never-failing supply of liquor. The horn, if blown gently, sets all those who hear it, and are not perfectly good and true, into an involuntary fit of dancing; if blown louder, it brings Oberon to the place. The ridiculous scenes produced by this horn are perhaps too nearly allied to the burlesque. Though the poem be written professedly in a comic strain, the author has strictly observed the rules of decency, and managed more than one delicate passage with so much art as not to offend the nicest ear. A good translation of it into English, we need not add, is much to be wished, though perhaps scarce to be expected.

44. An Apology for the Life of George Anne Bellamy, late of Covent Garden Theatre. Written by herself. To which is annexed, Her original Letter to John Calcraft, Esq. advertised to be published in October, 1767, but which was then violently suppressed. 5 Vols. 8vo.

UNHAPPY the Life that needs an Apology! But such is the phrase which, borrowed originally from the primitive defenders of Christianity, has of late been perverted and prostituted to the uses of the stage and the stews. Mrs. Bellamy's mother (she tells us) was the daughter of an eminent farmer and hop-planter at Maidstone in Kent, named Seal, a Quaker, who was also proprietor of Mount

Sion at Tunbridge-Well, to which his widow removed soon after his death, and let her houses furnished. She then married Mr. Busby, a builder, who unexpectedly failing, and no fortune having been secured to her daughter, or settled on herself, they were both left destitute. Mrs. Godfrey, however, sister to the great Duke of Marlborough (see the extracts), who had in her service a daughter of Mr. Busby by a former wife, placed Miss Seal at a boarding school in Queen Square, from whence, at the age of fourteen, she was seduced and kept at Somerset-House by the late Lord Tyrawley, till he married, for convenience, Lady Mary Stewart, daughter of the Earl of Blessington. Indignant as his mistress was at first, she followed him to Lisbon, on his going thither in a public character; but there, finding him attached to a Donna Anna, the same indignation made her accept the hand of a Captain Bellamy, whom she accompanied to Ireland, where being delivered of our heroine on St. George's day, 1733, (therefore named George, we suppose,) some months too soon for him to be her father, he immediately left the kingdom, and never more saw either mother or child. The sententious morality of our apologist here fails most egregiously, nor can she, by any means, reconcile us to such a flagrant breach, not only of virtue, but common honesty. By the directions of Lord Tyrawley, her real father, she was taken from her mother soon after her birth, and put to nurse, and at four years old was sent, with a Miss Frazer, to the Ursulines at Bologna, for education. Thus she was bred a Roman Catholic, though her mother was first a Quaker, and then a Methodist. The latter was then on Covent-Garden stage. At eleven, Miss B. was recalled to England, and lived with her noble father, till, on his going ambassador to Russia, her mother (then imprudently married again to a Mr. Walter, though it is not said when Capt. Bellamy died,) prevailed with her to come and reside with her. This occasioned her being renounced by Lord T., who, in consequence, withdrew her allowance. Meeting, at Twickenham, with Mrs. Woffington, Miss B. was induced to act privately, at Kingston, Andromache in the Distressed Mother, with her and Mr. Garrick. &c. and afterwards Othello, at Mr. Rich's, with his daughters, and being accidentally overheard.

overheard by Mr. R, he introduced her on his stage at the age of 14 in the character of Monimia, in which she succeeded (she says) at last beyond expectation, so as to conquer even the prejudices of Mr. Quin. Her favours from the great, and theatrical anecdotes, we shall pass over, till being pursued by Lord Byron, a friend of his, an "ignoble Earl," unnamed, took her by force to his house, and afterwards placed her in a lodging. What ensued we are not told, save that her character seemed, from this time, blasted; though it does not appear that she saw Lord B, and though she avows her innocence. But her own brother, who accompanied the Earl to her lodgings, could not be convinced of this. Her mother too was inveterate, and her health being much impaired, she went to Braintree, in Essex, to some female Quaker relations of her mother, where passing, by her dress, for "a wet Quaker," (as the phrase is,) she captivated, and would probably have married, an honest apothecary of the same persuasion, had not her name and theatrical connection been unwittingly betrayed by "the well-known Zachary Moore." The indignation, and also jealousy, of her female cousin, her leaving the country, her mother's reconciliation to her, their enlisting with Mr. Sheridan at Dublin Theatre, her campaign there with Garrick, &c. in 1746, and afterwards at Covent-Garden, her being again restored to the favour of Lord Tyrawley, his displeasure at her refusing Mr. Crump, an Irish linen merchant, for a husband, and her accepting Mr. Metnam for a gallant, &c. are incidents on which we will not dwell, further than to say that the latter gentleman (now Sir George Montgomery) took her, "nothing loth," ("neither sorry or offended," are her own words,) from the theatre, when the audience were expecting her in the 5th act of "The Provoked Wife," as Lady Fanshul, and that, after she had borne him a son, she discarded him for a mad, jealous freak, in consequence of a rash vow of which she seemed ever afterwards to have repented, and accepted the offers of the late Mr. Calcraft, whom she despised, and could never love, by whom she had a daughter, to whom "Lady Caroline Fox, Lady Tyrawley, and Mr. Fox," stood sponsors in person." Her theatrical engagements at Covent-Garden, however, still continued, (refusing the offers of Mr. Garrick,) from which, and her benefit, the amount of her income, she says, was larger than Mr. Calcraft's. With Mrs. Cibber, her rival Juliet, she was on the most friendly terms; but she and Mrs. Woffington (the Rival Queens) were continually squabbling and almost fighting, and one of their affrays occasioned Foote's little piece, "The Green-Room Squabble," &c. After this, they never spoke till Mrs. W. desired to ask her pardon, for an intentional injury, on her death-bed. But here we must at present drop the curtain, after adding, by way of epilogue, a few extracts, and will resume the historical part of the three remaining acts, or volumes, in our next, first observing, that the Life of this heroine, a continued course, as it seems, of vice, folly, and extravagance, by the distresses in which it involved her, and the remorse which it now must occasion, may afford an useful lesson to the young and giddy of her own sex, especially to those who are so unfortunate as to tread the slippery boards of a theatre; though the candid will make great allowance for such a wretched birth and education (if so it may be called,) and the miserable example of such blind guides as her parents.

"Among the many persons of quality who occupied occasionally my grandmother's houses, was the Honourable Mrs. Godfrey, mistress of the Jewel Office, and sister to the great Duke of Marlborough. With this lady a daughter of Mr. Busby's, by a former marriage, lived as her own attendant; and so great an esteem had she contracted, during her residence at Tonbridge, for my grandmother, and fondness for my mother, that she offered to bring up the latter, and have her educated, in every respect, the same as her own daughter, Miss Godfrey. My grandmother, however, having at this time no reason to doubt but that her child was amply provided for, politely declined the offer, but agreed, that upon Mrs. Godfrey's return to town for the winter, she should accompany, and spend three or four months with her.

"That season being now come, Mrs. Godfrey set out for London; and, upon her arrival, heard that her noble brother was given over by his physicians. But having been, for some time, at variance with the Duchess, on account of her exposing, though in a state of second childhood, the man who had rendered himself so famous, an imprudence which deservedly gave offence to Mrs. Godfrey, she had not the satisfaction of seeing him before he died. Here I must add, that the Duchess of Marlborough, much to her discredit, used to take the Duke with her in the coach, whenever she went abroad, even upon the most trivial occasions; exhibiting, as a public spectacle, the hero who had lately kept nations in awe, and whose talents in the cabinet were equal to his valour and military knowledge in the field. — Good heavens! such a ruin must surely have excited the most poignant grief even in the most unfeeling breast.

* This lady had no title to this appellation, her father, Sir Winston Churchill, being only a knight. EDIT.

“Mrs. Godfrey was prevented, by this disagreement, from paying a visit herself at Marlborough-house, to condole with her sister-in-law on the loss their family and the nation had sustained. Having, however, an inclination to know how things were conducted there, she sent her woman, Mr. Busby’s daughter, to make what enquiries she could; and the latter, overcome by the importunities of her little step-sister, who had attended Mrs. Godfrey to town, as proposed, was accompanied by her to see the remains of the Duke lie in state.

“When they arrived at the gate of Marlborough-house, they found it open, but, to their infinite surprise, met not a living creature during their passage to the room in which the body was deposited. So totally was this incomparable man neglected in the last stage of his mortal exhibition, that not a single attendant, or one glimmering taper, remained about him as tokens of respectful attention. My mother and her companion were obliged to the day-light alone for the faint view they obtained of the funeral decorations.

“The melancholy and disrespectful scene she had been just witness to was no sooner described to Mrs. Godfrey by her woman, than it had such an effect upon her as to occasion a long and severe illness, which at length reduced her to such a state that, had she experienced the same neglectful treatment her brother had done, she must have been buried alive: for one Sunday, fancying herself better than she had been for some time, and able to go to chapel, as she was dressing for that purpose, she suddenly fell down to all appearance dead.

“The screams of her woman and my mother brought Col. Godfrey into the room, who, having probably seen instances of persons remaining in a state of insensibility for a considerable time, and afterwards recovering, directed that his lady should be immediately put into bed, and that two persons should constantly continue with her, till indubitable symptoms appeared of her decease. The consequences proved with how much judgement the Colonel had acted. Notwithstanding the opinion of the physicians, who all declared that the breath of life was irrecoverably departed, and in opposition to the solicitations of his friends to have the body interred, he continued resolute in his determination till the Sunday following, when, exactly at the same hour on which the change had happened, signs appeared of returning sensibility. So punctual was Nature in her operations upon this singular occasion, that Mrs. Godfrey awoke from her trance just as the chapel bell was once more ringing, which so perfectly eradicated from her memory every trace of her insensibility, that she blamed her attendants for not awaking her in time to go to church, as she had proposed to do. Col. Godfrey, whose tenderness to his lady was unremitted, taking advantage of this incident, prudently gave orders that she should by no means be made acquainted with what had happened, lest it should make a melancholy impression on her mind. And I believe, to the day of her death, she remained ignorant of it.”....

“I cannot here help taking notice of one instance, among many, of Mr. Fox’s fondness for his son, who justly makes so conspicuous a figure in the political annals of the present times. The wall at the bottom of the lawn before Holland-house being to be taken down, and iron pallisades put up in its room, that the passengers on the road might have a better view of that fine antique building, it was necessary to make use of gunpowder to precipitate the work. Mr Fox had promised Master Charles that he should be present when the explosion took place. But finding the workmen had completed the fall of the wall without giving him notice, he ordered it to be rebuilt, and when it was thoroughly cemented, had it blown up again, in order to keep his word with his son. He at the same time recommended it to those about him never, upon any account, to be guilty of a breach of promise to children, as, by doing so, they instilled into them an indifference with regard to the observance of their own promises when they arrived at years of maturity.”....

Mr. Fox, in another place, is styled “one of the tenderest husbands, too indulgent a father, the best of masters, and the warmest and most attached of friends.” Of his generosity and compassion some striking instances are recorded; and his transactions with his steward and Ayliffe are set, we are told, in a true light. See p. 174.

We will also add her account of “the well-known Zachary Moore” [mentioned above], as distinguished for “his misfortunes as his dissipation.”

“This gentleman had once been possessed of an income of £.25,000 per annum. But not being endowed with a proportionable share of prudence, he found himself at length reduced, through his own extravagance, and the chicanery of his steward, to the most humiliating necessity. And what is very extraordinary, extraordinary, the wretch, who had thus juggled him out of a princely fortune, had the audacity to propose to him to take his daughter to wife; on which condition he would agree to return him back the whole of the estate he had deprived him of. Mr. Moore nobly, in my opinion, rejected the disgraceful offer. The generality of his acquaintance, however, notwithstanding they could not but admire his magnanimity upon the occasion, blamed an imprudence in consequence of which he was necessitated, at forty years of age, to accept of an ensigncy in a regiment that was ordered to Gibraltar." . . .

"General Braddock, to whom I had been known from my infancy, and who was particularly fond of me, the evening before his departure for America supped with me, accompanied by his two aides-de-camp, Major Burton and Capt. Orme. Before we parted, the General told me he should never see me more; for he was going, with a handful of men, to conquer whole nations; and to do this they must cut their way through unknown woods. He produced a map of the country, saying, at the same time, "Dear Pop, we are sent like sacrifices to the altar." The event of the expedition too fatally verified the General's expectations. — On going away, he put into my hands a paper, which proved to be his will. As he did not doubt my being married to Mr. Calcraft, from his apparent fondness for me, from the alteration in my behaviour, and from the preference I had given to him before Mr. Metham, he had made him his sole executor, leaving me only the plate which he had received as the usual perquisite from government on his nomination." — The death of this second father (as she calls him) we are afterwards told, threw her into a fever.

Dr. Francis is twice styled "the reputed translator of Horace;" and this, in a note, is thus explained: "I have been creditably informed, that this translation was the production of Mr. Duncombe." But this lady should be informed, that these two translations are totally different, and that Dr. Francis (as is well known to his scholars) certainly translated Horace as much as "Garth wrote his own Dispensary." — This mistake probably arises from his having been assisted by a "Dr. Dunkin" of Ireland. His Constantine failing on the stage, our heroine, his "Empress Fulvia," introduced him, she says, to Mr. Fox, who invited him to breakfast the next day with saying, "Well! Doctor, who knows but your damnation as a play-wright may be the means of your promotion as a divine?" She might have added, "And so it was." For Dr. F., after going chaplain to the staff with Gen. Braddock, succeeded Bishop Green, in 1762, by Mr. Fox's means, in the valuable rectory of Barrow. — The late Dr. Best (who supplied Mrs. B. with poultry, &c. at Holwood Hill) and his living, Keston, are, by another mistake, changed into "Betts" and "Caston."

45. Observations on an extraordinary Case of a ruptured Uterus. By Andrew Douglas, M.D. Member of the College of Physicians, London, &c. &c.

A RUPTURE of the gravid uterus has always been thought highly dangerous, but that it is not necessarily fatal appears from the case here related, the recovery of Mrs. Manning, of Denzil Street, Clare Market, where the membranes had been ruptured eight hours when Dr. Douglas first saw her, Sept. 12, 1784. The woman appearing in extremis the same evening, the uterus seeming to have been ruptured transversely, he determined on immediate delivery, which was happily effected by extracting the foetus and secundinae through the rupture by the natural passage, and, after many alarming symptoms, by slow degrees she was so far recovered, on the 27th, as to be able to walk to the Doctor's house in Bedford Street, Bedford Square, and from that time to the present, Jan. 10, 1785, she has continued well.

So unusual an event as recovery in such an instance led our practitioner to think it was equally criminal either to give up such a case as hopeless, and do nothing; or to consign the patient to a certain death, by means of a cruel operation."

To strengthen his opinion by collateral supports, he has abstracted XV Cases from medical writers, and the information of his friends, which, he thinks, "will give additional weight to his conclusions," though in three of these cases only the patients recovered. On these Dr. D. makes several scientific and humane observations, and among them the following: "A rupture of the gravid uterus is, confessedly, a case which the experience of the past and of the present time has rendered almost hopeless. Yet it might be worth enquiring, whether the recovery would have been so very rare, had we not so generally given way to an almost criminal despondency. The case I have related is decisive as to

“the possibility of recovery; and the “other histories which I have cited, “though not so conclusive as I could “wish, contain, each of them, some “circumstance which ought to encour“age us to try, in future what imme“diate delivery may be able to effect;
 “since it does not appear that any thing
 “has hitherto been gained by a con“trary conduct.” And, after obviating the objections that may be made to immediate delivery, shewing “how little “relief is to be expected from any “power which we can suppose the con“stitution to have over a foetus, in “such circumstances” as he describes,
 and pointing out “the pernicious effects “which its remaining in the abdomen “must inevitably produce,” he thinks these conclusions may be admitted:

“1. That, in a rupture of the gravid
 “uterus, which has even allowed a “foetus to pass into the cavity of the “abdomen, the case is not to be confi“dered as absolutely hopeless.

“2. That the danger of such a case “is as much, in consequence of the in“jury which the viscera sustain from
 “the child remaining in the cavity of “the abdomen, as from that which is “done to the uterus itself.

“3. That the danger will generally
 “be in proportion to the time the child
 “is suffered to remain among the vis“cera, and to the susceptibility of irri“tation which prevails in the constitu“tion of the patient at the time.

“4. That delivery affords the only “prospect of recovery to the patient,
 “and should therefore be effected as “soon as circumstances will permit.”

At the same time he allows that, “in “a case of such complicated danger, “circumstances will frequently arise “which will baffle all reasoning from “general principles.”—“It is a matter “of some comfort,” he adds, “that,
 “amidst such accumulated danger,
 “there still remains a possibility of the “patient’s recovery; and as that seems “in a great measure to depend on the “speedy removal of the child from “among the viscera, it is a point of the “highest importance to be able early “and certainly to determine, that the “accident has really happened.” With this laudable view this pamphlet was written, and these cases and circumstances collected, which, we hope, (in the Doctor’s words) will induce the faculty to “discard the melancholy ap“prehensions” that they have hitherto indulged, and “to cherish the hope of “a more favourable event.”

SUMMARY OF THE PROCEEDINGS IN PARLIAMENT, SESS. II.

*Debates in the present Session of Parliament,

Wednesday 9.

MR. Burke rose, and after enlarging, as usual, on the mal-administration of justice in India, called for two papers to be read, containing charges against two persons in high official stations [Gov. Hastings and Sir Elijah Impey], on which he meant to ground a motion; but meeting with some opposition from Mr. H. Dundas, said, he would defer his motion till the house should be more at leisure to attend to it.

The Newfoundland bill (see p. 141.) was then brought forward; read a second time, and ordered to be committed. And the order of the day being called for,

Mr. Welbore Ellis rose, and, in a very able speech, remarked upon the evidence of yesterday (see p. 143.), which, he said, of itself spoke forcibly to the fact.—The present question was nearly connected with the privileges of the House, and the rights of representation. The conduct of the H. Bailiff of Westminster was, therefore, first to be considered—how far he had obeyed the writ of the crown, and conformed himself to the forms of the House. His Majesty had appointed a time and a place for the meeting of his parliament, and a precept for that purpose had been issued, the departure from which was certainly censurable. The nature of the precept, and the importance of fulfilling it, were well known; but notwithstanding, on reading over the evidence, it would appear, that, instead of obeying, the H. B. had proceeded on his own authority to re-examine votes, which he had examined before; and that too upon their word only, though, in the former case, if he had doubted, he might have examined them upon oath. But this was not all. He had set the laws, and the court established by law for trying elections and reforming the abuses of returning officers, at defiance; and had constituted a new court unknown to the laws, which, having no authority to punish, was incompetent to the purpose for which it was established. Mr. Grenville's bill was framed on just and constitutional principles, and intended to narrow the power of returning officers, that elections might not be protracted for years, as in the present case; nor, if unduly made, remain undecided for any length of time. Much has been said as to the conscience of the High Bailiff, and it has been thought expedient that he should have time to make up his mind before he should make his return; and that, as there had been a precedent of a scrutiny having been granted, he should have been careful that his scrutiny did not supersede the writ. The latter came to him from the highest authority; the former had only the sanction of one branch of the legislature, which, however respectable, was not to be held in competition with that in which the three were combined. In proof of this, the H. B. being asked, if the authority of the House was withdrawn, under what authority he would then act, his answer was, he knew of none. Hence it is evident, beyond contradiction, that the House have now upon them the whole weight of the scrutiny, and are become a new power in the constitution, under which a returning officer dares to act in opposition to the known and established laws. He begged the House maturely to consider the consequence. Already has this scrutiny continued 8 months; and, proceeding upon the same plan, must of course continue 24 months longer, and all this while the city of Westminster must remain unrepresented. This was so glaring a violation of the rights of the electors, as must reflect disgrace on the dignity of the House, and for that reason he should move once more the resolution he had moved before, "That the H. B. be now directed forthwith to make a return," &c. (See the motion at large, p. 152.)

Mr. Peabam seconded the motion, and was very severe on the conduct of the High Bailiff, which, he said, should excite the highest resentment of that House. If a returning officer should delay the return of a writ, an attachment would issue against him. On the due meeting of parliament the rights of the people depended; and, if that by any fraudulent means might be evaded, or impeded, the constitution would at once be dissolved, and we should no longer be a free people. If in one instance the prerogative were suffered to prevail, it might in many; he therefore was for pursuing decisive measures, by enjoining the High Bailiff to make his return, and inflicting upon him exemplary punishment for his unprecedented presumption.

Lord Mulgrave remarked, that, with respect to common law, which derived its origin from a much earlier period than the law of parliament, he did not see the use of introducing it on the present occasion, any more than the statute law where the common were silent. And as it was allowed that scrutinies had been granted, and were truly consistent with reason, good policy, and parliamentary usage, he could not see the danger to the constitution, which the Hon. Gentlemen who had spoken before him were so apprehensive of. His Lordship adverted to the delays thrown in the way of the scrutiny by long speeches, cross-examinations, and frivolous objections; and he anticipated the arguments which the Rt. Hon. Gentleman [Mr. Fox] would no doubt endeavour, by his powerful eloquence and numerous friends, to impress upon the House, of "his grievous sufferings, and the sufferings of the electors of Westminster, by the exercise of a right, which had already been represented as contrary to the known laws of the land, and that militated even against the constitution itself." Any thing and every thing, his Lordship said, would serve the Right Hon. Gentleman for subjects of popular declamation; and as he had the power of perverting the sense of the most opposite truths, to serve his own purposes, every one knew he did not want the inclination to exaggerate his imaginary grievances, in order, if possible, to interest the whole nation in his cause. He trusted, however, that the House were not to be moved with empty unmeaning sounds; but that they would act with consistency and firmness; and not one day begin a business, by way of experiment, which the next, without having patience to see it folly tried, they would pronounce absurd and impracticable. His Lordship, after one of the most elaborate speeches he ever made, concluded with moving an amendment, which, except the word "That" at the beginning, had nothing in connection with the former motion of Mr. Welbore Ellis; which the reader will see by comparing them in p. 153 of last Magazine.

Mr. Montagu rose next and declared himself a steady friend to Mr. Grenville's act, tho' an enemy to the present mode of scrutiny. He dwelt some time on exposing the incompetency of the miserable court in which the H. B. presided, when compared with the efficacy of the committee prescribed by the law. One, he said, had the power of repressing long speeches, and rejecting whatever was foreign to the question; the other had not one feature of power to repress the grossest insults on its own authority. Establish the precedent, said he, that a returning officer may, on the pretence of satisfying his conscience, postpone the return of the writ, after the day on which it is made returnable, and mark the consequence. If one member may be thus deprived of his seat now, it is no improbable thing that fifty may hereafter be so excluded. But he hoped the friends of liberty would unite, to defeat the machinations of those who had countenanced and supported the scrutiny. Let every man's soul glow with the spirit and fire of his ancestors; those men who possessed

Unconquer'd minds by freedom's holy flame.

We should then have nothing to fear from the hostile attacks of those who are enemies to the liberties of mankind. Mr. M. recommended deliberation and caution to the House. He had heard doctrines advanced, and opinions supported, that had given him serious alarm. He had heard law authorities thrown out in the order of debate, that had excited the laughter of the House. In his opinion, men who were appointed to dispense the laws, were not fit members for popular assemblies, where it was hardly possible for them to avoid contracting a portion of that party spirit, with which almost every member was liable to be affected. He strongly supported the original motion.

Sir Lloyd Kenyon [Master of the Rolls,] could not admit the learned gentleman's remark, that a seat in that House was inconsistent with the dignity or gravity of a judge. Men who had been ornaments to their profession [Sir Joseph J. Kyll, Sir J. S. Rangr, &c.] had held their seats in parliament with the office that he occupied, with dignity to themselves and advantage to the country. Because he had said the day before, that every assembly, which, under the sanction of that House, had the image of a court, in fairness of argument, must have the power of commanding due respect and decorum to be observed within its own limits, did, therefore, such an opinion militate with the laws and the constitution? Every one knew that justices of the peace had the power to summon witnesses, but not to compel appearance; but, in case of disobedience or improper behaviour, the courts gave them aid; and the learned gentleman cannot have forgotten, that in the last scrutiny for this very city, one gentleman [Mr. Crowle] had been committed to Newgate by the House for improper language, and another [the hon. Mr. Murray] for contempt. He had given his opinion, and he had given it with the most solemn regard to truth, that the scrutiny was perfectly constitutional, and was warranted by the law of the land. Scrutinies were as ancient as the institution of Parliament itself, and many petitions had been presented because scrutinies had been denied. There was nothing, he insisted, in what was called the exigency of the writ, so urgent and positive, as to take from the returning officer all discretion. It had been said, that on the day of the return of writs, in the courts below, no excuse would be admitted by the courts. On the contrary, nothing was more frequent. He paid the most unequivocal compliments to the abilities, industry, and impartiality of Mr. Hargrave; but, not being accustomed to the bustle of courts, he was not so well qualified for dispatch as some others, who were not so deeply learned in the laws. He concluded with giving his support to the amendment.

Mr. M. A. Taylor rose, he said, to give his vote against those with whom he was accustomed to agree, and against whom perhaps he might never give another vote; but, for his part, he could not perceive the analogy between the sheriff's writs from the courts, and the writs from the crown. In the one, the writs returning to the courts from whence they issued, those courts were competent to decide both on the exigency and the allegations of the sheriff for delay. But in the other case, who was to judge of the exigency? The parliament being assembled, the tribunal was changed, and the laws of the land had wisely determined that no apology should be admitted for disobedience. He declared, that he delivered every legal opinion in that House, or elsewhere, with the humility that became him. He was young, and might call himself a chick in the profession; but with respect to the case put by the noble

Lord

Lord [Mulgrave], of the sheriff dying on the day of the return, and the corner having the voters to poll over-again, that he would venture to pronounce totally irrelevant to the present question.

Mr. Lee agreed with the Master of the Rolls, that every legal opinion which came from a lawyer in that House should be delivered with the rigorous impartiality of a judge; and therefore he must declare, in the most solemn manner, that in his mind the Westminster scrutiny could not be justified. He insisted, that law, the constitution, and common sense militated against it. Suppose, said he, that the sheriff of Cornwall should next take it into his head to have scruples, and should appoint a scrutiny instead of a return, then, as all the returns of the boroughs must be attached to his writ, he might keep out of parliament forty members till measures might be carried to the ruin of the constitution. The noble Lord [Mulgrave], in the gentleness of his gentle nature, had said, that it would be cruel to force the H. B. to make a return without satisfying his conscience. His conscience ought to be satisfied with the discharge of his duty; and his duty directed him to obey the King's writ, by returning those who appeared on the poll to have the majority.

Mr. Bearcroft rose, he said, as the House seemed inclined to hear the opinions of lawyers, briefly to state his ideas, as he would not be the means of keeping back the principal actors from coming forward to "sret and strut their hour upon the stage." With regard to the opinions of lawyers, whether chickens or old cocks, without being biased by either, he should speak his sentiments with impartiality. He had not the bad opinion of the Westminster election which some of the learned gentlemen seemed to entertain. He considered the scrutiny as proper and necessary; and what could not in justice be denied, when demanded: as to the clamours that this measure had excited, as if the constitution was endangered, and the freedom of election violated, they did not much affect him. The same complaints were carried, perhaps, to a greater pitch 30 years ago than now, on the last Westminster scrutiny; and yet nothing has happened since, either dangerous to the one, or hurtful to the other. The present scrutiny, with all its imperfections on its head, must be acknowledged to have done good. It has discovered one hundred bad votes already, and opened a scene of corruption and undue influence, which all men disclaim, and all good men detest. He was therefore for continuing the scrutiny, till the truth should be brought to light. Mr. Bearcroft, in the course of his speech, pronounced a most flattering eulogium on Mr. Fox, which he concluded with a true epigrammatic point. The talents of the Right Hon. Gent. he said, were such as all men were united to applaud; he had a quickness of discernment, a sensibility of reasoning, a boldness of enterprise, and a profoundness of judgment, beyond all men. These qualities excited admiration in their display; but they demand a watchful attention with respect to their object; when happily directed, they are the best ornaments of human character and the best blessings of society. But when perverted, they are dangerous in the extreme. In the Hon. Gent. they are perhaps more so than in any other man, owing to that imposing appearance of candour which seldom failed to betray you into error, while it wore the appearance of leading you to truth.

Lord North rose, he said, to "sret and strut his hour upon the stage." He began by applauding the generosity of the noble Lord [Mulgrave] in leaving the word "That" in the original motion. He followed Mr. Montagu in contrasting the scrutiny to a committee of the House. No two things could be more dissimilar, as it was agreed on all sides, that the scrutiny could not be decisive, and that a committee of the House must at last be referred to; he was pointedly severe on those who advised the scrutiny in preference to the committee. The gentlemen on the other side are loud in their praises of Mr. Grenville's act, and yet, to shew their consistency, they have adopted the only mode by which it was possible to elude its operation. He then adverted to what had been said the day before on the payment of witnesses, (see p. 143.) but said nothing new on the subject. He expressed his dislike to the fighting manner, in which the name of Mr. Hargrave had been treated; and applauded his integrity, his research, his judgement, his industry to come at truth, and his inflexible impartiality, which, he supposed, were the qualities the friends to the scrutiny disliked. He strongly supported the original motion.

Mr. Sheridan remarked, in reply to Mr. Bearcroft, that he had exalted with one hand, and had pulled down with the other; when he talked of his honourable friend's boldness, he meant his craft; and when he gave him candour, he qualified it with hypocrisy. But it was not from such men as his honourable friend, that danger was to be dreaded. It was not from the saug of the lion, but the tooth of the serpent, that the poison was ejected. He adverted to the declaration of the hon. Gent. who, with peculiar modesty, had styled himself a chicken of the law, "That he should that day vote with opposition, because they were in the right; but he probably should never vote with them again;" presaging that for the future they would ever be in the wrong. If such was his augur, he could not help looking on this chicken as a bird of ill omen, and wishing he had continued side by side with the full-grown cock, who, he doubted not, would long

long continue to feed about the Treasury gates, to pick up those crumbs which were there plentifully scattered about, to keep the chickens and full-grown fowls together.

Having with much wit and satirical humour diverted the House for some time, at the expence of the supporters of the scrutiny who had spoken before him, he next proceeded to reply to such matters as more immediately affected the question; and first, as to what had been said in tenderness to the H. B.'s conscience, which he thought the House was more solicitous about than the H. B. himself; for he, it had appeared on his examination, had delivered it over to his assessors, and, having so done, took no more concern about it.—A noble Lord [Mulgrave], he observed, had early in the debate treated it as a false idea, that the Westminster election had any connection at all with the common or statute laws. He referred to the words of the precept, to convince his Lordship of the fallacy of that argument. He glanced at a sarcasm which the Rt. Hon. Gentleman had thrown out against the noble Lord in the blue ribbon, as if his administration, memorable for its purity, had been supported only by the secret efforts of ministerial influence; and said, it struck him at the time, when he looked over to the treasury bench, to see how some of those people felt who sat near the Rt. Hon. Gentleman, and who had formerly been in the confidence of the noble Lord, had supported his measures, had been foremost in advising them, and most industrious in promoting them. He could not help remarking their present attachment to their immaculate leader, whose boast it was to use only the best influence of his own abilities, and the services he had done and would do his country, to support his measures. He defended Mr. Hargrave, and said, if he was unfit for the office, it was the High Bailiff that was to blame who chose him. He said, if the House should suffer the scrutiny to continue, new delusions must be found, to induce the House to countenance a measure, which all the world must consider as a stretch of ministerial tyranny. He concluded with a solemn address to the Right Hon. Gentleman [the Chancellor of the Exchequer], not as minister, but as a member of parliament, a friend of parliamentary reform, who, when he first declared his intention of putting himself at the head of the friends of reform, was considered as a most valuable acquisition. In that light he still considered him, and gave him the most unreserved credit for his sincerity; a gift, which, in whatever estimation the Right Hon. Gent. might hold it, was worth all the rotten support of the whole herd of followers, attached only by their present interests, and ready to change with the first change of circumstances; he therefore recommended consistency as well as sincerity, as necessary to establish a character in political life, and not to lay himself open to be pointed at in his way to the House with, "There goes the minister, who in his liberality gives 160 members to the counties; but denies to the city of Westminster its two legal constitutional representatives." Let the Rt. Hon. Gent. he said, be open to conviction. The path of recantation was not new to him, [here Mr. Pitt in a loud whisper said, In what?]. Mr. Sheridan replied, In the coal-tax last year, and in others that must be altered or given up this year; he, therefore, exhorted him to tread back the mistaken road he had taken with respect to the Westminster scrutiny, and, he would answer for it, the House would be ready to meet him.

Mr. Pitt then rose, and waving the variety of extraneous matter which had been introduced by the noble Lord in the blue ribbon and the hon. Gent. that spoke last; he would, he said, reduce all he had to say to two heads: one, the legality of the scrutiny; the other, the necessity of continuing it. As to the first, it had been so fully discussed in the preceding session, that to add any thing more would be superfluous. The second was a simple one, but spread into a variety of branches. It had been said, that by the institution of the scrutiny, the constitution had been violated. But had not the same thing happened in the case of Trentham and Vandepur, and did any one complain on that scrutiny that the constitution had been violated?—The legality of the scrutiny was therefore incontrovertible. All then that can be called in question is, the propriety of continuing the scrutiny. To determine this question, he referred back to the principle on which the scrutiny was established, namely, on the numbers of bad votes being so great, that it was doubtful which of the parties had the majority of legal votes. In confirmation of this doubt, though the H. Bailiff had not yet gone through more than a 4th part of the number of voters, who amounted in all to 12,000, there had been more than 200 of that 4th found to have been bad. Will it not, therefore, by parity of reasoning, be natural to conclude, that if in the examination of two parishes only, in which there were not more than 3000 voters, 200 of them have been found to be bad, that in the examination of the other parishes, in which there are 9,000 voters yet to be scrutinised, there will be found the same proportion bad, that is, in all 8000 at least bad? Surely, as this short specimen has incontrovertibly justified the principle, it has likewise furnished ample reason for full investigation of the grievance.

Mr. Pitt proceeded, in like manner, to answer other objections. 1st, He said, it had been urged, that the scrutiny had proved ineffectual; 2. That the enquiry should rather have been referred to the committee under Mr. Grenville's act; 3. That the poll was itself a scrutiny, and that therefore another scrutiny was superfluous; 4. That it was a partial, partial mode of proceeding; and 5. That it was expensive, and meant as a means of keeping the city of Westminster unrepresented. To the first, he answered, that it had been rendered ineffectual by the spirit of procrastination in Mr. Fox and his friends, and by the unsuitableness of Mr. Hargrave to accelerate the proceedings. To the 2d, he replied, that Mr. Grenville's committee was a tribunal to try an election, not to make one. How, he would ask, was this business to be brought before Mr. Grenville's committee before it was completed? And how could it be completed while so many bad votes were undiscovered? In either case the grievance, if so it must be termed, to the electors of Westminster, must have been equal; they must have remained equally unrepresented. To the 3d objection, the number of bad votes that had been found since the conclusion of the poll was an answer not to be refuted. To the 4th, the high encomiums that had been passed on the integrity, wisdom, knowledge in the laws, unconquerable honesty and strict impartiality of Mr. Hargrave, left no room to suspect that any partialities had been permitted on either side. To the 5th objection, he answered, that the expence was enhanced by every mode of unnecessary extravagance; by all the arts of law-craft; all what is called puzzling the cause; by every means of promoting litigation, and causing an unnecessary waste of time and money. Mr. Hargrave, he said, had a great depth of knowledge, a perfect acquaintance with the ambiguities of the law, which he had learned to convert to the causes that came before him, and knew how to apply the system of his own court (Chancery) to the method chalked out in the court of scrutiny. His labour and industry were unremitting, and his sagacity so great that he could confound and perplex, and render that unintelligible to himself which was clear to all the world besides, and all this with the greatest professional dexterity; but, for his part, he could not see the necessity for such a profundity of erudition in cases familiar to the most ordinary understanding. It was true the right of voting in elections for Westminster was not so clearly ascertained as not to admit of a doubt, but that doubt was not to be removed by the subtleties of lawyers. It must be removed by an act of the legislature. Before he sat down, he took notice of every invidious remark, every poignant stroke of wit, and every sensible and pertinent observation, that had been said or made during the course of the debate; and seeing the Rt. Hon. Gent. [Mr. Fox] in a collected state, having reserved himself to hear what he had to say on the subject before he rose himself; he hoped to hear no more of those tragic tales of tyranny, persecution, and cruelty, that have been so pathetically deplored on the other side of the House, nor of those declamations, and wailings, as if every hour the scrutiny continued, a fresh stab was given to the vitals of the constitution.

Mr. Wyndham observed, that, if the H. B. was not obliged to make his return till he could satisfy his conscience, that his poll was strictly and legally correct, he might in that case never be able to satisfy his conscience, and consequently never be obliged to make a return.

Mr. Fox rose at half after two in the morning, and, in an animated speech of more than two hours, kept the House awake till five. He considered the question under different heads, and combated the principle on which it was grounded, as well in point of law, as ancient usage, and parliamentary proceeding. The principle, he said, was new, and had no precedent. If elections were to depend on the conscience of the returning officer, the returning officer would then be the sole elector, for his scruples would not be confined to the free voice of the adverse party; he would have his scruples to the oaths of such as made against him. Nothing, he said, could be more false and absurd, than the assertion, that the returning officer need make no return till he was satisfied of the legal majority of votes. The reason, why some gentlemen were so inexterminably earnest for continuing the scrutiny, was, its being tedious, distressing, and expensive. He retorted the charge of his being the cause of delay on the party that opposed him, and vindicated the conduct of Mr. Hargrave with some warmth. He explained the reasons for insisting on a direct answer from Mr. Murphy, and paid that gentleman a handsome compliment. He refuted the argument of Mr. Pitt, "that the scrutiny now carrying on" was a part of the election, which was still "incompetent; and that Mr. Grenville's committee (which was to try the merits of elections) was inapplicable to the case." This led him to state the law as it stands with reference to the case, in which he took a wide range, and challenged the ablest of the lawyers to controvert him. He enumerated the various places where scrutinies had been demanded at the last general election, viz. in London, Liverpool, Southwark, Bedford, Middlesex, &c. in all of which they had either been refused by the returning officers, or declined by the parties; and called upon the opposite side to produce a precedent, where a scrutiny had been protracted beyond the day of the return of the writ. In the course of his speech, he was serious, severe, ironical, witty, sarcastical, and immitably logical and pointed. His speech might rather be considered as a remonstrance against the measures of the present administration, than a mere discussion of the present question. He recapitulated every leading feature of the Rt. Hon. Gentleman's conduct [meaning Mr. Pitt's], from his assuming the character of minister to the present hour. He dwelt particularly on his Indian manoeuvres, which he reprobated in the most unequivocal terms. He concluded with observing, serving, that tho' he had unwillingly been driven into a state of political hostility with the Rt. Hon. Gentleman, he had notwithstanding seen, or thought he had seen, something like magnanimity in his disposition, which he thought would have inspired him with a different personal conduct than he had met from him that day. He considered the proceedings against him as a means of expulsion. He stated the expences of the scrutiny at 3,000*l.* a-year, a sum so enormous, that neither he nor any party could be supposed able to support it for any length of time. He would not, he said, withhold from them the pleasure of knowing, that, from the above circumstance, protraction would certainly give them success; and he believed, that the statement he had just made would shew the cause of their perseverance in a clearer point of view than any thing else that had been said upon the subject. But though personal poverty might give his persecutors some temporary pleasure, they should still find him unbroken in spirit; and undaunted in mind, pursuing every constitutional means to stem the current of corruption, not ever to let sleep for a moment the decision that they so malignantly endeavoured to evade.

Mr. Dundas rose, he said, in reply to all that vehement declamation, all that torrent of coarse obloquy, which the Rt. hon. Gent. who spoke last is so ready, on all occasions, and on all questions, to pour forth against those who oppose his pursuits. What he has been pleased to say of his unwillingness to be driven into a state of political hostility with the Rt. Hon. Gentleman [Mr. Pitt] is neither more nor less than this, that he had no better seen that the Rt. Hon. Gent. had a will of his own, and would not be compulsively led to second his views, than he resolved to represent him as the most haughty, corrupt, unconstitutional, and dangerous man and minister that ever this country produced. It is thus, said Mr. Dundas, that the Rt. hon. Gent. has at all times thought proper to monopolise all patriotism, all public principles, and all love of freedom, to his own single self. "I am the palladium of the liberties of this country. I am the champion of the constitution. I am the man of the people. I am the Atlas of this free state." Such is the language of the Hon. Gent. alternately pouring forth praises and execrations on the same men, just as the vicissitudes of political affairs may happen to set for him or against him. Having said thus much by way of reply to the Hon. Gent.'s invectives, Mr. Dundas proceeded, in the next place, to consider his argument, with reference to the question; and first, to the vehement exclamations of the violation of the constitution, which is so familiar in the mouth of the Hon. Gentleman, and with which he is so sensibly affected, that he cannot sit silent, he cannot rest, he cannot sleep, all the vote of the House is rescinded, and the outrage repaired. I would ask him, said Mr. Dundas, how he slept since the year 1750, when the outrage on the constitution was then as flagrant as now, by the scrutiny between Vaudeput and Trentham? The constitution has survived that shock, and it would be ridiculous to suppose that it will be in the least injured by this. The similarity between the two scrutinies is striking. There were the same exertions, the same contentions of the aristocracy, the same intrigues as now. Both the great men and great women were seen to vie the same condescensions in both cases; and, in point of delay, if there was any difference, he appealed to the evidence before the House, if it was not owing to the manoeuvres of the Hon. Gent. [Mr. Fox] to procrastinate.

He supported the right of the H. B. to have proceeded, without the consent of parties, to scrutinise the parishes where the greatest suspicion of bad votes lay, which was notwithstanding controverted by Mr. F. and was determined by ballot. Would it not then be partial to the last degree, to restrain the H. B. from scrutinising those parishes in their turn, and compel him to make a return before he had fully satisfied his doubts? The House had already gone the length of determining scrutinies to be lawful, even after the return of the writ, should the circumstances of the case require it; surely, this is more agreeable to reason, and consonant to the principles of the constitution, than to declare all scrutinies illegal. If no scrutiny was to be allowed, mark the consequence. At all popular elections, the rabble would be the electors; and if the returning officer was obliged to make his return on their votes, the absurdity to which that would lead is notorious. The fact is, the right of voting in Westminster is not sufficiently ascertained, and a bill is wanting to explain it; but till that is obtained, parliament must not decide against the law of the land, and scrutinies must be permitted, wherever, on probable grounds, they are demanded.

Mr. Le Mesurier being referred to by Mr. Fox in the course of his speech, relative to bad votes in Southwark, as there was a petition against him for Southwark, did not think, in his circumstances, that this question deserved an answer; but being referred to as a gentleman of Indian connections, he felt it necessary to inform the hon. Gentleman, that the connections he had with India were his property in the stock, and the honour he had of a seat at the board of directors; but as to other connections, he was as independent as the hon. Gentleman, or any other member in the House. He was not panting after patronage; for he had neither son, nephew, relation, or friend, that he wanted to prefer, and held his seat in that House by the free voice of his electors.

The question being loudly called for, it was put on the motion, ayes 135; noes 1774; majority 39. The question was then put on Lord Mulgrave's amendment, and carried without a division.

The High Bailiff was then called to the Bar, and the resolutions contained in the amendment just carried were read to him by the Speaker, and a copy of them ordered to be delivered to him.

Col. Fitzpatrick then rose, and gave notice that he had received a petition from the electors of Westminster, praying to be heard by counsel; which he should present on an early day. The House rose at half after six in the morning.

Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, no debates.
Monday, Feb. 14.

Col. Fitzpatrick rose, he said, not to present the petition of which he had before given notice, chusing rather to defer it till the call of the House would ensure him a full attendance, and accordingly gave notice that on Thursday he would move for leave to present it. Mr. Pitt said, that if the prayer of the petition was, to be heard by counsel on a petition of which the House had already disposed, he for one would oppose it, as what the House could not with any propriety consent to receive; but, if the hon. Gent. wished to bring forward that question, he would beg leave to remind him, that business of the greatest national importance was one of the orders of that day.

Col. Fitzpatrick then said, that he would fix it for Friday.

Mr. Fox gave notice, that, having waited for the call of the House, in order to move for papers relative to India affairs, he would make a motion on that subject on Monday next.

Mr. Pitt reminded the Rr. hon. Gent. that when he moved for the call of the House, he gave notice that on Monday next, he intended to lay before the House the outlines of the commercial arrangements with Ireland. He hoped, therefore, that no obstruction might be thrown in the way of that important object.

Mr. Fox did not know that, if he were in the situation of his hon. friend Col. Fitzpatrick, any pre-engagement should prevent him from bringing forward the election business; for, if private grievances were invariably to give way to prior orders on public affairs, it would be easy for ministers to pre-occupy all the early days on crown business, and when that was gone through, to put an end to the session, so that grievances might never be redressed; on this occasion, however, he would not stand in the way of the commercial arrangements with Ireland, which, he said, if his information was to be depended on, had proceeded on the other side of the water in a manner alarming to this country.

Lord Beauchamp, feeling for the hardships of officers old in the naval service, moved that a copy of the plan for the reduction of the marine establishment be laid before the House.

Lord Mulgrave in reply said, that he could see no hardship in the proposed reduction. The officers in the navy were by no means in the same situation with the officers of the army; the latter paid for their commissions, and, when reduced, their property was affected; but the former paid nothing for their commissions, and consequently had no good ground of complaint on that head. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. Pitt then rose, and moved the order of the day for going into committee on the Newfoundland bill. But having already explained the nature of that bill according to our best comprehensions (see p. 141.) any further explanation of it would be only a tedious repetition, as even Mr. Fox, whose discernment is quicker than most men's, declared he did not clearly understand it [at least had not made up his mind upon it]. Thus much, however, may be necessary to say, that while the House were discussing the people of Newfoundland were starving. After the strongest opposition that we have known to a bill of this humane nature, it was suffered to pass for a limited time (seven months) only. It was the principle of the bill, which was thought to encroach upon the navigation act, that was so strongly combated.

Thursday 15.

This day a great deal of public business was gone through without debate.

The House was called over, and a new call was ordered on that day three weeks.

Wednesday 16.

Mr. Francis rose, and called the attention of the House to the civil establishment of Bengal, which, he said, amounted to the enormous sum of 927,945l. greater than the civil list establishment of Great Britain.

In 1774, it amounted only to £. 126,000

In 1776, in consequence of the adjustment of Governor Hastings and council, it rose to 251,533l.

Since which the whole power of the government having devolved on Gov. Hastings, it has amounted to 927,945l.

Among the particulars of this increase he mentioned the following:

New salt-office instituted by Gov. Hastings.

The president of that board (besides being chief of the district of Nudca, the emoluments of which are unknown) it stated to have received

		£. 18,480
Five other members,	First —	13,100
	Second	11,480
	Third	13,183
	Fourth	6,257
	Fifth	10,307

Total expence of this board £. 72,837

That, besides the above, there was a board of customs at Calcutta, the salaries of three officers for management annually £. 23,070

A new committee of revenue, of 5 persons — 47,350

The

The president's salary 10,950l.; of the other four 9,100l. each annually. The president has received besides 4,280l. a year, as ambassador to Madagasc-Saïndia, which he now enjoys, and has enjoyed for several years.

An agent victualler at Fort-William, whose profits on an average of 3 years have amounted to 15,970l. a year, besides 2,200l. a year as post-master; who is yet no higher in the service than a writer.

A committee of grain, whose salaries amount in the whole to 14,100l. a year.

Paymasters of the forces 43,670l. a year, besides a paymaster and accountant at Lucknow 7,640l. a year.

An allowance of 4,280l. a year to a resident at Goa, where there never was a resident.

Chaplains charged to the company 10,428l. a year, though there is not one church in Bengal.

Gov. Gen's. eight aid-de-camps. Besides the above, an innumerable multitude of officers, whose stated profits are immoderate, among whom are agents for providing gunpowder; for supplying military stores; for providing elephants; for supplying boats; for furnishing the army with draught and carriage bullocks; the profits of whose contracts are supposed to amount to more than 50,000l. a year.

Mr. Francis observed, that those expences were greater than could possibly be borne, if any hopes were yet entertained of making India a source of revenue to this country. He could not, however, account for the sudden reduction of the disbursements in Bengal, from 3 millions and a half to 1 million. But, preparatory to what he had further to bring forward on the subject, he would move, That a statement be laid before the House of the salaries and emoluments of the officers in the several departments of revenue, &c. in Bengal in the years 1782 and 1783, compared with their amount in 1776; also for an estimate of the probable resources and expenditure of the Bengal Government, from April 30, 1784, to the 16th of May 1785.

Maj. Scott rose, and replied to Mr. Francis. He declared before God, that nothing he had ever heard in that House had astonished him so much as the speech of the hon. gentleman. He had stated that the emoluments arising to the officers employed in the department of salt were enormous; yet all those emoluments were fixed by the unanimous assent of the supreme council, when that very gentleman was one of the members. And when the House were informed, that for every rupee gained by the members of that board, the Company realised nine, the House would be equally astonished at the hon. gentleman's unfair representation. The fact was, that from 1776 down to 1780 the Company had realised no revenue from salt. In 1780 Gov. Hastings took the manufacture of salt into the Company's hands, and allowed the gentlemen employed in it 10 per cent. for all they worked; [and the reasons for so doing were contained in a minute, signed by the hon. gentleman's own hand; importing, that as the advantage to be derived from the plan would depend on the quantity manufactured, and the economy to be observed in the management, it would be advisable to afford the comptroller and agents some particular inducement to give their utmost attention to those two objects, &c.] The consequence had proved the wisdom of the plan; for after paying all those enormous salaries, as the hon. gentleman has been pleased to call them, and every other expence, the Company have now a net revenue of 590,000l. a year, from which, before, they had sustained an annual loss.

In this manner did Maj. Scott combat almost every charge brought by Mr. Francis against the enormous emoluments shared by the Company's servants. He was himself, he said, sent by Mr. Hastings officially to the hon. gentleman in May or June 1780, to communicate to him a resolution of council, not to suffer army pay-masters to retain balances in their hands, but to allow per centage on their disbursements; this per centage rose, as in England, in time of war, and as now reduced by the peace. The hon. gentleman expresses pleasure to see the military charges reduced so low, but he doubts the fact. Every one knows the difference between war and peace, and what the extraordinaries of an army are. When the estimates in 1782 were made out, it was war; when the last estimates were made out, it was peace. Is there any mystery in accounting for the difference of the two estimates?

Maj. Scott made several other pertinent observations. And

Mr. Francis, in reply, said, the plan of paying the salt-officers by per centage was proposed to him about two months before his departure from India, when he was but little concerned about measures that were to operate long after his departure; he thought the principle might be a good one, and that was all he had consented to. He could not then judge of the abuses that would be made of it; but when they were discovered, they ought to have been reformed.

Mr. Pitt was fully sensible of reductions that were necessary for the salvation of the Company; but as a board had been appointed by act of parliament for regulating the abuses so justly complained of, he hoped, gentlemen would not run a race with the commissioners now actually exerting their utmost in the investigation of that important reform; he, therefore, could not help opposing the motion, which could only tend to obstruct the measure, without producing any possible advantage.

Mr. Erskine's Opinion of the Proceedings of the Court of King's Bench in Ireland by Attachment, written to a Gentleman in high Reputation at the Bar in Dublin.

S 1 R, Bath, Jan. 13. 1785.

I feel myself very much honoured by your application to me on an occasion so important to the publick freedom; and I only lament that neither my age nor experience are such as to give my opinion any authority with the court in which you practice; but wherever I have no doubts, I am always ready to say what I think: and you are, therefore, very welcome to my most publick sentiments, if any use can be made of them.

You have very properly confined your questions to the particular case furnished by the affidavit which you have transmitted to me; and my answers therefore need involve in them no general discussions upon the principles of civil government, which in the mere abstract are not often useful, nor always intelligible. The propositions, to which my answers are meant strictly to apply, are,

First, Whether the facts charged by the affidavit, on which your court of King's Bench is proceeding against the magistrates of Leiden, are sufficient to warrant any criminal prosecution for a misdemeanor whatsoever.

Secondly, Whether, supposing them sufficient to warrant a prosecution by information or indictment, the court has any jurisdiction to proceed by attachment.

As you are pushed in point of time, I can venture to answer both these questions at Bath, without the assistance of my books; because they would throw no light upon the first from its simplicity, and the last is much too clear to require any from them.

As to the first, the facts charged by the affidavit do of themselves neither establish nor exclude guilt in the defendants: in one state of society, such proceedings might be highly criminal; and, in another, truly virtuous and legal.

To create a national delegation amongst a free people, already governed by representation, can never be, under all circumstances, a crime: the objects of such delegation, and the purposes of those who seek to effect it, can alone determine the quality of the act, and the guilt or innocence of the actors.

If it points (no matter upon what necessity) to supersede or to controul the existing governments, it is self-evident, that it cannot be tolerated by its laws. It may be a glorious revolution, but it is rebellion against the government which it changes.

If, on the other hand, it extends no further than to speak with certainty the united voice of the nation to its Representatives, without any derogation of their legislative authority and discretion; it is a legal proceeding, which ought not indeed to be lightly entertained, but which many national conjunctures may render wise and necessary.

GENT. MAG. March 1785.

The Attorney-General might undoubtedly convert the facts, contained in the affidavit, into a legal charge of a high misdemeanor; which, when properly put into the form of an information, the defendants could not demur to: but he could not accomplish this without putting upon the record averments of their criminal purposes and intentions; the truth of which averments are facts which he must establish at the trial, or fail in his prosecution. It is the province of the jury, who are the best judges of the state of the nation, and the most deeply interested in the preservation of its tranquillity, to say, by their verdict, whether the defendants acted from principles of publick spirit, and for the support of good government, or sought seditiously to disturb it. The one or the other of these objects would be collected at the trial, from the conduct of the defendants in summoning the meeting, and the purposes of it met.

If the jury saw reason from the evidence to think that its objects, however coloured by expressions the most guarded and legal, were in effect, and intended to be, subversive of government and order, or calculated to stir up discontent, without adequate objects to vindicate the active attention of the publick, they would be bound in conscience and in law to convict them.

But if, on the other hand, their conduct appeared to be vindicated by publick danger or necessity, directed to legal objects of reformation, and animated by a laudable zeal for the honour and prosperity of the nation; then no departure from accustomed forms in the manner of assembling, nor any incorrect expressions in the description of their object, would bind or even justify the jury to convict them as libellers of the government, or disturbers of its peace.

To constitute a legal charge of either of these offences, the crown (as I before observed) must aver the criminal intention, which is the essence of every crime; and these averments must be either proved at the trial, or, if to be inferred, prima facie, from the facts themselves, may be rebutted by evidence of the defendants innocent purposes. If the criminal intent charged by the information be not established to the satisfaction of the jury, the information, which charges it, is not true; and they are bound to say so by a verdict of acquittal.

I am therefore of opinion (in answer to the first question) that the defendants are liable to be prosecuted by information; but that the success of such prosecution ought to depend upon the opinion which the people of Ireland, forming a jury, shall entertain of their intention in summoning the meeting, and the real bona fide objects of the assembly when met.

It is unnecessary to enlarge upon these principles, because their notoriety has no doubt suggested this novel attempt to proceed by attachment

ment where they have no place; and I cannot help remarking that the prosecutor (if his prosecution be founded in policy or justice) has acted with great discretion, by shewing that he is afraid to trust the people with that decision upon it which belongs to them by the constitution; and which they are more likely to give with impartial justice, than the judges whom he desires to decide upon it at the expence of their oaths and of the law.

This is a strong expression, which perhaps I should not have used in answering the same case in the ordinary course of business; but writing to you as a gentleman, I have no scruple in saying, that the judges of the court of King's-Bench cannot entertain a jurisdiction by attachment over the matter contained in the affidavit which you have sent me, without such a gross usurpation and abuse of power as would make me think it my duty, were I a member of the Irish parliament, to call them to account for it by impeachment.

The rights of the superior courts to proceed by attachment, and the limitations imposed upon that right, are established upon principles plain to be misunderstood.

Every court must have power to enforce its own process, and to vindicate contempts of its authority; otherwise the laws would be despised; and this obvious necessity at once produces and limits the process of attachment.

Wherever any act is done by a court which the subject is bound to obey, obedience may be enforced, and disobedience punished, by that summary proceeding. Upon this principle attachments issued against officers for contempts in not obeying the process of courts directed to them as the ministerial servants of the law, and the parties on whom such process is served, may in like manner be attached for disobedience.

Many other cases might be put in which it is a legal proceeding, since every act which tends directly to frustrate the mandates of a court of justice is a contempt of its authority. But I may venture to lay down this distinct and absolute limitation of such process, viz. That it can only issue in cases where the court, which issues it, has awarded some process; given some judgement; made some legal order; or done some act, which the party against whom it issues, or others on whom it is binding, have either neglected to obey, contumaciously refused to submit to; excited others to defeat by artifice or force, or treated with terms of contumely and disrespect.

But no crime, however enormous, even open treason and rebellion, which carry with them a contempt of all law, and the authority of all courts, can possibly be considered as a contempt of any particular court, so as to be punishable by attachment; unless the act, which is the object of that punishment, be in direct violation or obstruction of something previously done by the court which issues it, and which the party attached was bound, by some antecedent proceeding of it, to make the rule of his conduct. A constructive extension of contempt beyond the limits of this plain principle would evidently involve every misdemeanor, and deprive the subject of the trial by jury in all cases where the punishment does not extend to touch his life.

The peculiar excellence of the English government consists in the right of being judged by the country in every criminal case, and not by fixed magistrates appointed by the crown. In the higher order of crimes the people alone can accuse, and, without their leave distinctly expressed by an indictment found before them, no man can be capitally arraigned; and in all the lesser misdemeanors, which either the crown or individuals borrowing its authority may prosecute, the safety of individuals and the public freedom absolutely depend upon the well-known immemorial right of every defendant, to throw himself upon his country for deliverance by the general plea of not guilty. By that plea, which in no such case can be demurred to by the crown, or questioned by its judges, the whole charge comes before the jury on the general issue, who have a jurisdiction co-extensive with the accusation, the exercise of which, in every instance, the authority of the court can neither limit, supersede, controul, or punish.

Whenever this ceases to be the law of England, the English constitution is at an end, and its period in Ireland is arrived already if the court of King's Bench can convert every crime by construction into a contempt of its authority, in order to punish by attachment.

By this proceeding the party offended is the judge; creates the offence without any previous promulgation; avoids the doubtful and tedious ceremony of proof, by forcing the defendant to accuse himself; and inflicts an arbitrary punishment, which, if not submitted to and revered by the nation as law, is to be the parent of new contempts, to be punished like the former.

As I live in England, I leave it to the parliament and people of Ireland to consider what is their duty, if such authority is assumed and exercised by their judges: If it ever happens in this country, I shall give my opinion.

It is sufficient for me to have given you my judgement as a lawyer upon both your questions; yet, as topics of policy can never be misplaced when magistrates are to exercise a discretionary authority, I cannot help concluding with an observation, which both the crown and its courts would do well to attend to upon every occasion.

The great objects of criminal justice are reformation and example; but neither of them are to be produced by punishments which the laws will not warrant: on the contrary, they convert the offender into a suffering patriot; and that crime which would have been abhorred for its malignity, and the contagion of which would have been extinguished by a legal prosecution, unites an injured nation tion under the banners of the criminal, to protect the great rights of the community, which in his person have been endangered.

These, Sir, are my sentiments, and you may make what use of them you please. I am a zealous friend to a reform of the representation of the people in the parliaments of both kingdoms, and a sincere admirer of that spirit and perseverance which in these days, when every important consideration is swallowed up in luxury and corruption, has so eminently distinguished the people of your country.

The interests of both nations are in my opinion the same; and I sincerely hope that neither ill-timed severity on the part of government, nor precipitate measures on the part of the people of Ireland, may disturb that harmony between the remaining parts of the empire, which ought to be held more sacred, from a reflection on what has been lost.

I have the honour to be,

Sir, your most obedient,
and humble-servant,

T. EKSKINE.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRACTIONS have long prevailed in Holland, and are now carried to so great a length as even to threaten the dissolution of the union. The party of the prince of Orange seems to lose ground, and his betraying a want of fortitude to support his cause. As if the prince's conduct wanted an apology, they have caused a paper to be circulated throughout the provinces, full of condescension, and destitute of that magnanimity that was ever the characteristic of his warlike ancestors.

In the paper alluded to, of which the following is the substance, he is made to complain of being falsely and maliciously represented as fomenting a spirit of rebellion in the country, with the design of aggrandizing his own power, and of even aspiring to sovereignty;—of such a contempt to his authority, that in the flat country the people have refused obedience to the orders of the high regency, for practising the military exercise, and putting themselves in a capacity of defending the state; the consequence of which mutinous disposition must naturally tend to undermine the foundation of public security, to disregard the duty of subordination, and to draw upon the delinquents the utmost rigour of the law. His highness therefore thinks it necessary to exculpate himself, by a solemn declaration, not only of never having entertained such views as have been imputed to him, but of his utter abhorrence of all measures tending in any shape to the unlawful increase of his power: to the infringement of the public liberty, or to that of individuals. Having said this, he sets before their H. M. M. the debilitated state of the republic; which, without foreign troops, or foreign allies, is in no condition to make resistance against a prince so formidable as its present enemy; but must either sink under the first attack, or be forced to yield to the pretensions of the Emperor, so ruinous to the republic, as well by the diminution of its real force, as by the destruction of the principal branches of its prosperity.—Such being the present calamitous situation of the country, brought forward by the intrigues of faction, and the violence of party rage, his Highness enters into his own justification. On our part, says his Highness, having from the first moment of our administration done our utmost to put the republic in such a situation, that, without depending on other powers, it might have rested upon itself alone for its security, and have acquired, by alliances reciprocally advantageous, a just right to assistance in case of an attack, we have left no cause for censure or reproach. On the contrary, we now again offer to employ our influence, our property, and our person, in the defence of our country, and to sacrifice them all in so good a cause, if such should be the pleasure of the Almighty Disposer of human events.

This paper appears to have had no other effect than to irritate rather than conciliate the opposite party, which is so firmly devoted to the interests of France, as to leave no hope of the ancient system of reciprocal friendship with Great Britain ever being again restored.

The following is given as the translation of an official paper from his Most Christian Majesty to the Emperor. [Though some late circumstances render its authenticity doubtful, yet, as it was at first generally received as genuine, we have been induced to lay it before our readers.]

“THE sincere friendship which attaches the King to the Emperor, and the wishes of his Majesty for the maintainance of public tranquillity, make it his duty to come to an explanation with his Imperial Majesty on the difference between that Monarch and the United Provinces.

“The King has the less hesitation in expressing his thoughts on this important subject, as the purity of his intentions cannot be called in question. His Majesty, while, in compliance with the solicitations of both parties, he employs his good offices to effect a reconciliation, has carefully abstained from giving any opinion on the foundation of his Imperial Majesty's first pretensions. The King still prescribes to himself the same silence; but his concern for the glory of the Emperor authorizes the observation, that his first pretensions, and the demand for opening the Scheldt, are distinct propositions, and cannot be considered under the same point of view.

“The

"The Dutch, while they refused their compliance with the demand, only supposed a right which is secured to them by a solemn treaty, and which they look upon as the basis of their prosperity and even existence.

"It seems to result from thence, that the refusal of the States General ought to have no other effect than to bring back the negotiation begun at Brussels, and to establish a discussion on the result of which the respective claims ought naturally to depend.

"The King would the more earnestly desire this measure to be adopted, as it would prevent hostilities, and might lead to equitable arrangements.

"By pursuing an opposite conduct, it is feared, the Emperor will excite a general uneasiness, and that most of the powers will think themselves obliged to take such precautions as events may require. The King himself must be under the necessity of assembling troops on his frontiers. Besides, his Majesty cannot by any means be indifferent to the fate of the United Provinces, or see them attacked by open force in their rights and possessions, in the very moment when he is on the point of concluding with the Republic an alliance, the fundamental articles of which were agreed on before the late differences.

"If, by considerations of so great importance, the Emperor can be induced to suspend all marks of hostility, and listen to the voice of moderation and humanity, the King renews the offer of his mediation to procure an equitable and suitable accommodation, which he will the more zealously strive to bring about, as, while he obeys the dictates of his personal regard to the Emperor, he will have the satisfaction to concur in extinguishing, in its first seeds, a war, the consequences of which cannot but be dreaded."

It has been already remarked, that the claim of the Emperor to the free navigation of the Scheldt (see vol. LIV. p. 948). could not be his only motive for alarming Europe with his military preparations, which were by far too great for the object he pretended to have in view. In imitation of the King of Prussia, whose example his Imperial Majesty seems to copy, his designs remain a secret, till they are ripe for execution, or till they can no longer be concealed. The grand project he had in view, for uniting Bavaria to the Austrian Dominions, has at length found its way into the public prints. What effect this measure may produce a few months will discover. All that can now be said upon the subject depends upon appearances. The preparations for war are every where continued. His Imperial Majesty's Journey to Brussels is no longer talked of. No answer appears yet to be given by the Emperor to the proffered mediation of the court of France; nor are the sentiments of the King of Prussia on this important exchange publicly known; though letters from Ratis-bon, of a late date, say positively, that the treaty of cession of Bavaria to the House of Austria is already signed; and other letters from Versailles go farther, and assure, that the treaty has been notified in form to the court of France, yet neither of these reports seem well founded. This cession is in direct opposition to the wishes of the Bavarian Noblesse, who have strongly remonstrated against it, and has revived the rooted enmity between the Bavarians and the Palatines, which never can be reconciled.

Their representations were not without effect; their sovereign, perceiving the report to be spread with a confidence that gained it universal credit, thought fit to remove their anxiety by the following declaration:

"CHARLES THEODORE, ELECTOR, &c.

"We have caused to be read to Us your humble representations, with regard to a pretended treaty for exchange of countries, which was said to be signed Jan. 2, between Us and the Imperial Court. That report, published in the news-papers, is destitute of foundation; and the convention with the Imperial Court, ratified and signed by Us Jan. 3, only concerned the difference relative to the limits between Bavaria and Inverriel. This information we give you to quiet your minds. Done at Munich, Feb. 13, 1785."

Some treasonable practices have been discovered for putting Maastricht into the possession of the Emperor. The discovery is said to have been made by the King of Prussia.

Troops are levying in all parts of Bohemia, Moravia, Hungary, and in short throughout all the Emperor's dominions; and it is assured, that the year 1785 will be the most remarkable era in the reign of Joseph II. The Emperor's forces, when completed, will amount to 600,000 fighting men. The motions of the Austrian troops are narrowly watched by the King of Prussia. An army of 30,000 Prussians and 12,000 Saxons are ready to form a camp at Konigslein; while another Prussian army of 80,000 are assembling in the neighbourhood of Schweidnitz, to penetrate, if occasion should require, into Bohemia and Moravia. This does not carry the appearance of peace.

By the ultimatum delivered by Comte de Mercy, the Imperial minister at Paris, to M. de Vergennes, the Emperor enforces his demand, that the navigation of the Scheldt shall be free and open; all duties and tolls abolished; the forts of Lillo and Lusenhock to be delivered into his hands, and those of Kruys-Schans and Frederic-Henry demolished; the country called Outre-Meuse and Vraemhaven surrendered; and that his sovereignty over all that part of the Scheldt from Antwerp to the extremity of Saflingore be acknowledged.—Should these terms be insisted on, war will be inevitable.

The convention between the city of Dantzick and the King of Prussia, which has been long in negotiation, is now declared to be finally finally concluded. See Vol. LIII and LIV.

The States of Brabant, ecclesiastical and civil, having been assembled by summons, the Emperor's Chancellor de Crumpypen acquainted them in form with the purpose of their meeting, and demanded the loan of four millions, to be repaid in a manner to be afterwards agreed upon; with which requisition the States thought proper to comply.

The accounts from Transylvania differ widely as to the fate of Horiah (see p. 147). Some say he insists on being tried by the laws of his country; while others assert, that his sentence is already passed; that he is to be carried through the principal towns in which he committed his ravages, is to receive 50 blows with a baton in each; and, if he survives, is to work among the felons on the Danube for life; and every year, on the anniversary of his rebellion, is to receive the same punishment.—This, however, seems rather to be an ideal sentence proportioned to his offence, than a real legal punishment authorized by the laws.

The Spanish minister holds frequent conferences with the Secretary of the Divan at Constantinople, for the purpose of suppressing the piracies of the Algarines in the Mediterranean (see p. 66.); in consequence of which, a Capegi Bacha has been sent to Algiers, threatening the Republicans with the effects of his Sublime Highness's utmost indignation, in case they persevere in committing the hostilities complained of. Little stress, however, is laid upon these threatenings. The Spaniards are busy in making preparations, which it is wished may prove effectual. A grand expedition is again meditating against the Algerines at Cadiz; in which the Portuguese, Venetians, Maltese, and French, are to join, of which Count O'Reilly is to take the command, assisted by some of the ablest engineers in Europe. A great number of land-forces are to be employed, and many foreigners of distinction have already offered themselves as volunteers.

ADVICES FROM THE EAST-INDIES.

On the 28th past an officer of the Royal Navy arrived at the Admiralty-office with dispatches from Adm. Sir Richard Hughes, brought by the Juno frigate, Capt. Montagu, who sailed from Bengal the 28th of Sept. The advices are, that the French squadron is still formidable in those seas, and that the Dutch have at Ceylon five ships of the line besides frigates; that the several articles of peace with Tippoo Sultan were carried completely into execution, and that the Carnatic army were in cantonments; that Gov. Hastings had left Lucknow, and was soon expected at Calcutta, and that all was peace and tranquillity in Bengal, and in every part of Hindustan. Sir Edward Hughes's letters to government contain in substance, that he sailed from Bombay on the 12th of March last with the Sultan flag-ship of 74 guns; Defence 74; Eagle 64; Worcester 64; Bristol 60; Active 32; Juno 32; Eurydice, and Lizard cutter of 14 guns; having on board 1100 troops chiefly Europeans, that were wanting on the coast of Coromandel; and arrived in Madras road on the 23d of April; that he intended going down soon to Trincomale, to finish with the French Commandant those matters which had not yet been settled. This is all that has transpired.

The French accounts, however, are not so favourable. Their ministers are said to have received a return of the surveys of the Nicobar islands, situated in the entrance to the gulph of Mulacca; and the report transmitted by M. Bussy is, that these islands may be of the greatest utility in case of another war with England, as they afford good anchorage, and a safe retreat for the King's ships from the dangers of the monsoons;—and, what is still more, no ship can either pass or repass to China without being intercepted, as the straits of Sunda are always guarded in time of war; and then they have no other possible passage but the dangerous straits of Ballay and Lindbuc. For these reasons it is said, that the French intend to take possession and to fortify them.

The Dutch are likewise strengthening their fortifications in Ceylon.

M. Bussy positively refuses to deliver up Trincomale to the English, but declares himself willing to surrender it to the Dutch.

The French have taken possession of the Great Andaman Islands, so that they have now two harbours in the bay; while we are left without a place of shelter for our fleet.

All the powers of the East are making preparations as if they were jealous of each other, and apprehensive of being attacked. Our nation seems to sleep in security. The payment of the debts of the Nabob of Arcot engrosses their attention. Gov. Hastings has recovered most of the debts from the Nabob Visier of Oude; and the rains that have fallen in that country afford a fair prospect of a plentiful season throughout.

WEST INDIA INTELLIGENCE.

By the Thynne packet, lately arrived, the dispatches from Adm. Sir Richard Hughes and Gov. Sherley import, that the dispute with the Caribees is nearly compromised; that all the settlements had good seasons last year, and made large quantities of rum and sugar, but they are greatly at a loss for barrel staves, &c. which they are obliged to procure under-hand by a kind of contraband trade from the French at Martinico at very high prices.

INTELLIGENCE FROM IRELAND.

The following Resolutions of the two Houses of Parliament of Ireland shew how well satisfied the people of that sister kingdom are with the eleven Resolutions moved by by Mr. Secretary Orde, as the basis of the commercial system.

Die Mercurii, 16 Feb. 1785.

"Resolved, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons in Parliament assembled, That the said Resolutions be laid before his Majesty, together with an humble Address, to assure his Majesty, that they are thoroughly sensible of his Majesty's unwearied attention to the welfare and happiness of his subjects; that our gratitude is peculiarly due to his Majesty for the measures, which, since the last session of parliament, have been taken by his Royal Command towards forming the arrangement of commercial intercourse between Great-Britain and Ireland; that, with the most sanguine hope, they look forward to the confirmation of these Resolutions, containing the principles upon which they trust the commercial interests of the two nations will be finally established; when these shall be happily and fully carried into effect, through his Majesty's paternal goodness, and the wisdom and liberality of his parliaments of Great-Britain and Ireland, they shall, with the most sincere satisfaction, behold a system established upon the firm basis of reciprocal advantages, which will effectually strengthen and cement the common interest and mutual affection of both kingdoms, and will indissolubly unite the efforts of all his Majesty's subjects of Great-Britain and Ireland, in maintaining the strength, increasing the resources, and extending the power and credit of the British empire; and that it is their fervent prayer that his Majesty may long possess the true reward of a great and generous mind, in beholding the blessings derived under his royal auspices, and in receiving the just tribute of the most zealous duty and attachment, from his royal and affectionate people.

Dublin Castle, Feb. 20. Being appointed for celebrating her Majesty's birth day, the flag was displayed on Bedford Tower; the great guns in Phoenix Park were fired three rounds, and answered by volleys from the regiments in garrison. At noon there was a very numerous assembly at the Castle; and in the evening a play was given by his Grace to the Ladies; and at night bonfires, illuminations, and other demonstrations of joy throughout the city. Gaz.

Our manufacturers would soon repent the change, were they to emigrate to Ireland.

ADVICES FROM SCOTLAND.

Edinburgh, March 9. The silver plate taken in April 1778, by the crew of the Ranger American privateer, then commanded by Paul Jones, from the Rt. Hon. the Earl of Selkirk, was last week sent back to his Lordship by Paul Jones, carriage-paid.

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE.

Feb. 26.

CAME on, at the Old Bailey, the trial of Jacques Phillippe Hardy, secretary to the Count de Mirabeau, for stealing several of his master's effects, part here, and part in France. The trial having proceeded to some length, and there appearing no sufficient evidence on which to convict the prisoner, Mr. Justice Buller recommended it to the counsel for the prosecution to drop it. This was agreed to by the Count, provided his motives for commencing it might be permitted mitted to be explained to the court, and to the public; to which no opposition was made. It appeared, that the Count had received his trunk almost empty from Paris, and that among the articles missing were some confidential papers that had been entrusted to the prisoner: that, in hopes of recovering those papers, Sir Gilbert Elliott had advised the Count, to apply for a warrant to apprehend his secretary; but this not having the desired effect, (the warrant not having been executed till more than ten days after it had been issued,) Sir Gilbert, to clear the Count of any malicious intention, advised the carrying the affair into court, which he was now ready to drop, at the recommendation of the bench.

Judge Buller then directed the jury to acquit the prisoner, at the same time approving the propriety of the prosecution on the grounds on which it was undertaken; which however did not, in his opinion, affect the character of the prisoner.—Such was the issue of this business, which has occasioned much talk here and at Paris.

Feb. 28.

The purser of the Sandwich East India-man arrived at the India-house with advice of the safe arrival of that ship at Plymouth.

TUESDAY, March 1.

Being the annual feast of the Society of Ancient Britons, the same was celebrated with more than usual splendor, the right hon. Lord Viscount Hereford being President. The collection for the benefit of the charity, including one hundred guineas from the Prince of Wales, amounted to 476l. 8s.

Dr. Jeffries, the aerostat, who accompanied M. Blanchard in his hazardous voyage across the British channel, was honoured with the freedom of the town and port of Dover, as a mark of applause.—M. Vander Monde proposes to construct an aerostatic ship, to circumnavigate the globe through the medium of air, as other navigators have done through the medium of water. He insists that there are currents of air to be met with in the atmosphere every where.

An epidemical fever, which has raged for some time in the county of Gloucester, is said to have lately carried off a great number of poor. At Norton, within five miles of Gloucester, there lived, in two adjoining tenements, two families; in one, a man and his wife, and three children; in the other, a man and his wife: of these there was only one alive on the first of March.

Mr. Fox moved, in the House of Commons, extracts of orders from the Committee of Directors of the East India Company to their servants in India, to be laid before the House, agreeable to the 37th and 38th clauses of the late act, which, after warm debates, was negatived, 164 to 69.

In the House of Peers, Lord Carlisle made a motion tending to the same end, viz. that the debts claimed by British subjects from the Nabob of Arcot, should not be put into a course of payment till the origin and justice of those debts contracted contrary to the orders of the East India Company, shall be previously examined.—This motion had in view the payment of the debts due to the Company, in preference to other debts, that the Company might thereby be enabled to discharge their debt to the public. It passed in the negative, 73 to 29.

Wednesday 3.

Mr. Flood (in the Irish Parliament) moved for leave to bring in a bill for a more equal representation of the people, which was agreed to. He said, he did not mean to bring it in, till he had seen the fate of a like bill about to be introduced into the British Parliament.

The following malefactors, who were capitally convicted last January session, were executed on the scaffold at Newgate, viz. Edward Payne, for robbing the Dutch ship Elbe of a large quantity of dollars (see vol. LIV. p. 791); John Brice, for robbing the house of Mr. Whiting, of Lime-house, of a great quantity of plate; Thomas Brown, for robbing James Cook on the highway of his watch and six guineas; Samuel Davis, for robbing Mr. Lowth of his gold watch near Covent-Garden play-house; and William Hart, for robbing Mr. Walker on the highway near Southgate of his watch and money. They all behaved decently. Brice was a hair-dresser, in good business, in Ratcliff-highway.

Thursday 3.

Mr. Sawbridge moved, that the High Bailiff of Westminster, having finished his poll on the 17th of May last, the day previous to the return of the writ, be forthwith ordered to make his return.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer opposed the motion, and moved to adjourn.

Lord Surrey objected to it; and Sir W. Dolben supported it.

On the question being put for adjournment, it was negatived, 162 to 124; and of course the original motion carried without a division;—Lord Hood and Mr. Fox have since been returned.

The Committee of Supply voted 940,000l. for the building and repairs of ships.

Friday 4.

The metropolis and its neighbourhood having been for some days disturbed with a report of the plague having been in the Lock Hospital, owing to a putrid fever which had seized some of the inhabitants; the following notice will serve to shew the pains the committee took to undeceive the public, as well as the scientific, classical, manner which they shewed their zeal.

“Lock Hospital, near Hyde-park-corner, March 4, 1785. Whereas a report prevails, that there is an infectious disease now raging in this Hospital:—This is to assure the pub-lie, that every person in the Hospital, both servants and PATIENTS, are in PERFECT HEALTH. By order of the Committee."

A duel was fought between Lieut. F. son of Gen. F. then quartered in the Old Barracks at Chatham, and a gentleman of the name of Gordon, who was on a visit to his brother, an officer in the same barracks, when Mr. G. was so desperately wounded in one of his legs, that the limb was obliged to be cut off. The affair took its rise from a quarrel at cards.

Saturday 5.

The session at the Old Bailey, which began on Wednesday the 23d of February, ended, when 33 convicts received judgement of death. Among them were Holland Palmer and Anne Jones, for forging and uttering two-penny stamp receipts, a crime which may prove of the most pernicious consequence, as receipts written upon such stamps would not be allowed in evidence.

Monday 7.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer in Ireland [Mr. Foster] moved for leave to bring in a bill for the extension of trade, by exempting bounties and drawbacks from all fees whatever. This is intended to remove a very great grievance, which had arisen to such a height, that bounties and drawbacks were eaten up in fees for receiving them.

Tuesday 8.

The Lady Mayoress gave a splendid route and ball at the Mansion-house, at which were present many of the nobility and persons of distinction. The ball was opened by the Lord Mayor and Miss Spencer.

Wednesday 9.

The order of the day being read, for rescinding the resolution of the House on the 8th of June last, relative to the Westminster scrutiny; Mr. Francis rose, and reprobated the whole transaction as illegal, and, if suffered to remain on the Journals, would prove a most dangerous precedent.

Mr. Bastard thought there was another way to get rid of the disgrace, and that was by a bill; and if Ministers would promise to bring in such a bill, or countenance it when brought in, he would vote against the present motion.

The Attorney General thought the question a mighty modest one, viz. that the House should acknowledge themselves either rogues or fools in the votes they had already given, and dupes in what they were now to give. The next demand, he supposed, would be, that the House should make the amende honorable, and appear before the Westminster electors, in Westminster-hall, in white sheets, making humble confession of their guilt! The motion was negatived, 242 to 137.

Saturday 12.

A gang of fresh-water pirates broke open the hatches of one of the custom-house lighters lying along-side a West Indiaman, from which they stole 49 bags of Jamaica pepper; but, not content with their booty, they were going on board the ship, had not the watch been upon their guard, who fired upon them, notwithstanding which they made their escape. It appeared that they came in three boats, one of which was seized by some custom-house officers with 12 of the bags on board.

Sunday 13.

A remarkable high tide in the river Thames did considerable damage to the cellars and warehouses on both sides that river.

Mr. Orde, Secretary to the Duke of Rutland, arrived in town from Ireland and waited on the King.

Monday 14.

Lord Mahon moved for leave to bring in a bill for reducing into one act all the acts made to prevent bribery and corruption at elections. Agreed to. Also moved for leave to bring in a bill for securing the rights of voters at elections.

The tea sale commenced at the East-India-House. The buyers were not uncommonly numerous, nor did the altercations that were expected between the tea-dealers and directors, on account of damaged teas, take place.

At half past twelve A. M. a fire broke out at the house of Mr. Rivier, N^o. 4. in Scots Yard, Bath-lane: nobody was in the house but two maid servants, who had lighted a fire, and gone to bed, intending to get up to wash in three or four hours; upon being awakened, they attempted to come down stairs, but found it impossible, the fire having got to such a height, that their hands were burnt by taking hold of the bannisters; and they supposed the first floor had already fallen in, upon which they retreated, and made their escape over the roofs over the houses. The night was very calm; there was plenty of water, and immediate assistance; and by five o'clock the fury of the fire was subdued, having completely destroyed Mr. Rivier's house and all its contents (except a few trifles that have since been found among the rubbish) burnt a considerable part of the two houses on each side, and damaged the backs of about half a dozen in Cannon-street.

It may render the Public some service to record this, if it tends in any degree to stop a practice which is too common in many families.

Tuesday 15.

A court of Aldermen was held at Guild-hall, when a complaint came to be heard, that several barbers, who had been chosen constables, had refused to serve, alledging, that by the act for separating the Barbers for the Surgeons they were exempt. The consideration was adjourned, and the Recorder and Common Serjeant desired to give their opinion.

Wednesday 16.

Lord Muncaster presented a petition, signed by a number of Westminster electors, complaining plaining of the return of Mr. Fox; and moved; that it be considered on the 23d of June. Agreed to.

Sunday 20.

The French ambassador, while talking to Ld. Salisbury at court, was suddenly seized with a paralytic stroke, which, for some time, deprived him of his speech and the use of one side. He was immediately attended by Dr. Gisborne, and, being carried home, soon recovered the use of his speech.

Wednesday 23.

Count Zambecari and Adm. Sir E. Vernon made an aerial trip from the cheap-bread warehouse in Tottenham Court Road, to a ploughed field about 3 miles beyond King's field, near Horsham in Sussex, distant from London 35 miles, which they sailed in less than an hour. This seems to have been by far the most hazardous voyage that has yet been made. At first setting out, the wind tore away the lower part of the netting, and broke the glass at the lower part of the machine through which the string of the valve passed, in consequence of which, a piece of silk was hastily applied to stop the aperture, and the string in the hurry left in the inside, by which they were deprived of the means of descending at pleasure; but this was not all. When they were far above the clouds, three of the strings that attached the boat to the balloon gave way almost at once, by which it is not to be wondered that they were desirous to change their element; but all means of descending seemed out of their power, till the Count thought of cutting the silken tubes, which fortunately gave the necessary exit to the inflammable air; but not before the balloon had mounted so high, that the clouds appeared at a great distance below, and the sun shone very bright; at the same time the quicksilver in the barometer fell suddenly to 20: 8, whereas on earth it stood at 30: 4. The distance nearly 2 miles, in perpendicular height to which the balloon had reached. In descending, they passed through a dense cloud which covered them with snow, and felt very cold; but their motion being then very rapid, they soon arrived safe without any other accident. The observations they made were, that the balloon kept perpetually turning round its vertical axis, sometimes so rapidly as to make each revolution in 4 or 5 seconds; that a peculiar noise was heard like rustling among the clouds; and that in their descent the air was cold, and the balloon much agitated.

Saturday 26.

The Readings, a new species of elegant entertainment, introduced by Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Henderson, at Freemasons Hall, ended. Of this entertainment we shall give some farther account.

Monday 28.

About five, A. M. a fire broke out in the GENT. MAG. March, 1785.

laundry at the fine seat of Earl Spencer, at Wimbledon, in Surrey, which, for want of water, burnt with such violence, that the whole house was destroyed, and the greatest part of the valuable furniture consumed by the flames.

Thursday 31.

A mutual explanation and agreement is now finally settled between France and Britain, for delivering up of felons on both sides, on demand being made of them by their respective sovereigns. This explanation happened in consequence of the prosecution long carried on in France against Charles Clutterbuck, late one of the clerks of the Bank of England, which has at length been brought to a final conclusion, and his sentence of condemnation for life to the gallows confirmed. He was first tried for defrauding the Bank Royal of England, but, by a flaw in the indictment, his case was reserved, which his most Christian Majesty has since sitten in judgement upon and decided.

METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.

On the 13th of January the barometer was higher at Leeds in Yorkshire than ever remembered in that town, being 30. 80. wind E. and high, but fell as the wind shifted to N. and N. W. a great fall of snow was followed by intense frost. Saturday 19, an excellent Fahrenheit's thermometer stood at 7. 25. deg. below the freezing point. On New-year's-day 1784 the same thermometer stood at 8. In December the thermometer was as low as 6, see vol. LIV. p. 952. a degree of cold greater than has been felt in England these many years.

A meteorological correspondent assures us from observation, that from the 18th of October till the present time, which is a period of 143 days, there have been only 26 in which the thermometer has not been from one to 18 degrees and an half below the freezing point, which is a more constant succession of cold weather than has been known in this climate. Last year there were 89 days of frost, and in the year 1779 there were 84; in 1763 there were 94 days of frost, and in the celebrated winter of 1739 there were only 103, which are 12 fewer than in the present winter.

Lloyd's Ev. Post.

On the evening of the 13th of February the sea in sight of Alicant appeared as if on fire. This wonderful phenomenon excited every body's curiosity, though nobody could account for the cause. The fire shone splendidly in the water, and its brilliancy increased as the waves drew nearer the shore. When they broke upon it, they sent forth an infinite number of luminous particles, some great, some small, which flew to a considerable distance. This appearance began at half an hour after seven, and lasted three hours.

New

NEW DISCOVERIES AND INVENTIONS.

A Frenchman has discovered a method of making helmets, for the army, of prepared leather, musket-proof, and impenetrable by any cutting instrument used in battle, and withall so light as to be worn with the greatest ease. The Prince de Conde and the Comte Maillebois are in earnest to introduce them in their legions.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

The two prizes of 25l. each bequeathed by the late Rev. and learned Dr. Smith, master of Trinity College Cambridge, to those junier Bachelors of Arts who shall appear to be the best proficient in mathematics and natural philosophy, were this year adjudged to Mr. Lay of Trinity, and Mr. Dudley of Clare-hall.

Two prizes of 15 guineas, proposed to be given by Lord Euston and Mr. Pitt, to two senior Bachelors of Arts, and the like to two Middle Bachelors, who shall compose the best exercises in Latin Prose, to be read by them on a day hereafter to be appointed, near the Commencement, the Vice Chancellor of Cambridge gives notice, that the subjects for this year are.

For the Senior Bachelors,

An liceat nolentes in civitatem dare?

For the Middle Bachelors,

Utrum civis perniciosus acrioribus suppliciis quam acerrimus hostis sit coercendus?

The academy of Sciences, &c. at Dijon, have proposed the following subject for the prize of 1786. "To determine from their respective properties the difference between phlogiston and the matter of heat." No satisfactory memoir having been presented on the subject of last year, "The Theory of Winds," the academy has been obliged again to recommend it to the attention of the learned. The prize is double, and the time for presenting is unlimited.

The valuable collection of the late Dr. Askew's manuscripts have brought at a sale above two thousand pounds; amongst them were some very scarce books, with written annotations by some of the most learned men in Europe. Upon the doctor's death some years ago, they were offered to be sold to a great personage for two thousand guineas, but were refused on account of the magnitude of the price.

MEMORABILIA.

Meetings have been numerous, during the month past of almost all the manufacturing-towns in England and Scotland, in opposition to the plan for a commercial intercourse between the sister kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland; and not a few (if the papers may be credited) of the most considerable Manufacturers have threatened to remove the manufactories to Ireland if the propositions held forth and accepted by Ireland should take place here.—But were the manufacturers of England to remove to Ireland, the price of labour and provisions would soon increase there, and they would find themselves fatally disappointed. The English way of living once introduced among the lower class of people in Ireland would produce a change ruinous to both kingdoms.

The principles of peace, which characterize the society of Quakers and forbid them from taking any part in wars or to partake of any profits arising from wars, have been lately eminently displayed by one of these peaceable people, who, being involuntarily drawn in by his partners to take part in some privateers during the late war, or receiving his dividend, sent his son to Paris, to notify the names of all the ships taken by these privateers, and to apply to Dr. Edw. Ling, Fox Hotel at York, Rue Jacob à Paris, to receive their respective proportions of his share.

Mrs. Page, of Buxted, in Suffolk, was suddenly seized with a pain in her gums, of which she had only time to say it ran all through her before she expired.

On the 11th of March, in the afternoon, the tide at North Shields ran in more rapidly than has ever been known: wind N. and N. E. blew hard, with hail and snow. Ships drove on ships, and the whole harbour was a scene of confusion.

An ewe, the property of a servant to Mr. Philips, of Chipping Norton, cased five lambs, on the 26th past.

Four soldiers quartered at Terlemont, to warm the room in which they were to sleep, procured some charcoal, and set it on fire before they went to sleep. In the morning they were all found dead by the suffocating vapour of the charcoal.

From the statement of the Board of Mines, transmitted to the Mine-office at Madrid, it appears that in the course of last year 903 workmen were sent to the general hospital, 805 of whom were soon dismissed cured, 67 died, and 31 whose cases required farther relief remained. This fact, which is well established, proves how ill-founded the common prejudices against working in the mines of mercury are, as being prejudicial to health.

REMARKABLE ROBBERY.

On Monday the 7th of February, about eight in the evening, a man knocked at the door of Mrs. Abercrombie in Charlotte-street, in Rathbone Place, calling out Post. The maid opened the door, and instantly rushed in the villain with six others, threatening the girl with horrid imprecations if she spoke a word. They then went into the parlour, robbed Mrs. Abercrombie of her jewels, between 50 and 60 guineas in cash, and all the linen and cloaths they could pack up. While they were thus employed, the girl found means to get out at the back door; and though the whole neighbourhood was alarmed, the villains fought their way through and escaped.

General Honeywood, (see p. 159) was colonel of the 3d reg. of drag. guards. He received no less than twenty-three broad-sword wounds at the battle of Dettingen, in which he so much distinguished himself by his personal valour; he likewise, on the same day, received two musquet shots, which never were extracted to the day of his death. — The general died possessed of an estate of near 6000l. per annum, which, together with a considerable sum of ready money, he has bequeathed to Mrs. H. for her life, and afterwards to his cousin Filmer Honeywood, esq; M. P. for Kcht.

In perfect compliance with the wishes of Dr. Johnson, a sepulchral stone now covers the grave which holds his respectable remains. It is a stout, plain, blue slab, and bears this concise inscription:

DEATHS.

LATELY, in Dominick-street, Dublin, Sir Richard Steele, bart.

At Maidstone, Mr. Punnet, attorney at law.

In Ireland, Lady Arabella Denny; her ladyship was sister to the Earl of Shelburne, and aunt to the present Marquess of Lansdown. By her death, a considerable fortune devolves to the hon. Mr. Fitzmaurice, and a jointure of 1000l. per annum on Sir Barry Denny, bart. M.P. for the county of Kilkenny, of whose uncle she was relict. She was the original foundress of the Magdalen Asylum in Dublin, and of the few, if not the only female, who was admitted an honorary member of the Dublin society for promoting arts and agriculture.

At Bridgewater, Somersetshire, rev. Mr. Coles, V. of that parish.

At St. Issey, Cornwall, rev. Mr. Williams, R. of St. Ewe and of Gerrans, in that county.

At Gwinear, Cornwall, rev. Mr. Bennet, V. of that parish.

In Dublin, where he had resided many years, Henry Shute Cox, esq; formerly a bookseller in London.

David La Touche, esq; banker, of Dublin. He was one of the richest bankers in Europe: and has left an estate to his eldest son of 12,000l. per annum; to his second 7000l. per annum; and to his third son 5000l. per annum; in all 24,000l. a year; besides an equal division of the banking business, which has been computed, for several years back, to be between 20 and 30,000l. annually.

Near Madras, Lieut. Paul Norris of the 52d regiment, a promising young man, in the prime prime of life, and third son to William Norris, of Nonfuch, co. Wilts. As inclination first led him into the army, so a laudable ambition of rising in the profession of arms afterwards carried him a volunteer to the sultry regions of India, where, to the great regret of his surviving friends, he fell a victim to the climate, in his 23d year.

At Stoke Newington, Mrs. Sherrard, relict of Mr. S. who died Nov. 8, 1784, and whom she survived but six weeks.

19. At Eton-college, Mrs. Mary Hind, aged 84. She had many years kept a boarding house there for the reception of young gentlemen educated at that seminary. Her reputation in this line was obtained by her uncommon attention, care, and assiduity. As she was the oldest inhabitant, so also was she the most esteemed. She acquired a considerable sum by the early encouragement she met with; to deserve which, she exerted herself with unremitting zeal. Many who had been benefited by her care, paid her their visits when entered into the great world; and many who survive her will let fall the tear of concern in the reflection that their much-valued dame * is no more! She succeeded her sister, Mrs. Hopkins, about 1747. F. PICOTT.

20. At Windsor, Henry Boisragon, esq; late major of the 8th reg. of foot.

In Provence, Mr. Winthrop, a Petersburg merchant, of London, who had retired thither about two years ago for his health.

22. At Broadway-farm, near Great Berkhamstead, Herts, the person distinguished by the appellation of Peter the Wild Boy, who was picked up in a wood in Germany in the latter end of the reign of George I. while the king was hunting, and by that monarch sent over to England, where he has remained ever since; and of whom Lord Monboddo has lately given a particular history, which see in our list, p. 113; and also a singular anecdote of him in our vol. XXI. p. 522. A half-length figure of him was for many years exhibited at Mrs. Salmon's, in Fleet-street.

At Aberdeen, Christian Gavin, aged 103.

24. At Bath, Sir T. Dyke Ackland, bart. Sir Elias Prestwich, of Holme, bart.

25. At Chelsea, Mr. James Johnson, formerly a jeweller in the Strand.

Rev. — Lucas, vicar of Milbourne-port. He was found dead in his bed, though he went to bed in apparent good health the evening before.

27. At the parsonage-house of St. George in the East, Mrs. Pearley, a maiden lady, who has left the bulk of her fortune to the rev. Dr. Mayo, for charitable purposes.

At the Abbey-hill, Edinburgh, James Erskine, esq; knight marshal of Scotland.

At Mytote, Kent, much-lamented, the lady of Sir William Fagg, bart. aged 59.

28. In Broad-street, Carnaby-market, Capt. John Elphinstone, of the navy. In Feb. 1761, in the Richmond, of 32 guns, he destroyed the Felicite, a French frigate of superior force, on the coast of Holland, (see vol. XXXI. p. 90) In 1762, in the same ship, he piloted the British fleet through the Old Straits of Bahama, to the Savannah. He afterwards acted as rear-admiral to the Russian fleet against the Turks.

Mr. Robert Gulling, goldsmith, in Fenchurch-st.

Mar... At Ramsgate, Col. Daniel Haseltine, of the electorate of Hanover, and an aid du camp for Germany.

At Aglionby, Cumberland, Mr. Joseph Bond, aged 102, one of the people called Quakers.

1. In Poland-st. aged 85, Lady Rush, relict of Sir John R. of Shute, Berks.

In his 83d year, the rev. Mr. Turner, rector of Garthorpe, co. Leicester, and Stretton, co. Rutland.

2. In a very advanced age, at Colchester, Guyon Griffith, M.D. father of the late rev. Guyon G. D.D. rector of St. Mary-hill.

At Great Baddow, Essex, Mrs. Aldridge, wife of Mr. A. of that place, and dau. of the great Mr. Edward Bright, late of Malden.

Aged 81, the hon. Mrs Trevor, sister to Lord T.

Of an apoplexy, while at breakfast, Mr. Wells, boat-builder, of Christ-church, Surrey.

3. Rev. William Townsend, M.A. rector of Rotherfield-Greys, co. Oxford.

In Portland-street, Henry John Eaton, esq.

At Horsham, in the Weald of Kent, aged 90, the rev. William Hassell, M.A. rector of that parish from October, 1724; and it is observable, that he and Mr. Bate, his immediate predecessor, held that living upwards of 111 years. Mr. H. was educated at St. John's college, and elected thence a bye fellow of Peter-house, in Cambridge.

5. At South Lambeth, aged 58, the rev. Richard Yalden, M.A. vicar of Newton Valence, and rector of Greatham, both in co. Southampton.

7. At Dublin, right hon. Sir Arthur Brooke, bart. of Colebrooke, a privy counsellor, and member in the present parliament, of Ireland.

8. Aged 28, Mrs. Elizabeth Hewlett, wife of Mr. J. H. of Clifford's-inn. She had been 9 months afflicted with an atrophy, which she bore with that true fortitude which is inseparable from the Christian character. In her manners she was sweet, and in her temper benevolent.

9. At Godmanchester, near Huntingdon, aged 57, of a third paralytic stroke, the hon. Mrs. Mary Drax, eldest dau. of John 10th Ld St. John, of Bleisoe, sister to the late, and aunt to the present, Lord St. John, and wife of Henry Esle Drax, esq; of Charborough, co. Dorset, to whom she was married Oct. 22, 1754.

Rer.

Rev. Robert Hall, M.A. R. of Hawton, co. Nott.

In his 57th year, Thomas Livingston, M.D. many years an eminent physician at that place. As he was visiting a patient on the last evening of his life, he complained of a sudden indisposition, called for a glass of water, drank it, and sunk down dead without a groan.

10. Rev. Richard Walter, M.A. many years chaplain to Portsmouth dock-yard. He was chaplain to Lord Anson, on board the Centurion, in his voyage round the world, and had the merit and profit of writing the account of it, which was really the work of Mr. Robins, the engineer. The chaplainship is estimated at 500l. per ann.

11. In Jermyn-street, aged 87, Mrs. Mary Bernard, aunt to Sir Robert B. of Huntingdonsh. and half-sister of the late Lord Trevor.

In Southampton-st. Covent-garden, in her 56th year, Mrs. Mary Norman, spinster, who had retired from business in Tavistock-street several years ago, with a plentiful fortune, acquired with great reputation. She was remarkable for enjoying a constancy of good health, and great vivacity of spirits, till within the last fourteen months of her life. She was bountiful to her relations, hospitable to her acquaintance, and attentive to all her friends: charitable to the poor, and lived and died in peace with all the world.

"How lov'd, how honour'd once, avails thee

Gentleman's Magazine;

For APRIL, 1785.

BEING THE FOURTH NUMBER OF VOL. LV. PART I.

Some Account of the late Counsellor BOOTH, of Lincoln's Inn, by an intimate acquaintance.

✱✱✱✱✱ R. JAMES BOOTH was
✱✱✱✱✱ of an ancient Roman ✱✱✱✱✱ Catholic family in Here-
✱✱✱✱✱ M fordshire, where he pos✱✱✱✱✱ sessed a small paternal ✱✱✱✱✱ estate, and built there ✱✱✱✱✱ a neat private mansion, to which he used to retire in recess from business, but sold it some time before he died: I believe he was born at St. Germain-en-Laye in France, where his father accompanied his unfortunate Sovereign on the Revolution, and had some post at that court. He had at least four brothers, some of whom, I believe, are still living: one was an officer in the French service; another an ecclesiastic, who had good preferment in France, and was grand vicar to the present archbishop of Narbonne, of the Dillon family; two others were distinguished members of the late suppressed order of the Jesuits. Mr. Booth's principal talent was conveyancing, in which he was remarkably eminent, and was extremely well versed in the knowledge of the many penal and severe statutes against the Roman Catholics, still a foul blot on our code of laws, and singularly successful in protecting his clients from their many intricacies; but not to them alone was his practice confined; his abilities were universally known and acknowledged, and he was consulted by the most eminent leaders of the law on affairs of the first consequence, and particularly, as I have heard, in the drawing up his present Majesty's will: he also gained great applause in a capital suit between the Northumberland and Egremont families, being engaged for the latter, whose success in it was principally attributed to his endeavours, and was always by them gratefully acknowledged.

He was of a very convivial disposition, and loved to enjoy his bottle and friend. No one entertained with more elegance, nor was more choice in viands, wines, &c. many of which, indeed, he received as presents from his numerous clients: on these occasions he seldom let business interfere with his pleasure; by which, it is said, he lost some practice, and hence was frequently thought dilatory; yet, when he pleased, no one could be more expeditious. He was a very entertaining and pleasing companion; and though there seemed to be an apparent gravity in him at first, and he had not a ready utterance, he soon rendered himself agreeable to his guests, and unbended himself in such a manner, as rendered his conversation highly pleasing even to the youngest persons. His discourse was animated, interesting, and interspersed with lively sallies of wit, joined with entertaining anecdotes of men and things, which attracted and commanded the attention of all: his condescension, and the notice he took of any even trifling talents the youngest were possessed of, were extremely flattering from one of his very eminent abilities and judgement. He was a man of very high sentiments of honor, never for emolument stooping to any

MR. URBAN,

IN p. 279 of your last volume appeared a circumstantial account of the Wesley family, which received some enlargement in p. 353. The article which furnished it being also reviewed by Mr. Maty in December 1784; it has given rise to some animadversions by Mr. Wesley, which seems curious enough to be transcribed for your entertaining miscellany. Yours, &c. EUGENIO.

1. A DAY or two ago this Review fell into my hands, which contains a letter from the Rev. Mr. Badcock. I have not the pleasure of knowing this gentleman; but I esteem him for his useful and ingenious publications; and I think it my duty to inform both him and the public better, of some points wherein they have been misinformed.

2. He says, "Mr. Samuel Wesley, of Epworth, in Lincolnshire, was sent to the University." This is not accurate. He was educated for some years at a dissenting academy, from which he then privately retired, and entered himself at Exeter-College, in Oxford. "His heroic poem, the Life of Christ, excited the ridicule of the Wits." His own account of it was, "the cuts are good; the notes pretty good; the verses so so." "At a very advanced age he published a Latin work on the book of Job, which was never held in any estimation by the learned." I doubt that. It certainly contains immense learning; but of a kind which I do not admire.

3. "He married a woman of extraordinary abilities, the daughter of Dr. Samuel Annesley." (Dr. Annesley and the then Earl of Anglesea were brothers sons.) "Samuel, his eldest son, was a noted Jacobite." Nay, he was no more a Jacobite than he was a Turk. And what amends can Mr. Badcock, or Mr. Maty, make, for publishing this egregious falsehood? "Many of his political satires remain unpublished, on account of their treasonable tendency." Here is a double mistake. For, 1. He never published any thing political, whether satirical or not. 2. He never wrote any thing of a treasonable tendency; he sacredly avoided it. "In his rage of Jacobitism, he poured out the very dregs of it on royalty itself." No, never. He never wrote, much less published, one line against the King. I speak it from personal knowledge, having often heard him say, "If it reflects on the King, it is none of mine." His constant practice may be learnt from those lines, in the Battle of the Sexes;

"Forgive the voice that useful fiction sings;

Not impious tales of deities impure;

Not faults of breathless Queens, or living Kings,

In open treason, or in veil obscure."

"Time, however, changed the satirist against Sir Robert, into an humble suppliant." Nay, I do not believe, he ever wrote a line to Sir Robert, either in verse or prose.

4. "Mrs. Wesley lived long enough to deplore the extravagance of her two sons, John and Charles; considering them as under strong delusions to believe a lie." By vile misrepresentations she was deceived for a time. But she no sooner heard them speak for themselves, than she was thoroughly convinced they were in no delusion; but spoke the words of truth and soberness. She afterwards lived with me several years, and died rejoicing and praising God.

5. I was born in June 1703, and was between six and seven years old, when I was left alone in my father's house, being then all in flames, till I was taken out of the nursery window, by a man strangely standing on the shoulders of another. Those words in the picture, Is not this a brand plucked out of the burning? chiefly allude to this.

6. "He had early a very strong impression of his designation to some extraordinary work." Indeed not I: I never said so. I never thought so: I am guiltless in this matter. The strongest impression I had till I was three or four and twenty was,

Inter sylvas Academi quærare verum:

and afterwards, (while I was my father's curate) to save my own soul and those that heard me. When I returned to Oxford, it was my full resolve to live and die there; the reasons for which I gave in a long letter to my father, since printed in one of my Journals. In this purpose I continued, till Dr. Burton, one of the trustees for Georgia, pressed me to go over with General Oglethorpe (who is still alive, and well knows the whole transaction), in order to preach to the Indians. With great difficulty I was prevailed upon to go, and spend upwards of two years abroad. At my return, I was more than ever determined to lay my bones at at Oxford. But I was insensibly led, without any previous plan or design, to preach first, in many of the churches in London, then in more public places; afterwards in Bristol, King'swood, Newcastle, and throughout Great-Britain and Ireland. Therefore all that Mr. Badcock adds, of the incidents that "gave an additional force," to an impression that never existed, is very ingenious; yet is in truth a castle in the air.

7. It is true, that for a while I admired the mystic writers. But I dropped them, even before I went to Georgia; long before I knew or suspected any thing as justification by faith. Therefore all that follows, of my "making my system of divinity more commodious for general use;" and of "employing myself to search for some common bond, whereby the most dissimilar sects might have a centre of union;" having no foundation to stand upon, falls to the ground at once. I had quite other work while I was at Oxford; being fully engaged, partly with my pupils, and partly with my little offices, being Greek lecturer, and moderator of both the classes.

8. "His dexterity in debate has been so long known, that it is almost become proverbial." It has been my first care for many years, to see that my cause was good: and never, either in jest or earnest, to defend the wrong side of a question. And shame on me if I cannot defend the right, after so much practice; and after having been so early accustomed to separate truth from falsehood, how artfully soever they were twisted together!

9. If the poem on Religious Discourse "delineates the disposition and character of the author," it does not delineate mine; for I was not the author, but Mr. John Gambold. What becomes then of that good-natured remark? "The wonder is not, that John Wesley should have shewn an inclination to insult the memory of a sober divine; but that Samuel Wesley should have been disposed to shew lenity to a whig of the Revolution." Mistake upon mistake! 1. Those marginal notes were not wrote by Samuel, but Charles Wesley. He told me so this very day. 2. Both my father and all his sons have always praised God for the happy Revolution.—I let Bishop Warburton alone. He is gone to rest; I well hope, in Abraham's bosom.

10. "Mr. Wesley had a very important end in view"—What end, but to save sinners? What other end could I possibly have in view? Or can have at this day? "Deep projects of a subtle mind." Nay, I am not subtle, but the veriest fool under the sun, if I have any earthly project at all now! For what do I want which this world can give? And, after the labour of fourscore years,

No foot of land do I possess,
No cottage in the wilderness:
A poor, way-faring man,
I dwell awhile in tents below,
Or gladly wander to and fro,
Till I my Canaan gain.

JOHN WESLEY.

City-Road, Jan. 11, 1785.

MR. URBAN,

THE memory of persons whose projects or writings have been beneficial to the public, deserves to be preserved. The anecdote of Povey, obligingly communicated by Castorius in your Magazine for Nov. 1783, was therefore very acceptable; the description of his treatise, intituled "The Judgment of whole Kingdoms," &c. is just; perhaps the enquiry into the miscarriages of the four last years reign, printed 1714, was by the same author, there being such a sort of crest at the end; whether Povey was the original institutor of the Penny Post seems doubtful, for Entick (History of London) informs us, it was projected by David Murray, upholster, in Paternoster Row, who acquainted William Dowe with the plan, by whom it was carried on with good success for some time, till the government laid hold of it as a royal prerogative; but the crown indulged him with a pension of 200l. per annum during life. Vol. III, p. 463.

In answer to your correspondent's first query, Le Clerc, Hist. des Provinces Unies, t. III, p. 306, relating the murder of the De Witts, says, La Compagnie du drapeau bleu, à qui on avoit apporté de la biere, du vin, & de l'eau de vie, s'avança avec, de grands cris, vers la porte de la prison.—Le Geolier, de peur ou autrement, leur ouvrit enfin la porte: après quoi ils monterent à la chambre, où étoient les deux Freres. Le Ruart (Cornelle de Witt, Ruart ou Baillif de Putten) étoit, en robe de chambre, sur son lit, & son Frere enveloppe de son Manteau de velours, tels rels qu'on les portoit alors, lisoit dans l'Ecriture sainte.

The second query may be answered from Clarendon's History, vol. III, part II, p. 419. They (Charles II and Mrs. Lane) came to Mr. Norton's house sooner than usual, and it being on a holiday, they saw many people about a bowling-green that was before the door, and the first man the King saw was a chaplain of his own (Dr. Gorges) who was allied to the gentleman of the house, and was sitting upon the rails to see how the bowlers play'd. This I hope will be satisfactory.

Yours, &c. ARMINIUS.

MR. URBAN,

March 16.

THERE is a small mistake in the account of the consecration of the Rev. Dr. Samuel Seabury for Bishop of Connecticut in America, as it is published in your Magazine p. 105, under the title "Remarkable Anecdote."

He was consecrated at Aberdeen, Nov. 14, 1784, by three Bishops of the Church of Scotland, the College at that time consisting of only four, and not of five, as stated in those prints; though it is not unlikely that by this time the number may be increased to five or six, as, when Dr. Seabury was consecrated, they were about to elect more; which they generally do some time before consecration.

It is not very probable that Bishop Seabury will apply for the pious legacies of Archbishops Tenison and Secker*; or, if he does, that he should succeed; Connecticut being now totally independent on England both in temporals and spirituals. Bishop Seabury is gone thither, unfettered with any of our English laws, either ecclesiastical or secular, many of which are derogatory, and even destructive, so far as they are permitted to operate, of the unalienable rights of episcopacy, and of the Church, as a spiritual society. Nor can he claim these legacies as a matter of right, since by Stat. 21 Geo. II. chap. xxiv, sect. 13, so far as an act of state can produce such an effect, all ecclesiastical orders conferred by Scotch Bishops are rendered null and void. And though it is true that the English established Bishops did refuse to grant to America the blessings of episcopacy in the person of Dr. Seabury, and thereby drove him to seek it where (horribile dictu) account ing to a most unchristian statute, which will always leave an indelible scandal upon the English Church, his consecration will not, by the establishment, be allowed valid. On this and such like grounds of state laws so far interfering in matters purely spiritual, as to interdict and annihilate, as far as they can, the very essential and unalienable rights and powers of the Christian Church as a spiritual society, Papists and Presbyterians, and every other sect of Anti-Episcopalians, have long, and, it must be confessed, too justly, reproached the established religion of this country, as being little better than a mere creation of the civil state: and the great concern and very active part which the dignitaries of this church now constantly take in civil matters, spending more of their time and talents in politics than in their proper religious duties, confirm the charge.

It is indeed true, that some of the prelates of the establishment treated Bishop Seabury, just before he left England, with "politeness, with strong expressions of friendship, both to him and his cause; assuring him of their personal esteem—of their conviction that he had acted from the worthiest motives—of their wishes for his success, &c." Yet surely they must have blushed, for having refused him what was their bounden duty to grant, though all the state laws in the world had been against it.

Whatever temporal benefits America may gain or lose by the revolt from Britain, Connecticut at least will greatly gain in spirituals by the event. For Bishop Seabury, being no Lord of Parliament, nor vested with any temporal or secular power whatsoever, but, as he himself says, "In spiritual matters, totally independent of any civil power,"—surely he will never magisterially intermeddle in state matters, but as he again expresses it, "Conform himself as near as possible, to the primitive Catholic Church," and give himself wholly to the ONE THING which St. Paul gave in charge to St. Timothy, viz. The care and government of the Church, as a pure spiritual society entirely distinct from, and independant of the civil state. And thus the providence of GOD brings good out of evil—and seems to be verifying the prediction of the Rev. Geo. Herbert, in the middle of the last century:

"Religion stands on tiptoe in our land,

"Ready to pass to the American Strand."

MR. URBAN, March 28.

THE plan of your valuable Magazine being truly miscellaneous, I shall make no apology for sending you some loose thoughts upon several unconnected subjects, as they arose.

Your correspondent W. F. of Settle in Yorkshire, has given the world (vid. your last Supplement ad init.) an entertaining essay on Sepulchral Tumuli, and particularly one at Stackhouse in that county, and in a postscript wishes for an account or drawing of the remains of an old palace at Old Ford, said to have been built by King John, 'which, he justly observes, is not mentioned by any author,' it being the peculiar misfortune of the county of Middlesex never to have met with any one, who has thought it worth while to publish a regular, topographical history of it. I remember something of the building he speaks of, but know nothing of its history; and as to its having been built by K. John, if your correspondent had a more extensive knowledge of London and its environs, he would know that 'King John's court' is the common, popular appellation of all such buildings in that neighbourhood: he might find one in Holywell-lane, Shoreditch, another at Stepney, a third at Bermondsey, and, I believe, more elsewhere. Query, whence this appellation? is it demonstrative of the popular veneration for a man, who shewed himself by his conduct, surely, the weakest prince that ever swayed the British sceptre?

Your fame, it seems, has reached the banks of the Volga (vid. Mag. for January, p. 15.). The place where your correspondent dates his agreeable letter is laid down in some of the maps, and commonly known, under the name of Toms; the measurements, he mentions, would have been more intelligible to common readers, if he had told them that a Russian verst is $= 1168\frac{1}{2}$ English yards, ($1473\frac{1}{2}$ yards are $\frac{2}{3}$ of a mile, not three quarters, as Mr. Cox says, by mistake) and an arshin $= 28$ inches and a very small fraction: it might perhaps also have been worth while to observe, that the Hegira is the date of Mahomet's flight from Mecca, which took place in July 622 of the Christian era.

Your correspondent J. A. T. C. (p. 26.) asks, with great earnestness, whether 'there ever was an instance of a person having dreamt of an animal that was dead:' in answer to which you may inform him, that on the very night after reading his question, I dreamt that I had before my eyes a basket, or some other vessel, containing a quantity of smelts; that a woman came and took them up one by one, and dipping them in something which contained salt or brine, eat them. I ruminated upon the question, whether I was justified in not preventing her from taking them, as I was satisfied they were not her property, when all my scruples were in an instant removed, for—I awoke, and behold, it was a dream. I blush to record such nonsensical trumpery; but, as your correspondent seems seriously to wish for an answer to his question, I thought the above would be quite satisfactory. Indeed, he might have obtained an answer (though, perhaps, not so perfectly in point) by referring to Dr. Watts's Reliquiæ Juveniles, p. 172 & seq. where he exhibits his 'thoughts and meditations in a long sickness,' while 'ten thousand hurrying thoughts' made him adopt the mournful language (as other circumstances have led others to do, while sailing on the troubled sea of life),
GENT. MAG. April 1785.

When shall this weary spirit, toss'd with tempests,
Harrass'd and broken, reach the port of rest?

Your costly correspondent in Antigua (ead. pag.) doubts the truth of an assertion in the Life of Garrick, about the coaches filling up the streets of London. I have not that book at hand, but suppose that the assertion in question refers to the crowds that resorted to the theatre in Goodman's-fields, when that celebrated actor played there; and, if so, must think, from what I have heard, that there is too much of hyperbole in the narrative. But thus much I can tell him, from the evidence of those who remembered the fact, that in the year 1720, when the good people of this poor country were in a state of infatuation, there was such an influx of carriages from the west end of the town into the city, and particularly to the South-sea-house (which I suppose then was what is now called the Old South-sea-house, facing the church of St. Peter Le Poor in Old Broad-street, and is let out in apartments to different people), that on some days about noon it was not safe for persons on foot to attempt crossing the street from Charing-Cross to Stocks-market, where the Mansion-house now stands, and many people went by water, thinking that the most expeditious and safest mode of conveyance.

The stone carving of a triple head, exhibited in the miscellaneous plate in your

your Mag. for February, fig. 2. I apprehend to be a representation of the Holy Trinity; such were not uncommon in ancient times; there is one in the ninth compartment of Mr. Greene's altar-piece, exhibited in the preceding Magazine. And in 'a map of the Holy Land,' said to be 'by P. du Val, the King's Geographer, 1675,' inserted in an English translation of 'the works of Josephus, revised according to the French translation of M. Arnauld D'Andilly,' which map I take to be a copy from a French one, the title stands between two altars of burnt offering and incense, the smoke from which rises towards clouds that are over the title, whereon sitteth a venerable old man, designed, I imagine, to represent God the Father, cloathed with a flowing robe, his hair standing upright, with a long beard, and his arms extended upward: Cherubs are in the clouds about him.

By the way, Mr. Urban, whence comes it that that great politician and historiographer is generally known by his Latin name of Josephus? Was not his name the same with that of his renowned prototype in policy, Pharaoh's illustrious vicegerent? and is he not spoken of in the translation of his own work by his true and original name of Joseph?

Some nameless correspondent, in the Mag. for February, has been at a vast deal of pains in drawing up a list of the preachers at the anniversary meetings of the sons of the clergy, together with some interesting queries and hints relating to the subject. If I am not much mistaken, Mr. Urban, two sermons were put into my hands by a clergyman in my neighbourhood some time ago, one or both of which would have saved your correspondent much trouble, and satisfied several of his doubts; these, I believe, were Mr. Jones's before the sons of the clergy in 1782, and the Dean of Canterbury's at St. Paul's 12 June 1783, being the yearly meeting of the charity children in and about London and Westminster, together with various lists and accounts of benefactions, inserted by way of appendix; but, having no particular use to make of them, after reading them I returned them to the owner, and did not buy them; and therefore cannot now speak particularly as to the dates when the lists commenced, nor what they contained: thus much, however, if my memory do not deceive me, I think I remember, that, having spoken of one sermon before the sons of the clergy, the compiler speaks of the second as preached at some time about the middle of the last century by Thomas Manton, D. D. successively Rector of Culliton in Devonshire, of Stoke-Newington in Middlesex, and of St. Paul Covent-Garden, (which of the three he held when he preached this sermon, I cannot tell, not knowing the exact time when it was preached); which last he resigned when the act of uniformity took place, and afterwards became the great Coryphaeus of the Presbyterian ministers*, as Owen was of the Independents. This sermon now lies before me: it was published in 1689, together with many other sermons and two treatises†: it fills up about eight pages and a half in folio, and is, according to the custom of the time, tolerably sprinkled with Latin and a little Greek: the text is Psalm cii. 28. "The children of thy servants shall continue, and their seed shall be established before thee:" in which words he observes, 1. the persons, 2. their privilege, 3. the ground or duration of it: from whence he adds, 'The point is, That God hath a great care of, and blessing for, the posterity of his servants, that they may be established by his favour:' and here his business is, 1. to shew what privilege they have; 2. the reasons; 3. to reconcile it with common sense and experience; 4. to whom the promise is most eminently fulfilled: and then come two Uses, 1. of advice and consolation to parents; 2. of advice to the children of godly parents; and here he speaks 1. to them in the general, and calls upon them to 'own the blessing of the covenant: Lord, when I came to town, I was a poor lad of mean estate, could hope for little, and would be even glad to live; and afterwards when a young beginner, full of doubts and fears; but, Lord, out of thy mercy and truth thou hast provided liberally for me, and brought me from mean estate to large and plentiful means; and 2. to this day's meeting more particularly: let it be like a meeting of ministers' sons: let me press you 1. to sobriety and temperance: do but consider what a dishonour it will be, not to yourselves only, but to this holy calling, you to the Lord himself, when from a feast of ministers' sons some shall go away with staggering feet, inflamed countenances, and a faltering tongue: oh, let it not be:—2. to charity: this is the great end of the meeting, and therefore must not be left out or neglected.' I observe several O's in your list of preachers, but know not what they mean. Your correspondent in Jamaica (vid. p. 116 of same Mag.) asks for 'Anecdotes' of five Ladies, whose names he there mentions: the History of them is well known, but as to Anecdotes, I do not know where he will find any of persons dead 3 or 400 years since. And here I cannot help taking notice of a strange impropriety of speech which we often meet with, I mean that of giving extracts from books long since published, under the name of Anecdotes, 'Anecdotes, i. e. things unpublished, a solecism which no man of letters surely can be guilty of. Philippa, sole daughter and heiress of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, third son to King Edward III. was born in 1355, and was married to Edmond Mortimer, third Earl of March, by whom she had issue Roger, Earl of March, Sir Edmond, and Sir John. f. p. Elizabeth, married to Henry, Lord Percy, surnamed Hotspur, ancestor of the Percies, Earls of Northumberland, and Philippa, who was thrice married, but does not appear to have left any issue. Roger, fourth Earl of March, had issue Edmond, fifth Earl of March, ob. f. p. Roger. ob. inf. Eleanor, married to Edward Courtenay, third Earl of Devonshire of that family, ancestor of a race of earls; and Anne, eldest daughter, (another of the persons your correspondent enquires after), who thus became heiress of the family, and was married to Richard of Coningsborough, Earl of Cambridge, second son of Edmond, Duke of York, fifth son of King Edward III. by whom she had issue, first, Isabel, married to Henry Bourchier, Earl of Essex, by whom she had issue; and, second, Richard, Earl of Cambridge, and afterwards Duke of York, father of Edward IV. Richard III. George, Duke of Clarence; five more sons, and four daughters.

Philippa, eldest daughter of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, by his first wife, and sister to King Henry IV. was married in 1387 to John I. King of Portugal, and died about 1415, leaving a numerous issue, of which the eldest son, Edward, King of Portugal, is the direct lineal ancestor of the present king and queen of that kingdom. Blanche and Philippa, daughters of King Henry IV.

both died f. p. the first was thrice married, first in 1402 to Louis, surnamed Barbatous, Duke of Bavaria; second, to a King of Arragon; third, to a Duke of Bar: the second was married in 1405 to John, King of Denmark and Norway.

Upon the subject of Philology, I conceive that we are guilty of an impropriety in our usual mode of writing the Hebrew name, Solomon, and that the proper way of spelling it would be with an a, Salomon: I find it thus written in an old book that I sometimes look into, viz. Diodati's Annotations upon the Bible, which led me to reflect that it is thus written by the people of that name in London; and when I considered whence it is derived, I was confirmed in my idea: it is interpreted 'peaceable,' as being derived from a Hebrew word, signifying peace, which we commonly write Salem, or, as I find it elsewhere, Selam: it consists, I suppose, in the original, of three letters, SLM, but, as the vowels we insert are a or e, certainly it must be much more proper and consistent to insert in the derivative a than o.

Can any of your numerous readers favour the public with a scientific explanation of a word, which I believe has not been in use in this country above twenty years, but is now, alas! domesticated among us? I mean the word swindler: it sounds like a German word, and, if so, I suppose should be spelt schwindler.

Whence arises that strange, mistaken idea that the vulgar are possessed of, that second cousins are not allowed by the canons to marry? especially owning, as they do, that there is no objection to the marriage of first cousins.

Can any cause be assigned for those beautiful appearances of vegetation with which our windows are frequently adorned in a morning, when there is a white frost, and especially for the diversity of representations they exhibit? sometimes there appear large, bold, and spreading leaves, at other times small and delicate figures. A friend of mine, who was formerly in Russia, has informed me that he has seen the windows there so thickly covered with ice, that, when he first came into a room in a morning, he has applied a rouble to the glass, and it has left behind it an impression as perfect as that of a seal upon wax. Yours, &c. E.

MR. URBAN,

HAD I happened to have seen your Supplement sooner, I should have been glad to have given an answer

W. F. time enough for insertion in this month; as I think the facility of an early reply is one considerable advantage in publications like yours. Being myself only of the humble order of fire-side naturalists and antiquaries, I am always thankful, when the business, pleasure, or locality of gentlemen of another turn concurs with their disposition to oblige, in giving us good descriptions of things rare, or uncommon, in nature, or art. And they should the rather be encouraged to do so from the consideration, that many have the talent of describing in an higher degree of perfection, than many others who can better account for and explain. Of this I lately saw a curious instance in a foreign journal; a gentleman described minutely a very large, but damaged, piece of tapestry, but without pretending to know the history represented, the discovery of which he requested from others. An answer was immediately given by one who declared, that he had seen the tapestry over and over again, but without ever attempting to make out it's meaning, so confused and perplexed it always appeared to him, but that from the description it certainly was, &c. &c. Here we have an instance of a person's not being able to make out a story from the reality, tho' he could readily do it from the representation of another, who was himself perfectly unacquainted with the subject. How many gentlemen saw, and bestowed a vast profusion of learning upon, the few letters that compose the Greek inscription to Astarte, which Mr. Tyrwhitt made out so clearly in his study, that there was no occasion to say a single word more about it! Let therefore gentlemen be so kind as to give accurate descriptions and representations; and it is probable, that some one will be found able and willing to explain them: not that any thing perfect is pretended to be said on the present occasion; as the want of historical information must for ever leave us often in the dark, as to many surprising monuments of a rude and illiterate race of predecessors, which provoke, without satisfying, our curiosity. One could wish, however, to have a few more particulars given of this extraordinary barrow, as nothing like it seems to be mentioned by Mr. Collinson in his Beauties of British Antiquities, 1779, 8vo. p. 9. & 13. The dimensions most wished for are the diameter of the flat part at top: the circumference of the base: and whether the present height being said to be 8 or 9 feet, be not a false print; as not suiting very well with "vast mass," and taken "by computation on the spot": as one should think, so small an height, might easily be measured: nor is the meaning very clear of, "stones piled in such a manner as to rest upon each other's bases." Were I to judge from the engraving, I should conclude, that it was made, like other barrows, by accumulating a large quantity of earth, and then casing, coating, or facing the whole with stones. I should imagine too that, when perfect, it's summit rose in an oval form considerably above fig. 2. so as to cover, with a considerable quantity of earth, and stone-casing, the part where the bodies were deposited; as they usually lie on the ground, and all the earth is heaped on them. As to what is called the wall surrounding the present flat top, that appears to me plainly to be the outer stone casing, which stands up a little higher than the internal soft materials, which have been stirred, and thrown away, partly in the attempt to bare the stone coffin work; and partly by the weather since: so that the whole, to use a familiar image, looks like a poached egg, held in one's hand, and broken a-top, with some of the soft contents run out, so that the shell rises a little above them all round. Perhaps so much would not have been said on the present subject, but from a fancied resemblance between it, and that of King Gyges mentioned by Herodotus, and which, Dr. Chandler informs us, still subsists; as indeed what works of mens hands seem so likely to endure, the end certainly aimed at by all builders? The Dr. probably never happened to see two civil requests in Gent. Mag. 1775 and 1776, desiring a little more explanation, or else one may presume, that he would have gratified the enquirers; the last of whom thought he should thereby be enabled to clear up a difficulty in the text of the oldest and most valuable Greek Historian. I forgot to mention that the idea of increasing the heap by stones thrown on by passengers, though often practised in other places, seems out of the question, on a spot, where few visitors could reasonably be expected: nor could so large a mass be thus increased, any more than the Tower of London, by throwing stones at it.—As to the Roman inscription, that stands by its side in the plate, one could wish that the Romans, who aimed at eternity in all they did, had condescended to our ignorance so far, as to have applied a few stops, that should have told us the new god's name: at present, for any thing that that appears in the print, it may be very variously expressed. If however there are none, one could at least wish to have the last line and last letter carefully examined and reported; as, could we fix the name of the dedication, that might go a little way towards doing as much for the deity's, I have no notion at all of triumph: but rather guess viriacer, or virnicer, or virincer: if so, then we have perhaps the usual conclusion for votum solvit libens animo, for I hardly think fovi optimo thus crowded in at last will be approved of: or locato opere, or voto solenni, or suscepto, in officium, though this last is not contemptible.

A BARROWIST.

MR. URBAN,
ROBERT Leighton *, D. D. was born in London in 1614, but he received his education in the University of Edinburgh, where he took the degree of M. A. in 1636. He afterwards visited the Continent, and spent three years in France, where he acquired great reputation; particularly in the University of Sedan, and taught philosophy there till he returned to Scotland in 1639. He was then ordained minister at New-Battle, a place about five miles from the capital, and continued in that ministry until the year 1649, when, finding himself involved in a controversy with some of his brethren about doctrinal matters, he relinquished his parish, and retired to live privately in Edinburgh. During this recess he abode in the house of Mr. Burnet, father to the celebrated bishop of that name. In 1651; the magistrates of Edinburgh, as patrons of their own University, made choice of him to be their principal, and in that honourable station he continued ten years, respected by persons of every denomination. When episcopacy was re-established in 1661, he was appointed bishop of Dumblaine, and dean of the Chapel Royal; and in 1670, he was promoted to the archbishoprick of Glasgow. As he was naturally of a mild and peaceable disposition, he did not approve of the persecution carried on by the Presbyterians, and therefore left his see to be filled by another. The place of his retirement, for about ten years from this time, is not certainly known; but about 1684, the Earl of Perth sent for him out of Sussex to London; and this journey proved fatal to him, for over-heating himself with walking too great a portion of the way, he was seized with a pleurisy, and died on the second day after his arrival at the Bell Inn in Warwick-lane, aged 70 years. His works are Prælectiones Theologicae, A Commentary on the first Epistle of St. Peter, and thirty sermons.

A good account of Dr. Pitcairne may be found in the new edition of the General Biographical Dictionary.

I should esteem it a favour, to see memoirs of the Erskines, of the family of the Forbes, and Mackenzies, all great names in North Britain.

H. LEMOINE

LONGEVITY OF THE TORTOISE.

IN addition to the two instances of the longevity of the tortoise, mentioned in our last p. 297, we are enabled (by a gentleman on whom we can rely, and who has often seen the animal) to add, that in the year 1765 there was living at Sandwich in Kent, in a garden * then in the occupation of the late Samuel Simmons, Esq; † a tortoise, which was known to have been there from about the year 1679, but how long before that time no person could say with certainty. There is good reason, however, for conjecturing that it was brought thither from the West-Indies, by an ancestor of the present William Boys, Esq; F. S. A. who was proprietor of the premises several years before and after the above mentioned period. Since the death of Mr. Simmons, the premises have been in the occupation of John Matson, Esq; (lately appointed Chief Justice of the Bahama Islands); and in his possession, as we are informed, the animal died in the winter of 1767. It seems that it had (according to its usual custom on the approach of winter) endeavoured to get under ground; but having selected for this purpose a spot near an old vine, it was obstructed in its progress by the roots, and probably had not strength enough to change its situation, as it was found dead, with only half its body in the ground.—About thirty years before its death it got out of the garden, and was much injured by the wheel of a loaded waggon, which went over it and cracked its upper shell ‡.

MR. URBAN,

AS professional men will not give advice without a fee, and as gentlemen who are better informed may not have leisure to do it; I venture to write my sentiments in answer to some queries of your correspondent H, relative to road-making.

The sketch here delineated (see the plate fig. 1.), I judge from experience to be the best form for a road: the materials, which are the most expensive article, being used to the greatest advantage, and being confined by the abutments, cannot give way till cut through by the wheels; but care should be taken to mix no dirt with the stones, lest the heavy carriages press between the stones, which ought to be close and compact. Any stone will do for the bottom, but it should be covered two or three inches thick with gravel; sea gravel is the best, as being hardest and clearest. Sand gravel should be well skreened, and the dirt separated from it entirely. The 14 feet, which, you may observe, is all stone, or hard materials, may be lessened to 10 or 8 feet perhaps, according to circumstances, but the abutments ought not to be lessened, because a narrow road will require as strong or even stronger abutments than a wider one, and the durability of the work depends very much upon its being close and compact; besides, the abutments form an easy slope, that carriages may run off or on at pleasure.

The red soft shelly stone may do for the purpose, if it grinds to sand, but it must be nicely distinguished whether it be sand or dirt; sand in wet weather will not turn to mud, but will be firmer and closer than in dry weather. Sand will make a sound road of itself, placed according to the plan above; but I should think the red stone covered with sand would do better, as chalk tempered with sand makes a very good road. The covering of sand must be thick enough to keep the wheels from the soft stone; that is, two or three inches thick. Sand, where it is handy, makes by much the cheapest road; pleasant for a horse, but heavy for carriages; the plan may at first sight appear expensive, but I am certain will be found cheapest in the end; it is taken from a road in Suffex leading to Brightelmstone, which was made by Mr. Jones of Hursbam, whose invention has done essential service to his country, and whose plan is now followed in the cross roads of the neighbouring parishes, upon a smaller scale. Construct your work upon a plane, and make no upcast; use clean materials and good abutments; the thickness of the road will raise it sufficiently.

IN answer to your correspondent in p. 87, about the best materials for mending roads, that kind of gravel is the best, which, not having too large pebbles, is sharp and gritty: such as this will be compact and lasting, provided there be a good foundation laid of hard stone, where the ground is inclinable to clay, morass, or other unsolid nature. Without duly attending to this circumstance, the road, however well formed, will be of no long duration.

The second kind of gravel is that which is frequently found mixed with a sort of loamy or marly substance; the more or less of this mixture constitutes the goodness or badness of this class of materials, and if it has a greater proportion of loam than of stone, the best method in that case is to have it skreened.

Of stone materials*, that undoubtedly is to be preferred which is the hardest and most enduring; these notwithstanding should not be laid down too large, but broken into small pieces, with heavy hammers, which are cast of iron on purpose; then any kind of sand or weak gravel will suffice to level the surface. If the ground is spongey, or inclinable to clay, there should be laid a bed of sand, otherwise the stones will sink in and be lost. The inconvenience of large stones, unbroken and pointing up, must have been felt by most travellers on horseback. The same may be said of round large stones, or pebbles, which are continually slipping about, as is the case in many parts of Staffordshire on the bye-roads.

Flints make a very good road, as may be seen in most parts of Hertfordshire, and, when a little crushed by heavy carriages, form a very even and pleasant road. Some kinds of limestone compose an excellent hard road; which may be observed in practice, through all the Peak of Derbyshire, and is so far preferable to flints, in that it is more binding.

Sand or sandy stone comes next under consideration, which I place last, as being the least valuable; notwithstanding it must be allowed to answer very well, where better materials are wanting. Many parts of Leicestershire can witness

* Of which there are various sorts too tedious to be here analysed.

this,

to which the clay of that country seems impervious, to effect that purpose, it must, however, be remembered that the sand should be laid at least 18 inches thick. White sand is preferable to red, this last indicating more of the ochreous or loamy quality, and here I would particularly recommend the attention of your correspondent, as the materials he describes seem to come under this denomination; at the same time observing that the round sloping form, commonly called rampart, is in most situations approved, and was certainly the method practised by the Romans; examples whereof may be seen at this day on the military way, called Watling-street, leading from Lichfield, near a place on Cannock Heath, which goes by the name of Knave's Castle (supposed to be a Roman intrenchment). Here the old road may be traced for a length of three miles, with this further remark, that it is raised much higher than our modern method, and being done over a dry gravelly common, shews it was an invariable rule with them without regard to circumstance.

When roads pass over swampy bottoms, the surest reparation to improvement is by placing layers of gorse, alder, or willow-kids, with a proper thickness of sand over them, afterwards more firm materials where they can be had. If any runnel or plashe of standing water intervene, a small drain, or a brick arch laid across the road, will give a vent to the flood at rainy seasons, which, without this help, will greatly injure the rampart by being pent up on both sides; in some places, to save expence, I have observed a deep furrow made to give passage to such water-course, but this I must condemn, as very inconvenient to travellers in a carriage, as well as prejudicial to it by the violent jolts in often occasions. Other aphorisms might be drawn from experience and daily observation; I hope these hints, purely theoretical, and founded only upon reason and philosophy, will be sufficient and satisfactory to your ingenious querist; moreover, being myself an old traveller, I perfectly agree with him that good roads are a very pleasing object. Yours, &c. OBSERVATOR.

MR. URBAN, Inverness, Feb. 8.

THE following curious fragment translated from the Latin of the original, which is attributed to Petronius Arbiter, was found lately among the papers of a learned traveller at Constantinople, who had received it, some years before his death, from the late Edward Wortley Montagu, Esq. and is printed with a view to excite attention to the Eastern repositories of classic learning, where much may be recovered, if Apollo shall ever be permitted to shew his golden locks on the banks of the Hellespont.

A. B.

TO COSULIANUS CAPITO.

You are not acquainted, Capito, with my glorious and happy indifference concerning those things which are transacted at Rome; and I desire you to be persuaded that I am happier in this second city of Italy, than you are in the first of all the world; for whilst you are not only now suffering the terrors of new devastations in Campania, from the convulsions of nature and the elements, but those arising from your own dangerous situation in the midst of your enemies, I am here enjoying the purest air, the most tranquil life, and the greatest variety of amusements that can be conceived. I assure you, Capito, that if the sense and spirit of men and women consists, as I esteem it to be, in tasting every pleasure to the utmost boundary of health, fortune, and reputation, and even a little beyond the last, when our situation enables us to brave the opinion of the cynicks, here we have as much sense and more spirit than you have, for our fortunes are by no means equal to our abilities.

Few are the sources of our wealth, which flows from all the world to the seven hills, with an uniform and immense stream, disobeying the old laws of nature, and flowing upwards from the boundless ocean to the capitol. Some among us, indeed, have been in Bithynia, as I have been, and to better purpose, for they have brought home with them what would have prevented me from leaving Rome, or added to the riches of your illustrious father in law, by a modern testament. suited to the temper of these happy times.

These sons of fortune and the provinces, who are afraid of being made sponges in the golden palaces of Rome, drop without compulsion enough in this city, to make us all open our Tantalean lips, to taste the nectarous juice, and whilst these fortunate men are throwing their aurei among the handmaids of luxury and pleasure, the poor, but elegant, provincials are straining every nerve to carry their fortunes on their backs, or in their bellies, to anoint their ears with the music of Cepio, or feast their eyes with the

the significant motions of our dancers in the theatre. Our men and women have adopted the delicious and refined fashion of lying alternately at the midnight banquet; and if our women do not permit us to see so much of the panting bosom as they do with you, they conceal, I assure you, what is better worth attending to: for our air is both purer and better than yours, and the health and the climate enable all of us to pursue the delights of society on firmer and better ground, than can be done by those who are relaxed by the sickly influence of Campania.

One inconvenience, however, I must admit, which arises from the novelty of our improvement: our women are not so delightfully varied and interesting in their conversation as those of Rome, or Athens; but in the pursuit of pleasure they are indefatigable, and will gradually suit themselves to the object of their ambition. At present that seems only to be directed to public appearances in the elegance of dress and the grimace of prudens love, under the awe and constraint of the publick, and of their four husbands, fathers, or aunts: but by degrees this will wear off, for time, you know, O Capito, is necessary to fortify the mind, not only against the inroad of misfortune, but in the road of pleasure; in short, my friendly Capito, we do nothing here, nor can we endure any thing, that is stupid and solemn. We fiddle, we dance, we laugh, we sing, we trifle, we make love, we chatter, we feast, we drink Falernian, we go to the theatre, we sup, and we do all we can, or can be permitted to do, with impunity.

A new theatre for the feasts of love, the flaming dance, and the joyous supper, has been built for a sum so small, that you will judge how poor we are, though we live so happily; for it cost no more for the unfinished walls, than five hundred thousand testestres.

This sum, however trifling, has raised the spleen of a foolish fellow here, who being a great enquirer into the important questions concerning the history of this Greek colony, and ancient city of Magna Græcia (which, strange lot! goes by the name of Afranius, the son of Æneæ, by way of derision) but is of the family of Ardea, one of the decayed mountain-her race, from the Appennine) had taken it into his head to decoy our young men from the haunts of true pleasure, to the impertinent meetings of his friends to look at old helmets, and rusty remains of his barbarous ancestors.

These outlines, Capito, of my present retirement will amuse the circle of my friends at Rome, whom I hope to embrace, through your mediation with him who has all power in his hands, before many days.

One other proof I will add of the change which has happened in the manners of this province.

The wife of Varronius Niger has lately persuaded her husband, who is repairing his villa, to throw all the statues of his ancestors, and the old pictures of inferior workmanship, which cumbered the Atriva, and other parts of the house, over the windows, or given them to decorate the houses of his servants, or those of the inferior people in this city.

This proves that taste begins to get the better of the silly pride of ancestry, and Capito desinit.

MR. URBAN,

A LETTER relative to Dr. Priestley, is in your Magazine for February, occasions this trouble, and recalled the following words to my remembrance. "Multos absolvemus & ceperimus ante judicare quam irasci."

I never saw any thing so liable to exception in a publication intended for gentlemen, as every part of that letter and postscript. As I have not seen Dr. Priestley's letter to the Critical Reviewers, I can only believe that P. Q. R. quotes the following passage from it fairly. "It [the Theological Repository] will be open to any query or difficulty relating to Religion, and it is wished that the writers should conceal their names."

P. Q. R. seems greatly alarmed and offended at the intimation of this wish. "Is this (says he) the conduct of free and ingenious writers, who are most probable, that be answered, with freedom writers are known. The difficulties are precisely the names of the writers, if they be stated in a fair, and solved in a satisfactory manner, the end proposed in the publication is effectually accomplished.

Certainly the reasoning will proceed with more freedom and greater closeness, when not interrupted by the introduction of personal compliments, or personal invectives, which, foreign as they are from such arguments, can hardly be avoided when the names of the writers are known.

P. Q. R. gives an instance of the truth of this, in his letter; for, if Dr. Priestley's name had been concealed, the argument must have been confined to this narrow compass, "Whether is it better, in religious controversies, to conceal or to mention the names of the writers?" P. Q. R. would probably have argued on his side of the question with less anger, and suppressed the superfluous rhetoric, of which the intervention of Dr. Priestley's name was the cause or occasion.

For the three following reasons I think P. Q. R. might have left out the harsh passage about "the art of Jesuitism, and the insidious slyness of present Presbyterianism." 1. It may be that there are at present Presbyterians and Episcopalians too, who deserve this writer's opprobrious epithets, in whatever sense he uses them: but nothing can be characteristic of any denomination, that is not to be found in the best as well as in the worst of a class. 2. If insidious slyness signifies here, as it seems to signify, the criminality of anonymous abusive writing, P. Q. R. has not by his own subscription guarded himself sufficiently from the charge of such guilt. 3. The art of a Jesuit ill comports with the character of a Protestant, or the nature of the Theological Repository; although P. Q. R.'s letter is a plain proof, that the art of Jesuitism did not become extinct with the order of the Jesuits.

P. Q. R. proceeds to ask, "Will Dr. Priestley set his own name to every sentiment he holds forth in print?" Yes, and to every sentiment too that he holds forth in writing, if he himself conceives it to be his duty, nor has it ever been said or suspected, that he is one who suits his duty to his convenience.

And will he [it is asked farther], will he invite assassins to stab religion in the dark? P. Q. R. puts a charge upon his readers, and puzzles a plain case by this sudden transition from simple to traititious language, which is here equally unnecessary and improper. There is some resemblance between the conduct of an anonymous scribbler murdering the character of a person by name, and that of a ruffian who assassinates a man unawares. But what ground of comparison is there, between stating a query or difficulty relating to religion, without subscribing the name of the writer, and stabbing religion in the dark?

P. Q. R. might have been contented with a more simple style, if he had only meant to express an honest apprehension of danger to religion from the revival of the Theological Repository. Such an apprehension, however groundless, might be innocently, if it were ignorantly, entertained, or by one who had no way to guess at what is to come, by any knowledge of what is passed. Dr. Priestley, it is well known, conducted the Theological Repository for years, and precisely on the plan that seems so much to alarm and offend P. Q. R. But certainly nobody, who has examined that publication, can seriously think that the publisher by that work has either intentionally or eventually injured, or discredited, religion. Religion has little to fear from an irreligious, and less from a religious, man; so that, after all, this language has a tremendous sound, but means nothing. The persons and the characters of religionists may be assassinated, but religion seated in the soul, and secure in its existence, "smiles at the assassin's dagger, and defies its point."

An invitation to send queries and difficulties relating to religion, in order to be fairly published for the general consideration of all religious people, ought not to have been called an unworthy challenge; nor need any Christian blush at setting his hand to such an invitation; and I sincerely believe it would be happier for us all, if nobody had any greater reason to blush than Dr. Priestley.

In the next sentence of his letter P. Q. R. insinuates, as if the Doctor had made a declaration of war against Christianity, and published a manifesto in the Critical Review, requesting the aid and co-operation of all the adversaries of our holy religion, with a kind of precaution, or a sort of promise to screen them from being known to the public; and, at the conclusion of his postscript, he as good as tells us that Dr. Priestley is Antichrist.

If P. Q. R. should be mistaken in these injurious insinuations, it concerns him to consider what reparation he can make for having printed them. As he cannot prove a single tittle of hostility to the Christian religion against the Doctor, the evil suspicion which he idly endeavours to fix upon him, falls heavily upon himself.

I pass over the honest enemies, who handle their weapons unfairly, to come to a very serious business indeed, Dr. Priestley's disavowal of his Saviour. As this is not a sly insinuation, but a round assertion, every person to whom this extraordinary information is given, has a right, as I conceive, to call upon the informer for particulars; and I, for one, beg to be informed, when, where, and how it was, that Dr. Priestley disavowed his Saviour?

If P. Q. R. knows Dr. Priestley, I think he would not, and if he does not know him, I am sure he should not, talk in a manner that excites an indignation and contempt which it is very difficult to suppress.

It has always been the favourite study and employment of Dr. Priestley's life, to learn and teach the doctrine of JESUS, to promote the knowledge, and extend the influence of it, by his instructions in every way, and, above all, by his own excellent example. Others may very honestly and conscientiously differ from him in sundry points of his belief; but unquestionably, the Doctor is fully persuaded in his own mind, that the faith which he embraces and recommends, by which he regulates his life, and on which he risks his salvation, is precisely the faith which was once delivered to the saints, and the very truth as it is in JESUS. The Doctor is by no means shy of giving the reasons of his persuasion; and I dare venture to say, that the Theological Repository will be open to any query or difficulty relating to it. If P. Q. R. can pass from railing accusations to sober reasoning, he may then enter the lists, incognito; or if he likes it better, he may enter his name at the barrier; and discuss, with all freedom short of licentiousness, any religious argument, that he can state like a scholar, and maintain like a gentleman.

In return for the information which I first received from P. Q. R. of the revival of the Theological Repository, I venture to assure him with all confidence, that the great and ultimate scope of that work is to ascertain, to defend, and promote the faith once delivered to the saints, and to explain and recommend to the undecided and deluded multitude, without regard to establishments, creeds, or confessions, the truth as it is in JESUS. PHILOLEUTHERUS.

P. S. I have done, Mr. Urban, with P. Q. R.'s letter, whom I certainly do not even guess at, and with whom I have no desire to be better acquainted; but I cannot conclude without addressing a few lines to yourself, on the subject of this communication.

Any man, with even less acquaintance than I have of Dr. Priestley, his writings, &c. must see clearly, that P. Q. R. has grossly misrepresented him, either through ignorance, or from malignity. In all cases of this nature, the current of my mind leads me to side with the sufferers; but in the present case, I know that the Subject of the indignity and injury is not merely innocent, but highly meritorious. Being sufficiently acquainted with his writings, conversation, and character, to be certain of what I affirm; I conceived it to be my duty to pay this tribute to truth, and in the discharge of it I am not sensible that there is the smallest mixture of undue partiality.

When I reflect, Mr. Urban, on the penetrating genius of Dr. Priestley, on his extensive knowledge and indefatigable application, when I consider the general integrity and circumspection of his conduct, the great simplicity of his manners, the serious turn and habitual piety so conspicuous in his life and writings, and take into the account, that, to the zeal of an Apostle, he unites the science of a Philosopher, I think it more than probable, that if he had subscribed the thirty-nine articles twenty years ago, he must at this day have been deservedly distinguished by his opulence and dignity in the church of England; and it can hardly be said that he would not have been an ornament even on the present very illustrious bench of Bishops. Why, Mr. Urban, has this man of superior understanding declined the riches and the rank certainly within his reach? He cannot be supposed to have been actuated by avarice, ambition, or priestcraft, nor does there seem to be any way of accounting for this that does not do him honour. I enter not into the tenets of the theologian; they must stand or fall by the reasons that are for or against them. But I contend, that there is a reverence due to the principles of the man. They appear to me dignifying principles, the leading strokes of a great character, entitled to protection from that humanity to which they do credit, and much too sacred to be silently relinquished to the rude attacks of anonymous ignorance or ill-will.

Mr.

MR. URBAN,

A Letter signed Leicestriensis, in your Magazine for March 1783, requesting some account of Mr. George Abbott's memorable defence of Caldecote Hall in Warwickshire, in the year 1642, against the attack of Prince Rupert, has hitherto received no answer from any of your numerous correspondents. At this circumstance I confess myself to be much surprised, as a very minute relation of the gallant exploits of the besieged at this place is to be found in the second part of Vicars's Parliamentary Chronicle, p. 153, whose words I transcribe.

About the middle of Sept. 1642, the Parliament was enformed of the great outrages and insolencies of the cavaliers arraymen, in Warwickshire, Worcestershire, Gloucester, and Cheshire. But one passage among the rest, being very remarkable and worthy of particular remembrance, may not be here omitted, which fell out in Warwickshire, and was this. The cavaliers having notice, and thereupon informing Prince Rupert of a worthy gentleman's house and habitation, by name Mr. William Purfrey, of Caldecot, in Warwickshire, a worthy member of the House of Commons, and a gentleman of a faire estate, who lived in a very strong and well built house of stone, upon which intelligence given to this Prince of Plunderers, he, with above 500 of his forces, upon a Sunday morning, a little before prayer-time (a fit day, and time of the day for such prophane thieves and robbers to act their wicked designs of thefts and rapines), came to Caldecot aforesaid, and beset this gentleman's house, with an intent to plunder and pillage it, himselfe being absent from home, and there being within onely the mistresse of the house, one or two daughters, one Mr. George Abbott her son in law, a very resolute and stout young gentleman, three serving-men, and three maid servants. The Prince being come to the house, sends unto them to open the gates, and to deliver up the house unto him; the gentleman and all within with him being very couragious and cheereful, and having good store of muskets, powder, and shot, in the house, refused so to doe, but stood upon their guard, resolving, by God's assistance, to fight it out, rather than to yeeld themselves to the perfideous cruelty of him and his accursed cavaliers, and thereupon the young gentleman tooke forth a dozen mul-kets, and taught the women how to charge the muskets whiles he and the other men discharged them. Prince Rupert thus affronted gives command, to his cavaliers to set upon the house, and to break open the outmost gates to come into the yard or court; but as his captains and souldiers entered in, the said Mr. Abbot and his men shot so thick and quick at them, and shewed themselves (by God's assistance) such notable marks-men, that at the very first onset, they slew one Captain Mayford, and Captain Shute, and after that one Captain Steward, and ere they had done, about 15 more of their souldiers, whereof some were other officers in armes, the men within still shooting at them without intermission, and the women, who had aptly learn't their art, did their work, and acted their parts, most nimbly and cheerefully; and when their bullets began to faile, they fell to melting all their household pewter; and, having bullet moulds in the house, speedely made more, and notably supplied that want faster than they could be spent, and thus the businesse was so plyed, and with such dexterity by them all in their appointed wayes, God wonderfully enabling them, that Prince Rupert was very sorely put to it, and having seene so many of his men slaine, and seeing he could not so easily enter the house as he and his company expected, he fired the barnes, stables, and outhouses, which caused a mighty smoke, and began to smother them much in the house, and to hinder their sight from acting as they did before, and now also their store of powder was well nigh all spent; hereupon therefore, Mistris Purfrey herselfe, the mistris of the house, opened her doores, and issuing forth, fell upon her knees, and craved quarter for herselfe and her family onelt: whereupon it pleased the Lord to mollifie the Princes heart toward her, who asked her what she would desire of him? She answered, her owne life and the lyves of those that ware within with her, certifying him, who and what number they were, and that onely her son in law Mr. Abbott, and his three servants, were all the men or male kinde in the house, which did what was done; which when Prince Rupert heard, and understood for certain of the paucity of their number, and considered their brave valour and resolution, he admired and wondered at it, raised the gentlewoman from her knees, saluted her kindly (the greatest act of humanity,

humanity, if not the only, that ever I yet could hear he expressed to any honest English), and granted her request fully and freely, notwithstanding the slaughter of so many of his men, and some commanders, as aforesaid, went into the house to see Mr. Abbot and the rest who had so bravely behaved themselves, whom when he saw, and that 'twas so indeed, he was much taken with their most notable valour, saved their lives, and house from plundering, saying to Mr. Abbot, that he was worthie to be a cheif commander in an armie, and proffered him such a place in his army if he would go with him, but he modestly refused it. However, here the said prince fairly performed his promise, and would not suffer a pennyworth of his goods in the house to be taken from them, and so departed.

*. * This notable act is recommended to the notice of future historians.

MR. URBAN, Oxford, Jan. 16.

THROUGH the channel of your useful and extensive publication, I beg leave to make a few observations which were suggested to me by reading in the new "Biographia Britannica," the extraordinary Life of Lord Clive. I respect the labours of Dr. Kippis, and would not doubt his integrity, or his judgement: but the most extensive candour cannot exclude some painful doubts from rising in the minds of his readers, when they find a character of such notoriety, who so lately departed this scene, held up to their view as adorned with every virtue. As Dr. K. admitted Mr. Beaufoy's production into his work; and, as that work may be consulted hereafter, as the great Repository of Biographical Truth; how can the Editor be excused in thus dignifying the most rapacious acts, and glossing over the most tyrannical cruelty? Notwithstanding the glaring partiality of Dr. K. and the laboured panegyric of Mr. B. yet Lord Clive will be remembered, and the truth will be spoken.

He stands forth as a striking instance, among many others which the faithful page of history exhibits, that though a man may aggrandise himself on the ruin of thousands, and then elude the sentence of Justice, yet he carries an awful tribunal in his own breast. The judge there is not long to be flattered by ambition, soothed with pleasure, or bribed by riches, but he rises to take ample vengeance. An infidel age may endeavour to account for the feelings of conscience on mechanical principles; and ascribe all its effects to the animal frame, or a general relaxation of the nervous system. But even an Heathen will teach us better, whose verses are peculiarly applicable to this miserable nobleman *.

What I would suggest to Dr. K. is, that in the appendix to the 4th vol. when published, he would exhibit such facts and particulars of Lord Clive, as may tend to correct the erroneous impression which must be made on the minds of those who receive all their information from the Biographia. The interest of historical truth, and the respect due to an intelligent publick, demand this recompence. I am yours, &c.

IN Mr. Astle's "Origin and Progress of Writing," we are informed that the Emperor Julian inscribed the following motto upon the entrance of his library, "Alii quidem Equos amant; alii Aves, alii Feras; mihi vero a Puerulo mirum acquirendi Libros insedit Desiderium." A somewhat different account of the Emperor's use of these words being given by Pancirolus in his book "Rerum deperditarum," I will transcribe the passage for the amusement of your learned readers, at the same time requesting, on my own part, some information relating to Mr. Astle's authority for what he has advanced †.

"Quando etiam librorum studio arserit Julianus Imperator, cetera doctissimus,

MR. URBAN, Old Sarum, March 10.
I HAVE been reading in the 27th number of the Topographical Antiquities, Dr. Ducarel's account of the Archbishopial palace at Lambeth. Among many curious particulars the following is very remarkable. In Archbishop Parker's regulations of the officers of his household (in the Appendix No VIII), Mrs. Parker is throughout styled Her Grace, a distinction the more singular, as, in the body of the work, a story is related, p. 55, of Queen Elizabeth, who, after having been entertained by the Prelate and his Lady, addressed the latter, with this scarce-to-be called compliment. "And you," saith she, "Madam I may not call you, and Mistress I am ashamed to call you, so as I know not what to call you; but yet I do thank you." As her Majesty, we know, retained many grains of the lately-exploded Roman religion, particularly that church's dislike of married Priests, and as she used one of Parker's successors very ill on that account, it is probable that there was more irony than civility couched under so ambiguous a speech. Still, since it is evident, that when the Queen held Madam to be too dignified an appellation for the Primate's wife, we may be sure that she could not approve, and consequently probably never heard of, Mrs. Parker being styled Grace; we may conclude, that she never was so called beyond the walls of the archiepiscopal palace.

As Bishops are allowed to be Lords of Parliament, and to marry, it is extraordinary that no kind of distinction is bestowed on their wives. The husband is my Lord for life—his wife remaining plain Mistress. I have heard of a Frenchman who fell into a droll mistake, not indeed from the want of title in wives of Bishops, but from not being accustomed to hear of Bishops having any such companions. Passing through Rochester, he met the lady of the Prelate of that city in her coach. She had on her head some kind of hat or bonnet then in fashion, to which his eyes were as little used as his ears to her high quality. Being told who the wearer of that novel attire was, he concluded the strange bonnet was the mate to the mitre—and for some time, as often as he met a woman with the same kind of head-dress, he took her for the wife of a Bishop; and as numbers of such occurred, he began to think that the church of England not only allowed the marriages of priests, but indulged my Lords the Bishops in a plurality of wives.

Among the same regulations, there are, though not equally curious, some observable, as picturesque of the manners of the times, and somewhat different from those of the present age. His Grace of Canterbury dined at ten in the morning, supped at five, and the gates of the palace were locked at half an hour after nine at night. His officers (for he had even a master of the horse), domestics, and servants, were numerous; and yet, as is still the custom in France, the servants of his guests waited on their own masters at table. The swords and cloaks of the guests were laid aside during dinner. His Grace's grooms, and his gentlemen men were enjoined to speak to no gentleman, but uncovered, and whoever infringed that order, his hat was to be nailed---not to his head, but to the screen of the hall.

The present age being more enlightened, and more ceremonious too, than the days of Queen Elizabeth, the court of modern servants have established regulations for themselves, as formal, and more tenaciously observed than the ceremonial of Arch-bishop Parker. No domestic now, high or low, is to stir a finger or a foot on the most urgent occasion, even for the service of his lord or lady, much less of his master or mistress, if the duty to be performed is not specifically within the province that the court of livery has annexed to his office. On the contrary, in the unpolished times of which I was speaking before, the Archbishop commanded, that all his servants and waiters in general should, at all times, refuse no service appointed to them---very rude indeed!

The Percy Household-book is a treasure of learning, with relation to the manners of our ancestors---though indeed chiefly confined to that capital occupation of former times, the table. I have seen a MS. set of regulations drawn up by a Lord himself himself in the same century with those of the Archbishop. They were principally restricted to the ceremonial of the family; and prescribed how far a livery servant might approach towards the presence-chamber of his Lord; or rather how far he might not approach, but at the door of which antichamber he was to deliver his message to a superior officer, who was to repeat it to a second still of higher rank, who was to utter the purport to the Peer---No fruitful source of mistakes, to be sure! and all these grave ordinances were drawn up by a young Lord of twenty-two.

I have often reflected on the gratitude we ought to feel to our predecessors who minuted down such stores of information to us their descendents: and I have as often reflected with indignation on our own unfeeling indifference, who prepare no such satisfactory information for our posterity.

In a word, Sir, whoever contributes any thing to posterity is a generous and disinterested Benefactor, as he can never be repaid: and any man is capable of conferring such an obligation, who will convey any information to future times. It must be owned that we have daily cohorts of informers; but they have two ingredients that prevent my classing them under the description I mean. One is, that so far from labouring for posterity, they think of nothing but the present hour, nor expect their intelligence should last longer. They tell to-day what happened yesterday, to be forgotten to-morrow. Their second defect is more trifling; they seldom speak a word of truth; and tho' that is of no consequence to the present generation, it will be a sore inconvenience to posterity, who, far from gaining information, will be led into a world of mistakes, plain truth is all that descendents demand from their predecessors.

Your Magazine, Sir, is a singular repository, as you hoard nothing but such fragments of matter of fact as can be gleaned from the devastation of time and accidents. Whatever can be recovered that wears the stamp of truth, is preserved in your valuable collection. If you can procure such presents for after-times, as I have hinted at, I am sure you would not refuse them a niche in your museum; for, however modern they would be at present, they would in due time become antiquities; and you will have the conscious pleasure of knowing that two hundred years hence you will present posterity with more entire and better preserved monuments of former times, than any which you have yet bestowed on a grateful public.

ANTIQUUS.

MR. URBAN,

IN reply to your note (vol. LIV. p. 976) respecting Mr. Mores, the passage you refer to in the Anecdotes of Bowyer does by no means prove that he was in orders even in the Church of Rome. It had been asserted, upon the authority of the letters of administration granted to his son, and the information of a friend of Mr. M. that he was in orders, and D. D. the latter an honorary degree conferred upon him in consequence of a literary favour which he had shewn to some foreign Roman Catholic ecclesiastics. Mr. Nichols, with a very laudable diligence and desire to unravel this mysterious business, sought for information from a source the most likely to afford it, the Sorbonne; where it was supposed, and where indeed Mr. M. usually intimated, that the degree had been conferred. But the information derived from thence was, that no such honorary degree had ever been conferred, nor any such person as Mr. Mores known in that university.

Mr. M's fears of a præmunire, if he should shew his diploma, might silence or satisfy the curiosity of his friend. But no such fears can now exist; and cannot the diploma, which was then in being, be found among his papers*, and be produced, to remove all doubt and dispute about it?

Besides, it is very unlikely that the degree of D. D. should be conferred upon a person not in orders†. It is never done in either of our own, nor I believe in any foreign university. But you say he was in Roman Catholic orders. This his own testimony disproves; for in his letter to the Superior of the convent, in which his daughter was placed, he calls himself "Ecclesie alienæ theologus;" and, if a divine of any Protestant church, or D. D. in any Protestant university, in what danger of a præmunire? That he was not in orders in the Church of England, a circumstance but little known beyond the parish in which he lived pretty clearly proves.

* We wish this could be tried. EDIT.

† This is not strictly true. That degree may be, and has been, taken at Oxford by laymen. Of this Dr. Atwell and Dr. Twells of St. John's are two instances. EDIT.

Fig. 3.

In the year * in which he acted as Churchwarden of the parish of Low Leyton (for he was not churchwarden for some years, nor did he greatly improve the church †, as Mr. Nichols had been informed), on a prayer day, Mr. M. took it into his head to anticipate the curate, and begin the service before he came. He began with the Litany; which, without any other part of the service, he read, catechised the boys, and left the church. The curate, upon his quitting the desk, read the remainder of the service, and the congregation were dismissed, not a little disturbed and surprised at so unusual an event. Complaint of this irregularity was made to the Bishop, with an intimation of the doubt that then existed of his being in orders. The Archdeacon was directed by the Bishop to examine Mr. M. when he should come to be sworn into his office, respecting his orders; to whom he refused to give any satisfaction or answer upon the subject. The consequence was, Dr. Waller refused to swear him into his office. A mandamus was threatened, but Mr. M. chose rather to submit to this more perhaps than legal resentment of the Archdeacon, than bring on an investigation that would strip him of a character which he much affected, and had long assumed in the neighbourhood in which he lived. He was therefore never sworn, but was suffered by the parish to go through the business of that year, as a less evil than that of having any contest or dispute with a man of Mr. M's litigious turn.

I should mention, that if he had been really ordained, it is not likely but that, in all the years that he resided at Low Leyton, and in habits of intimacy with the Vicar, to whom his services must have been often very acceptable, he would have some time or other assisted him in some part of his duty. But no such assistance was ever given, nor was he ever known to officiate in any respect, except upon this one occasion; and then he took care, for a very obvious reason, to read only a part of the service appointed to be read.

It is not to satisfy any doubts of my own, for I really have none, but to clear up this point to the satisfaction of others, that I wish the registrars of each diocese would look back a few years to see if any such person were ordained, and communicate it, if they should find any account of him, through the channel of your very valuable Magazine; they need not look back farther than the year 1753, for in that year he took his master's degree, and after that he calls himself E. R. M., Arm. A. M. S. A. S.

I respect the abilities and learning of Mr. M. as much as Mr. Urban can do; but I have a greater respect for truth. Whether he were ordained or not will neither lessen nor add to his fame. But it will be a satisfaction to many to know if he were, or to be rightly informed if he were not. Yours, &c. M. C.

MR. URBAN,

HAVING seen in your last volume, page 968, a letter from a correspondent of yours, who signs himself I. B. C. giving an account of a curious manuscript in his possession, entitled, an Abstract of the Reign of Charles the First, I shall esteem myself particularly obliged to your said correspondent, if he will favour me with his address, in a line directed to your printer, and am, Sir, Yours, &c. PHILO-ANTIQUITATIS.

MR. URBAN,

THE monument here exhibited by the late Mr. Schoepflin, and communicated to the Theodoro-Palatine Society at Manheim June 1776, was found at the side of the high road near Schrisheim, a little town in the Palatinate, about two hours journey from Heidelberg. It was a subterraneous building of an oblong form, whose walls were two Rhenish feet thick, eighty-four long, and sixty broad, and divided into a columbarium, or repository for urns, a chapel for sacrifices to the infernal deities, and a triclinium, or room where the remainder of the sacrifices was feasted on. Eight steps led into this building, which was eight feet below the surface, and four above, built of hewn stones, most of them a foot long, and five inches wide, divided by red lines. The building was vaulted over and had two chimnies [camini] two feet wide, which let in the light. Two of its sides had each two cells in the wall; each cell three feet high, two broad, and two or three inches deep, containing each an urn. Besides these four cells

† If Mr. N. will look in some Sunday, he will see very little improvement that has been made since the days of the venerable Mr. Strype. If Mr. Mores had had influence enough with this respectable parish, to have effected the rebuilding of it, he would have made the only improvement that it will admit of.

a fifth was at the foot of the steps on the right-hand. In the north corner was the chapel, of the same dimensions as the columbarium, with a small semi-circular chapel adjoining. In it was found an iron ax, or secespita, for slaughtering the victims, on a round altar or tippus, which had been removed into the columbarium. These sacrifices were followed by an annual feast in honour of the dead, on the ninth or tenth day after interment, celebrated in the triclinium, when the friends of the deceased eat part of the victims; the rest was burned or carried off by the servants. On the side of this room were found traces of a kitchen, with an entire brick hearth and ashes. This vault was paved with a plaister composed of ground stone and bricks mixed with chalk. See the plate, fig. 2 and 3.

This family burying place, uncommon in Germany, though frequent in Italy, is supposed to have belonged to some persons of inferior rank, and to have been built after the Romans had secured to themselves an undisturbed possession of both sides of the Rhine. Its age may be fixed to the beginning of the second century by coins found in it, which were a silver one of Caracalla, reverse, Jupiter sitting, holding a spear and thunderbolt. P. M. T. R. P. THE QUAKER AND PAPIST.

THE Quaker says (and truly) that the Papist should understand that text "this is my body," in a figurative manner. The Papist says (and truly) that the Quaker should understand that text "swear not at all," as forbidding the use of oaths in common conversation only. They each see and condemn the wrong interpretation of the other. Let the Papist then learn wisdom from the Quaker, and the Quaker from the Papist; for they are both undoubtedly wrong. And which errs most, it is not possible to say; for one errs in contradiction to the evidence of his senses, the other to the evidence of his reason. And Scripture, truly interpreted, is plainly against both. W. S.

MR. URBAN, Voronezh, Nov. 29.

I CANNOT resist the inclination I feel to send you the representation of a little animal, very frequent in these parts, totally unknown, I believe, to other countries. It is called here, The Musk-rat. It seems to me to be properly an intermediate species between the castor race and that of rats: and as it exhales a very strong smell of musk, it thence receives its denomination. The seat of his perfume is under the tail, quite close to the root, immediately beneath the outer skin. It is contained in eighteen small bladders, disposed in three rows of six each, and contiguous to one another. This musk possesses all the qualities of that in use among the pharmacopolists, and from each rat about one scruple of it may be obtained. One circumstance I find very extraordinary in this animal is, that it has neither gall-bladder nor caecum. They couple but once a year, at the very beginning of the spring. It lives almost continually in the water, and is never seen upon the shore but when every thing is perfectly still. At the very instant he perceives a man, he is under water again. Worms and water insects are his common food. His weight is generally something more than sixteen ounces. His skin is beautiful and glossy; but the smell of him is insupportable, and apparently never diminishes. This is the reason that we can only use it, at most, for the facing of a touloupe or a fur morning gown. The people here put the tail of this animal into presses and drawers for preserving their cloaths from the moth. But, unfortunately, they contract so strong an odour from the musk, that one must have lost one's smell by a catarrh to be able to bear a room where any lady has them on.

They are taken in spring and autumn, mostly by the weel and bow-net, in which they are found stifled, though their interior conformation is perfectly adapted to living a long while under water. The musk-rat digs the entrance of his hole in the sharp shores of the lakes, under the level of the water; but, by means of the oblique direction he gives it, it is always dry. They therefore breathe no other air, during the winter, than what remains confined within it. But no sooner is the ice dissolved, than they sport with great delight in the beams of the sun upon the surface surface of the water. Their muzzle, or snout, which is extremely sensible, and moves in all imaginable directions, is peculiarly adapted to rout in the mud, which they do for leeches, of which they are extremely greedy. This snout is also the principal organ of the animal, for his eyes are still smaller than those of the mole, and the holes of his ears are entirely stopped with hair. He sometimes makes a noise with his lips, like that of a duck, and then he draws his snout into his mouth. When provoked, he squeaks like a mouse; and his bite, at such times, is very dangerous. His intestines, even when quite fresh, emit a strong smell of sulphur.

The lovers of natural history will be pleased in comparing the account of this animal with the interesting description given by M. de Buffon of the Ondatra of North America, which in some respects resembles the Russian Musk-rat, but in his manners and figure is much more like the Castor. He is likewise three times larger; since that celebrated naturalist mentions those animals as weighing three pounds.

There is a great satisfaction in travelling about, and examining the wonderful works of nature and art; there is a greater in communicating one's observations and remarks to others. I have chosen the empire of Russia for the theatre of my percurrations, which as I am in no hurry to complete, I allow myself to stay in whatever place I come to as long as I find it agreeable. I seldom pass through any without making some notes thereon; and, I think, the best way of communicating them to others is in the same desultory manner in which they were made. I have not patience enough to put them into the form of a regular narrative; and if I had, it must necessarily be filled with much dull and uninteresting materials. Witness the Travels of Professor —, of —, and —, whose names I do not chuse to mention on this occasion, as I have a great regard, a great esteem, for their authors; and whose good qualities, learning, industry, and genius, I venerate and admire; but whose works few people can have the perseverance to read. And I chuse to send my scraps to your Magazine, because the little money I carry in my cabitka serves me for the wants of life, and I am not ambitious of fame. Yours, &c. M. M. M.

MR. URBAN, St. Petersburg, Oct. 24,
I INCLOSE an accurate drawing of a very remarkable little animal, altogether unknown in Europe. If you think it will be acceptable to your readers, accompanied by the following exact description of it, it is at their service. It is the Mus Jaculus, or Sau-teur; and in English may be called THE JUMPER. It has two incisive teeth in each jaw; and another, much smaller, on each side. His ears are long, and their cartilage so fine, that you see the blood-vessels through it. His fore-legs are very short, and their feet divided into five toes, placed on the same line. His hind-legs are, on the contrary, very long, and the feet furnished in like manner with five toes, but are disposed in an extraordinary way. The middlemost of the three first is the longest; but the fourth and fifth are placed at the distance of half an inch from this long one, the measure being taken in a diagonal direction. His body is slender forwards, but thick and clumsy behind. The ears, the superior part of the body, and the tail, as well as the exterior parts of the legs, are of a yellow colour, mixed with an ash grey, though the bottom of the body is whitish. The tail is longer than the body, and covered with very short hair; towards the extremity it is in form of a fan somewhat pointed, and consists of long black hair, and white, mixed together.

When this animal is at rest, he draws all his body together into one lump, and watches every sound and every thing about him, like a cat or a setting dog. When he proceeds to move, he gets upon his haunches, and puts his body into the form of a bow, then springs forwards by long jumps, so that he seems rather to fly than to walk. The length of his hind legs gives him such an advantage, that he often makes at one leap more than a fathom in length. I chose to send you the draught of the animal in his state of rest, because Hæselquist, Gmelin, and Pallas, the only

* M. Lépéchin cut the tail of several of these animals, at different distances from the body, and found that the extent of their jumps diminished in the same proportion. Those whose tail he cut off entirely, could no longer run at all; but, wanting the support they found in their tails, fell backwards as soon as they prepared their hind legs for advancing.

people who have hitherto drawn it, have represented it in the act of jumping.

He digs his hole with great sagacity and a surprising activity, scratching the earth with his fore paws, and removing roots, and every other obstacle, with his teeth. A very few minutes are amply sufficient for making an excavation of two or three inches in depth. In this manner he forms a very convenient habitation, half a yard deep in the earth. In the top are several apertures, that descend in a perpendicular direction to the burrow, which deepens always in an oblique line. These holes are probably a sort of vents to the habitation. As this animal lives on herbs and roots, during the summer he goes morning and evening in search of his food. He piles up his stock in different heaps, and, after having let them dry in the air, he transports them to his hole by little and little.

This animal is found in great numbers about Voronetch, in this empire: Messerschmidt saw them in Siberia, and Hasselquist in Ægypt. M. M. M.

P. S. As you must now grow old, Mr. Urban, I should think a small degree of relaxation from the business and cares of this world would be of great comfort and advantage to you. It is with a view of taking some of them from off your hands, that I transmit you this paper; and, if you like my assistance, I will pick up what I can for you in these frozen regions. I too am a laborious man, Mr. Urban; my warfare is manifold, as well as severe: but it is only the wretched that know how to compassionate the wretched. The happy are above it; the idle never think of it.

MR. URBAN, Ross, Herefordsh. Apr. 6.
I HAVE sent you the inclosed MSS. of the late Dr. Johnson, communicated to me by a friend, a worthy and respectable clergyman, with his permission for publication. The directions were given by the Doctor at Lichfield (some time about his marriage) to a relative, and the scheme was drawn about the same period. I am, &c. S. P.

Scheme for the Classes of a Grammar School.

When the introduction, or formation of nouns and verbs, is perfectly mastered, let them learn

Corderius by Mr. Clarke, beginning at the same time to translate out of the introduction, that by this means they may learn the syntax. Then let them proceed to,

Erasmus, with an English translation, by the same author.

Class II. Learns Eutropius and Cornelius Nepos, or Justin, with the translation.

N. B. The first class gets for their part every morning the rules which they have learned before, and in the afternoon learns the Latin rules of the nouns and verbs.

They are examined in the rules which they have learned every Thursday and Saturday.

The second class doth the same whilst they are in Eutropius; afterwards their part is in the irregular nouns and verbs, and in the rules for making and scanning verses. They are examined as the first.

Class III. Ovid's Metamorphoses in the morning, and Cæsar's Commentaries in the afternoon.

Part is in the Latin rules till they are perfect in them, afterwards in Mr. Leeds's Greek Grammar. Examined as before.

Afterwards they proceed to Virgil, beginning at the same time to write themes and verses, and to learn Greek; from thence passing on to Horace, &c. as shall seem most proper.

I know not well what books to direct you to, because you have not informed me what study you will apply yourself to. I believe it will be most for your advantage to apply yourself wholly to the languages, till you go to the University. The Greek authors I think it best for you to read are these:

Cebes.	} Attic.
Ælian.
Lucian by Leeds.
Xenophon.	} Ionic.
Homer.
Theocritus.
Euripides.	} Attic and Doric.

Thus you will be tolerably skilled in all the dialects, beginning with the Attic, to which the rest must be referred.

In the study of Latin, it is proper not to read the later authors, till you are well versed in those of the purest ages; as, Terence, Tully, Cæsar, Sallust, Nepos, Velleius Paterculus, Virgil, Horace, Phædrus.

The greatest and most necessary task still remains, to attain a habit of expression, without which knowledge is of little use. This is necessary in Latin, and more necessary in English; and can can only be acquired by a daily imitation of the best and correctest authors.

SAM. JOHNSON.

An original Letter from Dr. JOHNSON, written just before the publication of his Dictionary, to Mr. THOMAS WARTON, dated Feb. 1, 1755.

“DEAR SIR,

I WROTE to you some weeks ago, but I believe did not direct accurately, and therefore know not whether you had my letter. I would likewise write to your brother, but know not where to find him. I now begin to see land, after having wandered, according to Mr. Warburton's phrase, in this vast sea of words. What reception I shall meet with upon the shore, I know not; whether the sound of bells, and acclamations of the people, which Ariosto talks of in his last Canto, or a general murmur of dislike, I know not: whether I shall find, upon the coast, a Calypso that will court, or a Polypheme that will resist. But if Polypheme comes to me, have at his eyes*. I hope, however, the criticks will let me be at peace: for though I do not much fear their skill or strength, I am a little afraid of myself; and would not willingly feel so much ill-will in my bosom as literary quarrels are apt to excite. I am in great want of Crescimbeni, which you may have again when you please. There is nothing considerable done or doing among us here: we are not perhaps as innocent as villagers, but most of us as idle. I hope, however, you are busy; and should be glad to know what you are doing. I am, DEAR SIR,

Yours, &c. SAM. JOHNSON.

MR. URBAN,

I WISH to learn from your correspondent at Mortlake, p. 107, whether Hewson was the name of either of the two children whose baptisms were registered there in 1644. The real name of the odd man buried in the church-yard of that parish in 1715, to whom the Latin inscription refers, seems to have been HEWSON. I wish likewise to know if there be any other name besides that of Johannes Partridge entered on the tombstone. In this last enquiry I have a view to his widow, who was a widow when he married her. If she is not there, she likely had an utter dislike to widow-hood, and, old as she must have been in 1715, entered afresh into the bands of wedlock. The doctor's degree from Leyden is ascertained by the inscription, though I can find little or no mention of it elsewhere. It was probably obtained during his residence in Holland, into which his concern in the Rye-House plot obliged him to withdraw himself from danger in the reign of James II. The apud in the epitaph must not be translated at, but near; for his poor mother, who was a chair-woman, dropt him rather unexpectedly in a hedge ale-house, on her road to London.

Her son was first a shoe-maker, and then a cobbler; but whilst he was occupied in these necessary employments, he still found or took time to make almanacks and sigils, to deal in quack medicines, and practise a variety of astrological tricks. At last he betook himself entirely to the most lucrative, though the least honourable, of his three trades, and dropping then, it should seem, his real name, assumed that of Partridge, and commenced a quack doctor and an astrologer in form.

I need not tell you, Mr. Urban, that, contemptible as this character is now, as a profession so odious in almost all its branches ought to be, it was not so disreputable in those days, but that gentlemen and scholars † dabbled in it.

Under the supposititious name of John Partridge, this fellow published many astrological and medical, or rather astrologico-medical books, besides the translation of the Latin Thesaurus & Armarientarium Medico-Chymicum of Mynsicht, and his “Opus reformatum,” the improvement of Lilly's book of Astrology, mentioned by your Mortlake correspondent.

SWIFT has not misquoted from the only almanack of which this man seems to have been the real author, after the unfortunate time that he fell, not undeservedly, under the lash of Bickerstaff's ridicule. He did not indeed live in Covent Garden, as SWIFT says in his Predictions or Vindication, &c. for he had removed about ten years before this into Salisbury Street in the Strand, where he continued from 1699 till his death in 1715. I mention this frivolous circumstance, as it furnishes a sort of presumption, that there was no intermixture of perso-

* But Polypheme surely was monocular. And so, we are told, was this literary Ulysses. EDIT.

† It appears from Athmole's Diary, that “an astrologer's feast” was annually holden at Painter's Hall. EDIT.

nal malice in the merriment which Swift exercised at the expence of a man with whose place of abode he was unacquainted. SWIFT might likewise be ignorant of the man's advanced age; though if he had even known that the poor man was 20 years older, he would nevertheless have indulged his licentious wit.

A more circumstantial account of Partridge and his publications is now in preparation; and in that account, Mr. Urban, notice will be taken of Partridge's letter to Isaac Manley Esq. in your last. I am,
Yours, &c. JOHN DELVER.

P. S. Francis Moore, about whom you enquire, was man-setter to Mr. Partridge, and a constant at his heels, till he set up for himself, and began to make almanacks and sigils, i. e. charms or bits of paper, or pasteboard, or metal filled with astrological gibberish, to prevent sailors from being drowned, or maids from being got with child, &c. &c. &c. at first probably under the name of his old master, though that name seems to have been soon wrested from him by an abler writer, if not a better man. This appears from an humorous well-penned dedication to Isaac Bickerstaff, Esq. of an almanack, under the name of John Partridge, for the year 1714, entitled Mercurius Redivivus. This dedication I reserve for future publication in the account above mentioned.

Having a faint recollection of seeing a poem, or humorous paper, about Old Hewson the Cobbler, I should be glad of any information relative to him. J. D.

MR. URBAN,

READING in your last Magazine an account of the cancelling a leaf, at the Oxford press, of Mr. Toup's Annotations on Theocritus, and substituting another (without his consent) in the place of it, I was reminded of a passage in the introduction to an Historical Essay on the XXXIX Articles, printed in 1724, p. 19.

"In the year 1634, the Articles of 1571 were printed at Oxford, in Latin, by the encouragement of Dr. Prideaux (the King's professor in divinity) without the clause*, according to all printed copies of them. But Bishop LAUD, receiving information of this edition before it was published, took such measures, that the printers were constrained to reprint the book, or that part of it at least where the clause was omitted, and to insert the clause: in

* The clause here alluded to is that supposed to be a part of the 20th Article, the church hath power to decree rites and ceremonies, and authority in controversies of faith.

"which conduct LAUD seems to have been a perfect forger."

A READER OF OLD BOOKS*.

What is the solution of the difficulty that Wesseling hath given, and Ernesti repeatedly referred to with approbation in the following manner: "V. Cel. Wesselingii Disp. ad Marmor vetus de P. Sulpicii Quirini censu, p. 21, 22?"

The Textus Roffensis (a very ancient curious MS. which belongs to the church of Rochester) was surreptitiously taken out of their Archives by — Leonard, a doctor of physick. After an interval of two years, Dr. Balcqual the Dean, and the Chapter, discovered who was in possession of it, and made application for the surrendering of it; which being refused, they filed a bill in Chancery in order to recover it, and obtained a decree in their favour about the year 1633. Qu. Is this case noticed in any printed Reports?

MR. URBAN,

IT gave me pleasure to see honourable mention made of Bp. Warburton in the memoirs of Mr. Toup in your last Magazine. It is much to be wished that some of those friends who were well acquainted with him (and amongst them are some of the most distinguished writers of the age †) would do justice to his memory, by giving the public an account of his life and character. Few characters are more generally misunderstood. In his temper he was generous and manly, and above all mean resentment; in his carriage, both as a man and a bishop, he was entirely free from that superciliousness which marks his writings, the habit of which was probably acquired in the Bentleian School. His genius and learning will need no panegyrist. There are, in every age, a class of fashionable, ephemeral writers, who swim about, not ungracefully, on the surface of literature, like pretty school-boys; but never venture to dive in search of unturned treasures; Bp. Warburton was not of this class; his name and his writings will be had in remembrance, when the names and writings of his cavillers and adversaries shall be quietly interred with those bishops, deans, and dignitaries, their predecessors, who, after having strutted and jested their little hour, now sleep in peace in the pages of a Godwin or a Richardson. C. C.

* If this writer, or reader, had seen this leaf, he would not, surely, have wondered at its being cancelled, or thought the cases similar. EDIT.

† Of these, two, if I mistake not, have distinguished themselves in this very walk of biography. SUM-

SUMMARY OF THE PROCEEDINGS IN PARLIAMENT, SESS. II.

Debates in the present Session of Parliament, continued from p. 224.

Thursday, Feb. 17.

TH E army estimates were then brought forward. The House having resolved itself into a committee of supply, Mr. of Graham in the chair,

Sir G. Yonge (Secretary at War) rose, to state the number of men intended to be moved for, to constitute the army establishment for the service of the present year. He took notice, that 70 regiments were intended to be kept up, including the six regiments that had been proposed to be reduced when the army estimates were last year laid before the House; but as it appeared at that time to be the general sense of the House, that those regiments should not be reduced, in order to comply with the feelings expressed for those brave officers, who had so gallantly fought in defence of their country, and that no additional expence on their account might be incurred, a general reduction of the army had taken place, by which, upon the whole, there would be a saving to the public. He said, the number proposed to be voted was rather lower than had been granted for any year since that of 1748. He concluded with moving,

“ That a number of land forces, including 28,300 invalids, amounting to 18,130 effective men, be employed for the year 1785. And

“ That 655,963l. 4s. 8d. be granted to his Majesty, for defraying the charge of the same. And also,

“ That 222,021l. 4s. 4d. be granted for payment of forts and garrisons.”

Lord North remarked, on what the Rt. Hon. Secretary at War had said, that the number of regiments to be kept up was greater, yet the expence to the public was to be less. His Lordship wished to know how that was to be effected.

The Secretary in reply said, by reducing throughout the army one drum and ten privates in each company; so that the number of men reduced in the other regiments would be greater than the number contained in the six regiments intended to be kept up.

Col. Fitzpatrick could not help expressing his surprise, that the six regiments, which last year were proposed to be reduced, should this year be intended to be maintained. The idea of keeping up a great number of regiments, and but few men, involved a question, Whether the direct opposite principle was not the wiser? As this was entirely a military question, he wished to have an opinion upon it from military authority.

Col. Phéps, not seeing any other military officer present, rose, and apologised for offering his opinion, not decisively, he said, as knowing himself incompetent from his rank in the army; but expressive of his own sense and that of his brother officers on the general reduction of the army. It was almost universally agreed by gentlemen of his profession, that the best mode of forming a system of peace establishment was to keep up a number of regiments, but to lessen the number of men in each; men may easily be recruited and trained, in case of a war; but long experience is necessary to qualify an officer for command. He supported his opinion by proofs, and could not help being surprised, to hear the Rt. Hon. Gent. the first to complain of the mode that had been adopted by way of reward to gentlemen, who had paid a large part of their fortunes for their commissions, and who certainly, if they had no claim on the justice of the House, had a considerable claim on its generosity. He had hitherto, he said, considered the Rt. Hon. Gentleman as the army's friend, but his conduct that day astonished him.

Lord Adam Gordon said, he had the honour to command one of those regiments that were proposed last year to be reduced; and he was exceedingly happy to find that resolution abandoned. A braver or a better set of officers were not in the King's service.

Mr. Steele was the more astonished, he said, at the objection of the Rt. Hon. Gent. as he himself had been the person last year who first recommended the plan now adopted by the Secretary at War, viz: the keeping up a large number of regiments, but the reduction of the number of men in each. He reminded him likewise that he was the friend who had recommended the officers of the regiments in question to the generosity of the House, and had spoken of their conduct in terms of the highest applause.

Col. Fitzpatrick admitted all that Mr. Steele had said; and that of the two systems he had given his opinion in favour of the present; but having done so generally, it did not follow in candour that he was bound to support that doctrine to every possible extent. He believed the Hon. Gent. would not say he was.—

he could not help repeating his wish to have heard a military opinion upon the subject; for though he had the utmost regard in every other respect for the Hon. Gent. who spoke upon the subject, he must excuse him if he did not admit him as a great military authority. He had not himself presumed to speak as a military man on the question, but officially, having at that time the honour of filling the place, which is now so much better supplied by the Rt. Hon. Baronet. He lamented the want of a Commander in Chief, on whose opinion the House might rest securely; at present he knew not who was responsible for the conduct of the army; but his present surprise at the keeping up four of the regiments in question is owing to a hint thrown out towards the close of the last session by the Rt. Hon. Gent. that the officers, whose merit every man must admit, might possibly be entitled to full pay without any expence to the public. This declaration had occasioned much speculation; and he for one imagined they were to have been employed in the service of the East India Company.

This called up the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who took to himself a share of the responsibility for the conduct of the army. He did not think it singular, he said, that at this time of peace there should be no Commander in Chief; nor did he believe that greater partialities were now practised in the military, than when there had been a Commander in Chief. He declared, however, that he had no allusion to any recent transaction. He understood that it was the general wish of the House, not to reduce the regiments in question; and, in consequence of that wish, the system had been formed. He admitted, that the Rt. Hon. Gent. was right in his conjecture, that some idea had been entertained of employing them in the service of the E. I. Company; but as that had not been carried into execution, a way had been found to keep them in full pay without expence to the nation; his word had therefore been accurately fulfilled.

Some little altercation took place between Col. Fitzpatrick and Col. Phipps, but in a most gentlemanlike style; and Mr. Fox closed the conversation with remarking on the words that fell from Mr. Pitt respecting the conduct of the army, though there was no Commander in Chief. He said, if he meant to insinuate aught against the management of the late Commander in Chief [Gen. Conway], that genleman had friends enough in the House ready to meet the charge. No reply was made; and both resolutions were moved, and agreed to.

After several motions for papers respecting the commercial arrangements with Ireland, which were all agreed to,

Mr. Pitt rose, and called the attention of the House to the reports of the Commissioners of Accounts, whose abilities, industry, and perseverance in the discharge of their duty deserved, he said, the unanimous thanks, not only of that House, but of the whole nation. And in order to impress the House with an adequate idea of the importance of the subject-matter of their reports, he recapitulated the several offices that had been the objects of their investigation, namely, the office of the Receiver-General of the land-tax; those of the Paymaster-General of the forces, Secretary at war, Treasurer of the navy, the navy and victualling offices, customs and excise offices in England and Scotland, offices for sick and hurt seamen, tax-office, stamp-office, post-office, paymaster-general's-office, surveyor-general of the land-revenue, imprest-office, surveyor-general of the woods and forests, hackney-coach-office, and the hawkers and pedlars-office. All these several offices and departments, Mr. Pitt said, had fallen under the examination of the Commissioners of Accounts; and their reports would be the best guide to the committee of the House, in their investigations of the subjects to which he meant principally to draw their attention.

To bring this complicated business the more clearly before the House, he classed his matter under three distinct heads. In the first, he placed the offices employed in levying and collecting the public revenue; in the second, the offices employed in the disbursement and expenditure of it; and in the third, which he considered as the most important of all, he included the manner in which the whole revenue should be finally accounted for.

Under the first of these heads came naturally to be considered the offices of receiver-general of the land-tax, the post-office, the boards of customs and excise, the salt-office, the stamp-office, coach-office, &c. In all which offices, such regulations had already taken place (see vols LI. LII. LIII.) as to render any further remarks, for the present, unnecessary. But those he chiefly wished to recommend to the attention of the House, were the offices in which immense sums of the public money were detained, to the the manifest loss and risk of the public. He inspected the Tax-office, in which from the year 1756 there appeared to be due in arrears, in the hands of defaulters, no less than 113,161*l.* of which 24,251*l.* had already been lost upon composition, and a great part of the remainder still very doubtful; whereas, from the Excise-office, where the money was paid in weekly, there had been no arrears during the same period, or defaulters, except in one instance only to the amount of about 360*l.* To prevent losses of the like kind, was, he said, one great object he had in view.

Having touched slightly on the other departments employed in the collection, he then proceeded to the Navy-office, where it was of importance to prevent arrears from lying long in the hands of treasurers both in and out of office. This, he said, carried the appearance of much difficulty, which, however, should not deter the House from looking forward to seek the means of remedy. One great difficulty to treasurers making up their accounts was owing to the almost impracticability of pursers accounting regularly, from the frequency of being shifted from one ship to another; another was, the privilege given to sub-accountants of having their accounts set à la pape, by which they were never fairly made out or examined. He therefore most readily acquiesced in the recommendation of the Commissioners of Accounts, that the balances in the treasurers hands should be regularly paid into the Bank, which would put an end to all disputes about interest, as has of late been much the fashion. With respect to the Ordnance-board, he had the pleasure of informing the House, that, from the very excellent and judicious regulations made there, the wishes of the Commissioners of Accounts had already been anticipated; and he had only farther to wish, that the rule prescribed to the other offices, to pay their balances into the Bank, might be adopted in this. He touched slightly on the little regard that had been paid by former administrations to objects of the greatest magnitude, and inspected the extraordinary of the army, the expenditure of which he thought a material object of enquiry.

The Pay-office was the next subject of animadversion, in which the Commissioners of Accounts had pointed out many abuses that called for correction. One of the evils which had taken root in that office, and not easy to be eradicated, was, the application of the particular services, to the services, for which it had been granted. It rode to pay-masters to sums of public money which instances are in memory. But, as soon now in the course of necessity of any further this office at this time was precluded.

On the vast emoluments of the Imprest-office he enlarged with some vehemence. The sums, extorted for management by this office, had amounted to more than one hundred and fourteen thousand, four hundred and twenty pounds; but, what was still more to be regretted, the enormity of the sum rose in direct proportion to the distresses of the public. The Commissioners of Accounts had hazarded various sentiments on this subject. Should the substitution of salaries, in the room of fees and perquisites, become the subject of consideration, the reasonableness and propriety of those fees, &c. would naturally come under the inspection of persons who were in the entrusted with the powers of settling the quantum of the equivalent; but the sums paid at present to the auditors so far exceeded all due proportion as to require immediate attention. No emoluments of individuals ought to grow out of the distresses of the country. Every public office had originally been instituted for the service of the state, and the duties of it discharged for the emolument of government; but when it was no longer for public advantage that such services should be performed, or when the exercise of them became an unnecessary expence, it would be an inversion of the principle that governed such establishments, to suffer that private emolument, which was no motive for the institution, to prevent or retard the abolition, or abatement, of the expence. These observations were directed, he said, to the situation of the auditors of impress, and were intended to prepare the way for a proposed regulation. On that ground it was, however, previously necessary to examine particularly, whether such regulation interfered with any right vested in the officer by virtue of his office. The last patent for the grant of this office described it with no emoluments. The power of auditing the Bank and South-Sea accounts was deduced from the general words "auditing and determining the accounts of all persons accountable for sums received in the name of impress." The issue the fore, by way of impress, was the circumstance that gave the auditor authority; and solely on a bill, or an act, the authority of the auditor's report was created; but, when created, the legislature thought proper to direct the payment of them to be accounted for according to the due course of the exchequer, by which the auditors gained a new object. But should the legislature see good cause to alter this mode of issue, could there be a doubt of its having a just right to do so?

In the regulations which he had to propose, it was with him a generally received principle, to preserve patent rights and living interests: These he considered as insignia of notable services rendered by the patentees for the advantage of the state; but, much as he respected patent interests; he would not go so far as to admit, that the patentees had a right to consider the enormous unforeseen accumulation of profit arising from the distresses of their country as a property sacred, which no reform was ever to touch. In the fair construction of any patent right, he could not allow such an idea deductible from it. If it were, the consequence would be fatal; for, however paradoxical it might appear, the fact was, that the faster money flowed into the office, the more remarkable it was for delay. By the constitution of the office, the principals, considering their places as sinecures, did the business by clerks, who, being paid by fees and perquisites, were equally open to the sub-accountant who wished his account to be delayed, as to him who wished his to be accelerated. He exempted, however, the present auditors and their deputies from this censure, who, he said, had exerted themselves, and done more than could have been expected. His remarks were levelled at the constitution of the office, not at the officers who were to do the business. He then adverted to the immense increase of the sub-accountants arrears, and thought that some plan should be fallen upon for settling their accounts. He reminded the House, that about two years ago he had been laughed at for stating, that there were then upwards of forty millions of the public money unaccounted for, and treated as a visionary for supposing that he could ever recover forty thousand pounds, or even 40l. of the money; but he had now the satisfaction to assure the House, that twenty-seven millions had already been traced; that 257,000l. had actually been acknowledged; and that solid sums might yet be expected from a further investigation. The enquiry, he knew, was tedious, as there were upwards of nine hundred persons concerned in that enormous balance; but he would not be dispirited. He would submit it to the House, whether the powers of the impress should not be enlarged, so as to enable them to settle the public accounts with the utmost exactness. The fees of office amounted at present to upwards of 60,000l. though the business, so formerly transacted, did not deserve so many hundreds; it would be necessary therefore, in his opinion, to render the auditors responsible for the negligence of their clerks, and that all fees should be abolished, and handsome salaries substituted in their room. He had no doubt of the general concurrence of the House in this important and necessary retrenchment.

One thing he found recommended in the reports of the Commissioners of Accounts, which he meant at present wholly to abandon, and that was the consolidation of offices. This, he said, he did from a conviction, that the saving would be inconsiderable; but he was not certain but that a part of the business of one office, that seemed to be over-loaded, might not be transferred to another that had less to do. He instanced the Excise-office, some part of the business of which might be transferred to the Tax-office; and placed on a new footing. As to the taxes that were optional, and in a manner voluntary, such as that on coaches, and others of the like kind, he meant a collector to be appointed to call upon the parties chargeable at stated times, instead of leaving it to them to pay at their pleasure. The consolidation of the Hackney coach-office, and Hawkers and pedlars-office, would be rendered unnecessary by the abolition of the offices themselves, of which he should say more on some future occasion.

In the course of his speech, which kept up the attention of the House for more than three hours, by the variety of objects to which he alluded, he more than once took occasion to blame the inat-neglect of former administrations to measures of the greatest magnitude. He instanced their total disregard to a list of the sub-accountants deemed defaulters, which had been prepared by order of the Treasury-board, and laid upon the table in the session of 1782-3, but not suffered to be considered as a voucher of any authority.

He concluded with moving, "That leave be given to bring in a bill for better examining and auditing the accounts of this kingdom."

Mr. Sheridan rose, to reply to some strokes of censure which had fallen from the Rt. Hon. Gent. in the course of his remarks: The charge, he said, of treating the discovery of forty millions being in arrear, by persons through whose hands the public money had passed, with levity and ridicule, was certainly very unjust; for though the House did not give entire credit to the assertion, they stated in their address to the Crown, that large sums of money were owing to the public; which was not treating the discovery with levity or disregard.

Mr. Pitt replied. It was yet in the recollection of the House, that the gentlemen opposite to him had denied that any such sum was owing, and had asserted that 40l. would never be received; and that the official document that he had introduced to shew the grounds on which he had ventured to state the fact, had been disregarded, tho' actually drawn out at the instance of the Treasury-board.

Mr. Sheridan still denied the authority of the document alluded to, and insisted, that it was only a memorandum drawn out by Mr. Molleson for his own private use, and not an authenticated record.

Mr. Rose set the matter right. He said, that though Mr. Molleson had no formal authority from the Treasury-board, yet it was by the desire of the Treasury-board that he had employed persons to make the extracts from the Treasury rolls.

Mr. Fox rose, and insisted, that notwithstanding all the parade of merit which the Rt. Hon. Gent. had assumed to himself and colleagues, on the score of reform, he would venture to compare the one year in which he had the honour of a share in the administration with the two that the Rt. Hon. Gent. had been minister; and refer to the reports of the Commissioners of Accounts to decide in which period the most important public business had been dispatched. Indeed, from the great attention and applause with which the Rt. Hon. Gent. was heard, when speaking of retrenchment, particularly on the salaries of the auditors of the Imprest, he was apprehensive that he should be left singular when he gave it as his opinion, that places held by patent, which were the freeholds of the possessors, ought not to be wantonly retrenched, being generally the reward of great and meritorious services. The Rt. Hon. Gent. had said, that salaries ought not to be suffered to exceed the amount for which they were originally granted. He could not subscribe to that doctrine, for, were it universally to be adopted, the property of this kingdom would be in a very precarious situation; most of the great estates of the best families were originally grants from the crown; and if all their improvements were to be resumed, the original grants would not be worth holding. He would not say, that if the appointments were to commence de novo, the present arrangements would be eligible; but would assert, that, in the present instance, more of principle would be sacrificed, than would be gained by retrenchment.

As soon as Mr. Fox had done speaking, the question was put on the motion, and agreed to.

Mr. Pitt rose again, and moved, that leave be given to bring in a bill, for better regulating the office of Treasurer of the Navy, and for transferring the custody of the cash for ordnance service from the Treasurer of the Ordnance to the Bank. This was likewise put, and agreed to.

Mr. Pitt then begged the attention of the House to another motion, which he had once before, he said, had the honour to make, and which, when modelled into the shape of a bill, had passed that House, but had been rejected by the other. Their objection was, that the Commissioners in the several departments had the power vested in themselves to correct the abuses, if any, complained of, without a new law for that purpose. This, however, was more specious than true: he would therefore move, that "leave be given to bring in a bill, for appointing commissioners to enquire into the fees, gratuities, perquisites, and emoluments, which are, or lately have been, received in the several public offices to be therein named, to examine into any abuses which may exist in the same, and to report such such observations as shall occur to them, for the better conducting and managing the business transacted in the said offices."

Mr. Fox owned, that, when the bill alluded to was before in Parliament, he had done what he very seldom did, forbear to deliver his sentiments upon it, and had suffered it to go to the House of Lords, there to be thrown out.

The Attor. Gen. caught at Mr. Fox's confessing, that the House of Lords might be rendered useful sometimes, by throwing out such bills as for reasons of convenience it might be thought advisable to suffer to pass the Commons—and turned the laugh upon him. He then entered into the tendency of such a bill, and the reasons that required it, which neither the commissioners, nor government itself, could effect without new powers.

The Solicitor Gen. was of the same opinion. The motion was agreed to, and the House adjourned.

Feb. 18.

Col. Fitzpatrick rose, to present a petition of the electors of Westminster, praying to be heard by counsel, in support of the allegations contained in a former petition from the same quarter.

Mr. Pitt was of opinion, that the prayer of the petition could not be complied with, as that petition had already been considered and determined. He therefore gave it his negative.

Col. Fitzpatrick insisted that it was perfectly regular to present a petition at one time, and at a future period to present another, and move to be heard in support of it.

Lord Fred. Campbell said, that to present a petition at one time, and afterwards to present another, and move to be heard by counsel on that other, was perfectly regular; but to present a petition at one time, and after that petition had been heard and determined, to move at another time to be heard by counsel on the same petition, was contrary to the usage of the House, and he should oppose it.

Lord Surrey, as an elector of Westminster, insisted on his right to be heard by counsel, as circumstances had arisen, since the petition was first presented, which had made the exercise of that right necessary.

Mr. Pitt insisted, that it was vexatious, unparliamentary, and a hindrance to public business, to sit discussing questions that had already been agitated in that House.

Mr. Fox insisted, that the grievances of the people were first to be discussed, in preference to every other part of public business; and urged the necessity of the present motion with much warmth.

Lord Mulgrave rose to say something on the motion, but the clamour was so great that he could not be heard. And, to quiet it, the Speaker put the question, and the motion was agreed to. It was then moved, and carried, that the High Bailiff and his assessor do attend at the same time, and Monday was the day fixed.

Monday 21.

Col. Fitzpatrick rose, and moved the order of the day, for hearing counsel, as above.

Lord Fred. Campbell begged to know to what part of the petition the counsel were to be heard, whether to the new matters pretended to have occurred, or to the old that have already been discussed. He was, he said, anxious to have the question clearly understood, and for that purpose, would beg leave to move, "that the counsel for the electors of Westminster be restrained from going into any other matter than what may tend to prove that the evidence given on Wednesday the 9th of February was defective and incomplete; or such other matter as may have occurred since that day."

This gave rise to some conversation on the irregularity of the proceeding; when it was agreed, that the motion should be introduced by way of amendment.

Mr. Jolliffe opposed the amendment, on the ground, that if petitioners were to be restrained from stating their grievances by counsel at large, then it might be truly said, that the privileges of electors were wholly at an end.

Mr. Eden opposed the amendment precisely on the same ground.

Lord Frederick Campbell insisted, that he was quite regular in his motion, and should persist in it, till it was clearly understood, that the counsel should not be heard on any other petition than that which the honourable member had presented the Friday before.

Lord Maitland treated the amendment with some asperity. Suppose, said his Lordship, a case in common law, where the parties were just ready to come to issue, and the judge should tell the counsel, "You may proceed, gentlemen, if you please; but you must not introduce any matter or thing in your brief, that may have been decided on in this court relative to your case before; if you do, you shall not be attended to." Just as absurd would be the doctrine this day laid down here, were the Noble Lord's [F. Campbell's] amendment to be adopted.

Lord

Lord Maber rose in support of the amendment. He said, if counsel were allowed to plead determined causes over again, all public business must be retarded by frivolous repetitions.

Mr. Astor, Gen. observed, that, if counsel were to be admitted to be heard in support of former petitions already decided, there would be no end to hearings on petitions. He would therefore support the amendment, if all former petitions were to be included in the counsels instructions.

Lord Mulgrave insisted, that it was quite consistent with the usage of the House to restrain counsel from deviating from the precise matter in evidence.

Mr. Powis opposed the amendment. He was from the beginning an enemy to the whole proceeding.

Mr. Dundas contended strenuously for the amendment, and cited several cases in point.

Mr. Sheridan replied very ably to the last speaker, and endeavoured to shew that he had wholly mistaken the principle of the original motion, which involved only the petition of Friday, and what had so near a relation to it as not to be separated from it. He insisted, that it was the incontrovertible right of the petitioners to be heard by their counsel at large.

Lord Munaster rose, and stated some propositions from Sir Cecil Wray, on the event of which that gentleman would trust the issue of the scrutiny. The propositions were to adjourn the scrutiny from St. Martin's, to St. Margaret's and St. John's parishes; and, if upon scrutinising those parishes, Sir Cecil did not obtain a majority of legal votes, he would then give up the election, without giving Mr. Fox any farther trouble.

Mr. Fox treated this proposition contemptuously.

Mr. Banks, though an enemy to the scrutiny, thought the noble Lord's proposition fair. The scrutiny was a hindrance to public business.

Mr. Fox insisted, that, if the noble Lord's amendment should pass, the progress of public business would be impeded more by that than by any thing else. Were the return to be now made, even were it a double return, the election might be decided by Mr. Grenville's bill, without any delay of public business. But till the return was made, the scrutiny should be perpetually brought forward as a grievance, whatever might be the consequence.

Mr. Bancroft persisted, in opposition to all the reasoning of Mr. Fox to the contrary, that the scrutiny in the first instance was a legal proceeding, and that the progress of it was interrupted by the most unwarrantable delays. He supported the amendment; and was followed by

Mr. Hardinge, who counted up forty-eight long speeches that had been made in discussing the question, which was still as far from being decided as when it first began to be agitated. He was clear, he said, that the electors of Westminster had a right to petition, and that they had a right to support their petition by counsel; but he was as clear (having presented one petition, and been heard upon it by counsel), that they had no right, on their presenting a second petition, to be again heard by counsel on the matter contained in the first petition.

Mr. Martin was for no restriction. He was for giving counsel their full scope; that the question might fairly be decided at once. He supported the original motion.

Mr. Pitt took up Mr. Hardinge's argument. He knew, he said, that he trod on burning coals whenever he touched on the Westminster election; but, as the subject-matter of the present petition was different from the subject-matter of all former petitions, it was his opinion, that the counsel ought to be confined to speak only to the present petition.

The question for the amendment being put, the numbers, on a division, were, Ayes 203. Noes 145. After this, the counsel were admitted; but being told the resolution of the House, they declined speaking.

The High Bailiff was then ordered to the bar, and passed a short examination. After which a motion was made, that the H. B. do make a return of two members to serve in parliament for the city of Westminster, on which, after some debate, a division took place, when the numbers were; For the motion 136. Against the motion 145. Majority 9 only.

Tuesday, Feb. 22.

The House was called over for the second time during this session; after which,

Mr. Pitt moved, that the dispatches from Ireland might be read. And that the propositions, moved by Mr. Orde on Monday the 7th instant in the Irish Parliament, might be read also, see p. 230. This being complied with, after a long apologetical introduction, in which he enlarged colossal on the magnitude and importance of the subject; he proceeded to remark on the illiberal treatment of Great Britain to her sister kingdom, in former times. Before the Revolution, it was the custom to confine the commercial system of Ireland to her own local situation. This degrading system continued from one administration to another through several reigns; but it was impossible that such a narrow and impolitic restriction could continue for ever to check the operations of a high-spirited and free people. They were by slow degrees at length allowed to trade with our Colonies, but that trade was only through the medium of Great Britain. This however was one step gained; but Ireland could not even then, from her own ports, steer a direct course to our Colonies; but was obliged, in compliance with the navigation act, to carry on all her intercourse with other countries through our means and by our regulations. At length the hour of her emancipation arrived; and he had the honour of asserting her right at a time when this country shewed no inclination to contest her claims. By acknowledging her independence, we have left her commercial interests without contest, and have opened to her the most free, direct, and unobscured intercourse with every maritime state in Europe, except with Great Britain. Such was, and such is, our situation with our sister kingdom at this instant. It was an attention to her present circumstances; in consequence of what had been her former condition, which disposed his Majesty's ministers to form such regulations as they trusted would effectually supply former defects; and such as, he flattered himself, would be considered as forming the basis of a solid and permanent establishment founded on the unerring principles of reciprocal advantage. He inveighed against that illiberality which tended to exalt or enrich one people of the same empire at the expence of another. He thought the navigation act capable of very different constructions. Whatever liberty Ireland might formerly have to correspond with foreign parts, with Great Britain she had none; but now should this restriction be done away, the stream of trade will centre in the British capital; so that those who have insinuated that a deserted metropolis will be the consequence, will not be displeased when they see the very reverse the fact, and the riches of the whole united empire attracted to one centre in the great metropolis.

We have heard, he said, that this indulgence to Ireland will be a dreadful blow to a law by which the British empire has risen to opulence and glory. The prejudices, thus generally entertained; he thought it high time to abandon, and in their room to cherish ideas of affection and liberality, which better became sister nations. Were the wound as dreadful as it is represented, he wished to know who gave the stroke? There was a time when ministers of this country were disposed to surrender to Ireland every thing that was held most dear; because in fact they could not help themselves. They had insulted Ireland, and she resented it. She demanded as her right what we were in no capacity to refuse. Whatever therefore was then improperly conceded was not to be imputed to him, but to the noble lord who then presided. His system was only completing the structure which his lordship had left unfinished. It was true, indeed, the apprehensions that have risen in some men's minds do not so forcibly strike him. He saw nothing we had to dread from a circuitous commerce in commodities which we could always bring in a direct line. The chief W. India productions were sugars and rum. It is hardly possible that Ireland should ever take any of that trade out of our hands. She would in that case be under the necessity of paying twice both customs and freight, as she would not only have to open her own ports, but ours also; and not only those; but the insurance also would be doubled.

In stating the revenues of Ireland, he estimated only the leading branches, the customs and excise, hearth-money and quit-rents; which altogether amounted, he said, to nearly the sum of 656,000*l.* which was, however, insufficient for the purposes to which it had been originally allotted. It was well known, he said, that with all the advantages which Ireland had lately received, the revenue had been some years ago much greater than it was now.

He was therefore anxious that this defect should be made good, and that the service of the public should not suffer by the substitution of one mode of intercourse in the place of another.

He then went into the equality and liberality of his plan, which, comprehending a vast system of mercantile regulation, we must defer, for want of room, till our next.

MR. URBAN,
ON a grave being opened, on the 20th of July, in the year 1780, in the walk behind the altar of the cathedral of Norwich, the grave-digger discovered a skull, with the hair upon it, which was turned several times round the head, but, on being touched, it fell off; the skull appeared to be found, and the hair, on being opened, to be more than a yard in length. He likewise found several pieces of the coffin, but no other part of the body; the hair appeared to be perfectly sound, although, from the inscription on the stone which lay over it, it appeared to have been buried 128 years. The hair, together with the skull and pieces of the coffin, are now in the possession of Mr. T. Curson the sacrist. The following inscription is on the stone;

Restaurata iuge Carolo, secundum quos reditu non solum vivorum sed etiam mortuorum dormitorum, nec non fata ipsa sacrata à fanaticorum violationibus preservantur, in memoriam Brigette uxoris sue dilectissimæ, 26 Septembris anno salutis 1652 denatæ, Thomas Gourmay hoc posuit anno 1662.

And the arms of Gourmay.

Argent a crossing-pailed gules, impaling Gules, on a fess Azure, between three fleurs de lis Or, three bezants Sable.

There has also been some hair found in a grave, which was since opened in the choir; but, as no pieces either of coffins or any bones were to be found, it is supposed to have lain there a long time, and probably belonged to some bishop, or person of eminence, as none but such were formerly buried in the choir. The reason of hair living so long in the earth has by many been attributed to the low damp situation of the cathedral; there has likewise been a cross found, which was turned downward in the earth, and now by order of the dean it is laid upward: it might probably be the memorial of some abbot; I send you an exact representation of it *. Childing is also an old term in botany, when a small flower grows out of a large one, "The childing autumn," i. e. producing flowers on those of summer. Florists have a childing rose, a childing daisy, and a childing scabious.

MR. URBAN,

ONE of your Correspondents, in the Magazine for February, is pleased to speak of the appointment (as he calls it) of the Revd. Dr. Sam. Seabury to the Bishopric of Connecticut in America, as a great event *. That they who have nothing to give should bestow Mitres, or even Empires, is by no means sufficient to excite the wonder of any man, who observes but a small part of the transactions daily carried on in a world which is many stages short of perfection. When the Tempter made an offer of "the Kingdoms

Kingdoms of this world and the glory of them," he had no title even to a single acre; and in the walks of common life none are so liberal, and even profuse, in their entertainments as the man, who finding himself on the verge of breaking for a large sum, expends not his own money, but regales his guests with that of his creditors. How came the anonymous Scotch Bishop, who publishes the Consecration Sermon, by his own title *? Or if he had one, how could he confer it on another, without the authority of his Sovereign †? You or I might with just as much propriety go cap in hand to your neighbour the landlord of the Devil tavern, request him to confer on us the honour of knighthood, and, in order to satisfy his conscience, quote the example of Don Quixote, as this sage prelate does that of the apostles.

The laws of Scotland have excluded all Episcopacy; but, it seems, the race of those Non-Jurors, whose principles have ever been inimical to the present illustrious family on the British throne, have maintained an ideal succession of ecclesiastical dignities on the north of the Tweed. Dr. Samuel Seabury may, for aught I know, possess, in as eminent a degree as any of those prelates he now considers himself on an equal footing with, the moral virtues of the apostles; they consist not in numerous retinue of servants, or in coaches decorated with mitres, but may as probably be found in an itinerant diocesan as in him who occupies the most splendid palace. But surely it required only a small portion of the serpent's wisdom (one species of which, though perhaps not that recommended in Scripture, most modern bishops possess in an eminent degree) to have suggested to him, that the colonies, who lately shook off the dominion of their mother country, will not be disposed to yield much reverence to the suffragan of those mighty prelates ‡, whom a law, enacted in 1748, prohibited from ordaining even a single deacon.

In some future Magazine, I hope you will be able to favour the public with a history of Bishop Seabury's adventures after crossing the Atlantic; you will by that time be able to determine, whether they are better calculated for furnishing an additional chapter to the Legenda Sanctorum, or a third act to the farce of Sancho's government in the island of Barataria.

Unconnected with sects or parties, I must, in the mean time, beg leave to make a few short remarks on the different conduct of the Presbyterians on the South, and the Episcopalians, on the North of the Tweed; both equally Dissenters, both equally indebted for many privileges and comforts to the tolerating spirit of the age and country in which they live *: the former strive not to distinguish themselves by any claims to superior rank †, but rest content with the modern appellation of Dissenting Clergymen; while the latter grasping as it were at the united privileges both of the crown and crozier, not only affect to possess, but even to confer, the highest ecclesiastical jurisdiction; the former aspire to no authority beyond the guidance of a flock which voluntarily elects them for its pastors ‡; the latter not only trace an ideal pedigree from the apostles, but assume to themselves names the most ostentatious, treating the establishment of that country in which they are tolerated with the most sovereign contempt. The former officiate at their meeting-houses, without ever dreaming of such audaciousness as the taking up any abolished and disallowed title §; among the latter, it seems, there are still to be found Archbishops of St. Andrew's ||, though the fabric of its cathedral was not more effectually demolished by John Knox, that great deliverer of his country from religious thralldom , who left behind him a name superior to all titles; than the very existence of its pretended Metropolitan has since been annihilated by the Act of Union, whereby the present respectable and salutary establishment of religion in Scotland was planted on a basis too firm to be shaken by the unfated rapaciousness of any prelate. The former gave unequivocal proofs of their loyalty in supporting the House of Brunswick, amidst

* This will not be allowed by the latter, who are now subjected to more severe pains and penalties than the papists.

† How can they, as Presbyterians?

‡ The Scotch bishops are also elected by their respective flocks. And so was Bishop Seabury by 30,000 Episcopalians in Connecticut.

§ No surely. They cannot, nor wish to be more than Presbyters.

|| Not so. The Scotch Episcopalians have no Archbishop. The See of St. Andrew is now subordinate to that of Edinburgh.

 This strikes at all Episcopacy, in England as well as Scotland. Ex pede, &c.

* Ans. By the consecration of other bishops.

† Bishops (as such) may consecrate bishops, and convey spiritual jurisdiction, though they can give no temporal powers, or exempt from temporal penalties.

‡ The Episcopalians doubtless will revere the Superior whom they have recommended and chosen.

two foul and unnatural Rebellions; as to the latter, having heard nothing of their conduct during those periods, candour obliges me to infer that they observed a strict neutrality.

In the course of my life, I have read many vehement declamations against Puritans; I have also heard much, as well as seen, somewhat of the cant and fanaticism of sectaries in our Southern part of the Island; cant and fanaticism I by no means wish to vindicate, for wherever they are found in any conspicuous degree, they have certainly a tendency to make individuals, and sometimes whole bodies of men, ridiculous, if not through their sides, to wound even religion itself: but after all that has been urged by Bishop Stillingfleet, in his Treatise on Separation, which is evidently levelled at the Presbyterians who will not conform to the worship of the Church of England, I am still firmly of opinion, that there is no species of separation from establishments so dangerous, or which so evidently requires a jealous attention from the rulers of a Protestant community to restrain within some proper limits, as that which by assuming to itself not only undue titles, but claims of divine right, exhibits so striking a resemblance to the Church of Rome, that spiritual Babylon is the Apocalypse*.

MR. URBAN,

ON reading W. and D's letter in your last concerning Dr. Johnson's being monocular, I had no occasion to "blink my eyes alternately," to convince myself of an imperfection which, I am sensible, I have laboured under upwards of fifty years. This I have always attributed to picking my right eye open during my being blind in the small pox; but since reading the above letter, I have found many of my friends who appear to be in the same condition; indeed I am apt to think that the complaint, on examination, will be found to be more general than may have been at first imagined. As I have not the least knowledge of optics or anatomy, I pretend not to explain this phenomenon; but should be greatly pleased to see it investigated by some of your readers who may be equal to the task, and which, I am persuaded, many of them are. I am, yours, &c. W. E.

MR. URBAN,

SOME trust in chariots, and some in horses, &c. says the Psalmist. In like

* The above being shown to a friend in MS. he desired to add the notes, manner (an unintentional parody perhaps) Some delight in horses, some in birds, &c. says JULIAN, but I in books, Ep. ix. Indeed no one can read the works of this Emperor without being surprised at his knowledge and learning, on observing the various authors, in different sciences, which he had found time to read and digest, considering that the last eight years of his life were spent in camps and garrisons, at a distance therefore from his library, in the remote and then barbarous regions of Gaul and Germany; and that he was killed at so early an age as thirty-two. For his historical, moral, and even religious researches, as he undertook to be a controversialist, young as he was, we may, however, much more easily account than for his studying books of medicine and anatomy; unless it be supposed that the weakness of his constitution, and the frequent indispositions which he mentions in several of his letters, might perhaps have induced him to study his own case, and consequently made him acquainted with many others. With Hippocrates, in particular, he seems to have been so conversant, as to have quoted him (as he does many other authors) more than once, from memory, of which I will now give two remarkable instances. The first is in his xxivth Epistle, "to Serapion, a senator," probably of Constantinople, which may be considered as a laboured panegyric, on figs; on which subject, after quoting the elogiums of Aristophanes, Herodotus, and Homer, he introduces the great physician, mentioned above, as depreciating honey, by saying that "it is sweet to the taste, but quite bitter when digested"; in which opinion Julian coincides. But though Hippocrates says this in substance (as Petau has observed), in his work De Internis Affectionibus, they are not his words, as will appear from this close translation of them: "Boiled honey is heating, and adheres to the belly; but after it is digested, it ferments, and the belly suddenly swells and burns, and seems as if it would burst." The second instance is in Epistle lix, "to Dionysius," a cowardly officer. In this, to extenuate his own mistake in employing him, he adds, to some other similar instances, that "the greatest of physicians, Hippocrates, said, 'In my "opinion of the futures of the head I "was mistaken. Thus, even a physi"cian was ignorant of a theorem of his "own art." The passage to which Julian here alludes is the following, and occurs in Hipp. de Morb. v. 7. "Au-

"tonomus, of Omilus, died of a wound
"on his head on the sixteenth day, hav"ing received a hurt by a stone on the "futures. I did not think it necessary to "open it; for that the futures themselves
"were injured by the blow, escaped me."
(καὶ ψαύει μὲν τὴν γυνήν αἰσραφαι, κ.τ.λ.)
The words above quoted as from Hippocrates (probably, like the others, from memory also) are ἰσφηλαὶ δὲ μὲν τὴν γυνήν αἰσραφαι, which, thus detached, form a general proposition. "But," as his translator observes, "though in a particular case, this great physician had the candour to own himself mistaken, it does not follow, nor does it appear, that he was ignorant of the nature of the futures in general. Julian trusted to his memory, which, though good, was not infallible."

Of one part of the works of this extraordinary man, no one has made a better use than the late Archbishop Secker in his Second Charge to the Clergy of the Diocese of Canterbury. This excellent prelate, with his usual sagacity, has drawn good out of evil, and has made one of this Emperor's darts, thrown for a far different purpose, like that of Achilles, contribute to heal the wound.
"Designing to re-establish Paganism, printed almost word for word in the "Fruetus temporum," a chronicle printed by Wynkyn de Worde, 1515, fol.—but for 20d. to which the loaf was to be advanced, read 20s.; and for good able, read ale, and some lesser variations. The whole story has been very ably confuted by Mr. Pegge, in Archæol. IV. p. 29 —46, who appears to have seen the chronicle in question; and has well accounted for the mistake of Winchester for Worcester, as the place of the King's interment. Mr. Lewis, in his life of Caxton, refers it to the Saxon spelling of Wyncesterne and Wyncesterne; but as the Latin annalist reads Wintonia, and not Wincestria, Mr. Pegge thinks it would be a better apology to say it is a misprint in Hemingburgh; since Knighton, who transcribes him, has Wigornia

for Wintonia †.

Does not Mr. Pegge depart from his usual accuracy, in presuming that the late Mr. Philip Morant was the annota-

MR. URBAN,

PERHAPS some of your correspondents, versed in natural history, will favour me with explanations on the circumstance I am going to relate. Having been in Wales about six years ago, towards the end of September or beginning of October, I was crossing the ferry over to Conway: it was about ten o'clock at night, and consequently dark; the tide was out; and when I alighted from the carriage, I had some length to walk upon the strand to reach the boat. Whilst the boatmen and servants were putting in my baggage, I was exceedingly struck with the brilliant light that tracked their footsteps. I found it proceeded from the sea weed; that it appeared whenever I set my foot upon the weed, and continued for two or three minutes. I pressed the same weed in several places with my hand, and collected a great deal of cool transparent jelly, like beads near the size of a pea; this I repeated several times; the light emitted was so bright, and lasted so long, that I took a newspaper out of my pocket, and read the small print by it. The boatmen treated it as a very common appearance, and were surprized I should take notice of it. Though I have lived all my life in the neighbourhood of the sea, yet I cannot say that I ever observed the same appearance in the part of the world where I chiefly reside. On examining the sea-wreck, or vraise which produced the light, it resembled the common sort, in having the same swellings or bladders all through it; but differed in this respect, that the common sort is a loose scattering plant, but this grew in large close round tufts, very close indeed; whether this was occasioned by cutting the weed frequently for burning, or is the constant form of the plant, I could not learn from the boatmen.

As I do not recollect whether the eminent naturalist of Wales, Mr. Pennant, has in any of his various publications made any mention of this species of phosphorus. I could wish much to have an answer to the following queries:

Whether this weed be the common sea-wreck, or a different kind, and, if the latter, that some correspondent would give the botanic description?

Whether the appearance be usual and frequent on sea-coasts, or whether peculiar to some part of Wales?

Whether it depends or not upon the state of the weather, heat or cold, dryness or moisture?

Whether it be observable only in particular months, or seasons, and ceases at other periods?

Answers to the above, by some of your ingenious correspondents, will much oblige PHILOPHUSIKON.

P. S. I request also to be informed where is the best description of the insect called Termes pulsatorius, or Death-watch, and whether a figure of it be engraved? and how the insect is to be caught? not having met with any person that pretended to have seen it, though it be so commonly heard in old wainscot†.

* The weed, as above described, seems to be the "common sea-wreck," but the "luminous appearance" proceeds, we apprehend, not from the weed, but from the jelly-like substance left by the tide, which is probably the spawn of some fish, and what is common, as we suppose, to all sea-coasts.

The Medusa simplex, common in our seas, is described by Mr. Pennant, British Zoology, vol. IV. p. 50. 4to. See our last month, p. 233. See also Phil. Trans. N^o 337.

EDIT.

† We cannot at present refer to a better account of this insect, than that given by Mr. W. Derham, in Phil. Trans. No. 271 and 291, in which last is a print of it. See also Baddam's Abridgement, iv. 24. 320 Lowth, Abr. Cont. iii. 391.

MR. URBAN,

I SEND you a table of the order in the leafing and blossoming of sundry trees and shrubs, for nine different years. I was first induced to set about these tables, from a hint thrown out by the author of some Swedish tracts on natural history translated by Mr. Stillingfleet, and published by him about twenty years since. His opinion was, that a diligent attention to this circumstance would serve as a certain guide to the husbandman in the regulation of his seed-time; if you think that this or any other useful purpose may be answered by the publication, you will please to give this a place in your next Magazine. The chafin between 1765 and 1777 I am not able to supply; my time having been during that period too much taken up by other avocations, to give a necessary attention to these matters. I am, Sir, your humble servant,

MR. URBAN,

AT length is closed the long-expected sale * of that capital collection of MSS. formed by Dr. Askew during his Travels in the Levant †, and augmented by the printed editions enriched with the very valuable notes of his friend the learned Dr. Taylor, who bequeathed them to him by his will, and whose literary labours will do honour to this country as long as the writings of Demosthenes and Lysias retain their reputation.

It is much to the honour of the University of Cambridge, that they have made so large a part of this collection their own. After having taken measures for putting their press on a respectable footing, they have paid a proper tribute to the memory of their late illustrious member, by possessing themselves of all his MS notes; and you may congratulate the public on the approaching prospect of seeing them issue, with due honour, from the University-press, in new and correct editions of Æschylus, Apollonius Rhodius, Pindar, Juvenal, Terentianus Maurus, and other classic authors. After so long an interval since any thing more than Bibles and Common Prayers have proceeded from that press (for, I believe, Dr. Taylor's own works, printed there, almost half a century ago, were its last classic labours ‡); we may hope the students of this university will give such specimens of their taste for, and proficiency in, the literature of Greece and Rome, as will shew them not a whit behind the sons of their sister. Comparisons are invidious, and allowance must be made for filial piety. But whatever praise is due to the typographic part of the Oxford editions, many scholars of our own nation, and more on the continent, express themselves disappointed with the other requisites.

Among the classic authors illustrated with MS notes, or collations, by Dr. T. or preceding critics, gone to Cambridge, are, Æschylus, with MS notes by Is. Casaubon, H. Stephens, Dr. Askew, Dr. Needham, Dr. Taylor.

Apollonius Rhodius, by Wasse, Upton, Dr. Taylor.

Demosthenes and Lysias, by Mr. Markland, Dr. Askew, and Dr. Taylor.

* Of nine mornings, March 7—16.

† The Dr. kept a vessel with a Janisary constantly attendant on him, and the Grand Seignor's firmaund in his pocket, while he searched the islands of the Archipelago. There are comparatively few antiquities left. He brought away a statue of Apollo 5 feet high from Delos, where there are many. The inscription on the base of the colossus 15 feet square is very distinct, and should be read δ' αὖτις, &c. some letters of αὖτις being wanting. The fragments round it are no parts of a statue. In the quarries at Paros lay blocks of marble 70 feet long, as left by the Greeks.

‡ Two or three exceptions occur in p. 286.

§ Of these corrections of Ob. Oddey on Dion Cassius, Reimarus, in the preface, p. 25. to his fine edition of this historian, Hamburg, 1750, f. writes to this effect: "Understanding from the Acta Eruditorum, 1712, p. 523, that this learned Englishman had thoughts of a new edition of Dion. and had published a specimen of it, and hearing that a copy with his notes was in the possession of Dr. Mead, I wrote to the Dr. for the use of that copy, which was readily granted. It was found not to contain collations, but such respectable conjectures as left no room to doubt that his second thoughts would have thrown much light on the author. But the report of Oddey's specimen was a mistake."—His conjectures, however, have all due respect paid them in Reimar's edition, where they are inserted—After saying so much in praise of Ob. Oddey's critical acumen, your learned correspondents are requested to inform you who he was.

|| Cicero de Officiis et de Inventionibus were both bought by Dr. Farmer for the Public Library, Cambridge; but the Dr. politely resigned them to the Marquess of Lansdown. In return for which, his Lordship was pleased to present the University with a MS. of Gregory Nazianzen.

et de Inventione, Corn. Nepos*, Horace, Juvenal, Virgil, and the New Testament, in Latin: Herodotus, Thucydides, Æschyli Prometheus, Aristophanis Plutus, Nubes, et Ranae, Euripidis Hecuba, Orestes, et Phœnissæ, Plutarch's Symposiaca, St. Chrysostom's pieces, Euclid's Catoptrics and Optics, and the Gospels in Greek.

And that the University, as a body, might not seem to engross the whole of Dr. Taylor's valuable collection, several classics, both Greek and Latin, with his notes, and several of his MS common-places, were purchased by Mr. Burrell, Mr. C. Burney, Mr. Marsh, Mr. Jodrell, and Dr. Goffet, all members of that learned body: not to mention the purchases by the Marquess of Lansdown and Lord Stormont, who received their education at Oxford.

Dr. Askew's medical books and MSS. were divided between Doctors Simms, Wright, and Monro. He brought many of these from Greece, and the originals of many printed only in Latin.

The collection of letters between the critics of the last age was purchased by Dr. Beauvoir.

The finest copy of Chaucer, with the arms of Abp. Dean, by Mr. Steevens, the other by Mr. Lowes † of Newcastle.

The account of Queen Elizabeth's entertainment at Cambridge was bought by Mr. Nichols, and will form part of his intended collection of the progresses of that illustrious Queen.

The fine copy of what was intended for a second volume of inscriptions, collected by Chishull and his learned friends, and transcribed in the fair hand of the late Professor Ward ‡, is fortunately lodged in the British Museum, where was before placed the MS. of the first volume.

Of the MSS. the fac simile of the Vatican Virgil, bought at Dr. Mead's sale for 3l. 13s. 6d. was here purchased, by the Marquess of Lansdown, for 20 guineas; the Boetius of the 16th century, by the same, for twelve guineas; as was Martial, of the 15th century, for nine guineas and a half; the Rerum rusticarum scriptores, of the 15th century, for seven guineas and a half; the Dante, of the 15th century, for seven guineas; the Suetonius, of the 15th century, for sixteen guineas; the Virgil, of the 15th century, for sixteen guineas, the fine Livy, from Palermo, by Mr.

Burrell, for 33l. 12s. the Statius, dated 600 years old, by the Duke of Grafton, for seventeen guineas; the Theophrastus, 1l. 16s.; Xenophon nine guineas; Veterinarum medicinarum scriptores Græci, 5l. 11s. Nicander fully noted by Dr. Bentley, and a few others, by the British Museum.

The total produce of this collection, which the collector himself valued at 2000l. and out of which very few curiosities are reserved, amounted to 1287l. which, added to that of the printed books, 1775 3993l. 6s. makes 5280l. 6s. It was said 2000l. had been offered for the former, and 5000l. for the latter, by the King, and refused by the executors; but, it is believed, without foundation. The fact rather is, that Dr. Askew set these valuations himself.

It would be curious to trace the progress of books and MSS. of value from one library to another, and the different sums given in different centuries or half centuries. Thus, to give a few instances, the Vatican Virgil, which, it is believed, cost Dr. Mead more than it sold for at Dr. Askew's sale, was bought by Dr. Askew, at Dr. Mead's sale, for 3l. 13s. 6d.

At the sale of the learned Michael Maittaire's library, 1748-9, not ten years before that of Dr. Mead's, it was no uncommon thing for books of all sizes to sell by dozens, for 1s. 1s. 6d. or 2s. 6d.

Maittaire's own copy of his Annales Typogr. in 8 vols. with his MS notes, sold to Dr. Hunt for five pounds.

The whole produce of his sale was 469l. The catalogue was printed, agreeably to a direction in his will, from one drawn up by himself; consequently must have set off the collection to an advantage, which, in modern times, is too frequently lost, by the hurry with which heirs and executors bring the most valuable articles under the hammer.

* A copy of Keuchentius' edition of this author, collated with a MS. in the Deering library by your old friend Paul Gemsege, was purchased by his friend Gutt. Brander, etq.

mer of a puffing ignorant auctioneer. We must, however, be understood to except from this censure the subjects* of this paper, as well as those which fell under the direction of Mr. Paterson.

Such was the different valuation of books in the beginning of this century, that Dr. Askew has been heard to declare he bought many books for a shilling a-piece, for which his friend Sam. Baker would have given moidores.

Of Apollonius Rhodius he had collations from seven MSS. the best whereof is in the Wolfenbuttle library. He considered all the editions as exceeding faulty, and we need no further proof after what Reiske says in the preface to his edition. The best of all the scholiasts, but no variations, is in the Ricciardi library, which Dr. Askew read through with Lamy, who published the catalogue of that library in quarto. An English translation was made by the late Rev. Mr. Cowper, fellow of Benet Coll. Cambridge, of which the Dr. was well assured, and to his intended edition of this author the elegy in your vol. LIV. p. 198. refers, though the author of it has his doubts about the translation. Had it been known to Mr. Fawkes, who left his translation unfinished at the press, he would hardly have undertaken it †.

Dr. Askew lost many large boxes full of MSS. while at quarantine, and afterwards bought in England of the late Dr. Gifford for a guinea one which he knew to be among them, and which he traced to Smith a bookseller at Canterbury, but could recover no more.

He lent the Foulises a MS. of Plato, for their edition, on a note for 100l. They kept it two years, and Mr. Harris of Salisbury enquired so often after it that the Dr. hardly knew what answer to give. He thought Mr. Sydenham the best qualified to write notes on Plato. It was in contemplation to publish those of Mr. Gray.

* Who, we hear, will in a short time sell by auction the valuable library of the great Archibald late Duke of Argyll. EDIT.

Mr. URBAN,
YOUR labours, it is presumed, may not improperly be compared to the assiduity of persons collecting the remains of some valuable piece, which accident or time has demolished; or to a shipwreck, the planks of which (says the great lord Bacon) industrious and wise men snatch up and preserve from the deluge of time. The insertion of the following odds and ends will contribute much to the satisfaction of yours,
H. LEMOINE.

Paragraph from the *Post Angel, a periodical paper, published in 1701, and carried on or written by that queer projector and bookseller, John Dunton.

"July 12. One Mr. Wood, who died about three years since, deputy of Langbourn Ward, having left a settlement, that any maid-servant who should keep in her place twenty years, should receive at the expiration of that term 20l, on Friday last, a maid in Tower-street challenged the legacy; and making it appear she was lawfully intitled thereto, she received it to a farthing."

A precedent of the same in St. Andrew's parish, Holborn, where a person has bequeathed ten pounds to every maid-servant who lives seven years in her place. Query, Who made this provision; and whether this, as well as the former, are yet paid; and, if discontinued, to what use has the fund been appropriated?

Is the story of the devil going in the likeness of a pied piper into the town of Hamel, in Saxony, June 20, 1484, and enticing away 130 children, a fact, and related by credible authors?

It is well known, that wigs were first worn here in the reign of Charles II. the importation of that fashion being the act of that monarch and his courtiers. But might it not be worth while enquiring into the date of hair-dressing, and whence it came immediately; it being a notorious fact, that the first professors here were foreigners.

A correspondent of yours some time since required some account of the above singular genius. The following notices are copied from the MS. of Mr. C. Eve, late of Hoxton-square, an industrious antiquarian collector, whose books and papers have been unfortunately scattered, and many lost. Dunton appears to have been a native of Kent, from this account being in a clats superscribed, "Parochial, &c. Antiquities of Canterbury;" but the precise time of his birth is not mentioned.

* We particularly wish to be favoured with a sight of the Post Angel.
EDIT.

He was in business upwards of twenty years, during which time he traded considerably in the Stationers Company. However, about the beginning of the present century he failed, and commenced author, and in 1701 was amanuensis to the editor of the forementioned Post Angel. He soon after set up a writer for the entertainment of the public, and projected and carried on, with the assistance of others, the Athenian Mercury; or a scheme to answer a series of questions monthly, the querist remaining concealed. This work was continued to about twenty volumes, and afterwards reprinted by Bell, under the title of the Athenian Oracle, in four volumes octavo. In 1710 he published his "Atheism, or the new Projects of Mr. John Dunton, Author of the Essay on the Hazard of a Death-bed Repentance." This contains, amidst a prodigious variety of matter, six hundred treatises in prose and verse, by which he appears to have been, with equal facility, a philosopher, physician, poet, civilian, divine, humourist, &c. &c. To this work he has prefixed his portrait, engraved by M. Vander Gucht; and in a preface, which breathes all the pride of self-consequence, informs his readers, he does not write to flatter, or for hire. As a specimen of this miscellaneous farago, take the following heads of subjects. "The Funeral of Mankind, a Paradox, proving we are all dead and buried. The spiritual Hedgehog; or, a new and surprising Thought. The double Life; or, a new way to redeem Time, by living over To-morrow before it comes. Dunton preaching to himself; or, every man his own Parson." "His Creed; or, the Religion of a Bookseller, in imitation of Brown's Religio Medici," has some humour and merit. This he dedicated to the Stationers Company. As a satirist, he appears to most advantage in his poems, entitled, "the Beggar mounted; the dissenting Doctors; Patnallus in a!l or, Frolics in Verse: Dunton's Shadow; or, the Character of a Summer Friend." Throughout the whole of his writings he is exceeding prolix and tedious, and sometimes obscure. "His Cafe is altered; or, Dunton's Re-marriage to his own Wife," has some singular notions, but very little merit in the composition. For further particulars of this heterogeneous genius, see "Dunton's Life and Errors,"† a book not now in my possession, somewhat scarce.

† See Granger, vol. II. part 2. p. 416.

TO the picture which was given in our last, p. 173, of Dr. Johnson at Cambridge, we are now enabled to add a slight sketch of Dr. Johnson at Oxford, drawn by himself. The year is determined, by Dr. King's speech, to have been 1759, when the E. of Westmoreland was installed Chancellor. " is now making tea for me. I have been in my gown ever since I came here. It was at my first coming quite new and handsome. I have swum thrice, which I had disused for many years. I have proposed to Vansittart * climbing over the wall, but he has refused me. And I have clapped my hands till they are sore, at Dr. King's speech."

Of his birth-place, Lichfield, Dr. Johnson always spoke with a laudable enthusiasm. "Its inhabitants," he said, "were more orthodox in their religion, more pure in their language, and more polite in their manners, than any other town in the kingdom*"; and he often lamented, that "no city of equal antiquity and worth has been so destitute of a native to record its fame, and transmit its history to posterity."

Some little time before Dr. Johnson's death, he inclosed the epitaph for his father, mother, and brother, (see p. 9.) in a letter, written with his own hand, to Mr. Greene, commissioning him "to get it cut on a large stone that may protect the bodies:" desiring "the stone may be deep, massy and hard," and adds, "I beg that all possible haste may be made, for I wish to have it done while I am yet alive." The letter is in Mr. Greene's possession, and is dated "December 2, 1784."

* Dr. Robert.

† It appears, however, from Dr. Disney's Memoirs of Dr. Sykes, (which shall be reviewed in our next), that Dr. Johnson had a dreadful opinion of their ecclesiastical courts. "Dr. Johnson has been reported to have shewn the MS. of the former part of his tragedy of Jeune to a friend [Gib. Walmesley, no doubt] at Lichfield, who was officially connected with the courts belonging to the cathedral or peculiars there. His friend is represented to have expressed his opinion of so much of the tragedy as he had seen in terms of the highest approbation, and to have added, that he thought the writer had left no possibility of heightening the catastrophe in the concluding part of the play. "Sir," replied Dr. Johnson, "I have enough in reserve for my purpose; for, in the last act, I intend to put my heroine into the ecclesiastical court of Lichfield, which will fill up the utmost measure of human calamity."

Of Mr. Sheridan's Book on Oratory, Dr. Johnson said, "It is impossible to read it without feeling a perpetual elevation of hope, and a perpetual disappointment. If we should have a bad harvest this year; Mr. S. would say, it was owing to the neglect of Oratory."

A literary lady expressing to Dr. J. her approbation of his Dictionary, and, in particular, her satisfaction at his not having admitted into it any improper words; "No, Madam," replied he, "I hope I have not daubed my fingers. I find, however that you have been looking for them."

List of POET LAUREATS, from Queen Elizabeth's reign to the present time; in which it is observable, that for the space of one hundred and eighty years there have been exactly the same number of poetical as political Monarchs.

THE great Spenser was Poet Laureat to Queen Elizabeth; who died in 1598, about four years before his royal mistress.

He was succeeded by Sam. Daniel, who died 1619, and left the bays to Ben Jonson; who held the office 18 years, and then resigned it to Sir Wm. Davenant; who dying in 1668, after he had enjoyed it 31 years, it was placed on the head of Dryden; but at the Revolution he was deposed, and his bays adorned the brow of Tho. Shadwell, whom Dryden hated so much for this rivalry, as to produce one of the strongest satires in our language, well known by the name of Mac Flecknoe.

After Shadwell had worn it four years, he died in the year 1692, and it descended to Tate. This monarch held it 24 years; but dying in 1716, it fell to the Rev. Mr. Eudon, who enjoyed it till 1730.

Colley Cibber was the immediate heir to Tate, who perhaps, for this and other as equally good reasons, was made the hero of the Dunciad, by Pope. His Dramatic Writings, however, have rescued him from the character of a dunce, though his Odes are subject to some animadversions.

Wm. Whitehead succeeded Colley Cibber in 1757, and enjoyed it for 28 years, dying in April 1785. He is now succeeded by the Rev. Thomas Warton, B. D. Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, Author of the History of English Poetry, and of several other productions of transcendent merit.

50. Miscellaneous

50. Miscellaneous Tracts, by the late William Bowyer, Printer, F.S.A.; and several of his learned Friends; including some Letters, on Literary Subjects, by Mr. Markland, Mr. Clarke, &c. &c. Collected, and illustrated with occasional Notes, by John Nichols, Printer, F.S.A. Edinb. 4to.

THESE "last words" (as they may be called), both in verse and prose, of this last of learned printers, must be acceptable to all who are acquainted with the genius and talents of that valuable man. He here "speaks for himself, in the various forms of Author, Commentator, Critic, and Correspondent with some of the first Literati of his age." — Among other curious Tracts, now first collected, we find an Epitome of Selden's book De Synedriis Veterum Ebræorum, with other memoranda from that learned writer, 1722-6; a Sketch of Mr. Baxter's Glossary of Roman Antiquities, 1726; a Correction of the Vicar of Dewsbury, in "Remarks on Mr. Bowman's singular Sermon on the Traditions of the Clergy," 1731; Strictures on the Republication of Stephens's Thesaurus, 1732; Marginal Notes on Chishull's Antiquitates Asiaticæ; a Comment on the Saxon Feast of Yule; Observations on Middleton's Life of Cicero, on Kennet's Roman Antiquities, on Bladen's Translation of Cæsar's Commentaries, on La Bleterie's Life of Julian, and on Bishop Warburton's Julian; Miscellaneous Remarks on Roman History, &c. &c. But this is only a small part of the contents, which are too copious for us to detail.

As a specimen of our author's critical talent, from his Notes on Kuster De vero Usu verborum Mediorum, &c. 1773, to which he prefixed a Preface (here inserted) we will select "a correction of our English Homer."

To this we will add some extracts from the letters of Mr. Markland.

"Dec. 2, 1770.

"I understood, long ago, that Ely was designed for Keene. He is so very fat, that I fancy it will not be long before he has a successor; for, as Harry Finch used to say to Armstrong, in his jocose way, 'there is no being sure of a fat fellow for half an hour.' — Dr. Bentley used to compare himself to an old trunk, which, if you let it alone, will stand in a corner a long time; but if you jumble it by moving, it will soon fall to pieces: Nimirum hic ego sum."

"July 7, 1771.

"I do not mention Dr. Heberden's opinion of your complaint with the usual style of pity, because I am firmly persuaded that nothing can befall a man but what is to his advantage, if he pleases; and more cannot be desired. This is Reason, little considered or thought of, but strongly and clearly confirmed by the Book you are employed upon*. Hence, total confinement, mill-post legs, and apprehension of a stone in the kidneys, are of no great weight with one who is firmly under that persuasion, and thinks he has good authority for it, that no man is miserable but through his own fault. Providence and Religion have ordered otherwise; though he who thinks differently will have most human votes on his side, if that will do him any good."

"Jan. 27, 1775.

"What will become of us? For I foresee the American petition will be rejected. I have feared it a long time. I have less reason to be concerned than you have, being much older; and yet I cannot forbear being uneasy for posthumous calamities, which, I foresee, will be owing to the weakness of some, and the wickedness of others. The Provost of Eton † brought his son hither, a youth of about eleven years old. I told him, I was afraid he will see evil days in England; for that it seemed to be ripening apace. "Feb. 5, 1775.

"Dr. P.'s* wealth, you say, is confirmed by good authority. I am sorry for it, because I think a Christian priest, with no children, to die worth £.30,000, has a very unscriptural look. One news-paper says, that he left to twenty fellows of the College, who were his contemporaries, 100l. each. This would have been very pretty and commendable had it been done a fortnight before he was taken ill: otherwise it has the look of playing fast and loose, and seems to declare that, if he had never died, he never would have done any good with his riches."

Subjoined are some Latin letters and poems by Mr. Bonwicke, several Letters between him and Mr. Blechynden, on the Legality of taking the Oaths to King William; a Letter of Professor Ockley to Mr. Wotton, on the Confusion of Tongues, &c. and Construction of Eastern Languages, mentioned in the Anecdotes of Mr. Bowyer, p. 226; a curious Dissertation on 2 Kings x. 22, and 2 Chron. ix. 21, by Dr. Owen; Disquisitions on the Land of Goshen, by Mr. Costard and Mr. Bryant; and Two original Letters from the pious Mr. Nelson to his young cousins George and Gabriel † Hanger, 1713, containing some admirable Instructions for their Conduct through Life.—The whole is a fund of miscellaneous literature, which will add (if possible) to Mr. Bowyer's established reputation both for industry and abilities, and with that view has been gratefully selected by his surviving friend and partner, Mr. Nichols.

"Sir Robert Foley married a sister of Mr. Markland." In the Anecdotes of Mr. Bowyer, no sister of Mr. M. is mentioned but Mrs. Catherine M.—Sir R. F. married Miss Hinchliffe, who survived him. Had he a former wife? (Some further extracts shall be given in a future Magazine.)

Liber, Epigrammatum Liber, Sylvarum Liber. With Notes Critical and Explanatory, and other Illustrations. By Thomas Warton, [B.D.] Fellow of Trinity College, and late Professor of Poetry at Oxford. 8vo.

THIS elegant Historian of English Poetry, who has already exercised his critical talents on Spenser now presents us with the Juvenile Works (as they are called) of Milton, which were first published, he tells us (Comus and Lycidas excepted, which had appeared before), in 1645, but, for seventy years afterwards were totally neglected, a slight mention of them by Archbishop Sancroft*, about 1648, excepted. "The first printed encomium," which any of them received, seems to be that which Addison bestowed on Milton's Laughter, &c. in L'Allegro in a Spectator, written in 1711. Pope, on being asked by Mr. Digby (as the latter told our Editor's father), "if he knew any thing of this hidden treasure?" availed himself of the question, and soon afterwards sprinkled his Eloise to Abelard with epithets and phrases of a new form and sound, pilfered from Comus and the Penseroso. Thus, v. 20,

"Ye grots and caverns shagg'd with horrid thorn,

"is plainly borrowed from

"By grots and caverns shagg'd with horrid shades, Edw. 429;

"as

"I have not yet forgot myself to Rome, Eloise, 24.

At length, in 1733 and 4, Dr. Pearce and the two Richardsons contributed to rescue these poems from oblivion, and their reputation was farther extended by Jortin, Warburton, and Hurd. In 1738 Comus was adapted to music, and presented on the stage; soon after, L'Allegro and Il Penseroso were set to music by Handel; and in 1744 "Lycidas was imitated by Mr. Mason."—Our Editor afterwards laments that Milton should "unworthily and unprofitably waste the vigorous portion of his life, those years in which imagination is on the wing, on temporary topics, on elaborate but perishable dissertations in defence of innovation and anarchy. To this employment he sacrificed his eyes, his health, his repose, his native propensities, his elegant studies. Smitten with the deplorable polemics of puritanism, he suddenly ceased to gaze on such sights as youthful poets dream. The numerous and noble plans of tragedy, which he had deliberately formed with the discernment and selection of a great poetical mind, were at once interrupted and abandoned; and have now left, to a disappointed posterity, only a few naked outlines and confused sketches. Instead of embellishing original tales of chivalry, of cloathing the fabulous achievements of the early British kings and champions in the gorgeous trappings of Epic attire, he wrote Smectamnus and Tetrachordon, apologies for fanatical preachers and the doctrine of divorce. In his travels he had intended to visit Sicily and Athens, countries connected with his finer feelings, interwoven with his poetical ideas, and impressed upon his imagination by his habits of reading, and by long and intimate converse with the Grecian literature. But so prevalent were his patriotic attachments, that hearing in Italy of the commencement of the national quarrel, instead of proceeding forward to feast his fancy with the contemplation of scenes familiar to Theocritus and Homer, the pines of Etna, and the pastures of Peneus, he abruptly changed his course, and hastily returned home, to plead the cause of ideal liberty. Yet in this chaos of controversy, amidst endless disputes concerning religious and political reformation, independency, prelacy, tithes, toleration, and tyranny, he sometimes seems to have heaved a sigh for the peaceable enjoyments of lettered solitude, for his congenial pursuits, and the more mild and ingenious exercises of the Muse. See Apol. Smectymn. Prose Works, vol. I. p. 103, and Church Governm. b. II. vol. I. p. 61. He still, however, obstinately persisted in what he thought his duty. But surely these speculations should have been confined to the enthusiasts of the age, to such restless and wayward spirits as Prynne, Hugh Peters, Goodwyn, and Baxter. Minds less refined, and faculties less elegantly cultivated, would have been better employed in this task.

The Latin poems, though, for obvious reasons, they can never be so popular as the English, are accompanied with a series of English notes, as Mr. W. wishes them to be "better known than before." He does not agree in opinion with Dr. Johnson in preferring the Latin poetry of May and Cowley, the skill of the former being "in parody," and that of the other (as is here shewn) in "metaphysical conceits and unnatural extravagances."—Milton's Latin poems, on the contrary, "may be justly considered as legitimate classical compositions."—Gray, it is added, "resembles Milton in many instances. Among others, in their youth they were both strongly attached to the cultivation of Latin poetry."—Both their fathers, it may be added, were money-scrivener. In this edition, as it exhibits only those poems of which Milton published a second edition in his life-time, 1673, Paradise Regained and Samson Agonistes are not included. They had been just before printed together in a separate volume, in 1671. The chief purpose of the notes is to explain our author's allusions, to illustrate or to vindicate his beauties, to point out his imitations both of others and of himself, to elucidate his obsolete diction, and by the addition and juxtaposition of parallels, universally gleaned both from his poetry and prose, to ascertain his favourite words, and to shew the peculiarities of his phraseology." His imitations of the English poets, as well as of Spenser and Shakspeare, and the allusions taken from "traditional superstitions, not yet worn out in the popular belief," are particularly noticed. For this latter task Dr. Newton, though "an excellent scholar," was not qualified, being "unacquainted with the treasures of the Gothic library."

"library." But Milton has now happily fallen into the hands of one who, by a rare coincidence, unites a taste for the classics with the knowledge of antiquities. "Several curious circumstances of Milton's early life, situations, friendships, and connections," can only be learned from his Latin poems, which, therefore, "may have their use in unfolding them even to the learned reader."—Some notes by Mr. Bowle, the translator of Don Quixote, and a few by Dr. Warton, the Editor's brother (we wish, with him, there could have been more), are inserted. Milton's Will, after a diligent search in various offices, could not be found. It is probable, therefore, that it was denied "the privilege of admittance into a public ecclesiastical repository; or, if admitted, that it was easily suffered to be suppressed. Comus and the Paradise Lost could not, on this occasion, apologise for the defender of the king's murder."

Of the critical acumen displayed in these notes we cannot give a more striking specimen than the illustration of the following obscure passage in Lycidas, v. 159, a dignus vindice nodus:

"Or whether thou to our swift vows deny'd,
Sleep'st by the fable of Bellerus'd,
Where the great vision of the guarded mount
Looks toward Namancos and Bayona's bold; Look homeward Angel now, and melt with ruth."

The whole of this passage has never yet been explained or understood. That part of the coast of Cornwall called the LAND'S END, with its neighbourhood, is here intended, in which is the promontory of BELLERIUM, so named from Bellerus, a Cornish giant. And we are told by Camden, that this is the only part of our island that looks directly towards Spain. So also Drayton, POLYOLB. S. xxiii. vol. iii. p. 1107.

"Then Cornwall creepeth out into the western maine,

"As, living in her eye, she pointed still at Spain."

And Orsius, "The second angle, or point, of Spain, forms a cape, where Brigantia, a city of Galicia, rears a most lofty watch-tower, of admirable construction, in full view of Britain." HIST. L. i. c. 12. fol. 5. a. edit. Paris 1524. fol. But what is the meaning of "The Great Vision of the Guarded Mount?" and of the line immediately following, "Look homeward Angel now, and melt with ruth?" I flatter myself I have discovered Milton's original and leading idea.

"Just by the Land's End, in Cornwall, is a most romantic projection of rock, called SAINT MICHAEL'S MOUNT, into a harbour called MOUNTS-BAY. It gradually rises from a broad basis into a very steep and narrow, but craggy, elevation. Towards the sea the declivity is almost perpendicular. At low-water it is accessible by land, and, not many years ago, it was entirely joined with the present shore, between which and the MOUNT there is a rock called CHAPEL-ROCK. Tradition, or rather superstition, reports, that it was antiently connected by a large tract of land, full of churches, with the Isles of Scilly. On the summit of SAINT MICHAEL'S MOUNT a monastery was founded before the time of Edward the Confessor, now a seat of Sir John Saint Aubyn. The church, refectory, and many of the apartments, still remain. With this monastery was incorporated a strong fortress, regularly garrisoned; and in a patent of Henry the Fourth, dated 1403, the monastery itself, which was ordered to be repaired, is styled FORTALITIUM. Rym. Ford. viii. 102. 340. 341. A stone-lantern, in one of the angles of the tower of the church, is called SAINT MICHAEL'S CHAIR. But this is not the original SAINT MICHAEL'S CHAIR. We are told by Carew, in his SURVAY OF CORNWALL, 'A little without the Castle [this fortress] there is a bad [dangerous] seat in a craggy place, called Saint Michael's Chaire, somewhat dangerous for access, and therefore holy for the adventure.' Edit. 1602. p. 154. We learn from Caxton's GOLDEN LEGENDE, under the history of the Angel MICHAEL, that 'Th' apparacyon of this angell is manyfold. The fyrst is when he appered in mount of Gargan,' &c. Edit. 1493. f. cclxxii. a. William of Worcester, who wrote his Travels over England about 1490, says, in describing SAINT MICHAEL'S MOUNT, there was an 'Apparicio Sancti Michaelis in monte Tumba antea vocato Le Horc Rok in the wodd.' ITINERAR. edit. Cantab. 1778 p. 102. The Hoar Rock in the Wood is this Mount or Rock of Saint Michael, antiently covered with thick wood, as we learn from Drayton and Carew. There is still a tradition, that a vision of Saint Michael seated on this Craig, or Saint Michael's CHAIR, appeared to some hermits: and that this circumstance occasioned the foundation of the monastery dedicated to Saint Michael. And hence this place was long renowned for its sanctity, and the object of frequent pilgrimages. Carew quotes some old rhymes much to our purpose, p. 154, ut supr.

"Who knows not Mighel's Mount and Chaire,

"The pilgrim's holy vaunt?"

Nor should it be forgot that this monastery was a cell to another on a Saint Michael's Mount in Normandy, where was also a Vision of Saint Michael.

"But to apply what has been said to Milton. The GREAT VISION is the famous Apparition of Saint Michael, whom he with much much sublimity of imagination supposes to be still throned on this lofty crag of SAINT MICHAEL'S MOUNT in Cornwall looking towards the Spanish coast. The GUARDED MOUNT, on which this Great Vision appeared, is simply the fortified Mount, implying the fortress above-mentioned. And let us observe, that Mount is now the peculiar appropriated appellation of this promontory. With the sense and meaning of the line in question is immediately connected that of the third line next following, which here I now, for the first time, exhibit properly pointed :

' Look homeward, Angel, now, and melt
' with ruth.'

Here is an apostrophe to the Angel Michael, whom we have just seen seated on the Guarded Mount. ' O Angel, look no longer seaward to Namanco's and Bayona's hold : rather turn your eyes backward from the view of this calamitous shipwreck, which the sea, over which you look, presents. Look landward, Look homeward now, and melt with pity at the melancholy spectacle to which you have been a witness.' But I will exhibit the three lines together which form the context. Lycidas was lost on the seas near the coast,

' Where the great vision of the guarded
' mount

' Looks toward Namanco's and Bayona's ' hold ;

' Look homeward, Angel, now, and melt
' with ruth.'

The Great Vision and the Angel are the same thing ; and the verb look, in both the two last verses, has the same reference. I had almost omitted what Carew says of this situation, ' Saint Michael's Mount looketh so aloft, as it brooketh no concurrent.' p. 154. ubi supra."

We will also add Mr. Warton's general idea of the two succeeding poems.

" L'Allegro and Il Penseroso may be called the two first descriptive poems in the English language. It is perhaps true, that the characters are not sufficiently kept apart. But this circumstance has been productive of greater excellencies. It has been remarked, ' No mirth can indeed be found in his melancholy, but I am afraid I always meet some melancholy in his mirth.' Milton's is the dignity of mirth. His cheerfulness is the cheerfulness of gravity. The objects he selects in his L'ALLEGRO are so far gay, as they do not naturally excite sadness. Laughter and jollity are named only as personifications, and never exemplified. Quips, and Cranks, and wanton wits, are enumerated only in general terms. There is, specifically, no mirth in contemplating a fine landscape. And even his landscape, although it has flowery meadows and flocks, wears a shade of pensiveness, and contains rufous lawns, fallows gray, and barren mountains, overhung with labouring clouds. Its old turreted mansion peeping from the trees awakens only a train of solemn and romantic, perhaps melancholy, reflection.—Many a pensive man listens with delight to the milk-maid singing blith, to the mower whetting his scythe, and to a distant peal of village bells. He chose such illustrations as minister matter for true poetry, and genuine description. Even his most brilliant imagery is mellowed with the sober hues of philosophic meditation. It was impossible for the author of IL PENSEROSO to be more cheerful, or to paint mirth with levity ; that is, otherwise than in the colours of the higher poetry. Both poems are the result of the same feelings, and the same habits of thought.

" No man was ever so disqualified to turn puritan as Milton. In this, and the preceding poem, he professes himself to be highly pleased with the choral church-music, with Gothic cloysters, the painted windows and vaulted ilees of a venerable cathedral, with tilts and tournaments, and with masques and pageantries. What very repugnant and unpoetical principles did he afterwards adopt ! He helped to subvert monarchy, to destroy subordination, and to level all distinctions of rank. But this scheme was totally inconsistent with the splendours of society, with trappings of knights and barons bold, with stare of ladies, and high triumphs, which belonged to a court. Pomp, and feast, and revelry, the show of Hymen, with mask and antique pageantry, were among the state and trappings of nobility, which he detested as an advocate for republicanism. His system of worship, which renounced all outward solemnity, all that had ever any connection with popery, tended to overthrow the audacious cloysters pale, and the high embowed roof ; to remove the floried windows richly dight, and to silence the pealing organ, and the full-voiced quire. The delights arising from these objects were to be sacrificed to the cold and philosophical spirit of calvinism, which furnished no pleasures to the imagination."....

The translation from Dante, p. 371, beginning

" Founded in chaste and humble poverty," is from the 108th Sonnet of Petrarch :

" Fondata in casta et humil povertate,

" Contra tuoi fondatori alzi le corna,

" Posta stacciata, et dov' hai posto
" spene ?

" Ne gli adulteri tuoi, ne le mal nate

" Ricchezze tante ? hor Constantin non
" torna."

This Sonnet of Petrarch is referred to in the note, but the translation is said to be from " Dante, Parad. c. xx." No such lines are there.

(To be concluded in our next.)

32. An Apology for the Life of George Anne Bellamy, late of Covent Garden Theatre. Written by Herself. To which is annexed, Her original Letter to John Calcraft, Esq. advertised to be published in October, 1767, but which was then violently suppressed. 5 Fols. 8to (Continued from p. 207.)

WE next find our heroine moving in two very different spheres, "endeavouring (as she expresses it) to be the second female Newton," in humble imitation of Lady Anson, and, with that view, visiting Flamstead House, attending Martin's lectures, &c.; and then, shocked by the struggles of a cat in an air-pump, though an animal that she greatly disliked, quitting philosophy for politics, "determining to become, if possible, another Maintenon," and reading Grotius, Puffendorff, &c. We then attend her to the continent (leaving Lucy Cooper to console her swain) on a visit, first to her friends the Ursulines at Boulogne, and afterwards to Miss Meredith, a lady of character and fortune, who had just lost her sister, at Toulouse; introduced to the Du Miel at Paris (the Clairon and Lequin being in confinement); pressed to go to Voltaire's, &c. In the mean time, Mr. Calcraft had engaged a grand house in Parliament-street, where they, at her return, set out, en prince, with an establishment of upwards of 30 servants and 2,500l. a year for the table. Waving theatrical and political anecdotes, in which latter the Marriage Act and the transportation of the Savoy surrogate form an episode, a fortune in nubibus was now left to Mrs. B. by a Thomas Sykes, Esq. who died in France, which, by the villainy of his servant, who absconded with his will and effects, she could never recover, his money in Holland, for want of a legal claimant, falling to the States, and that in the English funds still remaining there.—Listed, as usual, under the banners of Mr. Rich, in the part of Juliet being insulted, as she thought, by an ill-timed laugh of Lady Coventry, she sent to demand payment of a note which she had given her when Miss Gunning, which being refused, she has exposed at once her ladyship's ingratitude and bad spelling, by inserting an original letter verbatim & literatim. At the rehearsal of Dodsley's Cleone (in which she succeeded, she says, in opposition to the public opinion, and even that of the author himself, and was instructed and applauded by Dr. Johnson,) she met, for the first time since their separation,

Mr. Metham, and was much disgusted at his nonchalance. A fire in Channel Row, during Mr. C.'s absence in the country, gave her an opportunity of exerting herself, and saving his books and papers. She was soon after cheated out of her undress earrings, and 400l. besides, by an unworthy relation. Her History of a Life has been given in our last, p. 174. Another "son Mr. Fox named, "after himself, Henry Fox Calcraft." Still flattering herself with being Mrs. Calcraft, much as she despised her innamorato, she was at this time "struck "with instant madness" on being told, by a "professed friend," but jealous rival, that Mr. C. "had been married, "some years before he knew her, to a "young woman at Grantham, who then "resided with an aunt of his, named "Moore." Her illness, in consequence, was nearly fatal, and a Mr. Darcy, a Romish priest, was sent for, no doubt, to confess and absolve her, who, being attacked, she adds, by Dr. Francis, not only confused him, who was a greater proficient "in the study of wine than "of holy writ," but made proselytes of "two ladies who were present." At length, Dr. Ford and Bristol Wells, by the breaking of an abscess in her lungs, restored her. Miss Meredith, soon after, bequeathed her 500l. besides 1,200l. she owed her, and her jewels, worth near 2,000l. This lady's life, it seems, was shortened by her hopeless passion for the Duke of Kingston. Mrs. Bellamy then visits Mrs. Child at Brussels, describes that city and Antwerp, &c.—Grown weary both of her political attachments and theatrical engagements, and not being able to prevail on Mr. C. to perform his promise of paying her debts, which now amounted to many thousands, she determined to leave him. But first she visited Holland, where she describes Amsterdam and the Hague. Her jewels, she afterwards says, "amounted to 6000l. exclusive of those "left her by Miss Meredith." But "the bills to be discharged," she tells Mr. C. "were for what was consumed "in his house, and by his company." He then paid her bill for wine, sent her 100 guineas for her usual concert and ball on New-year's day (though he was not present), "very inadequate," she adds, "to the expences," and lent her 2,400l. on her jewels, which were pledged. At length, after having detected him in an intrigue with a female friend of hers, a married woman, she steps steps into a chaise, and bids him adieu, saying, "We shall never, I hope, meet again." Her daughter she left at school at Camden House. In this, Lady Tyrawley was her "much-loved adviser." She proceeded immediately to Bristol, where she engaged herself to Mr. Mossop, at Dublin, for "1000 guineas for the season, and two benefits," the same terms being declined by Messrs. Woodward and Barry. Lord Tyrawley and Quin used in vain their influence to induce her to return to Calcraft, whose "meanings and repeated breaches of faith, in not exonerating her from her debts, nothing (she says) could palliate." This Antony might well think that the extravagance of his Cleopatra (in which she is self-condemned), her soupers, balls, concerts, dress, jewels, &c. were sufficient to ruin even a financier; but though this might have justified his not making, it certainly could not his breaking, a promise. During her acting at Dublin, being arrested for a debt of 200l. she entered into "a serious connection" (as she terms it) with Mr. Digges the player. And before she could leave Ireland, she borrowed 400l. more. Her debts, on her return to London, she found amounted to 10,300l. Having obtained a letter of licence from all her creditors but one, she engaged with Mr. Rich. To this woman she gave a bond and judgment. In consequence, a series of distresses, needless to recapitulate, prevailed on her to accompany Mr. Digges to Edinburgh, where, as soon as she arrived, she cut off her hair, (as recruits sometimes do their fingers) to prevent her being solicited to appear in public. Yet necessity soon obliged her to have recourse to false, and to perform (as usual), which she did with success. Here she was arrested by her female creditor, but, on a trial, a verdict was given in her favour, and she agreed to pay her debt by installments. At this theatre she presided (as she calls it) for one winter, and in the succeeding summer at one that was built by subscription at Glasgow, though at her arrival there she found that "half her Troy was burnt," in other words the stage, and the whole of her theatrical wardrobe, by some enthusiasts, instigated by a Methodist teacher.—Cloaths, however, being supplied by the ladies of the city, the house was soon opened with ecclat. Mr. Digges, in the mean time, succeeded to his mother's estate, on condition of his leaving the stage, and taking her name of West; and, soon after, Mrs. B. found that her contract with him (as with Mr. Calcraft) was invalid by his having a wife. Her chief patrons in Scotland were, the present Chief Baron Montgomery, the present Viscountess Townshend, and the late Duchess of Douglass. Her debts contracted there were partly discharged, by Mr. Hearn, a gentleman who owed his Eastern fortune to her introduction of him to Mr. Calcraft, and Sir George Metham, to whom she condescended to write on the occasion, and whom she visited, at his invitation, for three months, at North Cave in Yorkshire, on terms of friendship only. At the instance of Mr. (now Lord) Brudenell, she was engaged that winter at Covent Garden by Mr. Beard, and a protection, given her by Count Haffang, as his house-keeper, which did not, however, prevent her being arrested, at the suit of a Mrs. Ray, for 900l. two of which were debts that she had bought up, and conducted, first to a spunging-house, and then to the King's Bench, where she purchased the liberty of the rules. Mr. Yorke, then attorney-general, sent her 200l. to compromise the debt, if practicable. Counsellor Murphy pleaded her cause, which she gained, and the debt was compounded, by Mrs. Ray's executors, (she being dead) for 200l. down, and 200l. more in a year. The two next seasons she enlisted, at the same theatre, under Messrs. Colman, Harris, and Rutherford, who had purchased the patent. Her letter to Mr. Calcraft (then advertised, but now first published,) she was induced, or rather compelled, to suppress by that gentleman's vows of vengeance against her, Mr. Colman, his English Merchant, and the theatre, saying it was "at once putting a dagger into his heart, and a pistol to his head." Of this she has never ceased repenting.—Her refusing to sign (with some other performers) her approbation of Mr. Colman's conduct as acting-manager, and Lady Tyrawley's sudden death (Feb. 5, 1769) before she could see her, though sent for over-night, are two other most untoward circumstances in her life, as Lord T. on his lady's death, immediately seized all her papers, and no will was ever produced, though she had promised to leave Mrs. B. all her fortune. Nor did she ever see this nobleman again but once in the green-room, and on his death-bed, where she describes him him as "sunk into a state of debility and idiotism; sitting up in his bed, wrapped in a scarlet gown, his tongue lolling out on one side of his mouth, and he appeared to be counting his fingers." It is needless to add, that he did not know her. Mr. Woodward, after this, boarded with her at Strand on the Green. She made another trip to France, and re-visited her favourite nuns at Boulogne. At her return she found herself discharged from the theatre by means of Mr. Colman, on his reconciliation with the other managers. This was the consequence of her having incurred his resentment, which she now most "poignantly regretted," tho' she owns it to be just. She soon after lost her mother, of a lethargic palsy. Not having taken out letters of administration, her cousin Crawford supplanted her, seized her house and property one evening, and drove her out to Mr. Woodward's, who received her. In a suit against this kinsman, which she commenced in the Commons, she must have succeeded, had he not, after spending the produce of what he had gained, fled his country, and, being intoxicated, fallen into the Thames, and been drowned. She now removed to her mother's late house (once Calcraft's) in Brewer-Street, which, by the assistance of Count Haflang, Mr. Woodward, and other friends, she furnished with her usual elegance. "Just at this time Mr. Calcraft died," leaving her nothing of his "princely fortune," nor even a shilling to his wife, "a failure by which she recovered a third of his real, as well as personal, estate." In consequence of a fall he received at the theatre, by jumping on a table, in the character of Scrub, Mr. Woodward also breathed his last, April 17, 1777, leaving her all his plate, jewels, and 700*l.* in reversion, after the death of his brother. But, by the chicanery, she says, of the law, all she has received is 59*l.*; and, in consequence of a former debt, an outlawry was sued out against her, which obliged her to remove, under the name of West, to a lodging at Lambeth.

We will now add a few extracts, with some remarks that naturally arise from some incidents here related.

"Mr. Calcraft was at that time called Honest John Calcraft. Whether his conduct since entitles him to this invaluable epithet, I shall leave to your discernment. He was tall, rather inclined to the embonpoint, of a florid complexion, blue eyes, auburn hair; and, taken altogether, he had a manly handsome face, and a well-made person; but, from a slouch he had by some means or other contracted, or perhaps from not having learned to dance, as Coudée says, he had a certain vulgarity in his figure that was rather disgusting. His father was the town-clerk of Grantham. He had given his son a country-school education, that is, he could read indifferently; but, to make amends for this, he was an adept in figures, and was perfectly acquainted with keeping a ledger. This qualification, joined to unremitted assiduity, enabled him, from being a clerk with a salary of only 40*l.* a year, to acquire a princely fortune." . . .

"About this time Lady Caroline Keppell was taken dangerously ill, which threw her whole family, as well as Lady Caroline Fox, into the greatest distress. That amiable young lady was ordered, like myself, to Bristol to die; but she was almost as miraculously restored to health there as I had been. Mr. Adair, who had afterwards the honour of calling Lady Caroline his wife, declared, upon this occasion, that he really thought that lady and myself immortal; as it was not in the power of such severe indispositions as we both had been afflicted with to destroy us. He, however, found to his cost that her ladyship was mortal; for she fell a sacrifice, a short time after, to her affectionate regard for her sister Lady Tavistock. Impelled by that to accompany her sister to Portugal, before she herself was well recovered from an illness under which she had laboured, her anxiety, and her unremitting care of the dear lady she attended, robbed her also of her life, which was esteemed invaluable by all who had the happiness of knowing her." . . .

As to the elopement with the ignoble Earl, in which our heroine protests she never acquiesced, we cannot help asking, with the author of the following epigram in the papers,

"MA BELLE AMIE, I prythee say,
"The first time thou wert stolen away,
"Without a bonnet,
"Why didst thou in the coach sit quiet?
"Why didst thou not kick up a riot?
"O fie upon it!"

In plain prose, who can believe that one nobleman would thus, without his knowledge, pimp for another? When Miss B. was left alone at his Lordship's house, at least when she was placed in a lodging at "her own mantua-maker's," where "she did not receive a visit from a single person," what hindered her immediately returning to her mother, (which she might, for aught that appears, the same night,) instead of sending letters, and by her absence unavoidably incurring public censure?

"The Duchess of Chandos was beautiful to a degree." Allowing her face

Grace to be as polite and accomplished as if she had been "born and bred in a court," in this encomium on her "beauty," few who remember her, we apprehend, will join.

"Gil Blas was condemned to oblivion the second night of representation. And had not Mr. Town begged a third night for the author, Mr. Moore would only have had his labour for his pains." In this there seems some mistake, the writer of this article being at that play on the fifth night, when it was condemned. And on Mr. Garrick's begging hard for another benefit for the author, and saying, "Consider, a gentleman's property is concerned," the answer was, "Give him to-night."

Through these Memoirs nothing surprises us more than the favours conferred on the author by "females (as she expresses it) of the first rank, and those exemplary patterns of rectitude, Lady Granby and Lady Kildare." At a Harrington, a Rochford, and a St. Leger, we do not wonder; but that "a Powerscourt, a Dillon, and a Tyrrawley," the imputed wife of Mrs. B.'s father, should "honour with their friendship" the mistress of a commis, and not only receive, but return, her visits, that the Lady Capels, Lady Kerpels, and Lady Essex*, (all respectable,) should be her patronesses, and, above all, that she should be introduced, by the late Mr. Yorke, to his sister, Lady Anson, who "requested that she would call upon her often," is to us unaccountable.

Old Mr. Gansel, of Donnanan Park, here styled "the friendly, the hospitable, and the worthy," to us appears no better than a Pandar. And her apology for the "frequent irregularities" and "nocturnal orgies" of that "best of men," Mr. Quin, is such as might be expected from a pupil and admirer of Sterne, with whom sensibility, as it is termed, or good-nature and generosity, outweighs all other social duties, and every moral virtue.

"In all patents the term cousin is named." Only when the person named is a peer.

"Lord Downe was shot as he stood centry at the English general's tent. Impelled by his natural bravery, or rather by an unaccountable fatality, he went out as a volunteer to the army in Germany: and notwithstanding his noble birth and great fortune, led by some unknown whim, he insisted on doing duty as one of the privates. The Marquis [of Granby] had just sent him out his dinner, which he was dividing with his comrades, when a cannon-ball shot him dead upon the spot."

In this there is scarce a word of truth. How our apologist's memory should have failed her in regard to the fate of "the only admirer that really loved her," we cannot say. But certain it is, that though Lord Downe "went out a volunteer," when he fell he was lieutenant-colonel of a marching regiment, and he received his death's wound in the action of Camper, Oct. 16, 1760, in which he was taken prisoner, and soon after died of his wounds.

In the account of Mr. Woodward, his appearance first on the stage as Harlequin is not mentioned.

"His Danish Majesty came to see Jane Shore at Covent Garden [1768], in which I played Alicia, when, observing the royal visitor to prefer the charms of Somnus to the Tragic Muse, and unwilling that he should lose the fine acting it might be supposed he came to see, I drew near to his box, and with a most violent exertion of voice, which the part admitted, cried out, "Oh! thou false Lord!" by which I so effectually roused his Majesty, that he told the unfortunate Count de Bathmore [Qu. Barnstiff?] (who used to be a frequent visitor at my house), "that he would not be married to a woman with such a bell voice upon any account, as he should never expect to sleep."...

A series of distresses, painful to recapitulate, at length involve our fair apologist in such complicated misery as to induce her to take the desperate resolution of putting a period to her existence. With these "black ideas" she left her lodging one night, and made her way towards Westminster Bridge, hoping some freebooter might, in St. George's Fields, have prevented the fatal deed, by taking her life on finding her penniless. In her own words, she "descended the steps of the landing-place, and sat down on the lowest stair, impatiently waiting for the tide to cover" her, as her "desperation," she adds, "though resolute, was not of that violent kind as to urge her to take the fatal plunge." But this, surely, is more deliberate, and therefore requires more "resolution" than plunging at once, once, and we question whether one, who was really in earnest, would have taken this method to accomplish her purpose. Mrs. Bellamy, on this occasion, must certainly have recollected the distinction of the grave-digger in Hamlet: "if the man go to the water, and drown himself, it is, will he, nill he, he goes; but if the water come to him, and drown him, he drowns not himself." As she allowed herself so much time for reflection, we are not surprised at her being deterred from her purpose by the voice of a poor woman, expressing more misery, but perfect resignation. Thus Providence (she says) "interfered, and snatched her from destruction." The loss of her son, Captain Meredith, and of her friend, Count Haslang, both most inauspiciously for her finances, are two other most untoward circumstances.—But we must now hasten to conclude, which we cannot do better than in the writer's own words: "Should the relation of my errors, and their consequences, prove a document to my own sex, warn them to shun the paths I have pursued, and inspire them with a greater degree of prudence and reflection than I have been possessed of, I shall have employed my time to some good purpose. The certain effects of an inattention to a prudential system are poverty, distress, anxiety, and every attendant evil; as I have most severely experienced."

GENT. MAG. April, 1785.

Having enlarged so much on the Apology, we shall say nothing farther of the "Letter" (annexed) "to Mr. Calcraft," dated "Oct. 1, 1767," but then violently suppressed, as has been mentioned.

33. *The Nature and Extent of the Apostolical Commission. A Sermon preached at the Consecration of the Right Revd. Dr. Samuel Seabury, Bishop of the Episcopal * Church in Connecticut. By a Bishop of the Episcopal * Church in Scotland. 4to.*

THE memorable transaction which occasioned this discourse, though not done in a corner, long remained unnoticed and in general unknown. See an account of it pp. 105, 248, 279. And even now, though this sermon is published, an unaccountable obscurity still envelops it; the Right Rev. Preacher (Dr. Skynner, we apprehend,) conceals his name, nor does he even deign to inform us when and where it was preached. The place, however, we can add, was Aberdeen; the time, last November. Indeed, till that event, few in England seemed to know that, ever since Episcopacy ceased to predominate in Scotland, the Nonjuring Bishops have regularly continued their succession, and exercised their episcopal functions by ordaining the clergy of their own communion, and, as vacancies happen, in consecrating bishops. The late Revolution in America has now given them an unexpected opportunity of supplying the infant church in Connecticut with a nursing father, who, we hope and doubt not, will be a credit to those who recommended him, and to those who appointed him to that new and important station; thus exhibiting an extraordinary phenomenon in the ecclesiastical system. An English Missionary, an Oxford Doctor, consecrated by Scotch Prelates, a Bishop of the Protestant church in New-England! In the common course of things, humanly speaking, would Archbishop Secker, would Dr. Mayhew, have thought this possible, without some providential interposition; only twenty years ago?

* This word in both these places is surely superfluous. Where can a Bishop be found but in an Episcopal church?

The text of this discourse is taken from St. Mat. XXVIII. 18, 19, 20.

"And Jesus came, and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world. Amen."

In which, from our Saviour's ordaining the Apostles and seventy other Disciples, an "inferior order," the preacher observes an early "subordination among the ministers of Christ," and makes their "powerful and extensive commission," which he considers as "the fundamental charter of the Christian church," his subject on "this solemn and happy occasion." That part of it of which he and his brethren are members, he views "in the simple light" of a primitive church, "as a society entirely distinct by itself, without being incorporated into, or any way defended or supported by, the state; but as it stood for the first 300 years after Christ, unprotected, and therefore uncorrupted, by any legal establishment." The "civil powers," the powers that be, to whom, this prelate confesses, tribute should be rendered, and to whom St. Paul commands every soul to be subject, are not, however, treated with the honour or respect that is allowed to be due to them, and which, in conformity with the gospel, they have a right to expect from every sect, or church, of Christians. A decent and a proper attention to this would surely have prevented our preacher from deviating so far from his text; and subject, as to charge our temporal rulers with "foolishness," for lavishing emoluments and temporal dignities on the established church; nor would he, even in a note, have stooped to a pun, to express the regard which he and his episcopal brethren have long shewn "to the Acts of the Apostles," in preference "to the Acts of the British Parliament;" if he had wotted what St. Paul said, in those Acts, of the deference due to the high-priest. But at any reflections on "the boasted precepts of civil establishment," and "the depressing hand of insulting power," we cannot be much surprised, when we consider how little civil liberty is "supported," and how much these ecclesiastics are "depressed" in Scotland, six months imprisonment being the penalty on every unqualified episcopal pastor, who officiates to more than five, by an act 19 George II. Yet we cannot but be disappointed in seeing a discourse on such an extraordinary occasion, when the whole western world appeared in a new point of view, made a vehicle of invective against the Church triumphant (as Dr. S. seems to think it) of England, and a panegyric (as it really seems to be) on the Church militant in Scotland, styling it the only true apostolical Church, instead of enlarging on the benefits to be expected from establishing a Church, and settling a Protestant bishop, in America, a country whose name does not once occur in this publication, except in one of Herbert's Sacred Poems, and in a Prayer of Dr. Horne's, both quoted in the notes.

54. A Collection of Theological Tracts. By Richard Watson, D. D. F. R. S. Lord Bishop of Landaff, and Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge. 6 Vols. 8vo.

FOR the benefit of young students in divinity, his Lordship has here republished the following Tracts by Churchmen and Dissenters: "Dr. Taylor's Scheme of Scripture Divinity, 1762; Allix's Reflections upon the Books of the Holy Scripture, &c. 1668; Dr. Lardner's History of the Apostles and Evangelists, &c. 1760; Dr. Brett's Dissertation on the ancient Versions of the Bible, &c. 1760; Johnson's Historical Account of the several English Translations of the Bible, &c. 1739; Beausobre's and L'Enfant's Introduction to the Reading of the Holy Scriptures, &c. 1779; Dr. Taylor's Key to the Apostolic Writings, &c. 1754; Locke's Reasonableness of Christianity, &c. 1727; Dr. Clarke's On Natural Religion, &c. 1704; Smith's Discourse on Prophecy, 1656; Lord Barrington's Essay on the Holy Spirit; Dr. Benson's Essays concerning Inspiration, and the Unity of Sense, &c. Hartley and Addison's Of the Truth of the Christian Religion; Dr. Lardner's with an account of each publication.

The benevolent design of the Right Reverend Editor is fully explained in a Preface, which breathes such a liberality of sentiment, and such a spirit of toleration, as becometh a teacher of the truth as it is in Jesus.—A plan of theological studies is here proposed; the works of Dissenters, as well as of Churchmen, are recommended, as we see, above, they are selected, indiscriminately; several useful remarks are interspersed on the present mode of academical education; some hints are given for its improvement, &c. &c.—The whole is introduced by a Dedication to the Queen, which, as it does no less honour to the judgement of the writer, than justice to the character of her Majesty, we will annex.

"MADAM,

"No original work of mine could possibly have been so deserving of your Majesty's attention as this collection of other men's labours undoubtedly is. Our infancy is indebted to that sex, of which your Majesty is the highest ornament, for the first principles of religious education; and as one of the main objects of this publication is the pre-serving serving youth from infidelity, I cannot do the publick a greater service than by requesting your Majesty to give it your protection.

"The interests of civil society require that we should pay deference to persons of rank, even though they happen not to be persons of merit. But there is a limited and constrained deference: it is paid with reluctance; and in, both in kind and extent, very unlike that which all good citizens are ambitious of shewing to your Majesty.—My character has hitherto, I trust, never been that of a flatterer; nor do I fear the imputation of it in saying, that to your Majesty's rank, alone, I would not have given even this mark, worthless as it may seem, of veneration and respect.

"I verily believe your Majesty to be one of the best wives, and one of the best mothers in England. The time is approaching—distant may it be—when the recollection of the example which you have shewn to women of every rank in these great points of female duty (the greatest on which women of the highest rank ought to build their ar) will give your Majesty more than I, in conjunction with every part of the kingdom, I pray your Majesty may at last, at that time, enjoy. cc, with the greatest and most devoted Majesty's most obedient RICHARD LANDAUER."

55. Elegy to the Memory of Dr. Samuel Johnson. By Thomas Hobhouse, Esq. 4to.

OF this short poem the following lines may serve as a specimen:

"O Pity, parent of each bliss refin'd!—
Wealth can but sooth, not humanise, the mind.

Not the light graces of the dancer's bound,
Or soft Italia's magic-warbling sound,
Can bid the wounded heart forbid to bleed,
Or pay the raptures of one generous deed.

"In that dire hour, when Falshood thrinks with dread,
To see destruction tott'ring o'er her head;
Applauding Conscience breath'd a sacred calm,
And Resignation shed her heav'nly balm;
Faith cheer'd his soul with brightest ray serene,

And wond'ring Angels ey'd the pious scene;
Till the freed spirit sought the bless'd abode,
And hardly trembled to behold his God!"

Though the author calls himself "a stranger," he is evidently well acquainted with the character that he has drawn, and whose elogium he sings.—The thoughts and expressions that he has confessedly borrowed from Tickell's admirable Elegy on Addison (one of the best in our language) are, however, strikingly superior to the rest.

56. The Spartan Manual, or, Table of Maxims, being a genuine Collection of the Aphorisms, Maxims, and Precepts, of the Philosophers, Heroes, and other great and celebrated Characters of Antiquity, under proper Heads. For the Improvement of Youth, and the promoting of Wisdom and Virtue. 8vo.

"THIS little work (we are told in the Preface) will be found to comprise the sentiments of ancient wisdom upon a variety of the most interesting subjects of human action. . . . The title of Spartan Manual was adopted from two motives: 1. Because a great number of the contributors to the work are Lacedæmonians; and 2. Because the whole is conceived in that laconic brevity for which those greatest, wisest, and best of citizens are even to this day so deservedly famous."—Prefixed is "An Alphabetical Table of the Philosophers, Heroes, and others, whose Maxims, &c. are contained in the Work, with the Times in which they were born, or died, or flourished."—It only remains to add a specimen.

"LAW.] Laws are like cobwebs, where the small flies are caught, but the great ones break through. Salm. . . . Where there are many medicines and physicians, there are most diseases; and where there are many laws, there is most iniquity. Agesilaus. . . . They who use few words [meaning the Lacedæmonians] have no need of many laws. Charillus. . . . The law is not made for the good. Socrates. . . . It was a saying of Agesilaus, that the Lacedæmonian laws had the contempt of pleasure for their foundation, and liberty for their reward."

57. Hyper-Criticism on Miss Seward's Louisa, including Observations on the Nature and Privileges of Poetic Language. 8vo.

THIS writer (successfully, we think,) defends Miss S. from a charge, brought against her in the Monthly Review, of "accumulating, in the dramatic characters of her Louisa, glaring metaphors," and of "aiming to dazzle by superfluity of ornaments," by shewing that, even in prose, to which they are here reduced, "those ornaments" none of which are omitted, "do not appear glaring and unnatural." She is also justified, this writer proves, by the practice of the best poets, by similar metaphorical expressions adduced from Shakspeare, Milton, and Otway, not to mention Pope in his Eliza.—For the compliment paid to our criticism we are obliged to him, and, with him, are glad to see that Miss Seward has, in her third edition, ingenuously altered
"the

"the line to whose harsh elision" we "objected." See our vol. LIV. pp. 392 and 500.

58. The Antiquarian Repertory. 4 Feb. 49.

THE Fourth Volume of the Antiquarian Repertory being now announced as completed, we are sorry it is not in our power to continue the praise we bestowed on it at first setting out (see vol. XLVI. p. 560). But, not to mention many frivolous and ridiculous communications which have found their way into it, the execution of the plates, which are the most interesting parts of the compilation, falls off so greatly in the last volume, that it should seem as if they were the work of a boy learning to draw, rather than of the artist who claims them as his own; being taken from wretched modern drawings, which is the more censurable, as the numbers of the 4th volume were advanced from 2s. 6d. to 2s. and four plates given in each.

These plates represent the following subjects.

VOL. II. VIEWS. Of White Knights, Welsh bridge at Shrewsbury, Saint George's gate at Canterbury, Auckland palace, Jedburgh abbey, Harrold, Bar gate at Southampton, Starwic house, New bridge, Edinburgh, Alnwick castle, Mount Stewart, in the Isle of Rute, Woodstock market-place, Dunbarton castle, Ramsay abbey, Saint Donat's castle, Belvoir in Kent, Pembroke castle, Sheff. field place, Mannerbier castle, Enfield palace, Little Saxham church, Stratlam castle, Hunting-tower at Chatworth, and Queen of Scots' bower, a ruin, at Hardwick.

PORTRAITS. 8 Thomas Lord Wen *Unken, Henry Perc thumberland, Richards Cromwell.

MISCELLANIES. Brightelmston font, Percy cross, Becket's cup, Henry the VIII's spoon, boot, and glove, Camp on Cockfield fell, co. Durham, Trileph Rones, co. Monmouth, portrait of Abp. Chichele in glass*, Malcolm's cross.

VOL. IV. VIEWS. Bolton hall, Ranger, St. Petronilla's hospital at Bury, Chantry at Bakewell, Bridge house at Rocheester, Portchester castle, Upnor castle, Goodrich church, Tamworth castle, Natley abbey*.

PORTRAITS. A curious one of Jesus Christ, George duke of *Clarence, Thomas Percy, earl of Carlisle [doubtful], *John Wicliffe, Sir John Ogle *der, Margaret countess of *Salisbury, Thomas Radcliffe, earl of *Sussex, Sir Wm Walworth, lord mayor of London.

MONUMENT of the Radcliffes, earls of Sussex, at Borham, *Essex, of Sir David Owen, in Eastbourne church, *Sussex, and many wretched sketches of brasses.

MISCELLANIES. Cross and altar at Bakewell, font at Winchester, the well under the cathedral there, bust of William Lamb, in Lambe's chapel, Roman altar at Doncaster, Monument of Rich. Watts, Chair of the prior of Southwick, that at Dunmow, and that used by Q. Mary at Winchester.—Procession at the christening of *Prince Arthur, and of the funeral of Elizabeth, wife of Henry the *VIIIth.

59. Confessions: or, Thoughts upon several Subjects; affectionately submitted to the Consideration of a Young Friend. 8vo.

THESE "moral remarks upon life" at large, and the conduct requisite to "make that life happy," are compressed under the heads of religion, affection, and benevolence, conduct and conversation, (in which is a fragment on seduction, called "Lavinia,") pleasure and amusement; all which are treated with such a spirit of truth and soberness, and such an unaffected piety and benevolence, as must recommend the work to every serious and considerate reader.

LETTER to Miss H. MORE, by Mrs. YEARELY, the celebrated Milk-woman of CLIFTON, (first noticed in our last Vol. p. 297 *.)

To STELLA, on a visit to Mrs. MONTAGU.

UNEQUAL, lost to the aspiring claim,
I neither ask nor own th' immortal name
Of Friend—ah no, its ardours are too great,
My soul too narrow, and too low my state;
STELLA, soar on; (to nobler objects true)
Pour out your soul with your lov'd MONTAGU †.

But ah! should either have a thought to spare;
Slight, trivial, neither worth a smile or tear,
Let it be mine—when glowing raptures rise,
And each aspiring seeks her native skies;
When fancy wakes the soul to ecstasy,
And the wrapt mind is fir'd with Deity,
Quick let me from the hallow'd spot retire,
Where sacred genius lights his awful fire:
Yet shall your bounty warm my feeble state,
With cheerful lustre gild my gloomy fate;
In that lone hour, when angry storms descend,
And the chill'd soul forgets the name of friend,
When all her sprightly fires inactive lie,
And gloomy objects fill the mental eye;
When hoary Winter strides the northern blast,
And Flora's beauties at his feet are cast;
Earth by the grisly tyrant desert made,
The feather'd warblers quit the leafless shade,
Quit those dear scenes where life and love began,
And cheerless seek the savage haunt of man:
Then shall your image soothe my pensive soul,
When slow-pac'd moments big with mischief roll;

Then shall I, eager, wait your wish'd return
From that bright Fair who decks a Shak-speare's urn
With deathless glories; ev'ry ardent prayer
Which gratitude can waft from soul sincere,
Each glad return, to gen'rous bounty due,
Shall warm my heart for you and Montagu, Blest pair!—O had not souls like yours been given,

The dubious atheist well might doubt a heaven:
Convinc'd he now deserts his gloomy stand,
Owns MIND the noblest proof of a creating hand,

GAY's conversion, by externals wrought,
Dropt far beneath sublimity of thought.
But could he those exalted virtues find,
Which form and actuate your gentle mind,
How would the Heathen, struck with vast surprize,

Atoms deny, while SPIRIT fill'd his eyes!

SONG, by Mr. HAYLEY.

YE cliffs, I to your airy steep
Ascend with trembling hope and fear,
To gaze on yon expansive deep,
And watch if William's sails appear.

GENT. MAG. April, 1785.

Long months elapse, while here I breathe
Vain Expectation's frequent prayer,
Till, bending o'er the waves beneath,
I drop the tear of dumb despair.

But see! a glitt'ning sail in view!
Tumultuous hopes arise;
'Tis he! I feel the vision true,
I trust my conscious eyes.

His promis'd signals from the mast
My timid doubts destroy;
What was your pain, ye terrors past,
To this ecstatic joy?

A small Tribute to the Memory of the late excellent Dr. JOHNSON.

By I. S. DAMNONIENSIS.

MOURN ye, who Wisdom's hallow'd depths explore,
Mourn ye, who search the mystic roll of Truth;
Your guide, your Johnson, is, alas! no more,
The patron kind, the succouring friend of youth!

For well he knew the sacred veil to draw,
Where Wisdom erst had grav'd th' immortal page,
From Error's leav'n he purg'd the moral law,
And broke the talisman—inscrib'd by age.

By Virtue fir'd, he rais'd th' avenging rod,
And Satire scourg'd, by Indignation led *.
Beneath his feet the sons of Vice he trod;
And Folly's legions 'fore his eagle fled.

By zeal impell'd (tho' not the bigot sway
That wraps th' obdurate mind in mists of night),
As if inspir'd, he felt th' auspicious ray,
And daring plann'd his more-than mortal
flight.

Aiming to strip the mask from ermin'd Pride,
And trace the guises of the trait'rous heart.
Pursue Ambition with his giant stride,
And blaze the plottings of insidious art.

Not his the boast, to waste the midnight oil
From learning's store to tinge his fraud-ful
reed;

His scorn, beneath the mask of glancing Wile,
To venom doubt, and bid Religion bleed.

Nobler the plan, to shed the dew of peace,
And calm the tumults of th' affrighted
breast.

To bid the seeds of social life to cease,
And raise the virtues, jealous Envy prest!
And such was thine, O Johnson! This the Mase

In grateful lays shall boldly dare to claim;
E'en Virtue's self the trump of fame shall use,
And her best guardian consecrate to fame.

*The NAIAD'S REPLY to Mrs. BURRELL'S INVOCATION . By a LADY.

SWEET Heliconian Nymph, whose matchless strain
Invites me forth, and charms e'en Wisdom's ear,
Long shall these rocks the pleasing sounds retain,
And fam'd Parnassus be unenvy'd here.
More soothing notes ne'er form'd the wond'rous spell
The Syrens chanted to induce delay,
Nor issued from Calypso's vocal shell,
 wooing Ulysses to prolong his stay !
Like them thou sail'st, tho' friendship strung
the lyre,
And thy responsive voice its accents bland
Employ'd not to promote the loose desire,
Th' inebriate cup averted by thy hand.
But Heav'n-descended minds can ill endure
The rest which frail mortality implores ;
Soon in his renovated strength secure,
MANSFIELD upborne his well-known heights explores.

He, like the Grecian sage, would sure reject
Immortal youth, oppos'd to high renown,
Would hasten hence the injur'd to protect,
And awe the perjur'd villain by his frown.
For this did Heav'n my healing powers impart,
Not that dull sloth should win him to her
train,
Content I see him from my brink depart ;
Nor thou lament, as thou hadst sung in vain.
The bays are thine ; and may my lucid stream
Still flow for thee, replete with jocund health !
May the light spirits from thy eye-lids beam,
Conferring joys, not to be bought by wealth !

THE CONVICT.

SEE yon pale trembling wretch with quivering nerve,
Emerging now from Newgate's dreary cells,
That tragic visage, and those chains observe,
Impending doom his boding breast foretells.
In sorrowing silence slow he stalks along,
His bleeding bosom beats with growing fears ;
With supplicating eye now views the throng,
And now inclines his head to hide his tears.
At length arraign'd, the shuddering prisoner
stands,
In awful form the solemn rites commence.
He waits stern justice, and her dread commands,
And feels the pangs of death in dire suspense.
Now the tremendous moment of his fate
Arrives, and soon the vindicating breath
Of nice discerning justice, rob'd in state,
Reluctantly declares his sentence—Death.

* See Vol. LIV. p. 853.

The tottering wretch sinks down in grief and
tears ;
For mercy calls, of life th' expiring gleam,
That loyal attribute soon interferes,
With heav'n-like beams, and steps 'twixt death and him.

The terms of pardon he receives with joy,
An happy exile to the western shores * ;
New scenes of life his glowing hopes employ ;
He leaves his home, nor once its loss deplores.
And now far distant from the scenes of wealth,
This poor man's lightest toil there gives him bread,
No tempting thoughts now urge to gain by stealth,
For Vice and Want there stretch'd their wings,
and fled.

Thus gen'rous Britain spares her guilty sons,
And with parental fondness guides their way :
The bloody expiation still she shuns,
And gives them bliss, to teach them to obey.

SONNET. To ELIZA.

WH Y should I fear to speak my conscious Love ?
The noblest honour that the heart can move !
What tho' unnumber'd rivals claim the
charm,
Still hope aspiring every sense shall warm ;
For hope is glory, when for thee it burns,
And like a radiant star in pole discerns.
No pangs I nourish, breathe no raptur'd
flight ;
The cant of souls who love's fair source disguise !
I scorn to libel with the name of flames,
And pangs, and wounds, what every pleasure claims ;
That bids my heart exulting trophies wear,
And plants Eliza's graceful image there ;
And round the phantom, Mirth's enlivening
blaze,
With soft humanity all kind,
And sympathy of heart refin'd,
And all that burns to emulate the poet's lays.

Not pass unnotic'd by a theme at least.

The Sorrows of CHARLOTTE at the Tomb of WERTER.

I SING of the days that are gone,
Of Werter who now is no more :
Unhappy the hour I was born ;
His loss I shall ever deplore.

The grass that waves high round his tomb
Marks how subject we are to decay,
The Monarch must here meet his doom,
When death calls, even he must obey.

Since life is uncertain on earth,
Ah ! why should I sorrow in vain ;
The same power that gave us our birth,
Has a right to recall it again.

— The virtues that dwelt in his breast
Sweet remembrance will ever hold dear.
The honour my Werter possess'd
Demands in soft pity a tear.

Oh ! could it the angel restore,
Like a fountain it ever should flow :
But my Werter, alas ! is no more,
And my heart is o'erburthen'd with woe.

Oh ! give me but strength to retain
The goodness that dwelt in his heart ;
When life shall no longer remain,
We shall meet again never to part.

On a prevailing fashionable Foible.

I F you in converse Brutus should oppose,
His answer is, I'll take you by the nose ?
Or if his fancy leads to worse disgrace,
He'll throw a glass of ale against your face ;
Exhibiting and boasting (as tho' fit),
His want of manners, eloquence, and wit ;
For only he who hath nor wit nor sense,
Will e'er be seen to practise impudence.

SONNET, from PETRARCH.

By Miss SMITH of Bignor-Hall, Suffex.

L OOSE to the wind her golden tresses
stream'd,
And form'd bright waves with amorous
zephyrs' sighs ;
And, though averted now, her charming
eyes
Then with warm Love and melting pity beam'd.
Was I deceiv'd ?—Ah ! surely, nymph divine,
That fine suffusion on thy cheek was love ;
What wonder then those glowing tints
should move,
Should fire this heart, this tender heart of
mine !

Thy soft melodious voice, thy air, thy shape,
Were of a goddess, not a mortal maid ;
But though thy charms, thy heavenly charms, should fade,
My heart, my tender heart, could not escape ;
Nor cure for me in time or change be found ;
The shaft extracted cannot cure the wound.

O D E to P E A C E,

*Translated from the GREEK of Mr.
HUNTINGFORD.*

By Master JOHN BROWNE, at the Age of ten Years.

O THOU that satte'st near the throne of Jove,
When Chaos heard thy orders from above,
Each atom, then in wild confusion hurl'd,
Sprung from the deep, and form'd a perfect world.

If e'er the sun a dreadful darkness shrouds,
And fear with thunder-rolls along the clouds ;
If the sea's azure horrid storms surround,
Old ocean bellows, and his shores resound ;
Yet when the waves you order to be still,
The thunder's hush'd—the sea performs thy will ;

The breaking clouds restore the coming day,
And the bright sun no longer makes delay ;
The winds unto their rocky caverns fly,
And a smooth calm will o'er the ocean lie.

All nature hastes thy summons to obey,
Yet man, proud man, rejects thy sovereign
sway—

O ! quickly, Mars, forsake th' ensanguin'd field,

Nor terrify the nation with thy shield ;
Then shall we pay due honours to the land,
Each rustick reap the labours of his hand ;
And Ceres also shall a garland bear
Of fruits and corn upon her yellow hair.
Then, then shall Hymen light the torch of
love,

And boys around Cythera's shrine shall move,
With lovely maids ; wise arts will mortals
seign,
And Dædalean works shall rise again.

Proper EPITAPH for SHIRLEY FIELDING, Esq. Portrait Painter, who lately died at Lutterworth, in extreme distress.

H ERE, shelter'd now from want, from cold neglect,
Thy memory meets pity, meets respect ;
'Twas thine to call, from blended colors,
thought,

And animate with life the shadowy draught
Ah ! what avails it, that from noble blood,
With nobler talents grac'd thy virtues flow'd.
Let wealth, let honors, other names adorn,
To rival Nature's magic thou wert born ;
With gain, with grief, to struggle long, was
thine,

Yet pious friendship still reveres thy shrine.

ALAS, poor Mungo!

Happy wast thou, hadst thou known thy own felicity!

Remote from the fierce, bold eagle,

Tyrant of thy native woods,

Thou hadst nought to fear

From his piercing talons,

Nor from the blundering gun of the thoughtless sportsman.

Safe in thy wired castle,

Grimalkin never could annoy thee:

Daily wast thou fed with the choicest viands,

By the fair hands of an indulgent Mistress;

But, discontented,

Thou would'st have more liberty.

Too soon, alas! didst thou obtain it;

And, wandering, fell

By the merciless fangs of wanton, cruel Ranger.

Whether Subjects, Sons, Squirrels, or Daughters,

That apparent restraint

Is real liberty,

Yielding peace and plenty with security.

MR. URBAN,

I SEND you the following French verses, written by a Monk, with the translation:

A. P. P.

DOUX charme de ma solitude,
Brillante pipe, ardent fourneau,
Qui purge d'humeurs mon cerveau,
Et mon esprit d'inquietude!
Tabac! dont mon âme est ravie,
Lorsque je vois te perdre en l'air
Aussi promptement qu'un éclair,
Je vois l'image de ma vie.

Tu remets dans mon souvenir
Ce qu'un jour je dois devenir,
N'étant qu'une cendre animée.
Et tout d'un coup je m'aperçois,
Que courant après ta fumée,
Je passe de même que toi.

SWEET charmer of my solitude,
Brilliant pipe, consuming tube,
Who clear'st the vapours from my brain,
And my mind from anxious pain!
Tobacco! source of my delight,
When I see thee quit my sight,
And vanish in the purer air,
Like the lightning's quick career,
I see the image of my life below,
And whither soon my breath must go.
By thee I trace, in colours strong,
That man is nothing but a song.
An animated heap of clay,
The jest and sport of but a day;
That as thy smoke I pass away,
An emblem of my own decay.

MR. URBAN,

IT is observed by Mr. Warton, in his late admirable Edition of Milton's juvenile Poems, that "none of those pieces, now so popular, were distinguished by imitation, till about the beginning of the present century." But perhaps the celebrated Andrew Marvell, who (according to Mr. Warton) was Assistant Secretary to Milton during Cromwell's Protectorate, has professedly copied the strain and imagery of L'Allegro and Il Penseroso, in the following beautiful lines, which have been selected and placed by Mr. Mason as an Inscription for a shrubbery, in Lord Harcourt's elegant gardens at Nuneham in Oxfordshire.

"FAIR Quiet, have I found thee here,
With Innocence, thy sister dear!
Mistaken long, I thought thee then
In busy companies of men;
Your sacred plants, at length I know,
Will only in retirement grow:
Society is all but rude
To this delicious Solitude;
Where all the flowers and trees do close
To weave the garland of repose."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

The following not improbable state of the present dispute between the Emperor and the Dutch is copied from Lloyd's Evening-Post, a paper of good foreign intelligence.

It must be remembered that the exclusive right of the navigation of the Scheldt was granted to the Dutch by the treaty concluded at Munster, between the Emperor and the United States, Jan. 31, 1748.

There are no other parties to it——1648 was the year of the decapitation of Charles I. consequently England could take no part in it.

The 14th Article, on which it depends, is short: "L'Escaut occidental, les canaux des Sas & de Schwin, celui ci aboutissants, seront tenus clos a côté des Etats," viz. "The western Scheldt, the canals of Sas and of Schwin, which fall into it, shall be closed on the side of the country which belongs to the States."

This is so clear as to need no comment. The Dutch have built several forts, to prevent the navigation of the Scheldt to all but their own ships.

The Emperor contends, however, that this treaty does not bind, because Holland has not fulfilled her engagements in other respects, viz. about Maestricht and the Barrier Treaty.

By the Barrier Treaty, 1716, the Dutch were not to possess and garrison certain towns, but to keep them in repair; this they have not done, and the Emperor has claims for repairs to a large extent.

The claim of the Emperor to Maestricht is as follows:

Upon the irruption of Louis XIV. 1672, into Holland, the Count Monterey, governor of the Low Countries, gave a secret assistance to Holland; and Spain made a treaty soon after with them, whereby Holland agreed to give up Maestricht, the country of Vroenhoven, and Outermase, to Spain, as possessors of the Low Countries, if Louis XIV. did not make any acquisition; or, in the terms of the treaty, "if matters remained upon the present footing, mutually, when peace should be restored."

By the treaty of Nimeguen, 1686, Louis XIV. relinquished all his conquests in Holland. Spain put in her claims; but Holland pleaded certain mortgages, which the prince of Orange had upon Maestricht, against that cession.

Charles II. of Spain, with the usual Spanish good faith, paid off the mortgage, and satisfied the Prince of Orange; the negotiation trained on till his death, but that event produced the succession-war, and threw every thing into confusion.

The treaty of Utrecht gave the Low Countries to the German branch of the House of Austria, with all the rights, claims, &c. of Spain.

This claim was renewed, in 1738, by the Emperor Charles the VIth, and Commissioners met at Brussels; but his death, and the difficulties that arose about the Pragmatic Sanction, and the succession of Maria Theresa, rendered the negotiation abortive.

This claim, and that of the repairs of the barrier towns, are such as, if they were fairly discussed in a court of law, would be good. The Emperor, however, waived them, provided the Dutch gave up the free navigation of the Scheldt.

Maestricht, and a partial navigation of the Scheldt, viz. for his own ships, were offered by the Dutch last summer, but not accepted.

The partial navigation of the Scheldt has again been offered lately."

Nothing, however, can yet be said with certainty respecting the war. The advices from abroad are equally unfounded and contradictory. One fact may be depended upon, on the authority of the London Gazette, that the Count De Maillebois has taken the oaths in the assembly of their High Mightinesses, in quality of general of the infantry in the service of the Republic; with an appointment, as the Dutch papers say, of 60,000 florins for his travelling charges, 20,000 for the establishment of his household, and 60,000 for his annual pay.

Constantinople, March 10. The letters from Smyrna, of the 1st instant mention, that, the plague had entirely ceased there: but the last accounts from Tunis bring the disagreeable news, that the contagion continued to rage in that city.

A printing-office has at length been opened here, and employed on several works at the expence of government; one is the history of the Ottoman Empire.

Vienna, March 30. Prince Joseph Lobkowitz is appointed captain of the noble German guard, vacant by the death of the late Marshal Colloredo; Lieutenant-General of Nostitz is raised to the rank of General of Cavalry, and is made Captain of the guard (called les Archers) formerly commanded by Marshal Thierheim; and Gen. Clairfait is appointed Vice Commandant of the City of Vienna, in the room of Gen. Nostitz.

We have accounts from Brandies, that on the 8th of this month a most violent storm fell there of thunder, lightning, and rain, which, at this season of the year, and without any previous heat, greatly alarmed the inhabitants.

Berlin, April 9. His Serene Highness the Duke of Brunswick has accepted the office of Inspector-General of Magdeburgh; Lieutenant General Lengefeld is appointed governor of the city, from which office the inspectorship is now separated; and Lieutenant-General Gaudi is appointed Inspector of the Prussian troops in Westphalia.

Paris, March 28. Last night her Most Christian Majesty was happily delivered of a Prince, who has been since created Duc de Normandie.

Madrid, March 29. On Easter Sunday the 27th instant, the Portuguese Ambassador at this court made his publick entry into Madrid, and in a formal audience of the King of Spain demanded the Infanta Donna Charlotta (eldest daughter of the Prince of Asturias) in marriage for the Infant Don Juan of Portugal. In the evening the contract was read and signed in the presence of the Royal Family, the grandees of Spain, and the great officers of State. After which the marriage ceremony was performed by the Patriarch of the Indies, his Catholick Majesty standing proxy for the Infant Don Juan.

Utrecht, March 31. The explanation which their H. M. required of the K. of Prussia, relative to the treasonable correspondence with Maestrecht (p. 223.), is said to be received. That affair is likely to be attended with serious consequences. M. Tullen Olden Bernevelt Fiscal has put M. Vender Stype, his deputy, under arrest; but as yet no proofs have been realized against him. Suspicious papers have been found in his custody, but they are in cypher which nobody can read but himself.

The remark in our last (see p. 229), on the imaginary sentence of Horiah and Klotchka, appears now to be just. The legal sentence pronounced upon these two rebel chiefs was, to be broke alive upon the wheel, and then to be quartered, and part of their bodies to be openly exposed in different provinces. On the 28th of February they were led to punishment; six days previous to which, the magistrates in the several districts of Transylvania received Imperial orders to collect from each village six men, to be present at the execution. Klotchka suffered first, and Horiah was a witness of the torments inflicted upon him, and afterwards underwent the same himself. Their heads were sent to the places where they lived, to be set up on poles; and their quarters sent to the different places where they committed the greatest enormities. It was necessary to hasten their execution, on account of an infectious disorder, occasioned by the slaughter of the rebels, and the fullness of the gaols, that were crowded with the prisoners. People of all ranks have been attacked with the contagion, and numbers carried off.

The new regulations of his Imperial Majesty, respecting the interior government of the kingdom of Hungary, have been published in the Vienna Gazette.

Instead of the 56 counties, into which that kingdom and its dependent provinces were hitherto divided, ten circles are now formed, and committed to the charge of the following Hungarian gentlemen, with the titles of counsellors and royal commissaries.

Le Comte Giory, Le Comte de Teleky,
Le Baron Mailath, Le Baron Pronay,
Le Baron d'Urmeny, Le Baron Reva,
Le Comte Jankowitz, Le Baron Szent Ivany,
Le Comte Szeaseny, Le Baron Detzer.

The supreme courts retain their former titles, and the privileges which belong to their order, at a general diet of the nation; but their jurisdiction in their respective counties is entirely suppressed.

The greatest expedition is used at Cadiz in completing the armament destined against Algiers (see p. 229.). The auxiliary ships of the Portuguese, Venetians, and Maltese, are every moment expected, as well as a small squadron from Toulon. These preparations are, however, well known to the Algerines, who are in consequence using their utmost to render that fortress impregnable. All their batteries have been repaired, and furnished with cannon, and orders issued to build several vessels like gunboats, to throw burning materials on board the enemies ships.

The last letters from Cadiz bring the agreeable news of the arrival of the Brilliant, from Vera Cruz to the Havannah, with eight hundred thousand crowns; and of the Paula frigate, with one thousand two hundred Lima crowns.

EAST-INDIA NEWS.

The dispatches, which were lately received over land from the East-Indies, brought an account of the death of Mr. Wheeler, one of the supreme council, and of all the ships that sailed last season from England at their respective ports.

The dispatches received by the Surprise Packet, lately arrived from Bengal, bring a confirmation of the death of Mr. Wheeler. Also that the King of Delhi's prime minister, Aphraisaib Cawn, has been assassinated. The young Prince of Delhi had tried every method to return to his father's dominions, consistent with his own honour and personal safety, but every negotiation as yet proves ineffectual. Mr. Hastings states the Company's resources to be in so flourishing a situation, as to enable them to pay off the bond debt with interest in a short time.

Sir Edward Hughes was to sail for England, in the Sultan, the beginning of December, with the Eoridice frigate; and the command of the Squadron was to be left with Capt. Andrew Mitchel.

By private advices from India there is an account of a duel having taken place between Lord Macartney and Mr. Sadleir, in which it is reported the former was wounded.

The ship Bellona, Capt. Richardson, is gone on a voyage to Malacca and China, from whence she is to proceed to the S. W. Coast of America. [This is in pursuance of the plan proposed by the late Capt. King, in the the account of his voyage on discovery, to which we may hereafter refer.]

There has been a mutiny among the black cavalry in the English pay at Arnee, on account of arrears. They have made their officers prisoners.

Six midshipmen, who were taken by Mr. Suffrein in the captured ships, and sent up to Tippoo, have renounced both their religion and country, and voluntarily turned Mahometans: they have married Mahometan women.

Shauzadda, son to the King of Delhi, is still at Lucknow. (See p. 314.)

On the 4th of June last, a Portuguese ship, called the Priozo, laden with 60,000 pipes of Madeira, and a very rich cargo from Europe, was totally lost on the Gaspar-sand, at the entrance of the Ganges. The captain, two officers, and 40 men, perished for want of assistance, which could only be had from Calcutta. This is the second Portuguese ship lost at the entrance of the Ganges within these two months, laden with Madeira wine. [This dangerous navigation is thoroughly known only to the English, which is their great security at Calcutta.]

The Asia Snow from the eastward, but lost from Mesulapatam, is lost at the entrance of Hoogley River. All the crew but a few Lascars, who swam to Sugar-Island, perished.

Mr. Hastings has taken his passage for England; and nothing but the death of the next in rank will keep him in India.

The Dutch are now put into possession of their town and fort of Chinsurah; but with several restrictions, which they were not under before the war.

WEST INDIA NEWS.

On the 27th of January, Capt. Brown, in the Mary, arrived in the harbour of Kingston, in Jamaica, from Black River, on the Musquito shore, with intelligence, that a sloop of war anchored on that coast from the Havannah in December last, on board of which were three Spanish officers, charged with dispatches from the governor-general of Cuba to Major Lowrey, commandant of the British Ports at Black River which they delivered to him immediately after they landed. The tenor of these dispatches, it seems, was a peremptory requisition, to know if Major Lowrey had received any official instructions to withdraw the troops and inhabitants from that country; and giving him to understand, that, if the territory should not be vacated by March next, he should be under the necessity of compelling them by force of arms to retire. To his message, we understand, Major Lowrey returned no answer; but, after entertaining his visitors hospitably, gave an acknowledgment that he had received their dispatches, and promised to send a flag of truce to the Havannah, with his final determination on the subject, in a fortnight after. It was the prevailing opinion among the people at Black-River, that the Spaniards are seriously disposed to carry their threats into execution, and that they are making considerable preparations, both at the Havannah, and in the neighbourhood of the English settlements on the Main, expressly for that purpose.

Other letters bring the alarming intelligence, that a body of 500 Spaniards had already taken possession of the island of Restan, the harbour of which they are fortifying with great diligence, with a design from thence to carry on their operations by sea against the Musquito shore. In the meantime, Major Lowrey was, with unremitting diligence, putting his settlement into the best posture possible of defence; and having convened the Indian chiefs together, they had promised him, in the most solemn manner, every assistance and support.

About the latter end of December, Morris Keaton, a pirate and murderer, was executed at Cuckolds Point, near Port Royal in Jamaica, and afterwards his body was suspended to a lofty gibbet in chains.—He met his fate with uncommon resignation, penitence, and fortitude; and told the surrounding multitude, after he was tied up, that he was not afraid of death, but wished it as a relief from all his sorrows. He then turned to the executioner, and forbade him to take away the ladder, saying, that he would jump off himself when he was ready, which he accordingly did about two minutes afterwards.

The night before his execution he most solemnly declared, that the following outlines of the latter part of his life were strictly true:

“That he had been a volunteer in the King's army in America, and afterwards a Lieutenant in Arnold's regiment, when that officer joined the British; that he had been in nine actions, and employed by Gen. Clinton in three different messages to Lord Cornwallis, when besieged in York-town, Virginia; that on the conclusion of the peace, Gen. Arnold's regiment being disbanded, and he was discharged at that time without half-pay, or any other provision. He then made a voyage to Santa Cruz, where he had a brother who trusted him with a very considerable venture for America, which was unfortunately lost with the vessel within sight of New London, where he arrived with nothing but the cloaths on his back. From New London he found means to get to Norfolk, in Virginia, where he became acquainted with Benj. Johnson, Jos. Twentyman, and one Hughes, with whom he had several meetings; at one of which it was proposed by Hughes to procure a passage on board the schooner Friendship, then lying off Johnson's house, commanded by Wm. Lewis, and bound to St. Thomas's;

to seize upon the said schooner when opportunity offered; to murder all belonging to her without distinction; and to sell the ship and cargo at the first convenient port.

This bloody project, in the evening of the 9th day after their departure, they carried into execution. Keating, Twentyman, and Hughes, went up to Mr. Chadwick at the helm and, presenting a loaded pistol to his head, swore if he spoke a word they would instantly shoot him dead; they then bound and gagged him. Twentyman took the helm, and the others proceeded to secure the men upon the watch, all of whom Hughes proposed instantly to throw over-board. This done, Johnson and Hughes went into the cabin, and seizing the Captain first, made him secure, and then attacked Mr. Wilkinson, a passenger, who gave them some trouble, as he made resistance, and could not easily be overpowered; but at length, by stabbing him in several parts of his body, and chopping off his fingers as he grasped the throats, they at length completed their diabolical purpose. Wm. Price, Ch. Brown, and a negroman and boy, who were asleep, they easily subdued; and, after swearing them on a book to be true, kept them alive to work the ship. Chadwick refused to join them, and him they threw overboard without resistance. The coast being now clear, Twentyman assumed the command of the vessel, as the only man who could direct her course; and after thirty days sail, coming in sight of Antigua, Hughes having rendered himself suspected, Twentyman ordered him to be thrown overboard, which was the more readily obeyed, as he had some days before dispatched the negro-man in the same way.

Antigua being in sight, there was now but little time to deliberate; and it was, on consultation, their unanimous opinion to make for a French port rather than an English port, to dispose of the ship and cargo. Port Louis was therefore made choice of for that purpose, and Guadaloupe was the island to which Twentyman directed his course. Here Keating assumed the character of a merchant, and had succeeded in the sale, had not Brown (one of the foremast-men) found means to make his escape, which so alarmed the pirates, that they instantly set sail, and steered for the little island of St. Martin's, where they disposed of a small part of their cargo, took two or three Mulattoes on board to work the ship, and then made for Hispaniola, where Keating, disposing of all he could, made his escape from his companions, and found means to get to Port Royal in Jamaica, about the 8th of December 1784, in a very bad state of health. Here he took lodgings at Mrs. Dubois's, where he fell sick, and was visited by a physician, who talking on various subjects, discovered that his illness did not proceed so much from a bodily complaint, as from a disordered mind.

GEN. MAG. April, 1785.

Among other questions he put to the physician, he asked, "if some pirates had lately been apprehended there?" and being answered in the affirmative, and, "that they were the most bloody, daring, and abandoned set of villains that had ever appeared upon record." "My God!" cried he, what a pain have I in my head, and deadly sickness at my heart! Send for a barber instantly, or I shall be distracted!" The physician now suspecting the real cause, wanted no astrologer to tell his patient's fortune. Keating having been advertised and described, the physician had recourse to the news-papers; and his patient answering the description, a warrant was obtained; and, on apprehending him, he did not hesitate to acknowledge his guilt, though he was unwilling to disgrace his family. It has since been found that he was born at Munster, and of no mean extraction."

Perhaps the boldest and most determined spirit of revenge that ever possessed the heart of man was manifested lately at Jamaica, where a new negro, disdaining to be a slave himself, set fire to six negro houses, which were reduced to ashes; put three negroes to death, who refused to join him, and wounded several others. Having done this, as it was said, without provocation, he pursued one of the book-keepers, who very narrowly escaped his vindictive rage; but a stone thrown at his head brought him to the ground; and, being overpowered, he was secured, brought to a mock-trial, and sentenced to be burnt alive, which, though accompanied with all the excruciating circumstances of horror that could be devised, he underwent with almost incredible fortitude.

Port Royal, Jan. 29. This day accounts were received here by an express from Collector L——, which informs us, that the Spaniards have actually commenced hostilities against the Musquito-men; and that a party of the latter were killed by the enemy. These troubles will certainly occasion some embarrassment to Government.

By late advices from St. Vincent's, the Caribs are in great force, upwards of 1200 of them being well armed, and a terror to the English settlers, against whom they appear to entertain the most envenomed hatred.

ADVICES FROM IRELAND.

Advices of a very extraordinary nature have lately been received, by some merchants of Corke, from Jamaica, of certain regulations respecting the trade homeward from that island to this Kingdom, said by some to be in consequence of orders from the principal proprietors and West India merchants in London, and by others, of orders to the Governor from his Majesty's Ministers. The Corke merchants have written to Jamaica by a light vessel for the particulars, fully determined, if the answers confirm the late accounts, to submit the grievance to the consideration of our Parliament.

March

March 24.—This day his Grace the Ld. Lieut. went in state to the H. of Peers, and gave the Royal assent to the following bills: Great duty bill; loan bill; for the advancement of trade; post-office bill; sugar bill; tobacco bill; hawkers and pedlars bill; duty on licences; duty on carriages; corn bill; coffee bill; malt bill; qualification bill; Dublin entries for the Royal Exchange; 4000*l.* to the linen manufacture; 9000*l.* Protestant charter-schools; 1000*l.* Dublin Society; 3000*l.* for building public offices; 5000*l.* Foundling Hospital; 5000*l.* for building churches; 1000*l.* Hibernian School; 500*l.* to the House of Industry; 1000*l.* Marine Society; to take away the challenge to the array of pannels of jurors for want of a knight on trials, in which a Peer or Lord of Parliament is party; to prevent dilapidation on church lands; and Nenagh road bill.—Ireland is treading fast on the heels of England, in raising taxes.

ADVICES FROM SCOTLAND.

Edinburgh, April 2. A grave-digger, after paring off the turf in making a grave lately in the church-yard of Brechin, turned up as many small silver pieces as would have filled the crown of a large hat, and with them six silver spoons with circular mouths, about two inches diameter, and a quarter of an inch deep, the handles four inches one-half long, with a knob at the top. Most of the pieces are about the size of a sixpence, of the coinage of Edward I. bearing his name; and on some of them, on the reverse, a cross with three points in each angle, with CIVITAS DUBLINENSIS round it. Supposed to be deposited by some English, when Edward I. besieged Brechin Castle, then commanded by Sir Thomas Maule.

Edinburgh, April 16. This forenoon came down by express His Majesty's commission, appointing Ld. Eskgrove to be one of the Lords Commissioners of Justiciary, in the room of the Lord Kennet, deceased.

On Tuesday last, the 12th inst. the annual Harveian oration, instituted at Edinburgh, was delivered in the hall of the Public Dispensary by Dr. Webster. The subject was an account of the life, writings, and character of the late Sir John Pringle, Bart. At this annual meeting, the prize given by the Harveian Society, with the view of encouraging experimental enquiries in medicine, was publicly delivered to Mr. Ralph Irving, from Langholm, for the best experimental dissertation on the root of Ipecacuanha. This is the second time Mr. Irving has been successful.

The Highland Society, instituted at Edinburgh in February 1785, the objects of which are the improvement of the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, have offered premiums, in the manner of the Society of Arts and Agriculture in London, for various improvements; but while vassalage remains, what encouragement is there for improvement?

ASSIZE AND COUNTRY NEWS.

The following list of persons, capitally convicted on the respective circuits at the late assizes, exhibits a striking picture of the vice of the present age. The first column of figures shows the number sentenced, and the second those left to execute at each place. Where there is no figure, the number could not be ascertained.

There are 49 convicts under sentence of death in Newgate, and 180 for transportation; and the total number of prisoners in the said gaol is 540.

At Leicester, Abraham Shaw was executed for a burglary; and though but twenty-three years of age, he was a most abandoned and hardened villain. On the morning of his execution, being asked if he had any thing to say before he left the world, he only wished that, instead of one robbery, he had committed a thousand. He sang some lewd songs while in prison, and declared he would do the same at the place of execution; but before he was turned off his meek courage forsook him, and he appeared much convulsed, in which state he launched into eternity, little pined.

Robert Carpenter, some time since a navy agent at Portsmouth, was executed at Winchester gallows, pursuant to his sentence at the last assizes, for forging seamen's wills and powers, in order to defraud them of their wages. He is said to have left a fortune of upwards of 7000*l.* behind him, besides a house superbly furnished at Portsmouth, which, it is said, the sheriff seized on his condemnation. He has left a wife, a very genteel woman, and three children, unprovided for. He died very penitently in sight of a vast number of pitying beholders, many of whom shed tears upon the melancholy occasion. He formerly belonged to Drury Lane Theatre, and was the clown in the pantomimes.

John Wilkinson, and Elizabeth his wife, found guilty at the last Bury assizes of wilfully

fully murdering their youngest daughter, by cruelly beating and starving her to death, were lately executed at Rushmere, near Ipswich. At the place of execution they seemed little affected, particularly the woman, who, when the executioner was going to put the rope about her neck, put him aside, and said she would talk a little longer.

Benj. Cadard Brown, who was lately executed at Hoydam, in Suffex, for a burglary, was, on the contrary, remarkably penitent, and met death with becoming fortitude. He was only twenty-three years of age, a native of Rye, and left a mournful widow with two children.

At Launceston nine criminals were executed pursuant to their sentence. The ropes being put about their necks, and caps being drawn over their faces, Harrison, one of the criminals, to the surprize of all present, turned his cap up again, and begged that the spectators would indulge him by giving ear to a few words which he wished to say. Though there were near ten thousand people, an awful silence took place, and the criminal proceeded. "I am come of a respectable family, and brought up by honest parents; God grant that no one may reflect on them for my misconduct! Let me caution young men to shun the company of bad women: bad women brought on drunkenness; drunkenness, idleness; idleness, poverty; poverty, dishonesty, for which I now suffer an untimely and disgraceful death." Seeing two people laugh, he said, "We are not objects of mirth;" and concluded with hoping, "that his death might prove a warning to all present, and in that hope he should die happy, and not in vain."

At Norwich, William Newland was executed for uttering forged notes of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England. He was the person who went to Yarmouth, and employed some people to go to Ostend and Bruges, to pass a parcel of those notes. Fortunately for the public, the first note offered was detected; and the magistrates of Bruges, much to their honour, delivered up to the solicitor of the Bank, the parties and their notes, in consequence of which the prisoner was convicted.

At Cambridge, Hooper and Ashe, the two malefactors left for execution, were executed accordingly.

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE.

On the 6th of January last the annual festival of the benediction of the waters was solemnized at St. Petersburg, at which an example of toleration was set to other powers, which it would be to the honour of the age in which we live, and to the dignity of human nature, to be every where followed on similar occasions. The Empress's confessor, the prelate Ivan Pastom, made this festival conspicuous, by inviting not only the dignified ecclesiastics of the Russian church, but of all the different denominations of Christians resident at St. Petersburg. Roman Catholic priests, Lutheran preachers, English, Dutch, and German Protestant clergy, were all equally received, and nobly entertained, at the house of this most worthy bishop.

March 31.

Robert Nicholas, and J. Walker Heneage, esq; (in the room of R. Adamson, and C. Westley Cox, the present sitting members) were declared by the Grenville committee duly elected Members for the Borough of Cricklade. At the same time resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee, that the conduct of the returning officer, in taking the poll, and making the return, &c. was partial and illegal, whereby a colourable majority was obtained on the poll for Mr. Adamson and Mr. Cox.

FRIDAY, April 1.

A new aquatic balloon was sunk a little above Westminster Bridge. The inventor was in it. A tube was fixed at the top for air. The balloon drifted with the tide as far as Lambeth Stairs. In the interior two signals were made; the first denoted that all was well; the second, that he wanted immediate assistance; upon which the boatmen who attended instantly hauled up the balloon, and found the man nearly drowned. It seems the water got in, which the inventor hopes to prevent in his next experiment.

This day Mr. and Mrs. Garton, of St. James's Palace, going in their carriage to Streatham, were stopped by two highwaymen, who took from Mr. G. eleven guineas, and a small wafer box, in which were two white silk net purses, richly mounted. On going to Mrs. G. and attempting to rise, she seized the pistol of the rascal, which she held so fast, that, not being able to recover it, the villain fired it at her. The ball grazed her breast, and providentially passed between her and her husband without hurting either, otherwise than by the fright, each thinking the other shot.

Two convicts in Newgate, having cut a hole in the floor of their cell in Newgate, got into the common sewer, to make their escape; but wading there till they were almost suffocated, they at length reached the gully hole, where they cried out for help, and were taken out alive, but too weak to walk, and were carried to their former quarters.

Saturday 2.

About one in the afternoon a fire broke out in the large room at Spring-Garden, Charing-Cross, where an ingenious mechanic was exhibiting Windsor Castle and Mount Vesuvius, cut in cork. In throwing up the lighted rosin, to exhibit the representation of the burning mountain, some of it fell upon a quantity of combustibles, which through carelessness had not been put into their proper place. In an instant the building was in flames, the whole of which was consumed with the two adjacent houses, and the stabling at the back of the building much damaged.

Tuesday 5.

At a general Court of the Directors of the Bank, George Peters, esq; was elected governor, and Edw. Darell, esq; deputy-governor; and the following 24 gentlemen were chosen directors for the year ensuing:

Samuel Beachcroft,	James Maud,
Daniel Booth,	Richard Neave,
Tho. Boddington,	Jos. Nutt,
Lyde Browne,	Is. Osborne,
Thomas Dea,	Edward Payne,
William Ewer,	Christopher Puller,

John Harrison,	Brook Watson,
Breaston Long,	Mark Weyland,
Jos. Mathew,	B. Winthorpe, esqrs.

Wednesday 6.

The sessions began at the Old-Bailey, when, among other felons, the noted George Barrington was tried for larceny, in stealing a gold watch in the pit passage of Drury-Lane, the property of Mr. Bagshaw. Mr. Bagshaw missed his watch, saw Barrington behind him, and charged him with it. "I, your watch!" said he, and held up his hand with the palm downwards: that instant he heard a glass break, and stooping picked up his watch, and secured the prisoner. Another witness heard the watch drop, but could not tell from whom it fell; but the prosecutor was positive it must be from the prisoner.

This was the whole of the evidence, and the judge called upon the prisoner to make his defence, which he did in so matterly a manner as astonished the whole court.

Baron Eyre, in his charge to the jury, could not help lamenting, that a man of such abilities should stand in such a situation, and left it to the jury to judge by the evidence; hoping only, that if they did acquit him, it would be the last time they should see him in that place.

Saturday 9.

Among the felons convicted this day at the Old-Bailey, was the noted Mary Pile, otherwise Davis (see vol. LIV. p. 553) a young woman in man's apparel, for stealing a guinea, the property of Abraham Abbot, in the house of William Webb, where she came, habited as above, personating a weary traveller, and requesting lodging for the night; and there being no convenience but in Abbot's bed, he gave her leave to sleep with him, supposing her a decent young man; but in the morning he found his pockets stripped.

A fire broke out in the house of the Hon. Edwin Stanhope, Esq. in Curzon-street, May-fair, and raged with such violence, that not a single article of plate, jewels, or furniture, could be saved. Lady Stanhope's life was with difficulty saved, being taken out of bed by her servants wrapped up in a blanket. On strict enquiry into the cause, suspicion fell upon one of her ladyship's footmen, named Peter Shaw, and the most positive proofs of his guilt have since been discovered. It came out, on examination, that this fellow, who had lived with Mr. Stanhope but three weeks, had robbed him of medals, watches, rings, and jewels, to a considerable amount, some of which he had sold to a jeweller in Westminster. Shaw confessed the robbery, but denied his having set fire to the house, of which however there is little doubt.

A lady at this fire is said to have exhibited an example of maternal tenderness that does honour to her sex; for, having narrowly escaped the flames herself, and missing her child, she was restrained only by superior force from rushing back in a vain attempt to save it; and though told her infant was safe, nothing could pacify her till it was produced, when she clasped it in her arms, and, for the moment, seemingly rejoiced, regardless of every thing else about her.

The same evening a fire broke out at a subscription house in St. James's Street, adjoining to the Thatched-house Tavern, and entirely consumed the same before any water could be got to extinguish the flames. The Thatched house Tavern was much damaged, and narrowly escaped the same fate. As the fire burnt fiercely backwards, the clerks at the Secretary of States Office in Cleveland-Row began securing the papers of consequence; but happily, when water was procured in plenty, the engines soon extinguished the flames. The fire is said to have begun in the upper part of the house, by the negligence or malice of a servant boy.

Monday 11.

Mr. Pitt, preparatory to his grand scheme of applying a million annually towards a Sinking Fund for the Payment of the national debt, gave so favourable an account of the produce of the taxes last year, and the increase of the revenue, as to give ground to hope that the loan wanted for the supplies of the present year will be very trifling; and in order to ground what he said on the most solid foundation, ordered a comparative statement of all the taxes of the two last years to be laid before the House.

At a Court of Directors of the East India Company, "Resolved unanimously, that, in consideration of the steady exertions of George Leonard Staunton, Esq. and the abilities he displayed in the trusts reposed in him by the Select Committee of Fort St. George during the government of lord Macartney; and more particularly in the Negotiations carried on with the Marquis de Bussy and Tippoo Sulran, in all of which he acted without emolument or reward of any kind; Resolved, That Mr. Staunton be allowed 500l. per ann. during his life; to commence from the 1st of March, 1784, being the day on which the peace was signed with Tippoo Sultan; and that he be permitted to proceed to Bengal as Secretary to Lord Macartney, on entering into the same covenants as he did formerly in going with his lordship to Fort St. George.

William Higson was brought out of Newgate, and executed facing the debtors door, for the wilful murder of Joseph his son, by repeated ill-treatment, beating and striking him on the head with a poker. At the place of execution he seemed very penitent, and acknowledged the justice of his sentence. After he had hung the usual time the body was taken down, and carried to Surgeons Hall to be anatomized.

Some labourers, in digging a slope on the edge of a pond, near the Paper Mill, at Swarton, the property of Mr. Vowell, in casting up the earth, they cast up, in Portugal and other gold, money to the amount of 800l. besides a rough diamond of considerable value. It is well known that a person of property drowned herself in that pond; and it is supposed, previous to the fatal act, she had buried her money by the side of it.

The same morning early a fire broke out at the Coach and Horses, St. John's Square, Clerkenwell; by which, in less than an hour, the house was reduced to ashes, and the adjoining buildings on both sides almost miraculously preserved, being separated only by narrow passages, and chiefly constructed by timber.

Tuesday 12.

The session at the Old Bailey, which began on Wednesday last, ended, when eight convicts received sentence of death.

A man was committed to Newgate for a new crime, that of fraudulently taking off certain stamps from obsolete writs, and fixing them on other writs, denoting the duty to be paid.

Three villains, in the dead of the night, broke into the house of a widow lady at Paddington, entered her room, and with horrid oaths demanded her keys, and where she kept her bank notes. Being told she had none, they ransacked the house, and then robbed it of plate, money, and every thing of value that was portable, with which they made their escape.

Wednesday 13.

At a General Court of Proprietors for the election of six Directors of the East India Company, in the room of the six that went out by rotation, on casting up the poll, the numbers were as follow: for

George Cuming	690	Thos. Fitzhugh	611
John Roberts	690	John Scott	548
Lionel Darrel	675	John Travers	460
Jacob Bafanquet	671	Ric. Mendham	202
John Thompson	649	Richard Wyatt	61
Thomas Cheap	617

The first six were elected.

For WILLIAM MELLISH, Esq. Rec. Gen. T. MILLS.

The Lord Chancellor received from his Majesty's own hands, at St. James's, the Great Seal, newly engraved by Mr. Major's the temporary Great Seal, which the day after the robbery (see vol. LIII.) was cast in copper, was, at the same time, delivered to his Majesty, and defaced in his presence.

Saturday 16.

This day were put up to auction at Mr. Christie's the following reserved articles of the valuable collection of C. Locke, esq. The Discobolos, or antique statue of a player at coits, from the Mussini collection at Rome; his right hand extended, having delivered one, his left holding a second ready to throw; was bought in for 550 guineas; as was an intaglia, on a sardonyx, of Hercules and the Nemean lion, for 135l. Four sides of an altar charged with reliefs, two of which had been engraved by Bartolozzi, were sold for 27l. 6s. A volume of coloured drawings by P. Bartoli, after antique paintings in tombs and other monuments mentioned by Mr. Wright (Travels, p. 317), the Vatican Terence, &c. for 20 guineas, being the second vol. of that bought by Dr. Mead, and reserved by his heirs.

Monday 18.

Mr. Pitt rose, and, after one of the most admired speeches of the present session, moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend the representation of the people in England. But England is not yet ripe for amendment. The motion was lost by a majority of 74. viz. Ayes 174, Noes 248.

Tuesday 19.

The Earl of Leven was appointed his Majesty's High Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland.

About four o'clock in the afternoon the inhabitants of Chippenham were agreeably surprized by the appearance of a balloon hovering over that town, which had been launched at Bristol about two the same day, with Mr. Dicker, jun. in a gallery to conduct it. The wind was boisterous, and tossed the balloon like a football; sometimes close to the ground, and then in an instant high in the air; so that the young navigator had but a rough voyage, and was not in a humour to make many nautical observations. However, he fortunately landed safe near the town, and was presently surrounded by a company of horsemen, who conducted him to Chippenham, amidst the acclamations of a numerous croud of people, who had suddenly got together on so singular an occasion.

Wednesday 20.

Came on the election of the chemical professor to the university of Oxford, when, on casting up the poll, there appeared for

Dr. Wall 196,

Dr. Vivian 194.

Upon which the former was declared duly elected.

Friday 22.

The sum of 200,000*l.* in new guineas and half guineas, of the date of the present year, was conveyed from the Mint to the Bank under a proper guard. On this occasion, Beware of counterfeits, for such there will be abroad.

During the sitting of the court of King's Bench in Westminster-Hall, the sky-light over the court was by some accident broken, and the glass, with some rubbish, fell among the judges, which, on the sudden, put the whole court in disorder. In the first surprize, it was feared that part of the roof had given way, and the panic spread as rapidly as if the hall had been on fire. By every one pressing to get out, some were hurt, but none materially; and the affair has since furnished a laughable subject for the wits, who have not failed to make the most of it.

Between nine and ten at night six men, disguised and armed, broke into the house of Mr. Copley, on Lavender-Hill, Battersea-Rise, and, after confining the family, robbed the house of money and plate to a considerable value. One of the servants, making some resistance, was wounded with a cut-throat.

Saturday 23.

This day being St. George's day, and the anniversary of the Society of Antiquaries, after a contest of four hours for the chair, such as was never known before, and it is hoped, for the honour and interest of so respectable a body, will never happen again, the Earl of Leicester was re-elected President by a decided majority.

N. B. Those marked with an asterisk were the Council returned; so that it appears that 25 of Mr. King's list were returned. Mr. King did not offer himself to be elected as President, nor was understood to have any intention to do so, till by some particular circumstances he was induced to take that step on the day of election; and during the course of the election it was determined, by the Old Council, that a single mark on the list against the Earl of Leicester's name should be interpreted to be a double vote, both to elect his Lordship on the Council, and also as President: in consequence of which, all the annual votes were turned against Mr. King, and also all those where on the lists by mistake the officers were omitted at the end of the lists.  Mr. King 37
 Director, R. Gough, Esq.
 Secretaries, { W. Norris, M. A.
 { J. Brand, M. A.

A Correspondent, on reading in the Public Advertiser the above state of the ballot, observes, that there manifestly appears to be two or three errors; for that the putting down the names of those that were double-listed, prevents the matter appearing so clear as it ought to do. Mr. King, it is true, had fifteen out of twenty-one: but as Lord Harcourt and Mr. Astle, and all the officers, were in both lists, it requires some consideration to understand properly the event. It may soon be understood, however, by leaving them out in drawing the conclusion: for then it will appear, that of the new members brought in on the new council, Lord Leicester brought in three only, whereas Mr. King brought in six, which is exactly two to one. Mr. Jackson, who was put down on Mr. King's list as chosen, was not elected; and there was also another error, which arose probably on the casting up of the poll; for it appears clearly, upon mathematical calculation, that there could be but 104 who voted in all, and therefore Mr. Astle's number 108, and Mr. Norris's number 106, must both have been mistakes, though of no consequence. Public Advertiser.

Sunday 24.

Near twelve at night a poor watchman was gored to death by a mad ox in Fleet-Market, and expired in great agonies.—What pity, that the emoluments of the City should be a bar to the removal of such a nuisance as Smithfield from the inhabited part of the town!

Monday 25.

A board of general and flag officers, convened by his Majesty's express command, in order to inspect into the new fortifications now erecting at Portsmouth and Plymouth, and to report the same, to be laid before parliament, assembled this day at the Fountain-Head, at Portsmouth, and are forthwith to proceed with their survey. The board is to consist of a president (Duke of Richmond), three generals, ten lieutenant-generals, and seven major-generals, for the land department. And six admirals, and six captains, members of parliament, for the naval department.

The following bills received the royal assent by commission. The Militia Pay and Cloathing Bill; two Exchequer Loan-Bills; the Justices Essoign Bill; and several Inclosure and Road Bills.

And this day the exhibition of the Royal Academy was opened for the present year.

Tuesday 26.

John Thompson, a house-breaker, was taken out of Newgate, and hanged before the Debtors' door. He broke into the house of Mr. Wells, in Thames-Street, and stole Mrs. Wells most cruelly.

Thursday 28.

This day a most lamentable spectacle was exhibited to an innumerable multitude of their wretched fraternity, who were assembled from all quarters on the occasion, viz. Nineteen of their fellow-labourers hanged up like dogs, for crimes committed against the laws of their country, which no punishment will prevent, while common-furrows are permitted, at all hours, and in all places, to stroll the streets, to entice youth, to intoxicate them in vice, and deprave their morals. It would be happy for this country, were we as ready to adopt good regulations from abroad, as bad fashions. Prostitutes are there made subservient to the purposes of the state.

Saturday 30.

An epidemic disorder, the natural consequence of the bad air from the stagnated lakes, formed by the earthquakes in Calabria, continues to afflict and depopulate that unhappy province; nor is the earth there totally free from tremors. Gaz.

On the arrival of the news of the celebration of the marriage of the Infant Don Juan of Portugal with the Infanta of Spain, at the court of Portugal, orders were immediately given for three days illuminations and gala; and the ambassadors and foreign ministers were admitted to pay their compliments to her most faithful majesty on the occasion. Gaz.

The merchants of Corke, having received information that, from so long a continuance of easterly winds, many homeward-bound vessels from America and the West Indies were then near that coast, unable to make the land, and in great want of the necessaries of life, did, at their own expence, dispatch a fast-sailing cutter to cruise off Cape Clear, laden with bread, water, beef, pork, and likewise fresh provisions, &c. in order to administer immediate relief to such as might be found in need thereof. The management of this expedition was entrusted to a confidential person, who went as Supercargo, and was directed to relieve whoever he might meet with in distress, no matter to what country they belong, or whither they are bound. He had it also in particular charge, not to accept the smallest return for what assistance he might happily afford, as the gentlemen who promoted this undertaking considered themselves amply rewarded by the pleasure which results from so benevolent an action. This humane idea was no sooner suggested than, in order to carry it into immediate effect, a most liberal subscription was filled up with alacrity.—The above noble instance of disinterested generosity does honour to the character of the Irish nation, and shows how worthy they are to be made partakers of every mercantile mercantile advantage to which their connection with this country entitles them.

The duel between Lord Macartney and Mr. Sadleir, which was at first thought unfounded, appears to have been a serious business. They, with their seconds, Mr. Davidson and Major Grattan, took their ground about seven in the morning on the 24th of September, 1784. The distance marked by the seconds was ten paces. The lot to fire first fell to Mr. Sadleir, who firing accordingly, the ball struck Lord Macartney on the ribs of the left side, which was not known to the seconds till after his Lordship had likewise fired without effect. It had been previously agreed between the seconds, after the first fire, if no material execution had been done, to interpose their good offices to effect a reconciliation. This they were about to do, when it was discovered that Lord Macartney had been wounded. When the previous agreement was told to Lord Macartney, and he was asked his sentiments, his answer was, That he came there to give Mr. Sadleir satisfaction, and he was still ready so to do. And Mr. Sadleir being told that Lord Macartney was wounded, and that in the present circumstances the affair could not honourably be pursued any farther, he acquiesced, and declared that he was satisfied. And thus the affair ended.

A most interesting event to literature has lately taken place in France, by the nomination of eight members of the Academy of Inscriptions, who are to receive pay, and in proportion as they drop off be replaced by others of the same illustrious body, for the purpose of examining the MSS. in the French King's Library, and from time to time publishing either extracts from, or the whole of such as shall appear to deserve it. Two of these gentlemen are to examine the Oriental MSS. three of them the Greek and Latin; and three of them those relating to the history of France and Antiquities of the Middle Ages. The King also exhorts the other members of the Academy to take a part in the work; and he desires the other learned men in the capital and provinces to draw forth what treasures they may find in the several libraries to which they have access. In proportion as progress is made in the work, it will be laid before a deputation of the Academy and published in volumes, which will henceforth be considered as making part of the history of the Academy of Inscriptions.

The first eight Academicians named, are Messrs. de Guignes, de Brequigny, Guillard, du Teil, Keralo, Vanvillier, Abbe Brotier and Mr. Villoison, who spends the winter in the island of the Archipelago, and then proceeds to Mount Athos.

Such are the advances made in Literature in France.

MEMORANDA.

In the course of the lambing season this present year, two ewes, belonging to Mr. Boys, of Ashcomb, near Lewes, in Sussex, yeaned each of them two lambs, one of each perfect, the other preternatural. One had eight perfect legs, six of which were fore-legs; the other preternatural lamb had but one eye, placed exactly in the center of the forehead. The preternatural lambs died, but the perfect lambs were both living when this account was received.

DISCOVERIES.

At Palermo a catacomb was lately discovered, like to those of Rome, Naples, and Syracuse, the extent of which has not yet been traced. In the cavern several passages have been found intersected by others, each receiving light from apertures cut through the solid rock; and in the lateral passages are niches, in which skulls and various fragments of human bones have been found deposited; of which a more particular account may soon be expected.

A more valuable discovery was made on the 13th of April instant, by some workmen, in clearing a well in the garden of Farmer Le Boutelier, in Jersey, where, on the stone-work at the side giving way, they found four pots strongly cemented, full of ancient coins, gold and silver medals, and, what was thought extraordinary, a number of brass rings, with the name EDWARDS round them, were found at the same time.

Capt. Gilles, of the Three Brothers, belonging to Belfast, on his voyage home from America, discovered an island or large rock, in lat. $57^{\circ} 25'$ off Tarry Island, on the N. W. coast of Ireland, and about 65 leagues distant from it. A range of sunken rocks branches from it to the Eastward, which is very dangerous. Q. Whether this is not the same visionary story revived, of an island said to be seen some years ago, searched for, but never found?

Mr. Swindell, an engineer, at Stockport, in Yorkshire, has invented a machine for spinning wool, which finishes on each spindle three lays of 30 hanks to the pound in one hour.

A new experiment was last month tried, in the presence of the Emperor, by the Baron De Born, for the separation of gold and silver from the mineral, in which they were incorporated: mercury is the agent; and the experiment was made on 25 quintals of silvery mineral, from which was extracted, in the space of twenty hours, as much silver as would have been obtained in six weeks by the usual process of fusion.

The learned Dr. Hind has lately made trial of a medicine which has effectually removed the gout from the stomach in five different patients. The medicine is the vitriolic ether, a tea-spoonful of which Dr. Hind gives in an ounce of camphorated julep, with half an ounce of pepper-mint-water.

Another valuable discovery in the medicinal clinal sine has lately been made. It consists in a styptic solution, which immediately stops all kind of hæmorrhages, or bleedings, either from the veins or arteries, however they may be lacerated, of which several of the most eminent medical gentlemen have been witnesses.

Some trials of the effects of the Digitalis Purpurea, or Fox Glove, have likewise been made in dropical persons, at Edinburgh, and at the Westminster Infirmary; and it has been found a powerful diuretic; the dose of the decoction from one spoonful to four, two or three times a day. The decoction is made by boiling 4 ounces of the leaves in a quart of water till it comes to a pint.

A sheep, the property of Thomas Hall, of Fouldry House, was lately, March 10, taken alive out of a pit, in which it had been buried under the snow for thirteen weeks and four days. It died soon after being exposed to the air, and was so much wasted for want of food, that the whole carcase weighed but 8 pounds.

OBSERVATIONS OF THE WEATHER.

Warsaw, March 12. The result of the observations made upon the cold since the year 1776, in the Royal Observatory in this city, are as follow, viz. in 1776, on the coldest day, the thermometer of Reaumur was at 21 degrees; in 1777, at 17; in 1778, at 16; in 1779, at 18½; in 1780, at 16½; in 1781, at 17; in 1782, the same in 1783, at 19½; and in 1784, although the cold was universally severe, the thermometer was only at 17 degrees; and on the 28th of Feb. this year it was at 2½ degrees; our accounts from Petersburg mention, that on that day the thermometer was at 30 degrees.

Naples, March 8. All our neighbouring mountains are deeply covered with snow, and that of Somma affords a very singular spectacle, consisting of the burning lava issuing from the mountain, and melting the snow it encounters; in many parts torrents of fire and water are seen, intersecting each other in a variety of directions, amidst the white and glittering congelations with which the face of the country is overspread.

Elfinore, March 26. The ice still remains in the Sound, so that the people are continuing to walk to and from Sweden on the ice. There is intelligence of some ships being in the Cattagat at present. There have been in sight of Hörnbeck, two days ago, six ships, but since drove away with the ice; at the same place (which is six English miles below our castle) there were found some pieces of a wreck, supposed to be a Dutch ship.

London, April 2. The winter season, to date is from the first fall of snow on the 7th of October last, to that which fell this day, has lasted 177 days. And if we except a about 12 days towards the latter end of January, the whole of this period has been frosty or snowy, or both. Such another instance has not occurred in this island in the memory of man. The frost too has been more intense.

Friburg, March 10. The Rhine is now so low at Klausenberg, that the rocks at the bottom of the river are entirely uncovered; an event which has not happened for many years past. An inscription, engraven on ascertains the date.

The heat at Mesulapatam in the East Indies last summer was very uncommon and extraordinary. The thermometer was up at 109, and at Ellone rose to the astonishing height of 120 out of the sun.

The last Will and Testament of CHARLES LEE, Esq. late Major-General in the American Army

“ I Major-General Charles Lee, of the country of Berkley, in the commonwealth of Virginia, being in perfect health, and a sound mind, considering the certainty of death, and the uncertainty of the time it may happen, have determined to make this my last will and testament in manner following;—That is to say, I give and bequeath to A. W. Esq. one hundred guineas, in consideration of the zeal and integrity he has displayed in the administration of my affairs; also the choice of any two of my colts and fillies under four years of age. Item, I give and bequeath to C. M. T. Esq. fifty guineas, in consideration of his good qualities, and of the friendship he has manifested for me; and to B. T. his son, I leave all my books, as I know he will make a good use of them. To my good friend J. M. Esq. of Marlborough, in Virginia, I give and bequeath the choice of two brood mares, of all my swords and pistols, and ten guineas to buy a ring. I would give him more, but as he has a good estate, and a better genius, he has sufficient if he knows how to make a good use of them. I give and bequeath to my former Aid-de-Camp, O. B. Esq. the choice of another brood mare, and ten guineas for the same purpose of a remembrance ring. I give and bequeath to my worthy friend Col. W. G. of Dumfries, the second choice of two colts; and to my excellent friend W. S. of Virginia, I would leave a great deal; but as he is now so rich, it would be no less than robbing my other friends who are poor; I therefore intreat he will only accept of five guineas, to purchase him a ring of affection. I bequeath to my old and faithful servant, or rather humble friend, Giuseppe Minghini, three hundred guineas, with all my hories, mares, and colts, of every kind, those above-mentioned only excepted; likewise all my wearing apparel and plate, my waggons and tools of agriculture, and his choice of four milch cows. I give and bequeath to Elizabeth

Dun,

Dunn, my house-keeper, one hundred guineas, and my whole flock of catle, the four milch cows above mentioned only excepted. I had almost forgot my dear friends (and I ought to be ashamed of it) Mrs. S. her son T. S.; T. L. Esq. of Belviere; I beg they will except ten guineas each, to buy rings of affection.

"My landed estate in Berkely I desire may be divided in three equal parts, according to the quantity; one third part I devise to my dear friend, J. M. of Philadelphia; one other third part to E. E. both my former Aid-de-Camps, and to their heirs and assigns; the other third part I devise to F. O. at present of Philadelphia, and to W. G. of Baltimore, to whom I am under obligations, and to their heirs and assigns, to be equally divided between them: But these devisees are not to enter until they have paid off the several legacies above mentioned, and all taxes which may be due on my estate. In case I should sell my said landed estate, I bequeath the price thereof (after paying the aforesaid legacies) to the said J. M. E. E. F. O. in proportion above-mentioned. All my slaves of which I may be possessed at the time of my decease, I bequeath to Guisippe Minghini, and Elizabeth Dunn, to be equally divided between them. All my other property of every kind, and in every part of the world (after all my debts, funeral charges, and necessary expences of administrations are paid) I give and bequeath to my sister S. L. her heirs and assigns. And I do appoint the above-named A. W. and C. M. T. executors of this my last Will and Testament, and do revoke all former and other wills by me heretofore made.

"I desire most earnestly that I may not be buried in any church or church-yard, or within a mile of any Presbyterian or Anabaptist meeting-house; for, since I resided in this country, I have kept so much bad company when living, that I do not choose to continue it while dead.

"I recommend my soul to the Creator of all worlds and all creatures, who must from his visible attributes be indifferent to their modes of worship or creeds, whether Christians, Mahometans, or Jews; whether instilled by education or taken up by reflection; whether more or less absurd, as a weak mortal can no more be answerable for his persuasions, notions, or even scepticism in religion, than for the colour of his skin.

"In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this day of

in the year of our Lord
CHARLES LEE." (L.S.)

Signed, sealed, published, and declared, by the said
Major General CHAR.
LEE, as and for his last Will and Testament, in the presence of J. S. S. S.

MR. URBAN, Walton, near Liverpool.
MY thanks are justly due for E. N's letter in answer to the Queries about gravelled roads.

A clergyman, in conversation a few days since, mentioned, that it was a custom in Ireland to mix lime among their gravel, which contributed greatly to facilitate the road cementing into hardness; but could not give any further particulars. The writer of this would be further obliged, if any of your correspondents could inform him whether this custom has been practised any where in this kingdom; and if it has, where? the mode how? with the usual quantity laid on, &c. &c. Any further particulars would be gratefully received by

IT is well known that an oblique section of a cone, whose base is a circle, will be an ellipsis; and indeed it is only the properties of that cone that has yet been attended to: I should therefore be pleased to see from some of your mathematical correspondents a geometrical (not algebraical) method to find that section on a cone, whose base is an ellipsis that will be a complete circle. B. R.

On the 30th of November last (see Vol. LIV. p. 957.) died at Hints, co. Stafford, at the advanced age of 83, Mrs. Dorothy Chadwick, of New-Hall, in Warwickshire, a maiden lady, who lived upon an annuity of only 65 pounds till her 78th year, when, by the death of her brother Charles Chadwick Sacheverell, Esq; she unexpectedly became possessed of considerable landed property in the counties of Stafford, Warwick, and Derby, besides a handsome personal estate. She was the youngest daughter of the late Charles Chadwick, Esq; of Mave-syn Ridware (who was high-sheriff for Staffordshire in the year 1719), and of Dorothy his wife, the daughter of Sir Thomas Dolman, Knt. of Shaw-House, Berks. The death of this good old lady was occasioned by a shocking accident which befel her whilst she was alone, charitably employed at her bureau in counting over a hundred pounds as a present to the Poor!—Leaning too near the candle (on account probably of the little weakness she had in one eye), her cap unfortunately took fire, and though she tore off the whole of her head-dress, the flames communicated farther, and unhappily spread over her: in this horrid situation a servant, who happened at last to hear her cries, found her fallen upon the floor, and came but just time enough to save her from instant death; yet was she burnt in so dreadful a manner, that, notwithstanding an uncommon strength of constitution, after languishing twelve days in that miserable state, nature became exhausted: she bore her misfortune, however, with uncommon fortitude, and at last expired without a groan.

Capt. John Brett, senior captain of the royal navy, 1741. He was one of Lord Anson's lieutenants in his voyage round the world; and has been mentioned, in our vol. LI. as translator of the "Essays of Father Feyjoc."

At his house near Ilington, Dr. Messier, a man of distinguished literary abilities and great medical knowledge.

Suddenly, at Hinterlappung, in Switzerland, Mr. Diderot, one of the greatest mathematicians of the age. His kinsman, the Sieur Diderot, who was librarian to the Empress of Russia, also died suddenly about a twelvemonth ago.

At Leyden, the celebrated Dr. Lewis Gaspard Valkenaer. He is succeeded in the professorship of Greek literature and Belgic history, by Mr. John Luzac, one of the writers of the French Leyden Gazette. In

In Picardy, a very extraordinary character, of the name of Crequi de Canape, who was possessed of a good fortune, and lived the life of a cynick in the country upon his own estate; he wore a long beard, and dressed in the Greek manner; he usually lived in a pavilion which turned upon a pivot, and thus he could receive the light and air in what direction he liked; he had some knowledge of mechanicks having some years ago invented two vessels which were navigated with one sail, and one person was sufficient to manage them; in these he has been seen sail in the channel several times. About the year 1764 he took a pride in being always attended by two domesticks handsomely dressed. This singular man was buried in his garden, because on his death-bed he refused spiritual assistance; but his friends wished him to be allowed funeral honours in his parish church, and have brought the affair before the parliament of Paris.

At Madrid, M. Musquiz, formerly a minister of the finances of Spain. This gentleman, who was eighteen years minister of the finances, and four years secretary at war, has left only about 200,000 livres (about 10,000 l.) behind him, with four children to provide for.

Feb. . . Mr. Benjamin Field, stockbroker, many years a hofier in Grace-church-str.

March . . . Rev. Thomas Bray, D.D. rector of Exeter-college, Oxford, canon of Windsor, rector of Bixbrand, in Oxfordshire, and of Dunsfold, in Surrey. In the earlier part of his life he took an active part in the famous Oxfordshire election in 1754, for which he was rewarded by Lord Macclesfield with the rectory of Bixbrand (commonly called Bix). When the late lord Harcourt was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, he was made one of his chaplains, but did not accompany him. His lordship gave him the deanery of Raphoe in that kingdom; but being a bachelor, and not young, in 1774 he exchanged it with Dr. King, for a canonry of Windsor and the rectory of Dunsfold, though of less value; which preferments Dr. King had obtained as chaplain to the house of commons, whilst the present lord Grantley was speaker. If ancient laws and rules were not observed in Exeter-college, it was not for want of example in the rector, who adhered to them himself, without being morosely severe to those, who being born in later times, could not so easily accommodate themselves to the customs of former days. He was descended from a Cornish family, and when he was grown rich had a coat of arms painted for him, but said, he did not know whether any of his family had borne one.

11. At Greenwich, the wife of Mr. Oliver.

17. At Edmonton, Mrs. Tatam.

At Bath, Mr. Croft, many years an eminent brewer in Westminster, in partnership with the late Messrs. Benson and Byfield.

In St. Mary Axe, Mr. Smith, merchant.

17. Mr. Peter Maber, of Evershot, in Dorsetshire, having acted with uncommon fidelity, integrity, and firmness, through a life of more than eighty-eight years, retreated from this state to a happier scene of existence. He was steward to the late Thomas Hollis, esq; and his successor, for many years, and continued such to the last; approved and esteemed by all who knew him. Having in the younger part of his life passed some years on the continent, he acquired the French and Latin languages; and his ideas of men and things were enlarged and extended, as his strong natural parts were improved, by observations, which he brought into practice. His perseverance and steadiness, in never relinquishing the plain strait road of rectitude, made him respected by those who considered his character; but to the artful and interested he was obnoxious, as they could not bend him to their base purposes, and therefore they unjustly reproached him. He regarded it not, but as idle air, and went on his way propositi tenax.—He was a dissenter on a large plan, and from the best of principles, the right of private judgment in matters of religion. He was also a zealous and uniform friend to the civil rights of mankind in general, and a real lover of his country and its genuine constitution. Lamenting the degeneracy of these times, when all love of the public seems swallowed up and lost in effeminacy, luxury, and dissipation, he was full of the same spirit which possessed his father, when he opposed James II. and, in similar circumstances, would have acted the like part. The loss of such a citizen is to be lamented at all times, but more especially in the present, when the necessities of the age require such men; and few such are to be found.

20. In Tooker's-court, Chancery-lane, W. Sykes, esq; jun. nephew of Sir Francis S.

21. At Scarborough, aged 100, Richard Spencer.

23. In his 70th year, the rev. Mr. Richard Chase, rector of Ilketshall, Suffolk, and of Ellingham, and Hempstead, with Ledingham, in Norfolk.

Anne Simms, at Studley Green, co. Wilts, in her 113th year. Till within a few months of her death, she was able to walk to and from the seat of the Marquess of Landown, near three miles from Studley. She had been, and continued, till upwards of 100 years of age, the most noted poacher in that part of the country; and frequently boasted of selling to gentlemen the fish taken out of their own ponds. Her coffin and shroud she had purchased, and kept in her apartment more than 20 years.

24. At Bath, aged 43, Sir Patrick Houston, of Houston, bart.

26. Mr. Carnan, printer of the Reading Mercury.

Rev. Mr. Coles, rector of Bridgewater.

In an advanced age, the rev. Mr. John Goddard, rector of Kympton and S. Traworth.

At Cropedy, Oxfordsh. the rev. John Hopkins, M.A. aged 69, formerly fellow of Pembroke college, Oxford. He had been vicar of that parish above 26 years, but was prevented wanted from doing the duties of it for a considerable time before his death.

At Paris, Charles-Paul-Sigismond-Montmorency Luxembourg, Duc de Bouteville, first baron and first Christian baron of France, lieutenant-general in the king's service.

27. Mrs. Gambier, wife of James G. esq; admiral of the blue.

28. Mrs. Lewis, relict of Thomas L. esq; many years M.P. for the county of Radnor, and daughter and coheir of Sir Nathan Wright, by Margaret, daughter of Sir Francis Lawley.

30. At his house on Maize-hill, Greenwich, Samuel Roycroft, esq; aged 92.

Mr. Hall, assistant-groom of the wine-cellar at St. James's.

On St. Bennet's-hill, Doctors' Commons, Mr. Creek, who for many years kept the Sun tavern and eating-house in Foster-lane.

31. At Ilkworth, aged 74, the hon. Mary Fane, countess de Salis, daughter of the first, and sister and coheir of the late Lord Viscount Fane, and wife of Jerome de Salis, Count of the Holy Roman empire.

In Dover-street, Miss Harriet de Salis, only child of the rev. Dr. de Salis.

In Burr-street, aged 79, Henry Tisdale, esq; many years a commander in the Straits trade.

At Greenwich, Brigadier-general Browne.

At Bromley, in Kent, Henry Savage, esq; many years a director of the E. I. C. but had lately declined all public business. He was a man of clear sound understanding, and critical observation; of unblemished integrity, steady and zealous in his attachments to his friends; and, from an uniform benevolence of heart, frequently contributed to the relief and comfort of the indigent. During a lingering illness, conscious almost from the beginning that it would terminate in his dissolution, he preserved a calmness and fortitude, and discovered a resignation of mind, which shewed how well he was prepared for the awful change which he saw approaching.

We have to add to this just character of Mr. Savage, that he was one of the oldest servants of the East India Company, whose interests he never abandoned. He entered into the service at an early period of life, and after 24 years residence in India, during which time he was employed in several very critical and important troops, he returned, about the year 1754, with a well-earned competency, which, though chosen a director soon after his arrival, and continued in the direction near 30 years, he was very far from improving. His sole view of interest was the interest of the Company; his friends were the friends of the Company; and whenever he discovered a different disposition in those with whom he was accustomed to act (and no man had a quicker discernment) his private attachments never interfered with his public duties. In his conduct he was manly, open, and direct. Craft, in obtaining the end he had in view, he abhorred. He was by nature friendly, and his patronage was the patronage of the heart. His love of children was a remarkable trait in his character, and subjected him to much inconvenience. Those with whom he had been intimate abroad, were frequently pressing him to accept the guardianship of their sons; and he was seldom without one or more from different countries, whose education he superintended, and whose behaviour did not always require his care. In the times of their vacation from school, they were with him as with a father and a monitor; and he was an example to youth, with whom they could not live without profiting. In his behaviour he never put off the gentleman. He was remarkably well-bred, free and easy in conversation, and happy in a clear and ready delivery. He was well made, and of a commanding address. When Chief of the Company's factory in Persia, he was present at the triumphal entry of the tyrant Koulî Khan into Isfahan, fraught with all the riches of the Mogul empire, which he had just conquered, amounting, as it was computed, to 230 millions sterling. His courage was at that time put to the severest trial. He was to assume the character of the representative of the Sovereign of the British empire, and he maintained it with dignity. When the guards who surrounded the pavilion of the Schach, of whom there were three ranks, demanded his sword, he peremptorily refused to deliver it. Message after message was dispatched to the tyrant, and Mr. S. every moment expected an order for his head; but he remained firm. His highness, he said, might command his life; but he was entrusted with the honour of his country, which nothing should force him to surrender. He was at length admitted to an audience, and graciously received. When chief at Gombroon, he defended his factory from the plunder of the Persian troops, who were sent to collect the tribute; and in every enterprize in which he was engaged he did honour to the character he bore.

Before his death, though a lover of society, he lived retired (owing to a drafness that had been long coming on), and was only accessible to a few select friends. He was first seized with a sudden stroke of which he soon recovered, but being sensible he could not long survive, he calmly settled his affairs. About a fortnight before he died he took to his bed, but continued cheerful at times, and sensible to the last; and as Shakspeare expresses it,

Nothing in his life
Became him like the leaving it; he died
As one that had been studied in his death,
To throw away the dearest thing he ow'd,
As 'twere a careless trifle.

April 1. At Edgware, in Middlesex, Mr. Richard Fuller, aged 100 years.

2. Of a consumption, in her 10th year, Miss Emma Mawbey, dau. of Sir Joseph M.

11. At Chelmsford, Essex, John Bullen, esq; formerly a miller there, but had retired from business. He has left to his only brother, Matthew Bullen, a blacksmith at Great Waltham, a legacy of 10,000l.

Lady Aldborough. As she was preparing to set out for London, her ladyship was seized with a fit which brought on an apoplexy; and notwithstanding every assistance given, and having been let blood near twenty ounces, she expired in his lordship's arms. Her ladyship was grand-daughter to Thomas earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, lord high admiral of Great Britain, and lord-lieutenant of Ireland, whose secretary was the celebrated Mr. Addison. She was sole heiress to the late hon. Nicholas Herbert, of Great Glemham, and member for Wihon, by his lady Anne, co-heiress to the late Dudley North, esq; of Glemham-hall, in the county of Suffolk.

14. At his apartments in Charles-street, William Whitehead, esq; poet laureat, register and secretary of the knights companions of the most honourable order of the Bath, author of the Roman Father, 1750; Fatal Constancy, 1753; Creusa, Queen of Athens, 1754; the School for Lovers, 1762; a Trip to Scotland, 1770; &c. &c. This gentleman, the son of a tradesman in the town of Cambridge, was M.A. and a fellow of Clare-hall, till the statutes required him to take orders. He accompanied the viscounts Nuneham and Villiers, the present earls of Harcourt and Jersey, in their travels during the years 1754, 1755, and 1756. In 1757 he was appointed poet laureat on the death of Colley Cibber. His works were, in 1774, collected into two volumes 8vo. His odes, as poet laureat, have been regularly inserted in our volumes.

15. In Old Burlington-str. Sir John Dyke Ackland, bart. He is succeeded in the title, and part of the estate, by his uncle, now Sir Thomas Dyke Ackland, bart. who is unmarried.

Mr. Richards, master of the Nag's-head public house, in St. John's-str. Clerkenwell. Having condoled with a neighbour on the loss of his child, that had died that evening, he went home, and, having seated himself by the fire, expired instantly.

ter at Cheshunt, hanged himself.

Mr. Stevenson, one of the clerks of the board of green-cloth.

24. Samuel House, publican, of Wardourstreet,

street, Soho, one of the most extraordinary characters of modern times. Amongst many other singularities, he never wore a coat nor a wig, nor was ever found in bed (except when he was ill) after four o'clock in the morning: though blunt and uneducated in his manners, he was just and honest in all his dealings, and his word upon all occasions sacred. He early espoused Mr. Fox's party upon principles of patriotism, which his conduct notoriously evinced; as he was not only active in forwarding his interest, but frequently entertained, at his own expence, those of that party, who would eat buttock of beef, and drink porter, in Wardour-street. He was never embarrassed in the presence of any man, and though he frequently called upon the great, and was admitted into their presence, he never changed his dress or his character. In short, like Brutus, he died in what he thought the service of his country (having never been able to throw off a cold he got at the Westminster election); and his character might be parodied, from what Antony says of that distinguished patriot:

This was the noblest Briton of them all;
All the conspirators, save only he,
Did that they did to cross the views of Cæsar.

He only in the general honest thought,
And common good to all, made one of them.
His life was humorous, and the elements
So mixed in him, that Nature might stand up And say to all the world, "This was AN "ODDITY."

24. At Greenwich, Fred. Standert, esq.

25. At his apartments in the Middle Temple, James Horsfall, esq; under-treasurer of that Society, one of the vice presidents of the Humane Society, and F.R.S.

MR. URBAN, Hanover-Square, Apr. 20.

✱✱✱✱✱✱ Send you a copy of a letter, written some years ago, by the late Lord
✱ I ✱ —, to the Hon. Miss
✱ ✱ —, on the eve of her marriage. It was not intended for publication; but it may be of use: the pen it came from will be easily known*.

"MY DEAR MISS —,

IT is not in my power to add any thing to the good sense and solidity of the reflections contained in your letter to my wife. The rational plan you have there laid out, for your future conduct, will not fail to secure to you the esteem, love, and respect of a man, too well acquainted with the world, to undervalue so much prudence and discretion in a young wife. I believe, however, that most of your sex, on the eve of matrimonial engagements, mean and intend to act well; but, few having the advantage of your understanding, many are soon misled by misconception, levity, or, the worst of bad counsellors, those of your own sex. To resolve well, is nothing; the difficulty is to persevere; or, as Lee the poet much better expresses it, to be obstinately good. The word obstinately contains alone more meaning, energy, and pith than half the volumes which have been written on the subject. I repeat it, little can be added to what your own foresight has already suggested to you; but, as the engagement you are contracting is of the utmost importance to your future welfare, I will, since you do me the honour to ask my advice, subjoin a few remarks, the fruit of long experience and some observation.

Let respectability be your aim and object; be respectable in your connections, in your acquaintance, in the management of your family; but, above all, in the choice of your intimates. The world, in general, will be guided in their opinion of your character by the characters of those you select as objects of your friendship and confidence; your husband, moreover, will respect and consider you, in proportion, as he perceives you considered and respected by others. Airs, haughtiness, and pride, are not unfrequently mistaken for dignity; as roughness, ill manners, and brutality, in our sex, often claim as frankness, courage, and manliness—you will not mistake them—you have a friend in the world, and a very sincere one, who possesses this happy gift of assimilating this respectability with the best nature and the most winning affability:—I need not name her*.

What I have been saying seems to me very important, and deserves your serious consideration; but what relates

* We request the continuance of this correspondent's favours. His communications do us honour. EDIT.

* His Wife.

immediately to your husband is still more so

Let me intreat you to consider the first year after your marriage as a year of probation, a time of trial, of noviceship; every action, every step, nay, every word, will have its weight in the scale of your husband's future trust and confidence in you. Consider, in this interval, he will nearly have settled his opinion of your prudence, your discretion and your worth. I would by no means be understood to recommend cunning—cunning stands in the same relation to prudence, as hypocrisy to religion. Cunning, like hypocrisy, implies a sordid meanness of soul; and I both hope and believe, that you have an elevation of mind which would spurn at duplicity, at every kind of trick.

From these great outlines in the picture of a valuable wife, let me now proceed to the nicer touches of it, to the lights and shades, to those minute strokes of the pencil, without which the picture remains unfinished, but which require all the patience, all the attention, all the perseverance of the artist.—You are the artist: you are to draw this sublime picture—but you must do more—you must be a heroine and a philosopher. Assure yourself, that your husband, being a man, has his foibles, his caprices, his humours:—are you possessed of magnanimity sufficient to bear those, without repining, without peevishness, without retaliation?—have you philosophy enough to *scratch your ribbon, and smile good-humouredly, when your mighty lord struts all his dignity across the room, and gobbles his importance like an angry turkey-cock?—have you temper enough to compel him, on his cooler recollection, to call himself a fool, and you the best of women?—have you considered the importance of avoiding silly disputes about silly trifles?—it is well worth your consideration. I myself knew a man and wife, the two fondest and best-paired of creatures, who, after a long and wife investigation, whether we have ten fingers, or only eight fingers and two thumbs, complained bitterly of each other's monstrous ill usage; and concluded, by proposing a separation, the wife from the worst of husbands, the husband from the worst of wives.—

* Lady —, the writer's wife, when she saw her husband a girl, was used to scratch her hat with both hands, or the ribbon of her cap, crying out—"My lord—I don't hear—I don't hear!"

Luckily their heads were sound, as their hearts were good; both were struck with the dangerous tendency of such foolish altercations, and resolved in future to avoid them. Are you capable of checking a rising flush?—of swallowing a provoking word ready to burst from your lips?—If you be equal to such fortitude, to such heroism, you are, in my estimation, a great philosopher;—in that of your turkey-cock, you'll be an—angel.

More fortitude still may possibly require your exertions, if ever it should so happen (and this may happen to the most virtuous woman) that you perceive your mind too much employed in favour of another man*; yourself too much disposed to dwell on his good qualities, on the gentleness, the amiableness of his manners, on his disinterested attentions to you; if you feel such a man insensibly creeping into your affections—no hesitation—fly, if possible, from him, as far as from Pole to Pole—no confidante; more particularly no female one—bury the secret in the remotest recesses of your soul; and let your virtue and honour alone watch over it;—conceal your weakness, not only from the object of it, but from the whole world; nay, endeavour to conceal it from yourself—indulge not yourself, under pretence of fortifying your virtue, in gloomy thoughts about your supposed misery; that will not fail to increase the evil. On the contrary, amuse, dissipate yourself; laugh at your own folly; treat it cavalierly, and the illusion will soon cease—one serious resolve, however, must be firmly made, resolutely kept, and which no consideration must forego, the determined, fixed, unalterable resolution, of never, never, never trusting yourself alone with the man of whom you feel yourself afraid.

I perceive that this letter is spun out to a considerable length; the warmth of my wishes for your happiness would dictate a great deal more, but it is time to conclude it. One thing, however, I must mention; it is of a delicate nature from a man to a woman, but my age and my motives will be a sufficient apology for the liberty I take. This important advice shall be conveyed in as few words as possible. Be nicely and scrupulously clean: deficiency in this respect will unavoidably create disgust in a well-bred man. I fear, in our country especially, this is not always

* This surely is not to be supposed in a "virtuous woman." EDIT.

sufficiently

sufficiently attended to; and a fatal experience has often opened a woman's eyes when the evil was irreparable.

Thus, my dear Miss —, I have hastily thrown on paper such thoughts as have occurred to me; they have no pretension to novelty, elegance, or even order: they are written solely with a view of being of some little advantage to you. May you deserve, by your prudent conduct, to be happy, is my ardent wish! I have the honour to be, with great respect, Dear Madam, &c."

MR. URBAN,

THE idea of erecting the Penitentiary Houses, which were proposed in 1779, originated in the purest Benevolence, and the truest public spirit. "If many offenders" (says the Act of Parliament which was passed on the occasion), "convicted of crimes for which transportation hath been usually inflicted, were ordered to solitary imprisonment, accompanied by well-regulated labour and religious instruction, it might be the means, under Providence, not only of deterring others from the commission of the like crimes, but also of reforming the individuals, and inuring them to habits of industry." By this act, his Majesty was authorized to appoint three persons to be supervisors of the buildings to be erected; the supervisors, or any two of them, were to fix upon any common, heath, or waste, or any other piece of ground, in Middlesex, Essex, Kent, or Surrey, on which should be erected two plain strong edifices, to be called Penitentiary houses; one for the confinement and employment of 600 males, the other of 300 females. In fixing upon the ground, regard was to be had to health, and the accommodation of water, avoiding, as much as possible, any place where any other buildings were, or might be, erected contiguous to, or within a small distance of the outward fence of such houses, or within a populous town. The situation and circumstances were to be approved by the Lord Chancellor, the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Judges of the Courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas, Barons of the Exchequer, and Lord-mayor of London, or eight or more of them. After such approbation, the supervisors were to contract for the purchase; and if the owner would not agree to their price, the value was to be ascertained by a jury, and, on payment, or tender, they were empowered to take possession. After the houses were built, a committee, to be appointed by his Majesty, were to choose the officers named in the act; and there are very good and wise regulations for the government of the house and management of the prisoners.

That a plan, which had been so much desired, should, in the very outset, be made liable to become an engine of severe oppression, and, fair as it appeared in theory, should be found impracticable to execute, is greatly to be lamented; yet the former will appear by attending to the words printed above in Italicks, and to the conduct of the supervisors in consequence of the powers thereby given; and the latter appears by the scheme having been abandoned.

The original intent of the proposers appears plainly to have been to build these houses on some common, heath, or waste, remote from other houses; and for this there were many good reasons: the liberty of taking such ground would cost little; the injury to any man's property would be very trifling, being only the loss of commoning on the ground inclosed; and no houses would be deserted from an apprehension of such neighbours as these buildings would bring to a place much inhabited. But some words were inserted (I am convinced, without being attended to by the house—too common a case!), by which these supervisors were empowered to take any land whatever, "Common, heath, or waste, or any other piece of ground."

It will perhaps hereafter be hardly credited, that the supervisors, invested with such powers, should fix upon a piece of ground in the most fertile part of Wandsworth, in Surrey, let mostly to gardeners at high rents, situate between the populous villages of Wandsworth, Battersea, and Clapham, where new buildings were erecting every day, when there were such uninclosed spots as Hounslow-heath, Finchley common, and Enfield-chace, so near London; yet so it was. It is also somewhat extraordinary, that the gentlemen, as if willing to shew how dangerous it is to give such power, even to the most respectable persons, should fix on the spot without condescending to have any previous communication with the owners; yet it is the fact.

Having thus chosen their ground, and secured the approbation of the proper

per number of those whose consent was necessary, they advertised for plans of the intended buildings, with an offer of different sums for that which should be thought the best, and for I think) the second and third best. Plans were delivered, the price of the land was adjusted, and here the business ended. S.H.

MR. URBAN,

May 7.

YOUR correspondent E. in his Miscellaneous Collection of loose thoughts, inserted in your Magazine of last month, p. 191, enquires "from whence arises that strange mistaken idea, which the vulgar are possessed of, that second cousins are not allowed by the Canons to marry? especially owning, as they do, that there is no objection to the marriage of first cousins." People in general are too apt to adopt common notions and current opinions, without considering the truth and propriety of them. In this case, however, it is your correspondent who is mistaken, for the Canons do prohibit the marriage of second cousins. The Court of Rome was very fertile in inventing prohibitions, in order to reap the fruits of dispensations. But the civil law allows first cousins to marry; so that it was by confounding the civil law, by which first cousins may marry, and the Canons, by which second cousins cannot, that this mistaken idea, in all probability, arose. (Wood, C. L. 118—119.) This difference is now reconciled, by the Statute 32 Henry VIII. ch. 38, by construction of which it is clear, that both first and second cousins may marry.

I will take this opportunity of requesting some of your readers to point out, in your valuable scientific repository, whether the Levitical, or any other Law, now does, or ever did, prohibit a man marrying his (deceased) wife's step-mother. Yours, &c.

A LAYMAN.

MR. URBAN,

ALLOW me to mention something relative to Handel, as you have of late given room to anecdotes concerning him. When his ill success, in the conduct of the opera, had obliged him to exert his genius in its full nerve, and to have recourse to the novelty of Oratorios, they were at first received with some disgust by those religious votaries who could not bear the Scriptures adapted to music. Their sublime merit, however, at last made way for them:

but when the most inspired of all human compositions, the Messiah, was announced for the stage under that denomination, the zeal took fire with a vengeance, and was near involving Handel, and his composition, in utter destruction. Under these circumstances, and depressed also in finance, Handel carried over his favourite performance to Dublin; and the Music-hall, in Fishamble-street, in that city, was the first scene of that unbounded applause which ever since has followed this divine composition, which, one may almost say (pardon the unintended profaneness), was written by the finger of God himself. Yours,

A. T. M.

An Extract from the MS. Journal of a Tour to Spa.

ANTWERP. The church of the Grand Carmelites. On the left hand by the great door stands the altar of the holy cross. In the middle there is a small picture, said to be of inestimable value, painted, or rather stained, on white marble, with a most superb embossed frame: it is our Saviour's Head. No one can positively say who was the artist; yet all beholders must allow the beauty of it not to be expressed.

The Father who shewed us this curiosity told us, "It was found at Jerusalem, well authenticated as to its originality; that, after a bloody engagement, it was taken out of a Turkish vessel, the commander of which had it in charge as a present to a certain prince," whose name I cannot now recollect.

We all agreed to have seen somewhere a curious copy of this immensely rich piece; and, if I am not mistaken, there is one in the Bodleian library, Oxford. The face is a striking likeness of this at Antwerp. A. B.

MR. URBAN,

THE few mistakes in the List of Preachers at the Anniversary Meetings of the Sons of the Clergy, in your Magazine for last February, p. 94—98, I trust, you will find here rectified, and the omissions supplied.

In the 8vo. pamphlet which you mention, published 1733, the first preacher inserted is,

Additions to the List of Preachers before the Sons of Clergy.

Nov. 8th, 1655, George Hall, minister of St. Botolph, Aldersgate (afterwards bp. of Chester) Numb. xvii. 8. 4to, at St. Paul's.

Dr.

Dr. Manton is said to have preached the second sermon on Psalm cii.—8. vol. III. fol. 116; but the author of the above pamphlet proceeds thus:

Serm. 2d. 1674, Dr. John Dolben, bp. of Rochester, at St. Michael's, Cornhill. N. P.

1675 Dr. Pearson, bp. of Chester, at St. Michael's, Cornhill. N. P.

1676 Dr. Peter Gunning, bp. of Ely, at Bow Church. N. P.

1677 Dr. John Fell, bp. of Oxford, at Bow Church. N. P.

1678 Nov. 7. Dr. Sprat, (afterwards bp. of Rochester) at Bow. Galat. vi.—10.

1679 Dr. William Lloyd, (afterwards bp. of Worcester) at Bow Church. N. P.

1680 Dec. 2, Ditto, at Bow Church. N. P.

1681 Dr. Tho. Tenison, at Bow Church, N. P.

1682 Dr. Arthur Bury. (&c. as in your account). N. B. This sermon is added to Dr. Bury on the Sacrament, 2d Edit. 1683; at Bow Church.

There is nothing said of bp. Rush, but he proceeds thus.

1683 Dr. William Beveridge, late bp. of St. Asaph; St. Matth. v. 16. at Bow Church. Printed in vol. IV. of his Theol. Theologic. p. 201, and vol. II. of his Works, fol. p. 169.

MR. URBAN,

WHEN any one like Crito, p. 895, of your last volume, mentions former accounts of the Peerage to be imperfect, and warrants his own to be exact, one rather wonders, that in his list of barons of the present reign he should omit Lord Osborne, especially as he mentions his lordship's title amongst those which will merge in higher titles: but here too he is inaccurate; he says, that in another generation Osborne and Conyers will be absorbed in Leeds, but it will take two generations to effect this, as Lord Osborne's son has the barony of Conyers, and will retain it after his father's barony will be absorbed in the dukedom.

He, as well as the writer of the succeeding letter, p. 897, follows the erroneous way of spelling Lord Porchester's title, calling him Portchester. The fact is, that he meant to have taken his title from Portchester castle, an estate of Mr. Thistlethwayte's; that this gentleman very properly thought it an incivility, and that Mr. Herbert, to remove the objection, omitted the t, and is now baron of Porchester, though where that place is to be found I do not know.

I thought, but may be wrong, that the barony of Botetourt had been in the present duke of Beaufort, as nephew of Norborne Berkley, who claimed and was allowed that title.

The next gentleman, p. 897, in giving the different titles possessed by branches of the same family, under the Howards, omits Berkshire. Did it not descend to the present Earl of Suffolk with that title?

As you observe, in a note, that Dinewor is now "Rice," not "Talbot;" so Willoughby of Eresby is now "Burrell," not "Bertie."

Winchelsea is wrongly, though commonly so spelt: his lordship writes it Winchilsea.

Albermarle should be Albemarle.

Lord Mountstuart is the same person as Lord Cardiff; and the former is the second title only of the B. of Dute. S. H.

As I esteem your Magazine a Repository of genuine learning, give me leave to request a place for the following:

QUERY I.

What are the belt-like appearances of the planet Jupiter supposed to be?

QUERY II.

What is the signification of the name "Simon-bar jonas," mentioned in the first chapter of St. John*.

QUERY III.

What is the true meaning of the allegorical expression in Virgil, "Claudite jam rivos pueri; sat prata biberunt †?"

MR. URBAN,

BE so candid as to inform your correspondent, Philoleutherus, that by an error of the press in February, p. 112, shyness has been misprinted for flyness; and that your correspondent has mistaken part of the argument relative to Dr. P's setting his own name to what he prints: a fact which is not meant to be denied, but rather affirmed; and his conduct in so doing contrasted with that which he encourages in others, by which he invites every sciolist and willing to make unwarrantable attacks on religion and morality, and "suit their duty to their convenience," by either avowing themselves after a convenient season, or concealing themselves for ever ‡. Not to insist on the temporising, accommodating spirit of many episcopalians, who hold a double doctrine with their good benefices, the alliance between the puritanism of the last age, the presbyterianism of the present, and the jesuitism of both ages, cannot be denied, any more than it can be, that there are good and honest men of all these denominations. All Philoleutherus's reasoning

* Rather in Matth. xvi. the "son of Jona," as in John i. 42. EDIT.

† See it well explained in a note on the passage in the Delphin Virgil. EDIT.

‡ The argument that a man's name will expose him to more ill-treatment in controversy, is so very extraordinary, that the writer who avails himself of it, must presume that all polemists who write under real names must be like Dr. P's good friend Dr. H. of whom I cannot help saying (what the good old patriarch on his death-bed said of his own untoward children) "Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce; and their wrath, for it was cruel: for in their anger they slew a man; and in their self-will they digged down a wall. O, my soul, come not thou into their secret: unto their assembly, mine honour, be not thou united."

will never convince P. Q. R. that attacks, whether ouvert or covered, on the persons and characters of religionists, in this giddy, unthinking, irreligious age, will not bring religion itself into danger. Religion, seated in the soul of the meekest and humblest Christian, will never be transferred into souls of a different cast by violence, ridicule, or abuse. Nor is it, in P. Q. R.'s opinion, the business or duty, not to say the characteristic, of a meek and humble, or pious man, to go about disturbing the peace, and unsettling the principles of his fellow-christians, or of his friends; who I will admit are as meek, as humble, and as pious as himself, to retort upon characters, whom they artfully affect to compliment, that they are not of as meddling and of as turbulent a spirit as the Dr.

If P. Q. R. appears so over-righteous in the cause of Christianity, that Philoleutherus's benevolence will suffer too great a shock by being better acquainted with him, let him know, Mr. Urban, that however speculative zeal may represent the truth as it is in Jesus in different lights to different eyes, true Christian benevolence, as delineated by one of the brightest professors of Christianity, will bring together, at the end of all things, the warmest defenders of the most discordant opinions, where practice has not been hurried into gross immoralities.

The field of argumentation about speculative opinions is unbounded; and philosophers never consider, that in religious controversy they violate the fundamentals of religion, as much as politicians do that of the system they contend about, where each mistakes errors of theory for errors of practice. P. Q. R.

MR. URBAN,

IT is apprehended that what your correspondent, Mr. Bickerstaff, describes as found in St. Mary's churchyard, at Leicester, and imagines a plate once charged with salt, and laid on a corpse (Gent. Mag. April 1784, p. 258) was a patten intombed in the coffin of some priest or incumbent of that church.

The custom of putting a plate of salt on the belly of a deceased corpse, is desired to be accounted for. Is it to prevent any discharge from the navel after death? or, is it still retained?

How could the antiquity found at Settle, engraved in your plate for that month, determine that that was a market-town?

MR. URBAN, York, March 1785.

AS your Magazine is justly regarded as the chief repository for detached pieces of antiquity, a place is requested for the following translation. The Latin original fell into my hands by mere chance, among a number of pamphlets, MSS. &c. which I bought of a seller of old books. I need hardly add that, considering that most of the Scottish records have perished, either by the ravages of Edward I. or by those of Cromwell, the recovery of any of them is a matter of consequence; and that the following is very curious for its remote antiquity, and will be of great importance in a parochial, or county, history. The notarial introduction and close are omitted.

Yours, J. BLAIR.

Notarial Copy of the Foundation of three Prebends in the College Church of Dunbar, 1342; included in a Confirmation of it, 1423.

To ALL our holy sons of the Church, to whose knowledge the present letters shall come, Henry, by the Grace of God and of the Apostolical see, Bishop of Saint Andrew's, health in the Lord our Saviour. Be it known to you all, that we CONFIRM the letters of William, our predecessor in this see, of good memory, which are neither cancelled, nor abolished, nor vitiated in any shape; as also those of the illustrious Lord and Patron [Patrick] Dunbar Earl of March, for the erection of certain prebendaries underwritten, with their chapels; which the said Earl, and his heirs, and successors, granted, and our said predecessor granted, to the Collegiate Church of Dunbar; presented to us by the venerable Robert Young, Dean of the said Collegiate Church of Dunbar, in the presence of the magnificent and illustrious Lord George, Earl of March; and of which the tenor follows. TO ALL THE FAITHFUL who shall see, or hear, these presents, William, by divine mercy, Bishop of Saint Andrew's, health in our Lord. We ordain, to the praise of the Eternal and Omnipotent God, the following augmentation of the rents and incomes of the parochial church of Dunbar, and its chapels, to wit of Whittingham, Spott, Stenton, Pewschils, and Hachervill, anciently annexed to it, with the addition of three parochial churches, when they are vacant, namely Linton, Dunse, and Churnside. At the instance of the noble and potent Baron [Patrick] Dunbar Earl of March, and with the unanimous consent of our chapter, we erect

GENT. MAG. May 1785.

the said parochial churches of Dunbar, Lintoun, Dunse, and Churnside, with their chapels, into one collegiate church in this manner; to wit, THAT in the said collegiate church shall be in future, for ever, a Dean Arch-priest, holding the care of said parochial churches and chapels; eight simple canons, having prebends, at the appointment of the said Earl of March, and his successors Earls of March, which canons are bound to perpetual residence, save on reasonable cause shewn to our see; and those canons who do not reside shall have only one-third of their prebendary-rents, the other two-thirds going to those who do reside. And the Dean Arch-priest, with the canons, are to receive nothing of the gross fruits of their prebends, unless they have resided thirty-two weeks night and day, except we have granted special dispensation to the contrary. [Here follow orders as to Masses and Psalms.] And that the said worship may be duly performed, let them receive the whole tithes, larger and lesser, and incomings, of the parish of Whittingham, and there have a perpetual vicar, who shall annually receive ten marks sterling; and he shall have power to administer the sacraments of the church at the altar of the Blessed Virgin Mary, newly constructed in the said church. To the other canons shall pertain to officiate in the church, according to their orders and degrees: and to each of them we assign these prebends; to wit, To the canon prebendary of Dunbar, the whole town of Dunbar, with all its pertinents. To the canon prebendary of Pincarton, the whole town of Pincarton, with its pertinents. To the canon prebendary of Spott, the whole town of Spott, with its pertinents. To the canon prebendary of Beltoun, the whole town of Beltoun, with its pertinents. To the canon prebendary of Pitcoks, the whole town of Pitcoks, with its pertinents, except what are given to the Arch-priest. To the canon prebendary of Lintoun, the whole parish of Lintoun, with all its pertinents; and he may there have a perpetual vicar, as shall seem good to the bishop, and the said vicar shall receive annually ten marks sterling. To the canon prebendary of Dunse, the whole parish of Dunse, with power to have a vicar at the option of the bishop. To the canon prebendary of Churnside, the whole parish of Churnside, with its pertinents, and leave of a perpetual vicar. [Then follow other clauses clauses with regard to residents and non-residents.] And that the canons of Whittinghame, Lintoun, Dunse, and Churnside, be subject to the jurisdiction of the Arch-dean of Lawdoun for the time. [Next are clauses as to the repairing of the several chapels, and who shall bear the expence, &c. and ordaining a solemn mass for the death of each Earl of March, and that his death be inscribed in the martyrology, or other book: and that the collegiate church have a common seal: and that the foresaid Lord Patrick of Dunbar, Earl of March, and his heirs, shall swear to observe the institutions of this ordination, on pain of a fine to the bishop; and concludes:] IN WITNESS of all which we have ordered our seal to be put to these presents, with that also of our chapter, and that of the said Earl, patron of said church. These things were ordained, and acted, on the feast of Saint Matthew the Apostle, in the year of our Lord one thousand three hundred and forty-two. AFTER the reading and full examination of said letters, the foresaid Master Robert Young, with the full consent and assent of George the foresaid Earl, has humbly begged that we will approve, ratify, and confirm them. WE THEREFORE, Henry, foresaid Bishop, holding the said requisition just and reasonable, CONFIRM the said letters and statutes therein made, with the consent of the whole chapter of our said cathedral church of Saint Andrew's, and of the said George Earl of March; and approve, and ordain them to have full effect in all points. IN FAITH and testimony of all which, we have ordered our seal, and that of the chapter, to be appended; as also the said Earl, patron of the said collegiate church of Dunbar, has put his, at Saint Andrew's, the twenty-third day of October, one thousand four hundred and twenty-three; and of our consecration the twenty-seventh year.

Allow me now, Mr. Urban, to make a few remarks on this curious old instrument. The copy from which this is taken has been done by somebody not skilled in old writing, so that frequently the words are unintelligible; I have therefore given the sense more than a literal translation. It appears from this copy, that it is three times removed from the original. 1. There was a notarial copy taken, 2d of August, 1425; one of the witnesses to which is George Kellie, prebendary of the collegiate church of our Lady of the Fields, under the walls of Edinburgh. 2. Was a notarial copy from the protocol book of the notary who took the first, on the 24th of December, 1595. 3. This copy is taken from the last.

As to persons and places mentioned, for William, Bishop of Saint Andrew's 1342, and Henry in 1423; Keith's Catalogue of Scottish Bishops may be consulted.

Of the Earls of March take a few notes from Crawford's Peerage of Scotland, Edin. 1716, folio. Gospatrick, son of Gospatrick Earl of Northumberland, being deprived of his estate by William the Conqueror, fled to Scotland, where Malcolm III. with great generosity gave him the territory of Dunbar. Gospatrick, his son, was created Earl of March by David I. in the year 1130.

Patrick de Dunbar Earl of March, who grants the above charter, was made governor of that part of Scotland which is south of the Forth in 1332. His son was Patrick, who succeeded 1368; whom followed George, warden of the Marches in 1380. His son was also named George, and is he by whom the above confirmation is given in 1423. He was the last Earl of the name, losing his estate in 1434, at the suit of James I. an affair which stains the memory of that respectable monarch. For the Earl had been the main instrument of redeeming that King from his long captivity; and the only crime alledged against him was, his being the son of a man who had been very ill used by the father of James I. and had in consequence rebelled against him, but was pardoned by the regent during James's captivity. It was prudence and patriotism in James to depress his nobles, but to depress any of them by tyranny and ingratitude was not vindicable.

The PLACES mentioned are Dunbar, Whittingham, Spott, Stenton, Peawschills, and Hachervill; Linton, Dunse, and Churnside in one place: and in another Pincarton, Beltoun, Pitcoks. Of these Dunbar is the collegiate church; and the prebends are Dunbar, Pincarton, Spott, Beltoun, Pitcoks, Lintoun, Dunse, Churnside, Whittingham; in number nine: with three chapels, Stenton, Peawschills, and Hachervill. Dunbar, Lintoun, Dunse, and Churnside, are also mentioned as parochial churches; and, I believe, they are so to this day.

Dunbar is well described by Mr. Penant, in his excellent Tour in Scotland. Of all the other places it were to be wished, some correspondent near the spot would furnish you with notices: such

I could gather you shall have in the mean time.

To begin with the parochial churches, as commonly situated in the largest towns, there is a Lintown between Edinburgh and Lanerk, which may be that here meant; though it is possible there may be another in East Lothian*, or in Berwickshire. The name means a town near a lin or cataract; and is also a family name in Scotland. Dunse is in Berwickshire, about ten miles west of Berwick; is noted as the birth place of Joannes de Dunse Scotus; and the name seems to imply a town on a little hill. Churnside is between Dunse and Berwick, and seems to mean a town by the side of a pool. It is also a proper name, or surname. Names from lands, or local surnames, are the most ancient, and began in Scotland about 1070.

Of the other prebends: Pincarton stands about six miles south of Dunbar. It seems formerly to have been a considerable town; for in a curious map of Scotland to be found in many MS. copies of Hardyng's Chronicle, and published by Mr. Gough in his valuable British Topography. Pynkerton is just south of Dunbar, and next to it; and marked as a town equal in size to Musselburgh, Coldingham, or the like. In Gordon of Straloch's, or rather Timothy Pont's, map of Lothian in Bleau's Atlas of Scotland, it is called Pinkertoun; and in Adair's map of East Lothian, are two places called Meikle Pinkerton, and Little Pinkerton. The old town of Pincarton seems now to have dwindled into these two farms, which belong to the Duke of Roxburgh. Were the town nearer the sea, we should suppose the name derived from a pink, or small ship; and I am told that the arms of Pinkerton, as a family name, are a pink in full sail with post nobile Phœbus: but these arms seem a poor pun ex post facto. It is more likely that the name is derived from pink, old English; and, I think, Anglo-Saxon, to stab: and that it was either founded by some man, or inhabited by a body of men, noted for skill in the short sword, or pugio, a dreadful weapon in the close fights of ancient days†. That it was founded in times

* In the Itinerary at the end of Hardyng's Chronicle; from Coldingham to Pynkerton vi miles; from Pynkerton to Dunbar vi miles; Dunbar to Lynton vi miles; Lynton to Hardyngton vi miles.

† These conjectures seem nugatory: but what is the origin of the English Pinkney, and Scotch Pinkey; of Pincanhale in Northumberland, famous for the council? &c.

when the Anglo Saxon kingdom of Northumberland spread over all those parts, seems evident from the termination ton, which is Saxon. It has just been mentioned that it is a surname in Scotland; but it is very rare even in Lanerkshire, where part of the family seems to have gone. There is a Captain Pinkerton mentioned in Carstairs's State Papers, 4to. as conductor by sea of the unhappy expedition to Darien: and, I believe, another Captain Pinkerton of the army is heir to the celebrated estate of Drummond of Hawthornden.

Spott is between Dunbar and Pinkerton. I know nothing as to its ancient, or present state; or origin of the name. Beltoun, or Beeltoun, is two miles west of Dunbar. Pitceks stands a mile south of Beltoun. They are all family names.

There is a Whittingham in Northumberland; for which, see Mr. Pennant's Tour in Scotland, vol. III. but this would rather seem some village in Berwickshire, or in East Lothian. Of Stenton, Pewschills, and Hachervill, I know nothing; but hope some topographical correspondent will give you information, as well as concerning the other places; for my notes are very defective; and you, I know, Mr. Urban, are an admirer of topography. It is remarkable that many of the above places give surnames; which custom spreading from England into Scotland about the eleventh century, it is natural that the names taken from places in the south of Scotland should be much more numerous, than those of like origin in any other part of that kingdom. It is hardly necessary to add, that Berwickshire was formerly called March, as being on the march or boundary of the kingdoms; and is now by corruption called the Merse.

MR. URBAN,

A PARTICULAR friend of your correspondent Mr. Hill wishes to acquaint you, that he is now, and has been for twelve months past, abroad on his travels. Having first seen all that was curious in his own country, he had a desire to explore every part of the Continent of Europe that could gratify the inquisitive eye, or afford to a speculative mind new sources for instruction or amusement. This will take a considerable time, and of course prevent his noticing the letter, in your Magazine, with the signature of Deirensis: on his return, I doubt not, he will pay attention to the subject, and esteem himself obliged to the writer. Yours, E. W.

MR. URBAN, April 16, 1785.

SOME years since, in digging in the Tower of London, the workmen discovered a square stone. Their curiosity prompted them to follow it down till they found means to raise it; when got up, it appeared to be a pedestal, on which some figure had probably been placed: it is very ancient, and there is no date thereon. Perhaps some of your learned readers may be able, from their researches, to give some account of it worthy the attention of the curious, with which view I inclose you the inscription (see the plate, fig. 2.), which is very perfect, and all in capitals.

Your's, &c. F. P.

MR. URBAN, Lichfield, April 17.

IN making a vault for the late Mrs. Robinson, Feb. 21, 1785, in the middle aisle of our cathedral church, two stone coffins were discovered, at the depth of four feet from the pavement; they were both covered with loose flat stones; one of them contained nothing but dust and rubbish, in the other were found the leather of a pair of shoes or slippers, much torn, some narrow gold lace, a pewter chalice, the foot and part of the cover gone; a neat, though rudely carved crucifix in black ebony, finely polished, on one side of which appears our blessed Saviour on the cross, on the other the Virgin Mary holding the Infant Jesus. These remains, by favour of the Rev. Mr. Inge, Canon Residentiary, were placed in my Museum, for the inspection of my numerous visitors. An exact drawing, by Mr. Stringer, of the chalice (fig. 3.) and crucifix (fig. 4.), I send for your truly valuable repository, not doubting but that you will favour the public with an engraving of these remains of antiquity.

As stone coffins have been long disused, it would afford the highest satisfaction to many of your readers, to be informed at what æra they were discontinued, and whether the chalice denoted the deceased to have been an Ecclesiastic. Yours, &c. RICH. GREEN.

P. S. Besides the above-mentioned chalice, I have two others in my collection, nearly similar, found in our cathedral at different periods.

Camden Street, Islington.

MR. URBAN,

I SEND you a continuation of observations on the island of Jersey, from p. 810 of your last volume.

At all the accessible places on the coasts of this island, are erected round towers, with embrasures on their tops for small cannon, and loop-holes on their sides for small arms: these have been built since the French landed in 1781; the entrance to these towers is by a door so high up in the wall, as to be out of the reach of man, and are to be ascended by a ladder, to be drawn up when the defendants are got inside; there are also in many places pieces of large cannon mounted, with store-houses by them for powder and ball. The militia were embodied, drawn out, and exercised, with two brass field-pieces, colours, &c. while I was on the island, and made a very martial appearance; there are also English soldiers constantly kept there, who are always on duty in Elizabeth-castle, and a party of them at the pier. This castle was first begun to be built in the reign of Edward VI. considerably augmented by queen Elizabeth, and such great additions made to it since, that it is at present a strong fortification; a ridge of sand and stones leads to it, above half a mile in length, which at high water is so completely covered, that large ships sail over it, and at low water the soldiers, &c. pass safely on to the castle. The island of Jersey was the last place which held out for the king (Cha. II.) in the great rebellion, and every other part of the island being in possession of the Parliament's forces under general Morgan. This castle defended itself bravely, till a bomb from the town-hill falling on the powder magazine, blew it up, and demolished great part of it; notwithstanding which, the Governor would not surrender it, till he had the king's order so to do, who had it in contemplation to have sold it, with the islands of Guernsey, Alderney, and Sark, to the French; but, on consideration that he might possibly be restored to his dominions, he declined all thoughts of it, chusing rather that they should be under the English government, though an usurped one, than that of the French, as they might then be irrecoverably lost. Two parts of different-sized bombshells, one a 13 and the other a 9 inch, found, on digging in the castle, some years since, and supposed from this bombardment I saw at the top of some steps ascending to the terrace of a lady's garden near the town of St. Hillier's. On the spot where the castle stands, was anciently a monastery, dedicated to St. Hillier, but whether demolished at the general dissolution of these edifices, I could not learn. As we had a great desire to view the interior of this castle, we applied to the governor for a written order, who kindly granted it, and without which no one is admitted. A great number of heavy cannon are mounted on the ramparts, some of which are bomb-proof. Everything appeared to be in good order, and no doubt would be capable of giving an enemy a warm reception.

For a considerable time, during the last war, a citadel was building on the hill near the pier, from whence it is supposed Elizabeth Castle was bombarded, which, when finished, will effectually prevent any further efforts of that kind. The walls towards the sea are raised a great height, but since the late peace a stop is put to it. By a beautiful model of the whole, finely executed in different coloured wax, which I was shown in an adjacent house, it will be, when completed, a regular fortification, a great addition to the safety of the island, and of Elizabeth Castle, in particular.

The town of St. Hillier's is about 3 quarters of a mile in length, and has many good houses; it consists of several streets, almost every house a shop, most of them so small as scarcely to deserve that name; the market-place is spacious, the court or town-house stands in it, a handsome modern building, in which the affairs of the island are transacted in the French language; in the vestibule of the court, on the left hand wall, is a picture of general Conway, the present governor, painted by Gainsborough. At the upper end of the market-place, on a lofty pedestal, stands a statue, in armour, of king Geo. II. in bronze gilt, the face a good likeness, but otherwise an indifferent performance.

The market (Saturdays) is plentifully supplied with all kinds of provisions, but much raised in price, with all other places, compared with a few years since. The town stands at the foot of a very long and high rocky hill, or rather mountain, the crags of which, in some places, are bare of any verdure, but its extensive top is covered with a fine soft short grass, and like a carpet to walk or sit on, with the most delicious prospects on all sides; that towards the town, in particular, commanding a view not only of its whole extent (being far above the tower of the church), but the beautiful one of a charming country, with Elizabeth Castle; the bay and town of St. Aubin on the other side of it, the river, with the shipping, and the ocean as far as the eye can reach, altogether forming a scene rarely paralleled.

King Charles II. was twice on this island, and being greatly caressed by the gentry at whose houses he met with a hospitable entertainment, he passed his time very agreeably; his lodging room and bed in Mount Orgeucil Castle is still shown to strangers, as one of the chief curiosities of the place.

The roads in Jersey are deep and narrow, with a raised foot-path, but not calculated for four-wheel carriages; and they are so shaded with trees, planted on each side, that in the hottest summer's-day it is delightful travelling, and cool as a grotto; but in the winter, I was informed, it is gloomy, cold, and impervious to the cheering rays of the sun.

About the middle of the island, in the parish of St. Saviour, is a high artificial mount, on which is an old chapel, which hill and chapel, tradition says, were raised and erected by a lady whose husband was buried there, that, being herself (after his death) resident in France, she might, from her house, behold the place where his body lay: the chapel is now used as a store-house for arms, ammunition, &c.

The Methodists have lately got a footing in the island, but are generally disliked, and have met with many insults; it is said a gentleman of fortune, from England, was their preacher, but not perfectly understanding French, he has left them for a time, and is gone to France, to perfect himself in that language; their place of meeting was in an ancient, and nearly ruined chapel, founded on rocks, in a field near the town; it is remarkable that the roofs of the churches are all arched, and strongly built of stone, with not a stick of wood in them, which preserves them from thunder-storms, &c. and is given as a reason that not one of them ever suffered by any casualty of the kind.

After about a month's stay at Jersey we embarked on our voyage to France, some account of which I may hereafter send you.

The inclosed drawing (fig. 5) is from a silver gilt ring, in my possession; and is, by the union of the hands, supposed to be a wedding ring: the two first words are the same as on the ring in fig. 4. of your last October magazine.

MR. URBAN,

I HAVE an odd volume of pamphlets rescued from a chandler's-shop, published about the time of the two protectors, tors, Oliver and Richard Cromwell, many of them perfect, others partly torn out, in which are many curious things relating to the affairs of that distracted and canting age. In your Jan. Magazine, p. 20, is an account of some sectaries and their horrid tenets: permit me to add from one of the pamphlets one more to Atopomastix's group, which may vie with the boldest of them, though I never heard or read of him till I was lately turning over the volume; it is of one Peter Sterry, whom the author stigmatises by "that cringing court chaplain Peter Sterry, who bows to whatever is uppermost, and as it is credibly reported by several godly men that heard him, to their astonishment, holding forth his bible in the chapel of Whitehall, he spake to this purpose; "that if that were the word of God, then as certainly, that Holy Spirit (meaning the late protector) was with Christ, at the right hand of the Father; and, if he be there, what may his family and the people of God expect from him! for if he were so useful and helpful, and so much good influenced from him to them, when he was here in a mortal state, how much more influence will they have from him now he is in heaven, the Father, Son, and Spirit, through him, bestowing gifts, graces, &c. upon them!" Then after relating a story of the discharge of one cornet Sumpner, by Richard Cromwell, in the presence of Col. Ingoldsby, &c. he declaims against Sterry and others, as follows: "Wherefore repent, you flattering courtiers, Peter Sterry, and ye other court chaplains. Repent, repent, Thomas Goodwin, and ye pastors and messengers of (as it is said) above one hundred congregational churches in England. Repent, you apostate army; repent, you major, aldermen, common council, and militia of London, whose principles are so base and mercenary, and like a beast looking downward, as to side with (whether right or wrong) whatever is uppermost, like our sword-bearer and officers who cry grace, grace, and bow to one Lord Mayor to-day, and do the same to the next the morrow. Repent also, you Presbyterian classical Ministers of the city, &c.; who, by the persuasion of three or four eminent self-interested sycophants among you, were drawn in, against your light and conscience, to carry your bodies to Whitehall (leaving your hearty good will at home) to address yourselves to this new golden calf, as an owning of him, and thus from an unbelief, and slavish fear of being frowned upon, or losing your parish places. Will such a practice as this stand good before the Lord in the day of account? Repent also, all of you, for your spending 50 or 60,000^l. about a heathenish, popish funeral pomp, not only wicked in itself, but at a time when so many tradesmen, and others, break and are ready to starve; and, when you had done, then following an image of wax to Westminster, as if it had been a dead man's body, when you lied unto, and mocked both God and man!"

In one of these pamphlets Richard Cromwell is upbraided with "drinking a health to his father's landlord;" and in another, with "spending his time in hawking, hunting, keeping race-horses, and riding horse-matches, to endangering the lives of both horses and men."

Yours, &c. M. S.

MR. URBAN, Dublin, March 10,
YOU have herewith a sketch of the front of an hospital established lately in this city, for the relief of poor blind and gouty men, by the munificence of the late George Simpson, esq; and thence called Simpson's Hospital. This edifice stands in Great Britain-street, opposite Jervis-street; is of a cut freestone, with ornaments round the windows, and a Dorick arch at the entrance, the trustees having preferred strength and conveniency to elegance, notwithstanding the largeness of the fund: this building is calculated to receive 80 patients, and to contain proper apartments for the necessary officers; but is not yet completed, the roof being but very lately finished. The Trustees, who are 13 in number, and were incorporated by act of parliament, in 1780, are prosecuting Mr. Simpson's charitable design with spirit and economy; they have now, in an house hired for their temporary residence, 40 poor men, clothed entirely in a decent light-brown uniform, and otherwise comfortably supported. By one whimsical singularity of the founder, women are totally excluded all benefit of this institution; and by another, the charity is debarred from any legacy or donation from others. Mr. Simpson originally was in the sugar trade, wherein he acquired a capital of about 60,000^l. and died in 1779; this fund, subject to 600^l. yearly to his widow, for her life, (and she is yet living) he has bequeathed for the purposes of this charity. Mr. URBAN,

April 18.

IF the following thoughts of an unlearned and unpractised writer are not deemed unworthy of insertion in your useful and entertaining Miscellany, they may perhaps excite some more able hand to defend the God of Israel from the imputation of requiring the blood of human victims: if you judge them too inaccurate for publication, you are at liberty to sacrifice them to the flames.

Yours, E. C.

It may perhaps seem extraordinary to find a writer, who appears willing to shew some respect for Christianity, adopting an opinion which has too often been held forth by its enemies as an argument against it, inasmuch as the God in whom Christians profess to believe can be no other than the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob; the God of the Jews; in a word, the God whom the adversaries of Christianity love, right or wrong, to reproach with accepting and commanding the sacrifice of human victims.

As to the history of Jephthah's daughter, I humbly presume that the inconvenience your correspondent J. L. (p. 182.) perceives in the explanation of that history by some whom he calls fashionable divines, namely, assigning to the vestals of ancient, and the nuns of modern Rome, a length of pedigree; which in the times of our forefathers they scarcely presumed to lay claim to, is not greater than that which results in favour of monks, ancient or modern, of Rome or elsewhere, from the consecration of persons to the Lord from their infancy, or even before their birth; and yet it cannot possibly be supposed, that such devoted persons were put to death. I presume also that the marginal translation in our Bibles of or instead of and, Judges, ch. ii. ver. 31; and that of to talk to, or to entertain, instead of to lament, ver. 40. are no very new-fashioned translations. But admitting lament to be the only proper sense of the original in this place (which, from my ignorance of the learned languages, I cannot pretend to decide), I do not from thence think myself obliged to admit, that the custom of the daughters of Israel going yearly to lament the daughter of Jephthah, is any proof that she bled at the altar; nor do I find in Scripture any traces of an altar, or of priests appointed for such a sacrifice. And if we refer to the history of the Jews, or to their laws, for a clue to guide us in the explanation of this particular event, the conclusion appears to me evidently the contrary of that drawn by your correspondent.

In that part of the Levitical law, where every kind of sacrifice required of the Jews is so expressly and so minutely marked, both as to the victim and the manner of offering it, do we find the least indication of any human victim? I own I am so far from seeing there any clear proofs of the Israelites being used to offer such victims, that I see very clear marks of the contrary.

In the history of the Jewish people we find indeed one, and only one, human sacrifice commanded by God; but we are there informed also how that sacrifice, commanded as a test of the obedience and faith of the Patriarch, was prevented by the God who had given the command, and who has more than once declared, that obedience was better than sacrifice, even than the sacrifice of those animals which the law prescribed, and which could not do away sin.

As to Levit. ch. xvii. ver. 28. 29. nothing, one would think, but a persuasion that the attentively reading of the Scriptures is most shamefully neglected, could tempt any person to select that passage in proof of the legality of sacrificing human victims, as if it stood unconnected with any part of the law or history of the Jews that could lead to give it a more reasonable explanation. And it is, Mr. Urban, so susceptible of another explanation, that in more than one of the first translations of the Bible into a modern language, both from the original Hebrew, and from St. Jerom's Latin Version, it does not suggest the idea of a human expiatory victim. Neither do I think it very probable (for reasons which I suppose obvious enough) that the terms of our English translation suggested that idea to the translators, or appeared to them capable of suggesting it to their readers.

I say nothing of the thoughts excited in my mind, on seeing the slaughter of Agag represented as the sacrifice of an expiatory victim: but it may, perhaps, not be quite useless to represent it here in another light.

If we believe really and truly that there exists a God; if in consequence of such belief we acknowledge the sovereignty of God; we cannot surely refuse to acknowledge in him a right which we allow to subordinate sovereigns; the right of punishing even by death, if the case deserve it, his disobedient, rebellious, and and criminal subjects: and that right in God, the only supreme sovereign, must extend equally over all delinquents, whether subjects or princes, or both, whose disobedience and crimes have drawn upon them his condemnation. As such, the Amalekites with their king had been doomed to destruction by God, and an express command given to Saul to exterminate them and all that belonged to them. Saul disobeys that command, by sparing not only part of the riches of the Amalekites, but also their king. Samuel, informed by the Lord of Saul's disobedience, goes to meet him, upbraids him with his ingratitude and disobedience, threatens him from God with the punishment of his transgression, orders Agag to be brought; and, after having declared to him, that as his sword had made women childless, so should his mother be childless among women, he executes upon him, in presence of the Lord in Gilgal, the sentence before pronounced against him and his people by the Almighty, and which Saul ought to have executed in the field of battle. What is there in all this that has the slightest appearance of Agag's being slain as an expiatory victim?

I am mistaken if it be more difficult to clear, from every such appearance, the event appealed to as a proof of the offering up human sacrifices under David.

2 Sam. ch. xxi. ver. 2. The Gibeonites were not of the children of Israel, but of the remnant of the Amorites, and the children of Israel had sworn unto them, [and made a league with them to let them live, Josh. ch. ix. ver. 15.] and Saul sought to slay them, in his zeal to the children of Israel and Judah. This injustice and breach of the publick faith having never been disavowed, nor any atonement for it made to the Gibeonites by David or the children of Israel, it as certainly lay at their door. In consequence of the guilt incurred by this, at least, tacit assent to the injustice of Saul and his house (ver. 1.), the Israelites were visited by a famine as a chastisement for their iniquity, and an admonition to clear themselves from the guilt of the violation of the league made with the Gibeonites, by doing justice on the bloody house of Saul, and thus putting away the guilt of innocent blood from Israel, according to the command of the Lord, Deut. ch. xix. ver. 11—13: and the death of the seven descendants of Saul was the consequence of this admonition. If, however, any one is determined to consider at any rate their death, not as a punishment of the guilty, but as the sacrifice of expiatory victims, it must in that case be allowed, that the sacrifice was made rather to the Gibeonites than to the God of Israel.

I readily agree with your correspondent, as to the gratitude we ought to feel for the benefits conferred on the world by Christianity, which not only has delivered us from the horrors of heathen worship, and from the yoke of the ceremonial law to which the Jewish nation was subjected; but would also, were its benevolent tendency fully understood, and properly seconded on our part, deliver us from the horror of seeing our fellow creatures, our Christian brethren, slaughtering each other, as they so often do, by thousands and tens of thousands; not indeed as victims to our God, who has forbidden such sacrifices, but to our own ambition and avarice. And I also think the want of that gratitude, with all its necessary bad consequences, a most serious subject of shame and reproach to the Christian world.

MR. URBAN,

May 3.

HAVING lately met with a wooden cut of the French saint, St. Roch, mentioned in March, p. 176, it is much at the service of your engraver, and may be compared with that in the altar-piece. An angel here seems curing the ulcer, and the dog standing by (fig. 7.). Under it is the following invocation, in French:

“ANTHEM TO SAINT ROCH.

“O blessed St. Roch, called divinely from God by an angelic voice, and who by special grace hast obtained power to defend and preserve all persons from the plague, we implore the favour of thy prayers. O St. Roch, pray for us! that we may be worthy of the promises of Jesus Christ.

“PRAYER.

“We beseech thee, O Lord, who hast promised the blessed St. Roch, that he who invokes thee shall not be attacked or hurt by the plague, one of thy scourges; and who hast confirmed thy word to him by the ministry of an angel: we most humbly beseech thee, that it may please thee, by his merits and intercessions, to deliver us, who implore it in our necessity, from the plague and all other mortal contagion, as well of the soul as of the body, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ thy son, who liveth and reigneth with with thee in the unity of the Holy Spirit, world without end.

“ So be it.

“ PETER BESSIS, master of the brotherhood of St. Roch at Calais,

MR. URBAN,

I Return you thanks for the notice you have taken of my letter of the 28th of July, respecting Mr. Wray's Greek inscription, May, 1783. But a further explanation of it is requested. As a Greek inscription, it is very easy to construe it;
but as making an English one it is still difficult to make it out, though I think I have discovered some parts of it. Be so good as to furnish a clue to it in your next Magazine; and you will oblige your constant reader, and perhaps your occasional correspondent,

A. X.

As a specimen of my communications,
I have sent a transcript of an original letter, in my possession, of our famous poet Dryden, which contains one of the earliest poetical productions of our illustrious bard. The date of the year is almost obliterated.

Many of your readers earnestly request
a full explanation of the Greek inscription.

To the faire Hands of Madame HONOR
DRYDEN these crave Admittance.

Madame,

IF you have received the lines I sent by the reverend Levite, I doubt not but they have exceedingly wrought upon you; for being so long in a clergyman's pocket, assuredly they have acquired more sanctity than their authour meant them. Alasse, Madam! for ought I know, they may become a sermon ere they could arrive at you; and believe it, having you for the text, it could scarcely prove bad, if it light upon one that could handle it indifferently. But I am so miserable a preacher, that though I have so sweet and copious a subject, I still fall short in my expressions; and instead of an use of thanksgiving, I am always making one of comfort, that I may one day againe have the happinesse to kisse your faire hand; but that is a message I would not so willingly do by letter as by word of mouth. This is a point, I must confesse, I could willingly dwell longer on; and in this case whatever I say you may confidently take for gospel. But I must hasten. And indeed, Madame, (beloved I had almost said) hee had need hasten who treats of you; for to speake fully to every part of your excellencies, requires a longer houre then most persons have allotted them. But, in a word, yourselfe hath been the best expositor upon the text of your own worth, in that admirable comment you wrote upon it;

I mean your incomparable letter. By all that's good (and you, Madame, are a great part of my oath) it hath put me so far besides myselfe, that I have scarce patience to write prose, and my pen is stealing into verse every time I kisse your letter. I am sure the poor paper smarts for my idolatry, which by wearing it continually heere my breast, will at last be burnt and martyr'd in those flames of adoration which it hath kindled in me.
But I forget, Madame, what rarities your letter came fraught with besides words. You are such a deity that commands worship by provideing the sacrifice. You are pleased, Madame, to force mee to write, by sending mee materials, and compell mee to my greatest happinesse. Yet though I highly value your magnificent presente, pardon mee if I must tell the world they are but imperfect emblems of your beauty; for the white and red of waxe and paper are but shaddowes of that vermillion and snowe in your lips and forehead. And the silver of the inkhorne, if it presume to vye whitenesse with your purer skinne, must confesse itselfe blacker then the liquor it contains. What then do I more then retrieve your own guists? and present you that paper, adulterated with blotts, which you gave spotlesse?

For since t'was mine the white hath lost its
hew.

To show t'was ne're itself but whilst in you.
The virgin waxe hath blusht itselfe to red
Since it with mee hath lost its maydenhead.
You (fairest nymph) are waxe; oh! may you bee

As well in softnesse as in purity,
Till fate and your own happy choice reveale Whom you so farre shall blisse to make your scale.

Dearest Valentine, the unfeigned wishe
of your humble votary;

Camb. May 23, 164 . JO. DRYDEN.

MR. URBAN,

UNLESS my memory deceives me, a tortoise died a few years ago at an advanced age in the garden belonging to the Bishop of London at Fulham; and I have either heard or read that this animal, and that mentioned by Dr. Ducarel to have been killed by the negligence of an under

under gardener of Archbishop Herring in 1753, were left at Fulham and at Lambeth by a prelate who was promoted from London to Canterbury. Archbishop Laud was so translated, and so was Juxon, but the tradition is in favour of the former ill-fated primate. If there be sufficient authority for the fact I have related, it is probably better known to many of your readers.

Your intelligent and lively correspondent, Antiquus (see p. 261, misprinted 201) is misinformed as to Queen Elizabeth's having used one of Archbishop Parker's successors very ill on account of his being married, for between Parker and Tillotson every Archbishop of Canterbury died a bachelor. Fletcher, Bishop of London, is, I believe, the prelate alluded to, who incurred her Majesty's displeasure, and was indeed suspended for this high offence. (See Mr. Masters's Hist. of C. C. C. Cambr. p. 286.) The Queen's address to that excellent wife and mother, Mrs. Parker, was doubtless ironical and pettish. On another occasion she declared to the Archbishop in the most direct terms, that she repented the having made married-men bishops, and spoke with so much bitterness against the clergy's entering into the holy state, that his Grace was in an horror to hear her. (Strype's Life of Parker, p. 109.)

E. (p. 190, mispaged also) has overlooked my reference to the lists of preachers before the sons of the clergy (since the year 1726) subjoined to the sermons on those anniversaries which have been lately published. O. was your mark, and intended, I think, to denote such sermons as are not known to be in print. Not having had an opportunity of reading Dr. Manton's discourse, your correspondent will be pleased to accept my thanks for his compendium of it.

More evidence will, I trust, be communicated to you concerning the supposed general imperfection of the right eye; and I join with W. E. in wishing that some ingenious and expert oculist or optician will, in a future Magazine, give a satisfactory solution of this phenomenon. To the hints already offered, I beg leave to add, that I imagine this comparative defect may be particularly distinguished by sportsmen, even though not fifty years old; I mean by those who have made more use of a gun than a pen. With a gentleman of this class I am acquainted, who freely acknowledges that he cannot now clearly mark his game with his right eye but at a considerable distance; and he also frankly owned, that the wear of this eye cannot be attributed to his having pored over MSS. but that it may be owing to his having taken good aim at partridges and pheasants, at snipes and woodcocks—innumerable.

In compliance with the request of D. H. I send the following memorandum from one of the registers of the bishops of Chichester, respecting honours enjoyed by the Percy family.

Henry Percy, earl of Northumberland, patron of Ponynge, Nov. 16, 1529, Reg. A. fol. 56. b.—Patron of Crawley, Oct. 10, 1530, being then also Lord of Honour of Cockermouth and PETT WORTH, as also Lord of Ponynge, Fitzpayne, and Brian, fol. 58. a.

MR. URBAN,

YOUR learned correspondent T. H. W. (page 277) has not shewn his usual attention to the lines from Theocritus, cited as a parallel passage to the following clause of Prospero's address to Ferdinand respecting Miranda. Tempest, Act iv. Scene i. init.

For I

Have giv'n you here a bird of my own life;
Or that for which I live:

the words in the Greek poet being μισήν της ζωῆς—"the half of life." There is, however, an expression in Othello that is very similar, viz. Act i. Scene ii. where Iago, alarming Brabantio with the elopement of his daughter, tells him,

Your heart is burst, you have lost half your soul;

and as Theobald has remarked, dimidium animæ meæ was the current language with the Latins on such occasions.

To the manner of reading the above passage quoted from the Tempest, though allowed to be the same in all the impressions, Mr. Theobald objected, because he did not conceive how Miranda could be only a third part of her father's life, when he had no wife living, nor any other child to rob her of a share in his affection. He, therefore, in the true spirit of a critic, substitutes, without any authority, the word thread for third. And though the late Dr. Johnson, in his valuable edition of Shakspeare, has restored the antient reading, he certainly did not comprehend the full purport of the lines, from his adding this observation, "that Prospero in his reason subjoined, why he calls her a third of his life, seems to allude to some logical distinction of causes, making making her the final cause." But if I am not mistaken, this obscurity may be dispelled by a little attention to the character of Prospero, and to a like mode of speaking used by him towards the end of the play.

He is represented by the Poet to be a person of a philosophical and religious turn of mind, and as such must be supposed to have employed his thoughts upon that future state of existence, which will succeed the entire dissolution of the visible fabric of the universe, described by him in those admirable lines, that are so well known as to render a repetition of them unnecessary. In the words under examination, Prospero then may be conceived to have intimated, that to consult and provide for the happiness of his daughter, for his own temporal welfare, and for his spiritual concerns, was the whole business of his life, or that for which he lived; and that to each of these interesting articles he allotted an equal portion of his time and thoughts.

With the view of satisfying your readers that this is not a vague interpretation, I will refer them to the last speech except one, delivered by Prospero, towards the conclusion of the fifth Act, where he appears to have resumed the same train of ideas, and has adopted the same word as expressive of his sentiments: for he says,
I'll bring you to your ship; and so to Naples;
Where I have hope to see the nuptials
Of these our dear beloved solemnized;
And thence retire me to my Milan, where Every third thought shall be my grave.

Happy as the old man knew he should be with leaving Miranda married to the Prince of Naples, he was very sensible that his beloved daughter would continue to be the object of his affectionate care; and having been before deprived of his dukedom, in some measure through his inattention to the duties of that high station, he was determined in his own mind, on his return to Milan, not to neglect his worldly affairs; but it was also his fixed purpose, still to appropriate a third part of his time to meditating upon his last momentous change; or, that Every third thought should be his grave.

With great pleasure we insert the following Letter, dated from St. John's College, Cambridge.

MR. URBAN, May 6, 1785.

IN your last Mag. p. 290, is a letter from Mr. Markland, containing some reflections on the memory of Dr. Powell, late master of this college. As I am convinced Mr. Markland had no intention of misrepresenting Dr. Powell's character, but had been himself deceived, I beg leave to send you some few facts, which will set this affair in a true light, and for the truth of which I appeal to the whole society.

It is true that Dr. Powell died in very affluent circumstances, but the greatest part of his fortune was left to him in 1759 by Mr. Reynolds, a relation of his mother, and the remainder was the well-earned fruits of his labours in educating his pupils whilst tutor. During the ten years he was master, he lived in great splendour and magnificence, and had considerably diminished his private fortune before his death. When it was determined to rebuild the first court, he generously made a present of 500l. to the society; to several undergraduates he occasionally gave sums of money, and to others he allowed annual stipends to enable them to complete their studies; at his own expence he bestowed prizes upon those who distinguished themselves at the public examinations. By his will, which had been made a considerable time before his death, he bequeathed 1000l. to his friend Dr. Balguy; to six actual fellows, to ten who had been fellows, and to four who had only been of the college, 100l. each; and to four fellows his books.

I might mention many and more important advantages which he procured for his college; but I wished only to shew, in opposition to Mr. Markland, that, if Dr. Powell had never died, he would still have done good with his riches.

I am, Sir, &c.

JOHANNENSIS.

MR. URBAN,

IN order to confute or confirm your Memoirs of the British Timon (vol. LIV. p. 814), some friends of yours have made enquiries lately at the New Inn Coffee-house. The master of it, Mr. Mortimer, knew Timon very well, but never knew him by that name, nor why it was given him. Respecting his "wearing no shirt," Mr. M. is ignorant; but well remembers that at least he wore shams, and also very large cravats, and though antiquated in his dress, he was always neat. The benchers of the inn having long known him, and considering him as indigent, for many years took no rent of him; and, what is more extraordinary, they have had no rent for his habitation ever since; for Mr. Mortimer's house being

ing enlarged, and become a kind of chop-house, he now possesses, and actually keeps in the very apartment where Timon lived and died, and that without any addition of rent. The story of Timon's friend, the parish clerk, and his debtor, it seems, is literally true.

Yours, N. J.

P. S. "Virgil," says a critic in one of last month's Reviews, "describes the dress of Penthesilea in the following manner:

"Aurea subnectens exertæ cingula

"mammæ

"Bellatrix.

"In these lines (he says) exertæ has been always rendered cut off, without the shadow of an authority." This assertion is rather too hastily hazarded. In the Delphin Virgil the editor has rendered exertæ (mammæ) in the interpretation, by nudato (ubere) and Dryden has given it in English,

"Athwart her breast a golden belt she "throws,"

without translating the epithet at all. At the same time I wonder, with this writer, that Mr. Pennant, or any one, should, "at this period, believe (though Herodotus has asserted it) that the Amazons were deprived of their right breast, in order that they might more conveniently use the right arm."

Mrs. Booth, who is still living (see p. 244) was a daughter of Archbishop Sharp, and is a lady of most respectable character, though she embraced the religion of her husband from whom she lived separate. In your last vol. p. 236, you related the (supposed) death of the Count of Albany, but never (as I remember) have contradicted it.

P. 244. The late Lord Vere was, I presume, the last surviving peer of the last century. The Earl of Guilford, born in 1704, is, I suppose, the oldest English peer now living.

P. 248. What "state laws" prevented the English bishops from consecrating Bishop Seabury? N. J.

MR. URBAN, Leicester, April 12.

PERMIT me to propose to the wisdom of our legislators a tax of one shilling a year on common watches and clocks, and half-a-crown on gold watches; to be paid, if possible, at the commencement of the year, for every year ensuing. To wear a cels or tax-assurance in the case, or a metallic appendage externally, of a quality most agreeable to the owner, to be paid for to government; which persons of public spirit, so far from deeming a disgrace, will consider as a mark of honour, as a proof that they contribute to the occasions of their country.

Such watches or clocks as are illegally without them to be forfeited, if in wear or use, as the legislature pleases, either all to the public use, or part to the informer. May such a productive tax supersede that distressful and inefficient one on baptisms, marriages, and burials!

If a person goes out of the nation, and returns after his year, he should pay for the year he is in, though half be elapsed, re-entering his watch and clock, and paying the tax a month at furthest after his arrival, or forfeit it. Foreigners, as to watches, exempted. Public clocks not excepted. This tax to affect or comprehend both sexes.

If a person sells, or otherwise parts with his watch or clock, the buyer or possessor, if in use, must enter it within a month in his own name, paying a fresh tax. This tax not to affect clock or watch-makers, further than that which they wear out of trade.

May our present statesmen do two good things; adopt my preceding scheme, and raise their projector above the condition of a curate! Yours,

WILLIAM BICKERSTAFFE.

MR. URBAN,

MR. TOUP (see p. 185) offered to Mr. Fletcher, the famous Oxford bookseller, to publish Longinus thirty-five years ago, or perhaps forty, if Mr. Fletcher would undertake to print it on his own account, which that cautious old gentleman declined, as Mr. Toup's sagacity was not at that time known, even to the university. The refusal was a fortunate one; and the public, no doubt, has gained greatly by five-and-thirty years reading. When Mr. Toup returned from Cambridge, where he took his master's degree, he paid a visit to his friend in the Turl, and bought an unpublished Greek dictionary in MS. for two guineas, which, by the use the great critic appears to have made of it in his works, must have been a pennyworth. I know no very great particularities in the life of this corrector of Suidas; the life of a recluse seldom affords any that are worth relating. Mr. Toup censured freely, and praised sparingly; and he seems to have thought, as the generality of great men in his line are too apt to think, that after themselves, since the world is for

the

The most part dull and undeserving, the fewer they praise the better. There is not much entertainment in the courtships, if I may so call them, of great scholars; they are like all others, bellum pax rursum, they fight and shake hands, scold, and are friends again; but whether they deal in abuse or panegyrick, whether they call god or dunce, it is clarissimus, it is illustrissimus, it is ὁ πᾶν, like Homer's hero.

Sen fiat seu currit semper πόδας ὦκτος Ἀχιλλεύς.

Mr. Reiske indeed complained bitterly, it should seem, to Dr. Askew of Mr. Toup's usage of him, which made the doctor offer to get any thing printed in London against Toup. Reiske, however, died without retaliation or apology, before or since, though the case of Erasimus and Scaliger might have shown that great men can relent, and still maintain their dignity. But no injured scholar on the continent can want a champion whilst Mr. Schneider can hold a pen. Judge, O you Muses, of the provocation, how slight! Mr. Warton, one of the most ingenious men we are possessed of, with great pretensions to a critical taste in Greek, makes a few innocent blunders in re-publishing an edition of the Anthologia, upon which Schneider says with a sneer, "Qualia decet Anglum." I wish Mr. Schneider could read Mr. Warton's notes upon Milton, or any of his numerous works, which are so highly prized by his countrymen. When Mr. Toup re-published the substance of the cancelled sheet in his Appendiculum Notarum ad Theocritum, he spoke very indecently of the Oxford Hebræans, and treated them with the most consummate contempt. Upon which a late eminent professor fired an epigram in Greek at the critick's head, and paid him in his own coin. The turn of the epigram was, if I remember, an allusion to Toup's dedication of the Stratonicæ to the archbishop, "that he had hung up the ensigns of Priapus in the chapel at Lambeth." I once saw a translation of this jeu d'esprit, the work of a late eminent chancellor, who was himself more than equal to the writing of the original. If I were asked to give an opinion of Mr. Toup's critical performances, I think I should be founded in saying, that he was less happy in conjecturing, than in defending his conjectures; and in this he resembled his great master Bentley, whose very errors were instructive. No one ever went away from the emendations of Suidas, without having been assured of something besides the vanity of the annotator; and though he could by no means subscribe to one half of the alterations proposed by the note-writer, yet would he think himself happy to command the same respect from others, that they had extorted from him. Mr. Toup is often ingenious, and always learned; and by a peculiar felicity in discovering the places to which his author alludes, or quotes, has explained difficulties, and illustrated obscurities, with greater plausibility, and more undoubted success, than any of his predecessors. This learned gentleman, though he enjoyed but little protection from the heads of the church, is said to have died worth twelve thousand pounds, no part of which he can ever be suspected to have got by his publications.

MR. URBAN,

THERE was, till within the present century, retained within the precincts of the royal palace of Westminster, a solemn officer, styled the king's cock-crower; whose duty, during the whole season of Lent, was to crow the hour, instead of crying it, as is the practice of watchmen. Whether that venerable function was abolished by the late bill for the reformation, as it was called, of the Royal Household, I am ignorant. I do know that in most seasons, wherein a pretended rage for reformation prevails, many customs, whose origin did in reality aim at reforming our manners and lives, are confounded with abuses, and levelled indiscriminately. The intention of crowing the hour of the night was undoubtedly to remind waking sinners of the august effect the third crowing of the cock had on the guilty apostle St. Peter: and the limitation of the custom to the season of Lent was judiciously adopted; as, had the practice continued throughout the year, the impenitent would become as habituated and as indifferent to the crow of the mimic cock, as they are to that of the real one, or to the cry of the watchman. The adaptation to the precincts of the court seems also to have had a view, as if the institutor (probably the Royal Confessor) had considered that the greater and more obdurate sinners resided within the purlieus of the palace.

Many reasons concur for restoring the office of royal cock-crower, if abolished. One is, that it would not now be a fine-cure: as we have turned night into day, the officer in question could not sleep on his post. As courtiers too do not at present retire to rest till morning, the cock-crower would have much more chance of striking terror into their guilty minds, as happened to St. Peter, than by giving his warning to men fast asleep; the only mistake which the institutor seems to have made in so religious an establishment! How awfully would it strike a noble lady, passing through the streets with a row of footmen and torches before her chair, to hear a chanticleer of sonorous lungs crow, "Past four o'clock, and a cloudy morning!" Peter wept; her ladyship might drop a tear.

As the national concerns too are often agitated in the senate past midnight, might not the venerable senators themselves receive devout mementos of their mortality, on meeting in the broad-way at Whitehall, as they return from their duty, a body of cock-crowers iterating the past hour: could we suppose that any of those legislators had, like St. Peter, been denying their master; or, like his comrade Judas, been selling their conscience for a bribe? But I recollect, that the office remained in force long since debates lasted past midnight, and even since bribery and corruption had taken root; and, yet it is not recorded, that any member of either house ever imitated St. Peter at the voice of his Majesty's cock-crower, and repented.

I am founded in this bold assertion by an anecdote, dated soon after the accession of the present royal family. On the first Ash-wednesday at night, as his late Majesty, then Prince of Wales, sat down to supper, a person advanced, before the chaplain said grace, and crowed "Past ten o'clock." The astonished prince, not understanding English, and mistaking the tremulation of the crow for mockery, concluded that this ceremony was an insult, and was rising from table in great heat, till informed, that what his royal highness took for an affront was nothing but an etiquette of the palace, which had been practised in the presence of all preceding princes, Plantagenets, Tudors, and Stuarts. However, the practice was discontinued from that time within the walls of St. James's, and no more performed than our sovereigns wash the feet of the poor on Maunday Thursday in person.

MR. URBAN, Kent, April 16.

BEING a great admirer of the stately oak, I read with pleasure whatever I meet with on the subject of that venerable tree, the boast of this kingdom. In your vol. LIII. p. 697, a gentleman, who signed T. Ruggles, whether it be his real, or an assumed name, has entertained your readers with an account of different kinds of our oaks. But neither he, nor T. H. W. p. 653, and in your last Feb. Mag. p. 109, nor indeed the great Miller, have taken any notice of a very particular species (for so I presume to call it) which I have seen: it is supposed to be the only one of the sort in that neighbourhood, which abounds with timber, and possibly in the kingdom. The children call it the French oak, from its rough appearance, like what is called the French hen. * A branch of this curious tree I shewed last summer to a very eminent nursery-man, who was totally unacquainted with it, though he professes to have seen the several oaks of all the different parts of the world. And, like other great natural philosophers, when they cannot account for things, he wisely pronounced it a resus nature. But in this I must beg leave to differ from him; for it appears to me to be a distinct species; and, I am informed, bore several acorns in the year 1783, although last year, which was very unfavourable for them, it had none.

It may here be expected that I should give a * description of the leaf; but for doing this properly, I must confess myself wholly disqualified: nor could the nursery-man abovementioned enable me to describe it botanically; so totally different is it from any other species of the oak. I can only inform the diligent enquirer into natural history, where he may satisfy his curiosity with this extraordinary sight. And Mr. Ruggles, if that be the gentleman's real name, and he actually lives in Essex, from whence he dates †, or any other curious naturalist, will not think much of a journey of forty miles from London to see this extraordinary tree, which is growing in a field belonging to Sir Horace Mann, at a small hamlet, called Riden Quarter, in the parish of Goudhurst, in the Weald of Kent.

It is to be hoped, Mr. Urban, that some gentleman will take the trouble (or, I may say, pleasure) of examining this singular tree, and send you a particular and botanical account for your insertion in some future Magazine.

* All that I can say upon it is, that the leaf is about two inches long, divided into five or six parts, which I call lobes, placed and shaped irregularly, and stands upon little or no foot-stalk.

† Mr. R. dates from "Cobham," which is in Surrey. EDIT.

"Mr. Turner ‡ and Mildmay, of Graces, lost it to Rich, though he caused the freeholders to be sworn."

"There were few or no gentlemen, and a small appearance of commons."

"To the Right Rev. Father in God, Right Hon. in his Highness the Lord Protector, Right Worshipfull in his Country, and Right Worthy in himself, Fleetwood shewed this to § Noll (saying) "they will jeer us." "Has he any fleece on his back?" "No." "We had best suffer their jeers, and let them alone."

At the End is added a short Chronological Index of Men and Things of the greatest Note, alphabetically digested, chiefly relating to the Sacred and Roman History, from the Beginning of the World to the Year of Christ 1640, and downwards. Written for the Use of the Schools of Great-Britain, by Richard Hogarth, Schoolmaster, 1712." This little book has also a Latin title-page to the same purpose, "Disputationes Grammaticales, &c." and is dedicated, "Scholarchis, Ludimagistris, et Hypodidascalis Magnæ Britanniae."

P. 8. In the "Wanstead Assembly" are introduced portraits of the first earl Tylney, his lady, their children, tenants, &c.

P. 12. In the Bee, vol. V. p. 552, are the following verses * to Mr. Hogarth, on Miss F's picture, 1734.

To Chloe's picture you such likeness give,
The animated canvas seems to live;
The tender breasts with wanton heavings move,

And the soft sparkling eyes inspire with love;
While I survey each feature o'er and o'er,
I turn idolater, and Paint adore:
Here, Chloe, I at least transported see
Your eyes with softness languishing on me;
Hogarth has all the charms in sight display'd,
But wisely kept your pride and scorn in shade.

Ibid. William Western, esq. who died of the small-pox, Aug. 12, 1729, is said, in the "Political State," to have possessed 5000l. a year. He married a sister of lord Bateman, by whom he left a son and two daughters.

P. 16. The late Mr. Cole, of Milton, in his copy of these Memoirs, had written against the name of Bambridge, "Father to the late attorney of that name, a worthy son of such a father. He lived at Cambridge." And in a copy of the first edition, on occasion of a note (afterwards withdrawn) which mentioned "Mr. Baker's having quarrelled with Hearne;" Mr. Cole wrote, "Mr. Baker quarrelled with no man: he might coolly debate with Mr. Hearne on a disputable point. It is, therefore, a misrepresentation of Mr. Baker's private character, agreeable to the petulance of this age."

P. 33. Lord Gardenston, one of the lords of session in Scotland, on delivering his opinion in the court of session upon the question of literary property, in the cause of Hinton and Donaldson and others, all booksellers, in July, 1773, thus introduced the works of Hogarth: "There is nothing can be more similar than the work of engraving is to literary composition. I will illustrate this proposition by the works of Mr. HOGARTH, who, in my humble opinion, is the only true original author which this age has produced in England. There is hardly any character of an excellent author, which is not justly applicable to his works. What composition, what variety, what sentiment, what fancy, invention, and humour, we discover in all his performances! In every one of them an entertaining history, a natural description of characters, and an excellent moral. I can read his works over and over; Horace's characteristic of excellency in writing, decies repetita placebit; and every time I peruse them, I discover new beauties, and feel fresh entertainment: can I say more in commendation of the literary compositions of a Butler or a Swift? There is great authority for this parallel; the legislature has considered the works of authors and engravers in the same light; they have granted the same protection to both; and it is remarkable, that the act of parliament for the protection of those who invent new engravings, or prints, is almost in the same words with the act for the protection and encouragement of literary compositions." This is taken from a 4to pamphlet, published in 1774 by James Boswell, esq. advocate, one of the counsel in the cause.

P. 83. A few months before this ingenious artist was seized with the malady which deprived society of one of its most distinguished ornaments, he proposed to his matchless pencil the work he has intitled a tail-piece; the first idea of which is said to have been started in company, while the convivial glass was circulating round his own table. "My next undertaking," said Hogarth, "shall be the End of all Things." "If that is the case," replied one of his friends, "your business will be finished; for there will be an end of the painter." "There will so," answered Hogarth, sighing heavily; "and, therefore, the sooner my work is done, the better." Accordingly he began the next day, and continued his design with a diligence which seemed to indicate an apprehension (as the report goes) that he should not live till he had completed it. This, however, he did in the most ingenious manner, by grouping every thing which could denote the end of all things—a broken bottle—an old broom worn to the stump—the butt-end of an old musket—a cracked bell—bow unstrung—a crown tumbled in pieces—towers in ruins—the sign-post of a tavern, called the World's End, tumbling—the moon in her wane—the map of the globe burning—a gibbet falling, the body gone, and the chain which held it dropping down—Phœbus and his horses dead in the clouds—a vessel wrecked—Time, with his hour-glass and scythe broken; a tobacco-pipe in his mouth, the last whiff of smoke going out—a play-book opened, with Exeunt omnes stamped in the corner—an empty purse—and a statute of bankruptcy taken out against Nature.—"So far, so good," cried Hogarth; "nothing remains but this,"—taking his pencil in a sort of prophetic fury, and dashing off the similitude of a painter's pallet broken—"Finis," exclaimed Hogarth, "the deed is done—all is over."—It is a very remarkable fact, and little known perhaps, that he died in about a month after this tail-piece. And it is well known he never again took the pallet in hand, to the infinite loss of society.

"Take him for all in all,

"We shall not look upon his like again."

P. 88. One of the best portraits (and probably the most striking likeness) Hogarth ever painted, is at Lichfield. It is the picture of a gentleman with whom he was very intimate, and at whose houses at Mortlake and in Ironmonger's-lane, he spent much of his time—Mr. Joseph Porter, London, merch. who died April 7, 1749. Mrs. Porter, the sister of this gentleman (who was daughter of Dr. Johnson's wife by a former husband) is in possession of the picture.—John Steers, esq. (of Paper Buildings in the Temple) has an auction by Hogarth, which Dr. Chauncey, Dr. Snagg, and others, are introduced; and the Earl of Exeter has a butcher's shop, with Slack fighting, &c.

P. 100. In 1762 was published in 4to, undated, "A Catalogue of the Original Paintings, Busts, Carved Figures, &c. &c. &c. now exhibiting by the Society of Sign Painters, at the large Room, the upper End of Bow-street, Covent-Garden, nearly opposite the Playhouse Passage."

In the "Nouveau Dictionnaire Historique, Caen, 1783," our artist is thus characterised: "Ses compositions sont mal dessinées & faiblement colorées; mais ce sont des tableaux parlans de diverses scènes comiques ou morales de la vie. Il avoit négligé le mécanisme de son art, c'est-à-dire, les traits du pinceau, le rapport des parties entr'elles, l'effet du clair obscur, l'harmonie du coloris, &c. pour s'élever jusqu'à la perfection de ce mécanisme, c'est-à-dire, au poétique & au moral de la peinture. 'Je reconnois,' disoit-il, 'tout le monde pour juge compétent de mes tableaux, excepté les connoisseurs de profession.' Un seul exemple prouvera combien réussit. Il avoit fait graver une estampe, dans laquelle il avoit exprimé avec énergie les différens tourmens qu'on fait éprouver aux animaux. Un chartier fouettoit un jour ses chevaux avec beaucoup de dureté: un bon homme, touché de pitié, lui dit, 'Miserable! tu n'as donc pas vu l'estampe d'Hogarth?' Il n'étoit pas seulement peintre, il fut écrivain. Il publia en 1750 un traité en Anglois, intitulé, 'Analyse de la Beauté.' L'auteur prétend que les formes arrondies constituent la beauté du corps: principe vrai à certains égards, faux à plusieurs autres: Voy. sur cet artiste, la second volume du 'Mercure de France,' Janvier, 1770."

P. 136. Of Heidegger an authenticated life may be seen in the lately-published edition of the "Biographical Dictionary."

P. 146. n. "Lady Vane." I have seen a copy of this print, with the following title and verses: "King Henry VIII. bringing to court Anne Bullen, who was afterwards his royal consort."

See here the great, the daring Harry Hands,
Peace, Plenty, Freedom, shining in his face,
With lovely Anna Bullen joining hands,
Her looks bespeaking ev'ry heav'nly grace.

GRANT. MAQ. May 1785.

See Wolsey frowning, discontent and sour,
Feeling the superstitious structure shake:
While Henry's driving off the Roman whore
For Britain's weal, and his Lutheran's sake,

Like Britain's Genius our brave King appears,
Despising Priestcraft, Avarice, and Pride;
Nor the loud roar of Babel's bells he fears,
The Dagon falls before his beauteous bride, Like England's Church, all sweetness and resign'd,

The comely Queen her Lord with calmness
eyes;
As if she said, If goodness guard your mind,
You ghostly tricks and trumps may despise.

P. 151. "This woman," said Hogarth, after he had drawn Sarah Malcolm, "by her features, is capable of any wickedness."—Mr. Pedington died Sept. 18, 1734.

P. 155. In the Craftsman, 1733, was this advertisement: "Mr. Hogarth being now engraving nine copper-plates from pictures of his own painting, one of which represents the Humours of a Fair, the other eight the Progress of a Rake, intends to publish the prints by subscription, on the following terms: each subscription to be one guinea and a half: half-a-guinea to be paid at the time of subscribing, for which a receipt will be given on a new etched print, and the other payment of one guinea on delivery of all the prints when finished, which will be with all convenient speed, and the time publicly advertised. The Fair, being already finished, will be delivered at the time of subscribing. Subscriptions will be taken in at Mr. Hogarth's, the Golden Head, in Leicester Fields, where the pictures are to be seen."

P. 159. The Harlot's Progress appeared surely in 1732; for in the Craftsman of Nov. 25, that year, we read, "This day is published, six prints in chiaro oscuro, of the Harlot's Progress, from the designs of Mr. Hogarth, in a beautiful green tint, by Mr. E. Kirkall, with proper explanations under each print. Printed and sold by E. Kirkall, in Dockwell-court, White-Fryars; Phil. Overton, in Fleet-street; H. Overton and J. Hoole, without Newgate; J. King, in the Poultry; and T. Glais, under the Royal Exchange." "Mother Needham's Lamentation, pr. 6d," was published in May, 1731.

P. 176. In the Craftsman of May 14, 1731, is an advertisement nearly similar to that printed in vol. LIII. p. 347; and in a short time after the following:
"Pursuant

"Pursuant to an agreement with the subscribers to the Rake's Progress, not to sell them for less than two guineas each set after publication thereof, the said original prints are to be had at Mr. Hogarth's, the Golden Head, in Leicester Fields; and at Tho. Bakewell's, print-seller, next Johnson's-court, in Fleet-street, where all other print-sellers may be supplied.

"In four days will be published, copies from the said prints, with the consent of Mr. Hogarth, according to the act of parliament, which will be sold at 2s. 6d. each set, with the usual allowance to all dealers in town and country; and, that the publick may not be imposed on, at the bottom of each print will be inserted these words, viz. "Published with the consent of Mr. William Hogarth, by Tho. Bakewell, according to an act of parliament."

"N. B. Any person that shall sell any other copies, or imitations of the said prints, will incur the penalties in the late act of parliament, and be prosecuted for the same."

P. 181. The celebrated Beccaria, in his "Essay on Public Happiness," vol. II. p. 172, observes, "I am sensible there are persons whom it will be difficult for me to persuade; I mean those profound contemplators, who, secluding themselves from their fellow-creatures, are assiduously employed in framing laws for them, and who frequently neglect the care of their domestic and private concerns, to prescribe to empires that form of government, to which they imagine that they ought to submit. The celebrated Hogarth hath represented, in one of his moral engravings, a young man who, after having squandered away his fortune, is, by his creditors, lodged in a gaol. There he sits, melancholy and disconcerted, near a table, whilst a scroll lies under his feet, and bears the following title: "being a new scheme for paying the debt of the nation. By T. L. now a prisoner in the Fleet."

P. 192. The six paintings of the Harlot's Progress at Fonthill cost, at 14 guineas each, 84l. 4s.; the eight of the Rake's Progress, 22 guineas each, 176l. 16s.

P. 194. The original of "Before and After" are at the earl of Besborough's seat at Roehampton.

P. 196. In the Craftsman, March 12, 1736-7, occurs, "This day is published, price 3s. a print representing a DISTRESSED POET. Also, five etchings, of different characters of heads in groups, viz. a Chorus of singers; a pleased Audience at a Play; Scholars at a Lecture; and Quacks in Consultation; price 6d. each. To be had either bound together with all Mr. Hogarth's late engraved works (except the Harlot's Progress) or singly, at the Golden Head, in Leicester Fields; and at Mr. Bakewell's, print-seller, next the Horn Tavern, Fleet-street." And April 2 and 9, 1737, "Just published, price 3s. A print representing a DISTRESSED POET. Designed and engraved by Mr. HOGARTH. Also four etchings, viz. A pleased Audience; a Chorus of Singers; Scholars at a Lecture; and a Consultation of Quacks, price 6d. each. To be had at the Golden Head, in Leicester Fields; and at Mr. Bakewell's, print-seller, next the Horn Tavern, in Fleet-street. Where may be had, bound or otherwise, all Mr. Hogarth's late engraved works, viz. A Midnight Conversation; Southwark Fair; the Rake's Progress, in eight prints; a sleepy Congregation in a Country Church; Before and After, two prints."

P. 211. The duke of Ancafter bought the "Morning and Night;" Sir William Heathcote "Noon" and "Evening."

P. 213. The following information, communicated by a respectable friend, may be relied on as authentic. "Mr. John Festin, the first hautboy and German flute of his time, had numerous scholars, to each of whom he devoted an hour every day. At nine in the morning he attended Mr. Spencer, grandfather to the earl of that name. If he happened to be out of town on any day, he devoted that hour to another. One morning at that hour he waited on Mr. V—n, afterwards Lord V—n. He was not up. Mr. Festin went into his chamber, and opening the shutter of a window, sat down in it. The figure with the hautboy was playing under the window. A man, with a barrow full of onions, came up to the player, and sat on the edge of his barrow, and said to the man, "If you will play the Black Joke, I will give you this onion." The man played it. When he had so done, the man again desired him to play some other tune, and then he would give him another onion. "This," said Festin to me, "highly angered me; I cried out, Z—ds, sir, stop here. This fellow is ridiculing my profession: he is playing on the hautboy for onions." Being intimate with Mr. Hogarth, he mentioned the circumstance to him; which, as he said, was the origin of "The enraged Musician."

Mr. Festin has not been dead ten years. He was brother to the Festin who led the band at Ranelagh."

P. 218. In regard to the likeness merely, there cannot be a finer than that of Capt. Coram.

P. 222. Edward Swallow, butler to Archbishop Herring, had an annuity of ten pounds given to him in his Grace's will. For the honesty and simplicity of his physiognomy, this old faithful servant was so remarkable, that Hogarth wanting such a figure in Marriage à la Mode, accompanied the late dean of Sarum, Dr. Thomas Greene, on a public day to Lambeth, on purpose to catch the likeness. As they were coming away, he whispered, "I have him!" And he may now be seen to the life preserved in the old steward, in plate II. with his hands held up, &c.

P. 228. Hogarth said himself, that Lord Lovat's portrait was taken (at the White Hart at St. Alban's) in the attitude of relating on his fingers the numbers of the rebel forces—"Such a general had so many men, &c." and remarked, that the muscles of Lovat's neck appeared of unusual strength, more so than he had ever seen. When the painter entered the room, his lordship, being under the barber's hands, received his old friend with a salute, which left much of the lather on his face.

P. 229. What is said of Hogarth's Garrick in Richard, is equally applicable to Dance's fine picture of him in that character.

P. 241. Mr. Palmer was lord of the manor of Cogenhoe, or Cooknoe, and patron of the church of Ecton.

P. 242. The late Rev. Mr. Hall, of Harbledown, in a MS letter to a friend, July 1, 1756, says, "Both the prints of the Archbishop [Herring] have so little resemblance, that it seems to me indifferent which I take."

In 1739 that primate, (then Bp. of Bangor) in a letter to Mr. Ducombe, mentions having seen "a group of figures" in Merionethshire, drawn about them by a harper, "that Hogarth would give any price for."

P. 258. In one of the plates of the Analysis, Hogarth records his quarrel with Quin, whom he represents as stabbing Brutus. He is drawn at full length, with his back to the spectators. In the same print he drew Effex the dancing-master, endeavouring to reduce the graceful attitude of Antinous to modern stiffness.

P. 299. Mr. Garrick's publication was thus prefaced: "The following interlude was prepared for the stage, merely with a view of assisting Mrs. Pritchard at her benefit; and the desire of serving so good an actress is a better excuse for its defects, than the few days in which it was written and represented. Notwithstanding the favourable reception it has met with, the Author would not have printed it, had not his friend, Mr. Hogarth, flattered him most agreeably, by thinking the Farmer and his Family not unworthy of a sketch of his pencil. To him, therefore, this trifle, which he has so much honoured, is inscribed, as a faint testimony of the sincere esteem which the writer bears him, both as a man and an artist."

MR. URBAN, B. C. Durham.

I SEND you the drawing of a fibula of uncommon magnitude and weight, found in April last, at Huskew Pike, an eminence distant from Penrith in Cumberland about three miles, on the Keswick road, (See the plate, fig. 8.) In searching for stones, several urns, and other remains of human sepulture, have been found at this place; but history is silent touching the people here interred, or whether the occasion was public: the adjacent country was the scene of many dead'y conflicts in early ages. The fibula is of silver, and coarse workmanship; the diameter of the circle is seven inches and a half; the studs or buttons are hollow, and fitted on without solder; it has never been burnished, as appears by the hammer marks remaining: the length of the tongue, or spear, is twenty inches and three quarters; and the whole weight is twenty-five ounces. I hope some of your correspondents will discover its proper use, as it seems to be too heavy an ornament for a man's apparel. Yours, W. H.

MR. URBAN,

YOUR Magazine, which has seen the rise and fall of many competitors, and been the favoured remembrancer of an eventful age, after its friends had begun to fear, and its rivals perhaps to hope, its dissolution, has lately exerted its resources with new vigour in Natural Philosophy, Poetry, Antiquities, Criticism, and Biography. When

When such is the fact, it would be capricious to dwell on slight blemishes: but I hope it is friendly to your work, and to the public, to notice, with honest meaning, some articles which will find their way into the best-conducted miscellanies, though candour will hardly rank them among those petty imperfections. The last humiliating circumstances of our visible existence should be shielded from ridicule, which is unnatural; and from reproach, which is inhuman, to say the least. Newton yielded no otherwise to the general law of dissolution than Peter the wild Man of the Woods; Addison, than Chatterbox. Lucretia and Messalina, Achilles and Therites, the deified Charles and the demoniated Cromwell, and, to finish with a circumstance the most affecting, in our external change the loveliest and the least attractive of human forms are subject to an equal sentence in the grave. But is this a reason for extinguishing our sympathy in that sole consideration which is alike to all? Where is the moral lesson the disgusting legend can supply by which the remains of the fair Rosamond are insulted? Are frailty and impregnable virtue in this respect discriminated? Where is the satisfaction of minutely particularizing the effects of death on the supposed bodies of Ireton, Cromwell, and Bradshaw? I should be ashamed to violate decency, and the just respect to our nature, by transcribing the smallest part of what they who sent you those articles were not ashamed to publish with marks of extravagant satisfaction. Beauty, which could subdue the wise; and the stern countenance, which could awe the brave: the arm victorious over heroic foes; the features which unchanged enforced the solemnity of a tribunal in the name of which the rulers of the earth have not yet ceased to tremble:—all that could once enchant or dismay, it is now easy to make the subject of unfeeling mockery. But, for the future, is it too much to hope that such triumphs will be forborne? that from the Repository of humanizing Science they will, however, be far? Yet it were well if my complaint might justly end here. I stand arraigned, with others, for the honourable crime of attempting justice to the memory of a departed friend! and, under the name of Vindication in behalf of an eminent living writer (whose excellencies are not impaired by a free representation of his errors), the honest fame of the dead is touched with an ungentle hand: a far greater injury than to insult their perishable remains; which however, I am persuaded, the gentleman who has made this attack on a sincere tribute of affection to merit, early indeed removed, would, in any instance, abhor. For Dr. Priestley he can feel hardly greater veneration than my heart warrants me in professing; but, if he supposes that any system of opinions, religious, moral, or political, determines my partiality or aversion, he mistakes me much.

It is the sensibility and probity of the heart, that, when I venture an encomium, must always be the leading qualification.—I lament that there is yet a remaining cause of remonstrance: a living character, whose sex, whose talents, whose sensibility, and whose sufferings, must, one would have thought, irresistibly have pleaded with an Urban: those sufferings, so early, acute, and various; so perpetually renewed; so aggrivated by a succession of better prospects; so embittered by their causes; so greatly imputable to others: and these the lot of personal elegance; of a mind most susceptible of those impressions which animate and which torture life; a mind, amid indulgences and trials which suffer few to think, fraught with just, delicate, generous sentiment: whose sincerity and benevolence appear to have been unchanged in the varying extremes of either fortune. Such, at least, are the ideas which arise from one of the most simply elegant and interesting narratives I have yet read. Your introduction to the Review of this Apology is marked with a severity too pointed for preliminary criticism, on the mere circumstance of a title, which the author did not, I presume, mean in the sense of a Greek Father, but in the sense in which her own language employs it; and, in this sense, happy would be the life which needed no Apology!—if the wisest and best of men could shew us that life. But still far more cruel (for the occasion will not bear a weaker expression) is the charge of an egregious failure in the sententious morality of the Apologist, in reconciling (one would imagine she had attempted this) the misconduct to which she owed the particular circumstances of her birth, to the rules of propriety and virtue. If she has not effected this, there is however no failure; for she has shewn too much moral sense and ingenueness to make the attempt. She does does not dwell, it is true, on the error of a mother: but the single word, 'duplicité,' is from her pen decisive; as, both in speculation and conduct, she appears herself to have recognised, as the first of virtues, sincerity. The fatal consequences, which this original misfortune drew on her life, with filial tenderness she avoids suggesting, and contents herself with a short reflection on the little applause with which she made her first appearance on the stage of life; a remark which has not only a liveliness and grace, but seems to me more pathetic than a long series of plaintive reflections would have been.

There is an indiscriminating vehemence of censure in some other expressions of your Reviewer, which strangely triumphs over the confession of female frailty, not only entitled to sympathy from many peculiar circumstances, but blended with qualities which, on a just account, may give the preponderance to the scale of merit. Of her literary deserts you at present say nothing; as you are to proceed, I would be unwilling to anticipate. The most sentimental (in the genuine, undebased sense of the word), the most pathetic and nobly moral passages from the great father and perpetual glory of our drama, she has retained with much credit to her memory; and applied with still greater honour to the felicity of her taste and judgement. On the whole, without prejudice to the free decision of others, my own idea accords nearly with that expressed in the Monthly Review: "That her narration is easy and natural; her story both amusing and affecting; many of her characters happily and justly delineated; her reflections often truly moral, sometimes particularly suited to her situation, and agreeably tinged with female delicacy."

The abandoning of the trust under the will of Mr. Woodward appears not only to merit the reprehension which is given to it by the Reviewers, but I am not without hope the executors may be made answerable to Mrs. Bellamy for the disappointment and loss sustained by it. An executorship being a personal confidence from the deceased testator, our law holds the person who once accepts it bound inviolably to the discharge of one of the most sacred of human duties, and that he cannot transfer his personal responsibility. With relation to the proper and most effectual mode by which the trust might have been carried into execution, there are some material queries intimated by Mrs. Bellamy, to which perhaps the Memoirs do not supply all the legally essential facts requisite for a decided answer. There is however in the metropolis learning, ability, and philanthropy, which, I have no doubt, if the case, on fuller knowledge, admits of redress, will give that effectual assistance I can only wish. C. L.

The following Memoirs of Lieut. Colonel William Proud, who was slain at the siege of Maestricht, July 12, 1632, extracted from a scarce sermon (on 2 Sam. III. 38.) preached at his Funeral in Canterbury Cathedral, Sept. 20, by Francis Rogers, D. D. Minister of St. Margaret's in that city, seem worth preserving.*

"THIS valiant souldier first went, for his countrie's service, Portugall voyage†. Then he served in the wars of Brittany. Thirdly, he went Cales voyage‡. Next, the island voyage§. Fifthly, he went into Ireland, where he was Colonel to a troope of horse, which being cashiered, he was made Lieutenant to a foote company. After all these travels and dangers, he went to Ostend, the most famous siege that ever was, or, I thinke, ever will be||. The enemy valiantly assaulted, the besieged valiantly repulsed them. The then Generall, the honour of our nation in this latter age, noble Sir Francis Vere employed him, being but a private gentleman, in a sally, in which he got the first badge of his honour, being shot into the thigh with a musket bullet. And the Generall observing his valour, and his stout and discrete answer, tooke such a liking of him, as shortly after his returne he made him a Lieutenant, and in a little space after, he made him a Chiefetaine; we say a Captaine, which he alwaies to his dying day would acknowledge, with a most thankfull mind, to be the ground of all his honour and fortune. And such was his fidelity ever after to that noble Generall, as he would not endure any man to speak basely of him, or in the least measure to detract from his worth. Having gotten this honour, he so carried himself for valour, for diligence, for insight in his office, as that the late prince of Orange, of famous memory, and the now illustrious and victorious prince, and all the army, noted his worth and merit. And still he advanced himselfe to higher place, being made a serjant-major of a regiment, and after that a lieutenant-collonell. Hee was not the end, but the beginning and foundation of his family *. Hee hath so raysed his house, as that his heire may live nobly, and comfort himself with the prime gentlemen of his countrey." It is further said, that "all the country round about, of the prime ranke, for knights†, cleargy, and gentlemen, with the grave citizens, and others, came to performe their last duety of civill humanity and christian charity to his deceased corps, brought to bee interred in his own city and country."

A monument to his memory, with his effigy kneeling, is in St. Michael's chapel, erected by his surviving son, Searles Prude; on which we are told, that he "married Mary, daughter of Sir Adam Spracklin, knt. and had four sons and three daughters." There are also some verses, expressive of his piety as well as valour.

MR. URBAN,

A CORRESPONDENT, who signs A. T. M. in your last volume, p. 816, has presumed to reform the Lord's Prayer. How far he may be justified in doing this, or upon what authority, is a question I mean to agitate. In the first place I shall represent to him, that I never heard any Christian declare he saw the least impropriety or indecency in that most sublime ORISON, which, being delivered and recommended by our Saviour himself, ought not to be changed or mutilated. Secondly, It has always been considered, and continues still to be esteemed, as the most solemn and efficacious prayer amongst every denomination of Christians, purposely taught us even at our lisping age.

* Tradition says, he was the son of a taylor.

† The sermon is dedicated "To the honoured and worthy Sir Dudley Digges, Sir William Monins, Sir Peter Heyman, Sir Thomas Paimer, Sir John Wild, Sir Thomas Wilford, Sir Christopher Harlort, Sir James Osenden, and Sir Edward Malters," deputy-lieutenants, who, it is said, "were all attentive hearers," and was printed at London by John Norton, 1633.

Lastly, his objection to the word lead us not into temptation, is groundless; for we all know that God tempteth no man; that is, so as to incite, allure, or provoke to sin. No, certainly, such temptations as these cannot be from God, who is essentially good, and ever abhors sin; but they are from the world, the flesh, and the devil: yet as these never have power to tempt us, but with God's permission, nor strength to overcome us, but when we neglect to apply in a proper manner to God for his grace and assistance; therefore, we make use of this expression to signify our total dependence on God; and to beg that he would not give the enemy any power over us, nor suffer us to give ourselves up to him. Moreover, as those trials which God often sends for the exercise of our virtue, and for the proof of our fidelity, are also in Scripture called temptations, such as afflictions, crosses, pains, &c. of which God is certainly the author and distributor; we beg of him, by these words, lead us not into temptation, that, with relation to all such trials as these, he would ever have regard to our weakness, and never lay upon us any load above our strength. Wherefore, it is not the meaning of this petition, to pray that we may never have any temptation (for this might not be expedient for us), but that we may never yield to temptation.

The other alterations appear equally frivolous; nor can I see the necessity of changing the word bread into support, unless the solemn use of it on a particular occasion gives your correspondent offence. I will beg leave, however, to remind him of the danger there is in varying the established form of words in public worship, which, after much deliberation, has not yet been attempted, notwithstanding objections have been frequently made to certain expressions used in the Liturgy.

I own myself a Layman; and have long expected to see a vindication of this matter in your Magazine from some learned Clergyman, it being more properly the province of that body of men, to explain and remove such scruples as your correspondent seems to labour under: many of your readers must be of that order; their silence on this head has greatly surprised me, and at the same time induced me to believe, that many of them are not sufficiently attentive to the business of their ministry.

THEOPHILUS.

SUMMARY OF THE PROCEEDINGS IN PARLIAMENT, SESS. II.

THE*R*E were, Mr. Pitt said, many difficulties to be overcome before the manufacturers of Ireland could in any degree equal those of this country. And on this consideration he had grounded a measure, which he believed could not be easy to controvert; and that was, that in two such nations as G. B. and Ireland, every appearance of oppression from the greater to the less ought carefully to be avoided, for in the nature of things it was impossible that the greater should be affected by an increase of the less, while the real interests of both were the same. In administering, therefore, to the advantage of the one, the interests of both should be consulted. Above all, he wished the committee to remember, that the conditions were intended to be reciprocal. And it was a principle to which the Irish could not object, that those who partake of protection ought in duty to contribute to the expence. This had always been understood in Ireland, and that, in proportion as her wealth increased, the amount of her contributions should increase also. There was no inclination on the side of government to take away with one hand what they gave with the other; but to propose such measures merely as should not only meet the ideas of the two contracting parties, but augment the prosperity, and establish, on an exalted and permanent foundation, the union, the harmony, and the greatness of the whole empire.

He concluded with moving, "That it is the opinion of this committee, that it is highly important, and for the general interest of the British empire, that an intercourse should be finally settled between G. B. and Ireland on equal terms; and that each country should have a like participation of trade, on Ireland securing to this country, that she will pay, in proportion to her growing wealth, such share of the public expence as may arise from the surplus of her revenue in times of peace."

Mr. Marshall observed, that for these last seven years this country had been giving and giving, and, if she continued to give, she would soon have nothing left. He thought it was high time to make a pause.

Lord North declared, that, in his opinion, the propositions of the Right Hon.

Gent. out-did every thing that the wildest imagination could suggest; and entered his protest against a final participation of our trade with Ireland. He owned, that in 1799 he made some concessions to Ireland, but not so humiliating as the Right Hon. Gent. had endeavoured to represent them. The opening the Irish trade to the W. Indies was on no other condition, than that they in return should encourage our Colonies by taking none but British Plantation sugars. In the present proposal Ireland was to bear a part of the public expence; but not till her revenues were greater than her expenditure, which was not likely to be soon, as the Right Hon. Gent. has owned that, for some years back, there has been a great deficiency. He made several other striking objections, and concluded with saying, that, should the propositions upon the table be carried into execution, the trade and manufactures of this kingdom would materially be hurt.

Mr. Dempster confessed, that the propositions had struck him as just, and, when he came to reflect on the loss of America, for want of reasonable concessions being timely made to her, he could not help being a friend to the commercial regulations held forth to Ireland, as that kingdom was in a ferment. There were delegates keeping parliament in awe, and armed associations dictating to those delegates. For his part, he could see no danger to either kingdom by the propositions upon the table; each was to take the other's goods, and each was to support the other's interests; and, if both honestly adhered to that principle, he was sure that both would be gainers; that Ireland would take none of our manufactures, if we did not agree to the propositions, he was certain; and he recommended the vigorous exertion of our national powers for the reduction of the public debt, as the most effectual method of reducing the price of labour in this country, and enabling our manufacturers to go to market on terms of equal cheapness with any country, for he knew of no country of equal plenty and equal industry.

Lord Pennryn said, the alarm had already reached Liverpool.

Mr. Fox spoke chiefly against the impropriety of beginning the business in Ireland. The propositions ought first to have originated in the British parliament;

and,

and, being agreed to there, should have been offered to Ireland either to have been accepted or refused, as they might judge for her interest; but the minister having tendered these concessions, the people of Ireland will not readily submit to any abatement. He took notice of what the Right Hon. Gent. had said of an alarm being spread.—The same alarm had gone forth when he had the honour of being in office, and he was then of the same mind that he was now; and he thought the Right Hon. Gent.'s good sense would have dictated to him to conciliate, not to pour forth venom and invective. His noble friend was then in a critical situation, when he made concessions; but, when the Navigation Act comes to be effaced, it is not easy to foretell the mischief. Sugars may be received in Ireland from foreign Colonies, imported in foreign ships, loaded and sent to England in British or Irish ships. He remarked, in reply to Mr. Dempster, that the propositions were by no means reciprocal; for, in Ireland, they were held forth by Mr. Orde as the means of increasing their trade, and of course of diminishing ours; but here, the language was just the reverse.

Mr. Dempster, in reply, said, he saw no reason why both statements might not be true. The advantage might be mutual, and the trade of both kingdoms increased by a permanent establishment.

Alderman Watson remarked, that the propositions were of serious consequence, and time should be given for local information.

Mr. Rose said, in reply to Mr. Fox, that nothing was to be apprehended on the article of sugars; for France had lately forbidden foreign vessels of more than 60 tons from carrying any of the produce of their Colonies.

Mr. Gilbert then reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Wednesday 23.

Alderm. Newnham moved for papers relative to the commercial intercourse with Ireland, which was agreed to without opposition.

Capt. J. Luttrell, the House in a committee, moved for 390,851. for ordnance service, for the year 1785; And,

For 42,0851. for the pay of land officers in the ordnance service.

Lord Surrey said, that, before he should vote on the motion, he wished to know if compensation was to be made to the persons who had been divested of their property, in order to enlarge the fortifications at Plymouth.

Capt. Luttrell, in reply, said, that nobody had been divested of their property without a compensation.

On this occasion, a repetition of the same arguments as were urged last session (see Vol. LIV; p. 539) took up the time of the House for some hours, and was at length concluded by a humorous speech of Mr. Courtenay, who, seeing the D. of Richmond in the gallery, observed, that to complete the fortifications on the present plan would require 35 years to build them, and 2 millions of money to pay the expence; and, as the noble Duke, who presided at the head of that board, had contrived so many workmen, pentagons, septagons, octagons, &c. would at least take 50,000 men to man them; so that an army must be raised to protect the navy, and the navy augmented to protect the nation.

The original motion was agreed to without a division; but a motion for money to augment the fortifications was deferred.

Thursday 24.

Mr. Francis rose, and called the attention of the House to the military establishment of Bengal. He understood, he said, that money had been raised privately, and applied to discharge debts which had not been included in the estimate. (See p. 224.) This he pledged himself to sift to the bottom; but in the mean time would beg leave to move, "That a copy of a letter from Warren Hastings, Esq; Gov. General of Bengal to the Court of Directors of the E. I. Company, dated the 24th of February 1782, be laid before the House."

Maj. Scott said, he should have no objection to lay the letter moved for before the House, but did not think it would throw the least light on the subject alluded to,

Mr. Francis rose again, to remark on the readiness of the last speaker, whenever he attempted to open a channel of information respecting India affairs, to endeavour to shut it up. The Hon. Gent. came forward not only as the Agent of Governor Hastings, but as the champion of the Directors of the Company.

Maj. Scott rose, in some heat, to assert his right of speaking without controul on all questions that come before the House; and as to India affairs, he was sure he was as well qualified to speak on them as the Hon. Gentleman who spoke last, and would suffer no misrepresentation to pass

unnoticed from whatever quarter it should come.

Mr. Smith (Chairman of the E. India Company) supported Major Scott. He said, that no just inference could be drawn from the accounts upon the table, as errors to a considerable amount had been discovered in the statement of them. He instanced, where a sum of more than half a million, incurred by the military establishment, had been placed to the account of the civil expenditure.

Mr. Fox observed, in reply, that when these accounts had formerly been charged by his honourable friend with inaccuracy, as leading to suspicion, they were then strenuously and clamorously defended. But now, when they were with equal justice arraigned, as imperfect, that irregularity is brought forward as a defence.

Maj. Scott rose again in vindication of their consistency. The insinuations, he said, of the Hon. Gent. who had made the motion, would not from any other person have merited the least attention; but the information, which the Hon. Gentleman might be supposed to derive from his former situation in India, could not fail of leaving an impression upon the House, were it to pass uncontradicted. He therefore found it necessary to assert (for assertion was all that could be brought forward at present) that the conduct of the Governor-General would be found not only irreproachable, but highly meritorious, notwithstanding all the malignant insinuations that had been thrown out against him.

Mr. Burke rose, and remarked on the difficulty of finding an India director in his place; and, now that they had found one, he said, the satisfaction received was by no means equal to the anxiety felt. When charges were brought forward against the Governor-General, the Hon. Gent. (Mr. Smith) had amused the House with a vindication equally singular and insulting; he had risen to inform them, that the accounts laid on their table, in compliance with an act of parliament, were irregular, nugatory, and no ground on which to build an argument. Yet the zeal, with which they had been supported by another Hon. Gentleman (Maj. Scott) had led him to think that Gentleman still the confidential Agent of the Governor General of Bengal; and the rather as he recollected the Hon. Gentleman's acting as the Jupiter Pluvius of the eastern atmosphere, refreshing the parched field there with visionary rains, when not a single drop had fallen within the limits of Hindostan. At that time he must suppose him to have spoken from his own intuitive intelligence. He therefore wished to know in what light he was to view him now.

Maj. Scott wished to know by what right the Hon. Gent. had put his interrogatories. If he chose to retort, he said, he might ask the Hon. Gent. if he was not himself an agent for the Rajah of Tanjore?

This produced a warm altercation, which was not appeased till Sir James Johnstone called to order, and the Speaker had repeatedly interfered. When the ferment was over, the question was called for, and the House divided: Ayes 16 for Mr. Francis's motion; Noes 41.

Friday 25.

Mr. Holdsworth rose, to enforce the necessity of investigating the past proceedings and intended measures of the Duke of Richmond, in building and repairing the different works for the security of his Majesty's dock-yards at Portsmouth and Plymouth. This brought on a warm conversation between Capt. James Luttrell and Mr. Courtney, of which enough has already been said on the subject, which is now in a train of being settled by a board of officers military and naval. (his Grace himself President). See p. 319.

Monday 28.

Mr. Pitt rose, to put off the report of the committee of council, on the subject of the proposed commercial arrangements with Ireland, from to-morrow till Friday, which was agreed to without debate.

Mr. Fox then rose, and earnestly claimed the attention of the House, while he stated the grounds of a motion for papers, on which, he said, he intended to found a direct charge of criminality against his Majesty's Commissioners of Controul and Superintendence, established under the authority of the act of last session, for the better regulation and management of the affairs of the E. I. Company. In all the bills that had been framed for that purpose, in his own bill, in that of the Right Hon. and learned Gentleman over the way [Mr. Dundas], and in that just mentioned which had received the sanction of the legislature, one object was particularly kept in view, namely, the liquidation of the debts of the Nabob of Arcot. The clauses in each, respecting these debts, had clearly and unequivocally laid down the rule that was to be adopted before they were put in a course of payment. The Directors were in so many words expressly enjoined to enquire into the origin of the debts contracted by the Nabob to British subjects, servants to the E. I. Company, and to take no measures for their payment till their legality was ascertained. This express direction of law the Directors had sent orders to India to enforce; but the Commissioners of Controul, in the full face of law, had dispatched other contradictory orders, containing an arrangement for the actual payment of the Nabob's debts without discrimination, and without previous enquiry or investigation; by which unwarrantable and illegal proceeding they had in a manner prohibited, or, 'which is the same thing,' put it out of the power of the Nabob to pay the debt of two millions and a half due to the Company, though at this time of so much importance, in order to discharge their arrears of customs, amounting to near a million due to the public, as well as to answer other purposes. [Here Mr. Fox entered into detail on the Company's affairs.—He gave a curious description of the manner of the Nabob's contracting debts with the Company's servants, who, if they were paid the interest, never wished, nor expected, to be paid the principal. He enlarged on the depreciated state of the Company's credit in India; and instanced the Bombay bonds, which three years ago were at 40 per cent discount; the next year at 50; and the last year at 60; and which now were scarcely negotiable at all. He arranged the debts of the Nabob to English subjects, servants of the Company, into three classes. Those contracted before the year 1767, and those contracted for the payment of arrears to the Nabob's cavalry, he passed slightly over; but those of 1777 he execrated. He was the more severe upon the Commissioners for giving their suffrage to this debt, as they knew that, were it just, the Nabob had no means of paying it; and as they knew it was contracted at a time the most critical and suspicious, when Lord Pigot fell a sacrifice for endeavouring to carry the orders of the Court of Directors into execution. He could not therefore help looking upon those as parties in his fall who countenanced the means by which it was accomplished. He took notice of a part of the instructions of the Commissioners for putting the Nabob of Arcot into possession of Arnee and Hanamanti Cottee, which, he said, was laying the foundation of new troubles.]

He concluded with moving, "That the proper officer be directed to lay before the House copies, or extracts, of all letters and orders of the Court of Directors of the United E. I. Company, in pursuance of the injunction contained in the 37th and 38th clauses of an act, entitled, an Act for the better Regulation and Management of the Affairs of the E. I. Company, and of the British possessions in India," &c.

Mr. Francis rose, and seconded the motion. He reminded the House of the consequences which he had foretold would be the result of this clashing institution. The Directors had no sooner begun to act, than the Commissioners had counteracted. Such a circumstance, when it comes to appear abroad, will be treated with contempt! Parliament, every one knows, supposed an enquiry into the debts of the Nabob necessary; and accordingly ordered the Court of Directors to take into their consideration the origin and justice of the demands of individuals before they were to be put in a course of payment. On this principle the Directors had proceeded, and sent orders accordingly. The Commissioners, in opposition, not only to the Court of Directors, but to the authority of parliament itself, have ordered the whole of the debts, the doubtful and fraudulent, as well as the just and unexceptionable, to be peremptorily paid without exception. On this proceeding Mr. Francis commented severely, and glanced at rumours that had got abroad, as if deeds like these could not have been done without collusion.

Mr. Dundas rose in some heat, and, in a most animated speech of near three hours, entered into a justification of the Board of Controul, which, if it did not convince the opposite party, certainly made a deep impression on the House. In answer to the charge of criminality, he began with reciting a part of the act by which the Court of Directors were commanded to take into their consideration the origin and justice of the demands upon the Nabob, as far as the materials they are in possession of shall enable them to do. This they had done, and no more. The letters and books in the Company's possession at the India House, contained as full information on the debt of 1767, on the cavalry debt, and on the consolidated of 1777, as the Court of Directors could possibly expect to receive. The Court of Directors had stated them; and the arrangement, that the Board of

Con-

Controul had ordered, was that which appeared to them of all others the most fair and just to all the parties. Here he entered into a full explanation of the nature of the several debts. The debt of 1767, he said, was incurred when the Company was in the greatest distress, and when the Nabob, being in debt to the Company, was compelled to borrow money at an interest from 30 to 36 per cent. every penny of which money was paid into the Company's Treasury; but, it appearing afterwards that the lenders were chiefly British subjects, an order was sent from home, for reducing the interest to ten per cent. which order was strictly carried into execution, though at that time much complained of, as the creditors had themselves borrowed money to lend the Nabob at a much higher interest than 10 per cent.—The cavalry debt was not less just. The policy had been, to keep the troops of the Nabob inferior to those of the Company; and an intimation had been given the Nabob, that a part of his cavalry might be spared: to the reduction proposed, the Nabob made no other objection than the want of money to pay the arrears, for which the common men were actually in mutiny, and had confined their officers. This the Company was as little able to advance as the Nabob, and the old method of borrowing was had recourse to; but the Nabob having assigned a part of his revenue by way of security for the former loan, the Company engaged their credit for this, and were as much concerned for the payment of it as if they had borrowed the money themselves. With respect to the consolidated debt of 1777, the learned gentleman declared that the Board of Controul had done no more than allowed the creditors to prefer their claims, subject first to the objections of the Nabob, next to those of the Company, and, last of all, to those of all the other creditors. In conclusion, he took notice of what Mr. Francis had glanced at collusion. This was not, he said, the first time that he had been misrepresented. It had been whispered, that he had received a large sum from an Hon. Bt. then in his eye [Sir T. Rumbold] on a particular occasion; which, however, had not broke his rest; and he hoped he should sleep as sound under this latter imputation, as they were both equally injurious, and both alike unfounded. He spoke of the Fort of Arnee, and the district of Hanamanti-Cottee, as restored again to their ancient masters; and remarked, that, if Parliament wished to have an established government in India, it was not the way idly and lightly to interfere with the executive power on all frivolous occasions, as what was spoken here lost nothing by telling when reported abroad; and what was said at one court in India was no secret at all the rest. He cautioned the House likewise against suddenly imbibing sentiments of doubt and distrust against a board that was but newly instituted, and whose members had characters to lose; while those who opposed them cared not by what means they dispossessed them of their places, provided they could reach the summit of their wishes, and occupy their room. This speech, though apparently full of authentic information, did not meet the ideas of

Mr. Smith, Chairman of the court of E. I. Directors, who admitted, that some of the debts authenticated by the Board of Controul were just and unexceptionable; but that others were of a very different complexion. And

Sir T. Rumbold, who had been particularly referred to by the Rt. Honourable and learned gentleman in the course of his speech, gave it as his opinion, that the Commissioners had acted in open contradiction to the directions of the statute by which they were instituted. He said, the old debt of 1767 was not so free from suspicion as the learned gentleman wished the House to believe, and that the cavalry debt was still more liable to doubt. But as to the consolidated debt of 1777, it was so large a sum as to swallow up by its enormity all the others; and the time at which it was contracted, and the circumstance of Lord Pigot's affair, rendered it so suspicious as to influence all good men against it. Sir Thomas said, that though he had spared no pains to come at the truth, yet he never could get a satisfactory account of it either from the Nabob himself or his creditors. The sums were lent in direct contradiction to the standing orders of the Company, which forbid their servants from lending money to the princes of the country; but that was not the worst.

Mr. Burke in severe terms reprobated the speech of the Rt. Hon. and learned gentleman. It consisted, he said, of false facts, false arguments, and absurd conclusions; and, through all the varnish that had been laid on to cover the most corrupt and iniquitous proceedings of the Board of Controul, he could discover the cloven foot of Benfield, craftily concealed. In the course of his speech he read

read some extracts from the Company's books, to controvert the facts that had been so confidently and plausibly maintained by the learned Commissioner, and treated the whole speech as the pleadings of an artful counsel retained in a bad cause.

At one in the morning the House divided; for the motion 97, against it 194.

Tuesday, March 1.

No public business done, for want of a sufficient number of members to ballot on the Southwark petition.

Lord Carlisle moved the India business in the House of Lords, the same as had been moved the day before in the House of Commons, and with the same success.

Thursday 3.

In consequence of the non-attendance of members on the Southwark petition the day before;

Mr. Pitt rose, and, pleading the delay of public business for his motive, moved the House to come to a resolution, that there be no election committees balloted for next week.

Mr. Eden opposed the motion, as highly injurious to those whom it might concern, who had witnesses to maintain, and other expences to incur, besides the inconvenience to witnesses who might suffer essentially in their business by this ill-timed delay.

Mr. Fox saw the motion in another view. It went, he said, to destroy the very essence of Mr. Grenville's bill, as it militated against the spirit, if not against the letter, of it. The intention of the bill was to compleat the number of members of the House as soon as possible; but, by evading the effect of the bill for a week, a precedent would be established for setting its purpose aside, at all times, by a vote. The motion, however, was carried, 91 to 72; majority in favour of the minister 19.

Mr. Pitt then rose, to bring forward the propositions for a commercial intercourse with Ireland. He was aware, he said, that all the necessary information concerning the extension of privileges claimed by Ireland, and which he thought for the mutual advantage of both kingdoms for G. B. to allow, was not yet received; but he hoped, that by Tuesday next, as he did not wish to carry the business by surprise, those who had ought to state against the principle of the system that he had suggested, would declare their intentions; otherwise he should construe their silence as a tacit acquiescence, and proceed to take the sense of the committee upon it on that day.

Sir Wm Cunningham rose, and stated his objections to the propositions, so far as he thought they would affect Scotland. He shewed how ruinous they would prove to the landed interest; how grievously they would affect the trading part of the people; and wondered that the honourable members of that country should sit silent, when the very existence of many of their constituents was at stake. He appealed for the truth of his statement to a Rt. Hon. Gentleman [Mr. Dundas], who knew what he had said to be true.

Mr. Dundas did not deny what the Hon. Baronet had advanced; but was aware that the truth might be somewhat exaggerated. He held in his hand, he said, a paper, printed in great letter and small, which though anonymous, had been circulated with much industry, to apprise the people in the south with what was intended by the propositions for an enlarged intercourse with Ireland, which, he did not doubt, had reached the very remotest limits of the north. This circumstance he had mentioned, not to impede, but to accelerate the motion; and for that reason, without any inclination to hurry matters, he should agree with his Right Hon. friend, that, when no more information was to be expected, procrastination would be exceedingly improper.

Mr. Cascoyne wished the Chancellor of the Exchequer to proceed deliberately in the business, which in his opinion, he said, was equally replete with novelty and importance.

Mr. Fox rose, to remark on the impropriety of beginning the business where, in his opinion, it should have ended. By this step the situation of both countries was rendered exceedingly awkward, as on the supposition that the propositions which had been made, and were probably already entered upon the Journals of one House, should be rejected in the other, that circumstance must prove exceedingly embarrassing. Mr. Orde, in the parliament of Ireland, had contradicted the Rt. Hon. Gentleman in the most unequivocal terms. He has laid such propositions before the parliament there as are disavowed by his Majesty's ministers here. On the contrary, such measures have been adopted by ministers here, as ministers there dare not propose to parliament; the state of the question before the committee was plainly this, what was this country to expect from Ireland in return for those privileges and advantages which she was to surrender? Was England in the first instance to give up up every thing, and trust to the generosity of Ireland to make a suitable return? He could not think the British House of Commons capable of acting so mean a part; as for himself, he should certainly oppose the motion for going into a committee on Tuesday, unless some satisfactory information arrived from Ireland in the mean time.

Mr. Pitt remarked on this resolution, that it was so manifestly calculated for the purpose of counteracting the business of government, that he hoped little regard would be paid to it by the sound judgment of the House. It was now known what the parliament of Ireland meant to give, and what they asked was before the House. They meant to contribute to the general expences of the empire, according to the growing prosperity of their country. And what more could be expected?

Mr. Fox, in reply, said, this was giving nothing; for Ireland would never own she was rich, while what she had so spare was to be taken from her.

Mr. Eden made some objections to the shortness of the time; but the motion passed without a division.

Mr. Gascoyne rose, and presented a petition from the merchants of Liverpool, against the intended Irish commercial bill. This petition

Mr. Pitt treated with some degree of levity, little perhaps imagining that it was to be the prelude to petitions from almost every trading town in Great-Britain, which have since followed. These liberal-minded people, Mr. Pitt said, had no fears, whatever interested people might suggest, but what arose from the apprehensions of Ireland's smuggling the West India spirits into England, and by that means underselling the fair trader!

Mr. Fox rose, and congratulated the House on the singular intuitive knowledge of the Right Hon. Gentleman in commercial affairs, which rendered experience in trade wholly unnecessary in the conduct of maritime affairs. He certainly knew better than the merchants of Liverpool what was for their interest; and therefore the pleasantry of his comments on their petition was extremely proper!

Mr. Pitt said, he had made no comments. He took up the petition in its own words, and hoped, that when the matter came before the public, it would be fairly represented.

Mr. Gascoyne spoke in justification of the petition, which was read, and ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. Sawbridge rose, and moved a resolution, similar to that moved by Mr. Welbore Ellis (see p. 217), "That the House do order Thomas Corbet, Esq; High Bailiff of Westminster, to make a return of members to serve in parliament for that city."

Mr. Pitt opposed the motion, on the ground, that the House had more than once declared that the scrutiny should be carried on. He did not mean, he said, to debate the question, as every gentleman was already in possession of the subject; but most assuredly should oppose the motion, by moving to adjourn.

Before the question was put, a petition from several inhabitants of Westminster was presented by Lord Mulcaster; praying that the scrutiny might proceed according to the order of the House.

Lord Surrey asked, if Sir Cecil Wray's name was to the petition? The names were read, and Sir Cecil Wray's name was not among them.

After much altercation and some argument, the question for adjournment was put, and lost, noes 162; ayes 124; majority against the minister 38.

Friday 4.

The House being informed that the Deputy Clerk of the Crown was at the door, the question for his admission was put, and carried.

The Deputy Clerk of the Crown then came into the House, and presented to the Speaker the precept which had been transmitted to him that day from Thomas Corbett, Esq; High Bailiff of Westminster, setting forth, that in pursuance of the order of that House, he had proceeded to a scrutiny of the legality of the votes polled in the course of the late election for Westminster, and that upon casting up the books, after deducting the unqualified votes, there appeared for

Lord Hood . . . 6988

Hon. C. J. Fox . . . 6126

Sir Cecil Wray . . . 5895

and that Lord Hood and Mr. Fox having a majority of votes, he returned them to represent the city of Westminster in parliament, conformably with the orders of that House.

The Speaker observed, that at the commencement of the last session of parliament, an instance similar to that now before the House had occurred; it was in the case of the election for Elgin, the returning officer of which did not receive the precept early enough to annex it to the writ. He then read from the Journals the record of the case he had alluded to with respect to Elgin, and said it was for the House to decide what was to be done in relation to the return for Westminster.

Mr. Fox said, that with due deference to, and respect for, the superior knowledge of the Speaker, he must observe, that the case of the return for Elgin was essentially dissimilar to that for Westminster; for, in the former, the precept was made out, though it did not reach the proper officer in time for him to annex it to the writ at the time of the writ being returnable to the Clerk of the Crown, but in the business of the Westminster election, the writ was returnable on the 27th of May, but the precept was dated the 4th of the subsequent March; so that, in the nature of things, the precept could not be annexed to the writ, which was returnable nine months before the former document was made out. However, there being some difficulty in the business, he presumed the House would surmount it, by deciding on the matter from circumstances of convenience, expediency, or analogy; but as for precedent, he was assured there was not one on the records of parliament, from which the judgment of the House could receive any kind of assistance in the present case.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer saw nothing to invalidate the return, which he thought ought to be accepted.

The question was then put for the House to accept the return made by the High bailiff to the Clerk of the Crown, and carried without opposition. And thus ended the Westminster scrutiny.

March 7.

In a committee on the supply, came to the following resolutions:

That 940,000*l.* be granted to his Majesty, for defraying the expences of buildings, rebuildings, and repairs of ships for 1785.

That 675,307*l.* be granted for the ordinary of the navy for 1785. The said resolutions to be reported on Monday.

Mr. H^{ffey} remarked, that, having compared the estimates now to be provided for with the estimates at the close of the former war, he found a very material difference. If the navy was to considerably increased as the difference between the two estimates appeared to be [411,000*l.* at the former period, 640,000*l.* now], then he was willing to give his support to the motion, but he believed it was not.

Mr. Brett, in reply, said, there were 160 sail of ships more now than at the close of the war in 1764; but another reason for the great increase was, that, at the period alluded to, there were no marines; at present there are. The motion was agreed to.

On the second reading of the bill for appointing Commissioners to enquire into the salaries and perquisites of civil officers;

Mr. Powis thought such an enquiry unnecessary. And,

Mr. Sheridan was of the same opinion, for the reason he had urged before (see p. 273). Some other members spoke, and the farther consideration of the bill was adjourned.

Tuesday 8.

Lord Beauchamp moved, "That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, praying, that the report of the council on the exports and imports of Ireland may be laid before the House."

Mr. Pitt assured the noble Lord, that no such report had been made to the King, and consequently no such report could be produced. The paper alluded to, he said, might be seen by every member who chose it, because it was printed, though in point of form it could not be laid on the table.

Lord Beauchamp was satisfied.

Mr. Eden moved for the Irish statutes to be laid before the House, that gentlemen might see the internal advantages which the Irish manufacturers had over the English.

Mr. Pitt, though he could not see the use, did not mean, he said, to oppose that or any other motion that had information for its object; it was accordingly agreed to.

The order of the day being read, for the House to be called over;

Lord Surrey was desirous to know, if the order was then to be discharged?

Mr. Pitt, in reply, said, that, as the business which was shortly to be brought forward was of the utmost importance, he hoped for the indulgence of the House for a little more time. He intended soon to move for leave to bring in a bill for the reform of parliament. He wished, therefore, that the call of the House might take place on that day fortnight, and next day he should be ready with his promised bill.

Lord Surrey thought, if the call of the House was so long postponed, there would not be time sufficient for the bill to be read the first time before Easter Holydays.

Mr. Pitt said, that as the adjournment would only be for a week, considering the variety of business in which he was engaged, he trusted, gentlemen would not refuse him so necessary an indulgence.

MR. URBAN,

AN occasional contributor to your useful miscellany would be exceedingly glad to see some account of the noted Orator Henley. He is frequently mentioned in some of the earlier numbers of the Gent. Mag. In the notes to the Dunciad there are some severe remarks on his conduct and principles: and Mr. Whiston hath published some letters that were sent him by the Orator, accompanied with reflections not much to his credit.

I think a very amusing article might be made out of materials, easily to be procured, respecting this eccentric genius.

He writ a pamphlet against Dr. S. Chandler, entitled, "Samuel sleeping in the Tabernacle:" occasioned by a dispute which that learned man had with Dr. Guyse, a noted divine among the Calvinistical dissenters. In consequence of taking the part of Dr. Guyse (though his assistance was neither asked nor desired), he offered himself as a candidate for church communion with some of the Independents. His character, however, weighed against his zeal; and the triers of the conventicle rejected his application. When he was informed of this, he entered into the vestry belonging to the meeting-house, where the matter had been solemnly debated, and assuming a very grave countenance, he made a most reverend bow, and departed with the apostolical valediction—"Finally, brethren, farewell." MINIMUS.

MR. URBAN,

I Have been lately very much amused with the new edition of the Biographical Dictionary; but was rather disappointed in not finding some account in it of the following writers: Abercromby, author of the Martial Achievements of the Scotch Nation; Baily, author of the English Dictionary; Barber, Blind Harry, Sir David Lindsay, Gawine Douglas, Alexander Montgomerie, and Allan Ramsay, those celebrated Scotch poets; Maitland, Guthrie, Ruddiman, and Duncan, who wrote the excellent Treatise of Logic, which is published in the Preceptor. I do not think every compiler of a book, or writer of a ballad, entitled to a niche in the Temple of Fame; but surely the above writers are eminent enough to be taken notice of in some future edition of the Biographical Dictionary. Perhaps, Mr. Urban, some of your correspondents may contribute materials for that purpose, which can be no where better preserved than in your valuable Magazine. Abercromby, if I have not been misinformed, was a physician at Forfar. Guthrie, the latter part of whose life must have been sufficiently known to the booksellers, was born at Brecbin, where his father was minister of the episcopal chapel. MR. URBAN,

IF your correspondent S. E. who in your last month's Magazine, p. 200, requests some information concerning the inscription placed by the emperor Julian in the frontispiece of his library, will look into the learned Abbé Gallois' work, entitled, "Traité historique des plus belles Bibliothèques de l'Europe," published at Paris in 1680, at p. 83, he will find as follows: "Il fit aussi pour son plaisir eriger deux grandes bibliothèques, l'une à Constantinople, & l'autre à Antioche, au frontispiece desquelles il fit mettre cette inscription, qui a tellement plu à quelques-uns, qu'ils s'en sont servis pour la même chose: Alii quidem equos amant, alii aves, alii feras; mihi verò à puerulo, mirum acquirendi et possidendi libros insedit desiderium." This inscription was so proper, that your readers will easily conceive the emperor might adopt it*.

With regard to the credibility of the Abbé's testimony, a few particulars concerning him may be acceptable to your readers. He was well versed both in sacred and prophane history, in philosophy and mathematics. He understood the Oriental, the Italian, Spanish, English, and German languages: in short, he was an universal scholar. He was the first who published the Journal des Sçavans, in 1665; and, in conjunction with M. de Sallo, Gallois continued this work till 1674. He was chosen member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris in 1668, and of the French Academy in 1673. The great Colbert had a particular esteem for him. He was first made librarian to the French king, and afterwards Greek Professor in the Royal College. He died in 1707, possessed of a valuable library, consisting of upwards of twelve thousand volumes, as appears by the catalogue of his books, published at Paris, 1710. He served many of his friends by his interest with Colbert; but he is said to have neglected making any provision for himself; whence it happened, that at the death of that minister, he was in narrow

* He adopted it from one of his own letters. See our last Mag. EDIT. circumstances, circumstances, although an Abbé. (See more concerning him in Nicéron's Hommes illustres, tom. VIII.)

I conceive that Julian is mentioned of course by Mr. Asple amongst other founders of libraries, and that the inscription above quoted was introduced by way of anecdote, to shew the emperor's great love of literature from his infancy.

ON what authority is the coffee-house in Exchange-alley, mentioned in February, p. 91, said to have been kept by a Mr. Morat? On no other, I apprehend, than that name appearing on the tokens there issued, which have all the bust of Morat, or Amurath the Great, the Turkish emperor; and a Turk's head was in the last century a very common sign for a coffee-house. Of that in Exchange-alley I send you three different tokens, (see the plate), viz.

MR. URBAN,

I HAVE not that dislike to the expression grateful thanks (p. 106) which your correspondent W. S. has, it not appearing to me at all tautologous, but conveying, on the contrary, an idea of gratitude, as tantamount to gratitudo, if one may be allowed to use such a word. What ran in this strict and accurate gentleman's mind, was probably the grates and gratias agere of the Latins, whereas he ought rather to have adverted to gratus, denoting a due sense of benefits, with a willingness to acknowledge and repay. See Johnson's Dict. v. v. Grateful and Gratefully. W. S. knows perfectly what gratus animus means, without any body's telling him.

As to wandering erroneous, cited from Milton, I only wish to ask, Whether a person may not wander or ramble about without being lost, not knowing, or missing his way?

BRANDRITH CRAGGS.

MR. URBAN, Knarestrough, Mar. 15.

HEARING some time ago the above-mentioned appellation given to a ridge of rocks, situated on a mountain, overlooking a deep vale, about half-way betwixt Knarestrough and Shipton, I was led to suppose the place had once been appropriated to Druidical superstition, its name manifestly implying the FIRE CIRCLE. A small village also, at two miles distance, evidently takes its name from hence, being called Few Stone. On coming to the place, I found it answer every description my ideas had formed of it. On the highest part of one of these rocks is a smooth, regular, well-wrought basin, formed out of the solid stone, two feet in depth, and three feet and a half in diameter. On each side of this is a smaller basin formed, each on a prominent point of the rock. A few yards from hence is a ROCKING STONE, the irregularity of the figure making it difficult to ascertain the weight exactly; yet it may be reasonably supposed to weigh near twenty tons, and so equally poised, as to be moved with ease by one hand.

Rocking stones are found in many parts of this island; some ascribed to nature alone, and others to art. Rock basins are not so common: they are found in some parts of Cornwall; but very few of them are mentioned to have been found in any other part of this country. Should any of your readers be able to throw some light on the original invention and use of them, it would, without doubt, be very agreeable to the studious investigators of British antiquities.

E. H.

Letter from the late Dr. Johnson, to a young Clergyman, now a Fellow of a College in Cambridge.

DEAR SIR,

NOT many days ago Dr. Lawrence shewed me a letter, in which you make mention of me; I hope, therefore, you will not be displeased that I endeavour to preserve your good-will by some observations which your letter suggested to me.

You are afraid of falling into some improprieties in the daily service, by reading to an audience that requires no exactness. Your fear, I hope, secures you from danger. They who contract absurd habits are such as have no fear. It is impossible to do the same thing very often without some peculiarity of manner; but that manner may be good or bad, and a little care will at least preserve it from being bad; to make it very good, there must, I think, be something of natural or casual felicity, which cannot be taught.

Your present method of making your sermons seems very judicious. Few frequent preachers can be supposed to have sermons more their own than yours will be. Take care to register somewhere or other the authors from whom your several discourses are borrowed; and do not imagine that you shall always remember even what perhaps you now think it impossible to forget.

My advice, however, is, that you attempt from time to time an original sermon, and in the labour of composition do not burden your mind with too much at once; do not exact from yourself, at one effort of excogitation, propriety of thought and elegance of expression. Invent first, and then embellish. The production of something, where nothing was before, is an act of greater energy than the expansion or decoration of the thing produced. Set down diligently your thoughts, as they rise, in the first words that occur, and when you have matter, you will easily give it form; nor perhaps will this method be always necessary; for by habit your thoughts and diction will flow together.

The composition of sermons is not very difficult: the divisions not only help the memory of the hearer, but direct the judgement of the writer; they supply sources of invention, and keep every part in its proper place.

What I like least in your letter is your account of the manners of your parish; from which I gather, that it has been long neglected by the parson. The dean of Carlisle*, who was then a little rector in Northamptonshire, told me that it might be discerned whether or no there was a clergyman resident in a parish, by the civil or savage manners of the people. Such a congregation as yours stands in much need of reformation; and I would not have you think it impossible to reform them. A very savage parish was civilised by a decayed gentlewoman, who came among them to teach a petty school. My learned friend Dr. Wheeler of Oxford, when he was a young man, had the care of a neighbouring parish for fifteen pounds a year, which he was never paid; but he counted it a convenience that it compelled him to make a sermon weekly. One woman he could not bring to the communion; and, when he reproved or exhorted her, she only answered that she was no scholar. He was advised to set some good woman or man of the parish, a little wiser than herself, to talk to her in language level to her mind. Such honest, I may call them holy, artifices, must be practised by every clergyman, for all means must be tried by which souls may be saved. Talk to your people, however, as much as you can; and you will find, that the more frequently you converse with them upon religious subjects, the more willingly they will attend, and the more submissively they will learn. A clergyman's diligence always makes him venerable. I think I have now only to say, that, in the momentous work you have undertaken, I pray God to bless you. I am, Sir,

GENT. MAG. May 1785.

Your most humble servant,

Belt-Court,
August 30, 1780.

SAM. JOHNSON.

Mr. URBAN, Mortlake, May 19.
IN answer to Mr. Delver's enquiry in your Mag. for last month (page 267), whether the name of either of the two children, whose baptism is registered in this parish in the year 1644, was Hewson (the real name it seems of Doctor Partridge), I can inform him, having been just now favoured with a transcript of the register, that, of the two, one only was a boy, named Henry, with a surname widely different. There is no other name on the tombstone than that of Partridge, which was an information likewise desired by your correspondent. I find Granger has given the inscription in his Biographical History of England,

* (New bishop) Percy.

ed. 1779, 8vo. p. 104; and says, he was author of "the black Life of John Gadbury," not mentioned in the list sent by your correspondent, P. Q. p. 281, who appears to have included in it three of Swift's publications, of 1709, 1712, and that without date.

I hope, Mr. Urban, your ingenious correspondent, Mr. J. D. will not fail to send you the "circumstantial account of Partridge," which he says "is in preparation." Yours, &c. D. P.

A correspondent wishes to be informed, when the art of enamelling was first introduced into England?

Colligite fragmenta ne pereant.

MR. URBAN, Burbach, March 12.

PERMIT me to address you in the above words, since to your labours and industry we owe the preservation of so many fragments of antiquity; which, if not registered and displayed in your useful repository, might have been totally lost to future generations. The study of this matter is not so contemptible as some people may imagine, having for its object both history and biography, and tends also to elucidate many points with regard to the taste, manners, and customs of our forefathers. This is not all; from medals, coins, and seals, we are almost made acquainted with their features; by contemplating the works of the ancients, we compare their genius with our own; by their public edifices, we fix the standard of their liberality and magnificence; the different ages of their construction shew us the various progressions and changes in their style and manner; by MSS and old books, we become familiar with their language and expressions. These are only a few of the advantages which may be derived from the study of Antiquity, considered chiefly as an amusement to any individual who has leisure to apply himself: the greater utility of it I need not mention, as being too manifest; nor shall I enlarge further on its merits, as it would lead me far beyond the bounds I have prescribed myself. Give me leave, however, to commend your impartial admission of subjects of this kind in your monthly miscellany, which seems at present the only one open to productions of this sort, and was adopted from the earliest period of the Magazine. I make no doubt that in future times such as prosecute this entertainment will applaud and admire the indefatigable pains you have taken to illustrate, by copies, originals, which at that time may be destroyed, or buried in oblivion*. That your work may continue to flourish, and survive the just condemnation of some of its contemporaries, is my sincere wish.

A correspondent in your last vol. p. 505, intimates that a solution may be found to my query in that vol. p. 249, in Johnson's Lives of the Poets. I lately read the paragraph he alludes to, which is no wise relative to the point in question; at least it is only a collateral reasoning, and much beneath the solid judgement of so learned a man, from whom, was he now living, I might have hoped for fuller information. It is truly surprising, that no one amongst your numerous correspondents can satisfy me in this particular, not to say interesting, enquiry. I readily admit the position, that, the Latin being a dead language, the pronunciation of it is arbitrary, nor can we establish with certainty what the ancient Romans gave it. The modern Romans, or Italians, have some peculiarities in their speaking it; so have the French, and also the Germans: but all these, together with every other nation on the continent, perfectly understand each other: whilst the Latin, as pronounced in our schools and universities, is so changed, either through opposition, or a partial analogy to our mother-tongue, that few, if any, foreigners can understand it. I shall not enter into a discussion of the conjectures which the learned have formed on this subject; some contending for Cicero, Chichero, or, as others again will have it, Kikero. This last seems most plausible; for upon what authority do we fix the harsh sound upon the syllables, ca, co, cu, and the soft upon ce, ci; which two last are the same as se, si? Similar reflections may be made upon the diphthongs ae, æ, &c. and the Germans call the emperor Keyser, derived from the Latin word Cæsar. And here I will end this philological digression, by repeating my original question; viz.

At what period, for what reason, and in what manner, our present pronunciation of the Latin tongue, as used in England, was first introduced? At the same time, why the Scotch should differ from us in this respect, who conform nearly to the foreign practice?

OBSERVATOR.

* The stone with an inscription on the Royal Oak, see vol. LIV. p. 257, is since broken by some ill-disposed person, the wall thrown down, and will probably never be re-erected.

The

The MORNING, taken from HALLER.

THE moon retires—Nature's dark veil no more obscures the air and earth—the twinkling stars disappear—and the reviving warmth of the sun awakens all creatures.

Already are the heavens adorned with its purple hues and its sparkling sapphires; Aurora, fair harbinger of the day, graciously dispenses smiles; and the brightness of the roses which wreath her forehead dissipates the mists of night.

The flaming light of the world advances from the eastern gate, triumphantly treading on the shining splendours of the milky way; clouds, covered with heaven's rubies, oppose him with their lightning, and a flame of gold spreads itself around the horizon.

The roses open, to salute the sun with genial dews; and the lilies exhale delicious odours from their satin'd leaves.

The vigilant hind flies to the labour-giving field; he guides with careful pleasure the earth-piercing plough; in the mean time his ears are delighted by the lightsome bands of minstrels, which sweeten the air and woods with their melodious notes. Thus doth benignant heaven lighten the heavy pressure of toilsome industry!

O Creator! all that I see are the effects of thy power! thou art the soul of nature, and dost actuate every part! the stated periods and glittering appearance of yon orbs, and the unquenched fire of the revolving sun, proceed from thy hands, and boast thy impression!

Thou illumest the solemn moon to guide us amid darkness; thou dost lend wings to the unseen wind, and by night thou dost enrich the earth with fruitful dews.

From dust thou hast formed yon proud-topped mountains; from sand thou produced metals; thou hast spread yon firmament, and thou hast clothed it with clouds, that it may remain unpolluted by the exploring eye of man.

Thou hast wonderfully formed the veins of that fish which causes rivers to overflow, and which makes whirlpools, and spreads devastation with the flappings of his tail. Thou hast built the elephant, and thou hast animated its enormous bulk, that it resembles a moving mountain.

Thou supportest yon splendid arches of the heavens upon the vast void; and with thy word thou hast produced from chaos this wondrous universe, filling it with order, and giving it no other limits than its own grandeur.

Great God! created spirits are too insignificant to raise the glory of thy works! We lose ourselves in their immensity. To tell them, one must resemble thyself in infinity.

Humbly contented, I remain in my own prescribed circle. Incomprehensible Being! thy resplendent glories blind the presuming eye of man! and He from whom the earth receives its being, needs not the praises of a worm!

MR. URBAN,

THE agreeable disposition of your correspondents, in answering the queries addressed to them, emboldens me to enquire after the family of the Mannings, originally of Sussex, where they possessed a remarkable mansion. The last of whom I can find resident in that county, was a colonel in the civil war. He had a son named John, who, from the ill-treatment of his father, entered as a private in one of the troops of horse-guards on their being first raised. This son married a lady of the name of Levett, relict of counsellor Levett, of the Temple, whose maiden name was, I believe, Bruerton; whose sister and co-heiress married into the family of Lord Dudley and Ward.

Yours, &c.

M. R.

MR. URBAN, South Molton, May 10.

AS Mr. John Wesley hath done me the honour of publicly noticing, p. 246, my paper* respecting his family, I think it a piece of civility due to him, to notice his strictures in return.

I am pleased that any "publications" of mine should be esteemed "ingenious and useful," by a man so well qualified to judge of their merits. For his acquaintance with my name, as the author of the publications which I suppose he had in his eye, I am indebted to certain writers, who took the liberty of proclaiming it in pamphlets, letters, reviews, and advertisements, with the very generous intention (for they are all benevolent men) of injuring its credit. The attempt, however, hath operated contrary to their wishes; and, if I needed a testimony, Mr. Wesley's would serve instead of a thousand.

* First published in the Bibliotheca Topographica Britannica, No. XX. and afterwards by Mr. Maty in his Review. See vol. LV. p. 279.

My paper was drawn up in great haste; but it was drawn up under the impression of sentiments not hastily adopted. An opinion of Mr. Wesley's great abilities, and an esteem for qualities which he possesses of still greater account, have long been familiar to my mind. I have been conversant with his writings from my earliest youth: and, though never his disciple, have been always his admirer.

I have already informed the public by what means I became acquainted with some papers which relate to the more secret history of his family. Had they been papers of a merely family or personal concern, I would never have communicated any account of them to the public. Had they tended to fix any reproach on the private characters of individuals, I would have suppressed them; and I was not conscious of doing an injury to the memory of Mr. Sam. Wesley when I called him a Jacobite. I called him, indeed, by a title which in politics I abhor: but I have learnt to separate political from moral character; and have no doubt but a Jacobite may be as good a man, and as perfect a Christian, as even a whig or a presbyterian. I judge of no man merely by his opinions or prejudices; nor at all times would I judge of him by any improper bias, or influence, that they may give to his conduct. If I know the cause, I can account for the effect; and if I can excuse the former, surely I cannot want an apology for the latter.

There are certain fundamental principles of conduct, in which all good men, with all their prejudices and partialities, are united. They are the common bands of society: the universal laws, which are independent of custom or country, sects and parties; and may be said to know no distinction between "Greek or Jew; Scythian, barbarian, bond or free."

I have now given my creed of charity; which, for a *Calvinist, as I have been denominated, is somewhat free: and I would risk the credit of my orthodoxy rather than recall it.

I esteem Mr. Wesley for the zeal he hath discovered in vindicating his brother from the imputation of Jacobitism; but till I am convinced, I cannot retract:

* A denomination I should not blush to acknowledge, if I thought myself fairly entitled to it; though a very silly writer, following at an immense distance the great leader of a late controversy, hath brought it forwards in the shape of an accusation; as if to be a Calvinist were as disgraceful as to be a mumpster, or as infamous as to be a cheat.

and my conviction of Mr. Sam. Wesley's antipathy to the house of Brunswick is founded on evidence too strong to be overcome by mere general assertions to the contrary.

However, if there be an error in my account, let me be wholly answerable for it. Mr. Wesley should not have coupled Mr. Maty's name with mine; especially in such uncivil language. If I cannot prove what I have advanced; let the blame rest on my own head alone: he is guiltless.

And were I convinced that I had been guilty of a false accusation, no man would be more ready to acknowledge it. But as I cannot, in justice to my own persuasions, revoke what I have written, it is certainly due, both to the public and to myself, to give some reason for what I have asserted.

I would first, in general, observe, that when I called Mr. Sam. Wesley "a noted Jacobite," I only echoed back the voice of popular fame. His brother cannot be ignorant that he always bore this character; and his greatest friends, and most intimate associates in this part of the kingdom, made no scruple of applying to him a title, to which, I really believe, he had no dislike.

His daughter often assured me, that he was strongly attached to the exiled family; and she once shewed me a small print of the Pretender, which, she said, had been presented to her father, and which he esteemed as a sort of a precious memorial. A late excellent and ever-honoured friend of mine, who was the pupil of Mr. Sam. Wesley, and who in his earlier days had imbibed a tincture from politics of the same colour and quality (though his maturer wisdom dictated far different sentiments), frequently called his old master a Jacobite; and appeared to entertain no conception, that any one would question his right to an appellation, to which that good man affixed no moral turpitude or infamy, though a genuine "whig of the Revolution."

Other pupils of Mr. Wesley have confirmed to me this account of his political principles; but my conviction hath not arisen from general or vague report, even though backed by the authority I have mentioned, but from evidence more particular and more decisive.

Mr. Wesley says, in his Remarks on my paper, that "he [viz. S. W.] never published any thing political, whether satirical or not."—"He never wrote any thing of a treasonable tendency; he sa- credly

credly avoided it."—"He never wrote, much less published, one line, against the king."

Had Mr. Wesley read the poems which Mrs. Earle, his brother's only child, put into my hands, he never could have expressed himself in such unqualified language. Amid a number which I once possessed, I can at present only lay my hands on one, entitled the Regency. It was written by Mr. S. Wesley, purposely with a view to raise a laugh at the expence of the king (G. I.) in the choice which he made of the persons who were intrusted with the prerogative while he visited Hanover.

I will transcribe a few verses of this witty and sarcastic poem; and let our readers judge how far the author "sacredly avoided" what had a "treasonable tendency"

As soon as the wind it came fairly about,
That kept the king in, and his enemies out;
He determin'd no longer his confinement to bear,

And thus to the dutchess his mind did declare.

Quoth he, "My dear Kenny, I've been tir'd
a long while,

With living obscure in this poor little isle;
And now Spain and Pretender have no more mines to spring,

I'm resolv'd to go home and live like a king."

Quoth Kenny, "Great sir! I approve your design," &c.

And so Kenny ludicrously runs over the list of the regents; estimates their several qualifications; and, by exposing them obliquely, laughs at the king himself.

Of the duke of Argyle she is made to say:

"And had not the stars been equally strong,
To keep him in the right, and you in the wrong,

It might have induc'd him such schemes to pursue,

As had made him belov'd--full as little as you."

After lashing the lords of the regency all round, the dutchess says, in the conclusion,

"On the whole, I'll be hang'd, if all over the realm,

There are thirteen such fools to be put at the helm:

So for this time be easy, nor have jealous
thought,

They ha'n't sense to sell you, nor are worth being bought."

"'Tis for that (quoth the king in very bad French)

I chose them for my regents, and you for my wench:

And neither, I'm sure, will my trust e'er betray;

For the devil won't take you, if I turn you
away."

Let these lines be glossed over by any art or refinement whatever, yet they can never be accommodated to that reverence which Mr. Wesley would acknowledge to be due to the Lord's anointed, let him be who he may.

I cannot produce the poem Mr. S. W. addressed to Sir Robert Walpole in behalf of his father. I have only a general recollection of it; but a recollection sufficient to make me assert with confidence, that such a poem did really exist: and I particularly remember, that he intreated the great statesman not to permit any prejudices, that he might have imbibed against himself, to stand in the way of his beneficence to his father.

But I will not any farther urge a circumstance, of which I am utterly incapable of producing the proof that may be required to establish it.

I was not acquainted with the later periods of Mrs. Wesley's life. I only spoke of what I knew. Her letters breathe a spirit of rational and enlightened piety; and she frequently deplored, in very pathetic language, the departure of her two sons from the simplicity of Christian faith, and their innovations on the order and decorum of the established worship. She adopted, it seems, very different sentiments of their principles and conduct several years before her death. To whatever society of Christians she united herself, I doubt not but she was an honour to them; and wonder not that a life, that had been so singularly pious and exemplary, should close, as Mr. Wesley says his mother's did, with a hope full of immortality.

Her Letters to her daughter on the first Principles of Religion, together with some other curious papers, I communicated some years ago to Dr. Priestley: and when he expressed a desire to transcribe them, I saved him the trouble, by freely making him a present of the originals. One of the most valuable (and which, in a letter to me, he calls "uncommonly curious") he hath unfortunately lost. I took no copy of it myself, so that I am afraid it is irrecoverable.

It is a kind of presumption to publish speculations about the state of another person's mind, and the different steps by which it acquires certain principles and habits; especially at a time when that person may speak for himself, and call
all

all that you have advanced the fiction of your own imagination. And it would be the height of insolence and obstinacy to persevere in maintaining what he, who hath the best right to contradict it, positively disavows. "For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of a man which is in him?"

"Therefore" (says Mr. Wesley) "all that Mr. Badcock adds, of the incidents that gave an additional force to an impression that never existed, is very ingenious; yet is in truth a castle in the air."

Let my conjectures then be the mere dream of fancy. I will not dispute for what I cannot prove, nor have even a wish to maintain. I might have been deceived, when I talked of Mr. Wesley's enthusiastic impressions and prophetic notices. But when I spoke of his admirable talents, his extraordinary exertions, his honest zeal, and his generous superiority to the world and its possessions, I am sure I was not deceived; I built no castle in the air, but raised a humble pillar to his fame on that ground where posterity will erect a nobler and more lasting monument. SAM. BADCOCK.

MR. URBAN, March 1785.

IN your last volume, p. 929, amongst the late productions of the press, you mention, with just approbation, a charge delivered to his clergy last summer by the lord bishop of Norwich, in the course of his primary visitation; intimating a wish, that it had not been in a manner confined to that diocese, by being printed but not published. For this reason, however, you give no farther account of it than a bare enumeration of the articles of which it consists. These are truly important; and will induce others, perhaps, as well as myself, to endeavour at procuring a sight of this interesting work. I wish all may be equally successful. I have perused it, and with the highest pleasure; I hope too with some edification: at least it must be the reader's fault, not the writer's, if this be not the case. There breathes throughout a spirit of honest Christian zeal for religion; a heart-felt attachment to its interests; and a serious, unaffected piety, delivered in plain, simple, undorned, yet emphatical, language. The whole shews that the excellent author is not acting a part, but is in earnest in that cause which he so warmly enforces, and so ably defends.

I know not, sir, whether the rules or limits of your very useful repository will admit a few remarks on one or two of the subjects on which his lordship has treated. I mean not to counteract your example, nor to enter into a critical examination of the whole charge; but merely to excite, if I can, the curiosity of your readers; being convinced, that the more such compositions as this are known, the better. And if, assuming to myself a liberty to which all are entitled, I should appear to differ from this truly learned and venerable prelate in one or two points, I shall be careful to hint that difference in terms expressive of my own feelings, and therefore of real respect.

After a solemn and instructive introduction, the particulars of which may be seen in your recital, his lordship proceeds to the important article of residence. This has almost always made a part, I believe, of all episcopal charges; and has been in a manner exhausted by the learned bishops Stillingfleet and Sherlock. The extensive range, which bishop Bagot has taken would not permit him to be diffuse on any particular point: yet what he says on this is written to the heart, and clearly from the heart. I cannot resist the impulse I feel to transcribe a sentence or two; no violation, I hope, of that respect which you have shewn, and which I mean to observe. "The first object for a parochial minister is to reside with his flock as constantly as may be*, &c. Of late years a practice hath been growing in many parts of the kingdom (and no where doth it prevail more than in this diocese) of a very hurtful tendency. I mean the resort of the clergy to the most considerable neighbouring town. It is within a moderate ride of their church: they can live there more conveniently, and perhaps at less charge: they are at hand to perform at all times both the stated and occasional duty.—The stated and occasional duty! Good God! Is this their care, their anxious concern, for the souls of those, of whom they are to give an account to their Redeemer? How many occasions do they thus lose, where a single word, perhaps, might rescue a poor wretch from sin and misery! Where is the influence of their example?" &c. &c. Ex pede Herculem.

Non-residence is the great opprobrium cleri. A learned and worthy dean, who, amongst other tracts, has written many useful essays upon trade, has been said to make "trade his religion." The remark may be pert and quaint, but it is utterly untrue. What, however, shall we say of those clerks, who, possessed of two or three large (and perhaps purchased) livings, reside not upon any of them? who, instead of taking "care of the souls of their parishioners," know little or nothing either of their souls or their persons; though probably they can give a tolerably good account of their tythes? Every diocese presents us with some such characters; the traders in, rather than the faithful professors of, religion. Let such unworthy pastors, if they deserve the name of pastors, read, and (if they can) feel, this apostolical remonstrance of the good bishop of Norwich. Let them prepare too to answer a remonstrance from a far greater bishop, whose interests they have neglected and betrayed, and whom they have thus exposed to an open shame.

Perpetual curacies his lordship holds to be exactly of the same tenure, so far as pluralities are concerned, with other benefices that have cure of souls; i. e. rectories or vicarages: "and in this assertion he is supported," we are told, "by the opinion of able lawyers." Be it so. There is, however, a great difference between a lawyer's opinion, and a formal decision in a court of judicature. I mean not to dispute the strict legality of this opinion; but I doubt the prudential consequences of its promulgation. Many things may be rigidly legal, which are not practically expedient. I am no lawyer; but every one knows that a different practice has universally prevailed for some centuries. The event only can shew, whether a strict adherence to the obsolete laws in this case (if ever it should be adopted), or a benevolent and long-established connivance at its violation, will be most beneficial to the interest of the inferior clergy, and the still more important interest of religion.

Whatever difference of opinion, however, may be entertained on this subject, there surely can be none on that of stipendiary curates; whose cause his lordship pleads with a strength of argument, and a warmth of benevolence, worthy of himself. Burdened, as too many of them are, with a heavy load of duty, expected to make a decent external appearance, and at the same time sinking under the weight of oppressive poverty, there are few members of society in a more pitiable situation. "A scanty and niggardly allowance," in the opinion of this prelate, and surely of every good man, "is disgraceful both to the curate and his employer:" yet the former is too often obliged to submit to the meanness and parsimony of the latter. It certainly is of importance, that the clergy should be placed above a state of indigence and contempt, by receiving a competent recompence for their professional labour. It is, however, of still greater importance, that they should be out of the reach of the latter, by being of a fair character and an irreproachable life. And here his lordship's remarks on the subject of testimonials deserve the serious attention of every clergyman in the kingdom. Truth is too often sacrificed to friendship by these attestations; although tenderness in such a case to an individual may be cruelty to the community, and give a dangerous wound to religion. In no instance, however, does an indiscriminate and unguarded signature take place more frequently, than in college testimonials. Every one, who has resided any time in either of our universities, must have been witness to these indefensible prostitutions; a circumstance particularly specified by this bishop. And when we recollect, that his lordship for some years presided over one of the most learned and respectable of our academical societies*, with the greatest honour to himself and advantage to his college, we must see that what he says on this subject comes with peculiar propriety, and ought to have a proportionable weight: a single hint from him is a volume.

Of this nature too is the transient but comprehensive suggestion on the general conduct and deportment of his clergy; in which his lordship blends the candid allowance which he is pleased to say he may want for his own, with that which he shall always be ready to extend to theirs. Nothing can be more happily conceived, or more elegantly expressed, than this part of his charge; which as strongly marks the polite gentleman, as the conscientious prelate. They who know him best will testify that he is both.

As a conscientious prelate, and as an honest man, we cannot be surprized at his reprobating, with a becoming indignation, all simoniacal engagements whatever. One can hardly bear to think on a traffic, so "complicately wicked," without horror. Pudet hæc opprobria! The subject is as copious as it is offensive. Let it be left to the serious consideration of those whom it may concern. And may every one of your readers, sir, be able to say, "My withers are unwrung!"

* Christ Church, Oxford.

With regard to faith and doctrine, the bishop of Norwich shews himself in this charge, as indeed in his other writings, to be what is usually called strictly orthodox; closely attached to the present system of the church establishment; which he deems to be so complete in all its parts, as not to require any alterations: and he calls upon those of the clergy, who may think otherwise, to "quit their profession." This is indeed a nice and delicate subject. To say that the Articles and Liturgy of our church would not be improved by some omissions and alterations in each, expresses the particular opinion of the assenter; but, at the same time, it seems to give them a degree of perfection, greater than any human composition can be supposed to attain. And, to require all, who, though educated in, and generally approving, its discipline and doctrines, may yet, after mature enquiry, have their doubts about some points, and even more than their doubts about others; to call on all such to retire from and renounce its communion, seems to be a demand more decisively general than strictly reasonable. A serious and impartial examiner may frequently alter his opinion concerning some of the arduous and abstruse subjects of religious controversy, which the wisest and best divines have acknowledged to be dark and intricate: and yet he may remain, I trust, a faithful disciple of Jesus Christ, and both an useful and an honest member of the church of England. He may wish, for instance, with the good archbishop TILLOTSON*, that our church and its Liturgy "were well rid of the Athanasian creed;" and yet he may prefer that church and its Liturgy to any other whatever; and, with him, may conscientiously resolve to live and die in its communion. Are we then, it may be asked, to "give up the essentials of Christian doctrine?" Certainly not. But, what are essentials? Even the best and most distinguished men of our own church have differed in their description, and still more in their explanation, of them †.

* See his Grace's Letter to the Bishop of Sarum (written a very few weeks before his death), in Birch's Life of Tillotson, pp. 314, 315, edit. 2d. See too his dying Words, ib. And then, Mr. Urban, join with me in saying, "May my latter end be like his!"

† What, e. g. is Athanasianism? and what the true, orthodox faith of our church

To maintain with some learned writers, that Jesus Christ is the SUPREME JEHOVAH of the Old Testament; and that GOD (1 Cor. xv. 24—28) to whom the Son is to give up the kingdom, and himself be subject †, means the TRINITY, may be one extreme: it surely is another, to reduce our blessed Lord to the level and character of a mere man, precisely of the same nature with, and in no respect superior to, ourselves §, according to the unqualified and daring assertions of the presumptuous Socinian.—But enough on this subject.

I will flatter myself, Mr. Urban, that I have not transgressed the rules of respect in these transient remarks on this excellent charge: nor have I, either in expressing my approbation or dissent, knowingly deviated from the most sacred regard to truth. I sincerely wish that what I have written may incite others of your numerous friends to peruse, if they can procure, this work, and to judge for themselves. Some who read it may possibly differ from its worthy and benevolent author in a very few particular points of doubtful disputation: all, however, who read his manners and his life, will, I am confident, agree, that he is learned without pedantry; pious without ostentation; an exemplary prelate; a faithful Christian; and, in every department of life, an amiable man.

I am, sir, &c.

on this point? Cudworth, Tillotson, BULL, Fowler, and many others of equal fame, assert the three persons in the Trinity to be different subsistences, minds, or spirits, substantially distinct: and aver this doctrine to be catholic, orthodox, and the faith of the church of England. Per contra; the university of OXFORD, at a general meeting, held Nov. 25, 1695, judged and decreed these very principles to be false, impious, heretical, contrary to the doctrine of the catholic church, and especially of the church of England!!! See Ben Mordecai's Apology, &c. Letter I.—Who shall decide when doctors disagree? Non nostrum, tantas componere lites. But surely this difference in sentiment amongst the wisest and most learned should teach moderation, diffidence, good temper, and forbearance to all; and more especially in their disputations on subjects so sublime and mysterious; which "the angels desire to look into," and, most probably, cannot comprehend!

So. Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Arthur Ashley Sykes, D. D. By John Dineen, D. D. F. S. A. 8vo.

MR. SYKES, we learn from these Memiors, was born in London, about the year 1684. The profession or business of his father, Arthur, cannot be ascertained; but his great-grandfather and grandfather were successively vicars of Ardely, or Yardley, in Hertfordshire, and the former was also rector of Cottered, in the same county, which was held in trust, after his death, for our author's elder brother, John, who died in 1723. He had a younger brother, George, a clergyman also, of whom hereafter. From Saint Paul's School Mr. Sykes was removed, in 1701, to Bene't, or Corpus Christi, College, Cambridge; and, on leaving the College, after taking the degrees in arts, he was a short time an assistant at that school. His first ecclesiastical preferment was the vicarage of Godmersham, in Kent, given him, in 1712, by his fellow-collegian, Archbishop Tenison. He was soon after engaged in a controversy with Dr. Brett, on the subject of baptism, in which Mr. Sykes maintained the validity of that rite as performed by persons not episcopally ordained. In 1714, on being presented by the Duchess Dowager of Bedford to the rectory of Dry Drayton, in Cambridgeshire, he resigned his vicarage. In 1715 he maintained the "Innocency of Error," in a pamphlet so entitled, which was animadverted on (anonymously) by a Mr. Sherwell, and also by Bp. Potter, in a Charge to his Clergy, 1720. The latter was reprehended by Bp. Hoadly, in a Postscript to his Answer to Dr. Hare; Bp. Potter rejoined; and, at length, Mr. Sykes published a masterly Vindication. The tract, much enlarged, has since gone through several editions; but into the particulars of this, or his other numerous publications, our limits will not permit us to enter, or even to name them all. We shall therefore only say, in general, that he distinguished himself, both as a politician and a divine, in the reign of George I. and took a very active part in the Bangorian controversy, being allowed to be one of Bp. Hoadly's most able advocates, by shewing that Dean Sherlock had himself maintained in 1712, the same positions and doctrines which he opposed in 1717. In November 1718 Mr. Sykes was presented, by Robert Bristow, Esq. to the rectory of Rayleigh, in Essex, which he held as long as he lived, and for which he resigned Dry Drayton. He was soon after nominated by the rector of Saint James's (Dr. Clarke), and appointed by the governors to the afternoon preacher'ship at King Street Chapel, Golden Square. In 1719 our author espoused the cause of Dr. Bentley against Dr. Middleton; in the Trinitarian controversy, offered "a modest plea" (as he terms it) for the baptismal and scriptural notion of the Trinity, and vindicated the new forms of doxology introduced by Dr. Clarke, and reprobated by his diocesan, Bp. Robinson.— We find him next replying to Mr. Rogers, on Church Power, addressing a letter to Lord Nottingham, on the subject of his Lordship's "Answer to Mr. Whiston," nominated and appointed (as before), in 1721, to the morning preacher'ship at King Street Chapel, engaged in a controversy with Dr. Waterland, on "The Case of Subscription," (in which his biographer, as well as honest Whiston, totally disapproves the latitude he allows,) defending the Quakers Bill, &c. and rewarded, for his former services, by Bp. Hoadly, with a prebend, and the precentorship, of Salisbury. In 1725 Dr. Clarke appointed Mr. Sykes his assistant preacher at St. James's, and, soon after, he ably defended Christianity against the objections of Collins, took the degree of D. D. at Cambridge, 1726*, replied to Collins, 1727, &c. and published a short Elogium on his deceased friend, Dr. Clarke, 1729, whole "Exposition of the Church Catechism" he defended, in 1730, against Dr. Waterland. This was followed by an "Essay on the Difference between moral and religious Duties," 1731, a controversy with Mellicurs Whiston, Chapman, and Douglas, concerning the eclipse mentioned by Phlegon, 1732, two Tracts on Dr. Rundle's being refused the see of Gloucester, two others on the reasonableness of repealing the Corporation and Test Acts, and an "Enquiry into the Meaning of the Demoniacs in the New Testament," which involved him in a controversy with Mr. Whiston, Mr. Twells, and others,

others, 1737. Dr. Sykes was advanced, in 1739, to the deanry of St. Burien, in Cornwall, in the gift of the Crown, and to a prebend of Winchester by Bishop Hoadly. His elaborate Defence of Christianity in "The Principles and Connexion of Natural and Revealed Religion," of which an ample account is here given, appeared in 1740, as did his "Brief Discourse on Miracles" in 1742, and his "Rational Communion" in 1743; and in 1744 our author shook the main pillars of Mr. Warburton's "Divine Legation of Moses," by impeaching his "Account of the Conduct of the ancient Legislators, of the double Doctrine, of the old Philosophers, of the Theocracy of the Jews, and of Sir Isaac Newton's Chronology;" and of the second of those heads Dr. Sykes resumed the consideration in 1747. In 1748 appeared his "Essay on Sacrifices," and in 1750 and 1752 he engaged in the controversy that owed its rise to Dr. Middleton's "Free Enquiry," &c. by proposing "Two previous Questions" in two parts, the latter occasioned by a tract of Dr. Dodwell's. Our author's "Paraphrase and Notes on the Epistle to the Hebrews," 1755, is thus emphatically characterised by Dr. John Jebb: "Sykes is eminently useful on the Hebrews." His "Scripture Doctrine of Redemption," and his "Tract on Confirmation," were published in 1756, and his last work, which was posthumous, was published by his brother in 1757. This was entitled, "An Enquiry when the Resurrection of the Body, or Flesh, was first inserted into the public Creeds," and is said to have been composed chiefly from the papers of "Sir Isaac Newton." Having been much relieved from the pains of the stone, for 15 or 16 years, by Mrs. Stephens's medicine, Dr. Sykes "enjoyed a general state of good health and spirits" till Nov. 15, 1756, when, at the funeral of a friend, he had a paralytic stroke, which terminated in his death on the 23d, in his 73d year. He was buried near the pulpit in St. James's church. To his wife, by whom he had no "children," [rather "child,"] and who was a widow when he married her (Mrs. Elizabeth Williams, of Bristol,) he left the whole of his fortune, which was considerable, and after her death (which happened in 1763) to his brother, George Sykes, M. A. who was vicar of Preston, near Faversham, in Kent, [given him by Archbishop Telford in 1715], and succeeded his brother in the rectory of Rayleigh. Mr. Sykes (who was also one of the six preachers in Canterbury Cathedral, being so appointed by Archbishop Herring, from a regard to his brother, in 1756, a circumstance not mentioned by Dr. Disney) left "the bulk of" his estate* "to the family of their patron, Robert Bristow, Esq. whose grandson, a minor, is now the owner of it." We must add, that, though his biographer enters fully into the argumentative, as well as historical, part of most of his author's works, on many important subjects (one has been mentioned), he freely dissents from him, and can, by no means, be charged with partiality to his opinions, either in religion or politics.—Dr. Sykes's character as a scholar and a divine may be deduced from his writings; "his works" (as Dr. Disney expresses it) "will speak his just praise." Archbp. Tillotson has somewhere observed, that "one who has drawn blood in controversy seldom recovers his temper." But to this Dr. Sykes, though a skilful polemic, is an exception, being (we are told) "of easy, gentle, and obliging manners, cheerful and good-tempered, modest and unassuming, unfouled by controversy, not proud of, or confident in, his learning." In his "sentiments respecting the person of Jesus Christ," he agreed, it is well known, with Dr. Clarke; and though he did not, like his biographer, secede from the church, this doubtless induced Dr. Disney to compile a Life which gives him frequent opportunities of introducing his Unitarian tenets. In p. 98 he laments the "diffidence and timidity" of the "excellent and amiable" Archbp. Herring, which prevented his "trying to infuse any of the meekness of his own temper into the laws of his country, for the security of those who lived after him," of which he gives some instances; and in p. 308 he mentions two transactions of another prelate, which he also "laments" not having been "hitherto minutely stated by the aggrieved parties;"

* He left 500*l.* in trust to the D. and Ch. of Canterbury, for the relief of six poor widows of clergymen in that diocese, and 100*l.* to the poor of Preston.

† One of these parties, we are well assured, did not think himself "aggrieved" by

"parties;" and calls "a desideratum
 "to a complete biographical embellish"ment of Dr. Secker's temper and "disposition, when seated in the archi-"episcopal see of Canterbury." On the contrary, Mr. Lindsey and Dr.
 Priestley are the subjects of his elo-gium, and, speaking of public securities,
 "the only road to our political salva"tion (he tells us) has been pointed "out by the hand of a master, of one "who is no less excellent and worthy
 "in the estimation of his friends, than
 "wise and faithful in the best interests
 "of his country, and of mankind*."— While Bp. Warburton, for his "rough"ness and incivility," receives no quarter, his "hardy demonstration," as it is styled, renders even his faith suspected, and "if the volumes are left "to sleep in silence," when the new edition of his works, intended, it is supposed, by Bp. Hurd, shall appear,
 "the cause of revelation," this writer affirms, will not be injured.

"Moscow, Oct. 1729.

"DEAR SISTER,

"This is the last letter you will be plagued with from the Russian Bear, till the summer, as this is the last ship for this season, and we are now preparing for the winter, and I own that the apparatus frights me. Mr. Ward yesterday brought me home some very handsome scarlet damask; I thought, for a nightgown; but before I could thank him, out came, from the same parcel, a great fur, like a petticoat in shape, but, to all appearance, of a weight that no animal with only two legs could carry. This, he told me, was for a soube, or gown, to travel in, or to wear in any place where ceremony is not required.
 For more ceremonious occasions there was crimson velvet, and ermine to line it, for a cloak, and a broad forehead-cloth, of black velvet, lined with satin, and a muffler under the chin, that is fastened to it on the temples, so that only eyes, mouth, and nose are seen.
 It is so contrived that it may be worn with the head full-dressed, without disordering the hair or cap; but, when I travel, I am to have a fur cap over it, and no other headdress. As it is, I am so disguised you would hardly know me, for at your brother's desire, I went into the dress of the country very soon after I got here, and found that he judged right, as it prevented much staring at me. At the wedding of our Governor*, I observed a lady, with a picture of the Empress Catherine hung to a blue ribbon on her left side, ornamented with diamonds.
 After dancing a minuet with a plain-dressed, but gentleman-like, man, he said, in rather broken English, 'Madam, pray give me
 'leave to introduce my wife to you, who 'would have been to wait on you before
 'now, but she has been ill, and this is the 'first day of her going out.' He then brought this picture lady to me, who entertained me very politely, and told me who all the company were, and made me a visit the next day, and we are become as intimate as the distance between us will admit of, she living chiefly at Cronstadt, her husband being a sea-officer. She is daughter to the clergyman to whom the Empress Catherine was a servant when she married her first husband, the Swedish corporal. When she came to be empress, she sent for this clergyman and his family, and gave them a pension, and often went to see them, and took his daughter about herself, and always shewed great love for her. The Emperor married her to this gentleman, and gave her a fortune, and, on her marriage, she had this picture pinned on letter.

her

her breast by the Empress. They are both good sort of people, and, I believe, a very happy couple. This surprising woman, who, from being the wife of a corporal, became that of a monarch, has so far raised my curiosity as to make me very inquisitive as to any anecdotes about her; and by all the information I can get, I think that, if she had died four or five years before the great Peter, she would have made a great figure in history; for gallantry with a monarch, or, more properly speaking, the gallantries she had had before her marriage with him, would have been over-looked. But you say, why don't I tell you her history, as I have heard it here? Now, though this will spin out this letter to an unreasonable length, I tell you that she was servant in the family of a clergyman in Finland, as nursery-maid to this above-mentioned lady. She married a Swedish corporal, and was taken by a party of Russians, some say, on the wedding-day, others say, the next day. No one knows what was the fate of her husband. She was, by Gen. Baure, who commanded the party, given to Prince Menzikoff, as were many more Swedish female prisoners. He was so fond of her as to be jealous, and kept her very close. Somebody told the Emperor what a beautiful Swedish girl Menzikoff had, but that he suffered no one to see her. The Emperor said, he would go directly to Menzikoff's, and tell him he wanted one of his Swedish girls to get up his linen, and that his informer should make him such a sign when the person he mentioned appeared. They went that moment. The monarch made his proposed request; several were produced, without the sign being made. On which the Emperor said, 'I am sure you have more, and I insist on seeing them all.' She was then produced, and he took her home with him, and after some years cohabitation with her, at last made her his wife, and continued very fond of her till he discovered an intrigue between her and one of her attendants, who was taken up on some other pretence, and condemned to lose his head. This sentence was executed, and the Emperor carried her in a close coach to see him suffer. I leave you to form to yourself the situation into which that sight, and his upbraidings, must put her. However, he shewed no outward resentment, on his children's account; but it was generally supposed, that, as soon as they were married, she would have severely felt his resentment; and her very dissolute life, after his death, made every one say, that she merited any severity he could have shewn her. Some years before this, a man was admitted to the presence of the Emperor, whom, after he had talked with him some time, he locked into his apartment, and went himself to that of the Empress; after some stay there, she came out with him, and went to his in great commotion, where she was heard to exclaim, 'It is he;' and in the course of three hours, that they two and this unknown man were together, she was heard to weep much, and often repeat, 'You promise me, he shall not be hurt.' He, without any passion, answered, 'I do promise, on my honour, and pity him enough to do every thing for his ease and advantage.' This man was sent away in the night, and was supposed to be the corporal [her husband]. She was in strong hysterics all that night, and he very tender over her.—But you must be glad that my paper stands your friend."

62. BIBLIOTHECA TOPOGRAPHICA BRITANNICA. N^o XXVIII. Containing some Account of Suffragan Bishops in England. 4s.

THIS Number consists of, I. "An Essay towards an Account of Bishops suffragan in England, occasioned by a Letter of the Rev. Thomas Brett, LL.D. printed in Drake's Antiquities of York, p. 539. By the late Rev. John Lewis, M. A. Minister of Margate in Kent. Written A. D. 1738." With an Appendix.—II. "Some Account of Prelates formerly existing in England, usually called Bishops in Partibus Infidelium." In a Letter from the Rev. Mr. Pegge to Dr. Ducarel, 1784. And III. "A List of the Suffragan Bishops in England, drawn up by the late Rev. Henry Wharton, M. A. and faithfully transcribed from his original MSS. in the Lambeth Library, A. D. 1768." This was supposed to be lost till discovered by Dr. Ducarel in 1767.—"Suffragan Bishops," we collect from the above, are properly the Bishops of the Province. But, besides these adjuncts, there were others, styled Cobepiscopi, viz. titular bishops, and co-operators or vicars in the episcopal functions, who lived in the country and villages at a great distance from the city church*. This order being laid aside in the Western church, by the Pope's tyranny, in the IXth century, Suffragan Bishops were introduced into England about the year 1325 †, who had

* "Bingham's Origin. Eccl. vol. 1."

had their titles from places abroad in partibus infidelium, and were commissioned by such bishops as were infirm, or otherwise engaged, to assist them in their episcopal offices. An Act for the nomination and consecration of Suffragans was made in 1534, 26 Hen. VIII. by which 25 towns, as Dover, Nottingham, &c. and the Isle of Wight, were nominated for sees of bishops suffragans in this realm, and in Wales. In this Act, Rochester, Chester, Chichester, Hereford, and Lichfield, are not named, and Bristol and Gloucester were soon after made the sees of diocesan bishops. Every prelate might name two, of whom the king was to choose one, and order his consecration. With this office two benefices with cure might be held, and the suffragans were commonly dignitaries. The last suffragan was John Sterne, consecrated bishop of Colchester 1592. Since that time, though the act is still in force, and though in large dioceses, for the purpose of confirmation in particular, such adjutors might be very useful*, none have been consecrated. These suffragans wore the episcopal habit, and, though they had no baronies, were styled Lords, like the present prelate of Mann. Mr. Wharton's list exhibits a pretty exact succession† of them, in all the dioceses of England, with the titles of those in Ireland.

In p. 27 of this tract, l. 6, for "they had" read "they held."—L. 21, for "shall" read "than."

P. 31, l. 12, for "variable" read "enviable,"—L. 15, for "or" read "nor."

63. The Life of John Gilpin, taken from divers Manuscripts in the Possession of the Family, &c. &c. To which is added, by way of Appendix, The celebrated History of his Journey to Edmonton, as read by Mr. Henderson at Free Masons Hall. Jan. 8°.

A VERY weak and sickly scyon, engrafted on a vigorous and well-known bough; in other words, a spurious John Gilpin, obtruded on the credulous as that legitimate son of Wit and Humour, whom we introduced to our readers in vol. LIII. p. 950. But — quam dispar! —

— Quantum mutatus ab illo

Gilpine, qui redit exuvias indutus amici, &c.

Ah! how unlike that GILPIN, who, on steed Of callender, was seen, with arrow's speed, By merry Islington and wond'ring Ware, Sans hat, sans wig, sans cloak, &c.

Of thirteen short chapters, of which this "Life" (as it is called) consists, the "celebrated Journey," put into prose, occupies near three, and the original in verse is also annexed; but as that, however excellent, is not new, and the little that is new is not worth reading, far from erecting a monument to this pseudo-sheriff and alderman at Ashford in Kent, where, we are told, he was "interred in the vault of his wife's family," the pamphlet before us, like the picture of Troilus on the walls of Dido's palace, will only record the rashness that gave rise to such an unequal competition:

Infelix puer, atque impar congressus acbilli.

64. Memoirs of the Baron de Tott, on† the Turks and the Tartars. Translated from the French. By an English Gentleman at Paris. Under the immediate Inspection of the Baron. 2 Vols. 8vo.

AFTER residing 23 years at Constantinople, the Baron de Tott returned of Lichfield, two of Salisbury, four of Worcester two of York, one of Exeter, two of St. Alban's, and one of St. Edmund's [Bury], after the IXth century, when Lanfranc is said by Collier, Hist. vol. I. p. 213, to have extinguished them here, and before 13254 How is this reconcilable?

* Lamenting the non-residence of diocesan bishops and archdeacons in his day, which made the revival of suffragans much to be wished, Mr. Lewis adds, as another evil in the province of Canterbury, "the archbishop's making so many archdeaconries his options, and disposing of them to his chaplains and favourites, however unqualified by their having cures at so great and unreasonable a distance." Since this was written, the option of an archdeaconry has been sold as a lay-fee, and justified by the highest law authority.

† In the passage above-mentioned, from Strype, Mr. Wharton promises "a perfect succession of suffragan bishops in almost all the dioceses of England, for two hundred years before the Reformation." But in his Latin, quoted by Dr. Brett, from his "Hist. De Ep'is et Decanis Londinensibus," p. 124, those words are thus qualified: "successionem propemodum justam in singulis fere diocesis," and the period "inter annos 1312 et 1540" is confined to "diocesi Londinensi." In truth, as mentioned in the preceding note, there are many before the XIIIth century. It is also observable that, though in the title of this List, and in several particular instances, they are called "Suffragan Bishops," or "Suffraganei," those each diocese are ranged under the head of "Coboresisepi."

† Query.

last

last year to France, and, in these Memoirs of his transactions, has given many melancholy instances of the ignorance, cowardice, tyranny, injustice, and supineness of the Turks, as well as many striking proofs of the unlimited confidence reposed in him by his employers, and of their obligations to him during the late war with the Russians, particularly for his defence of the Dardanelles, that key to the capital, whose real weakness was before unknown, and for the reform which he introduced into their whole military system. The Baron had the chief command of the artillery, and being perfectly well acquainted with the Turkish language, he had many more opportunities of seeing the manners of the people than fall to the lot of most travellers. His accounts, which are much to be relied on; shew, in a very strong light, the uncommon depravity and declension of the Ottoman empire. The translator, being well known to M. de Tott, in his name calls on the editor of the Annual Register, a respectable work, to retract an assertion of his apostacy, &c. in the volume for 1774.—A further account of these Memoirs, with some extracts, shall be given in our next.

65. An Address to Parliament, on the Situation of the Navy Surgeons. To which are added, Medical Strictures appertaining to the Health of His Majesty's Seamen, addressed to the Lords of the Admiralty; with Observations on suspended Animation. By William Renwick, Surgeon in the Royal Navy. 8vo.

FOR our account of this writer's "Letters on the Medical Service in the "Royal Navy," which we thought deserved attention, see vol. LIII. p. 599. This Address is on the same subject, urging the expediency of sea surgeons, who have completed five years servitude, being rewarded with half-pay and a provision also for their widows. That surgeons in the army should be commissioned officers, and in the navy only warrant, seems indeed a solecism. But this, we fear, is one of the grievances which cannot easily be redressed. In his "Medical Strictures" Mr. Renwick disapproves of the promiscuous use of tartar emetic and James's powder on board of ships, and, "next to "cleanliness and wholesome air," recommends "a general use of Indian "tea, the greatest cordial and most salutary medicine in the world." A warm bath is "the principal remedy" he prescribes in most casualties, as to which he coincides in opinion with the humane Dr. Hawes, though as to one of his cautioners, respecting the interment of bodies, he still dissents.

66. Discursory Thoughts, &c. disputing the Constructions of His Majesty's Honourable Commissioners and Crown Lawyers, relating to the Medicine and Horse Acts; to which are added, The Opinions and Resolutions of the Farmers in Scotland, viz. Not to enter every Drudge Horse which is rode on. Also, pointing out a Parliamentary Remedy for the Grievance People sustain by the equivocal Wording of the above Acts. With Remarks on the late Trials concerning the Medicine Act. By Francis Spillbury. 8vo.

It is hard, says an old proverb, to kick against the pricks. This dispenser of drugs and verbal criticisms will find it equally hard to kick against the taxes; and the "opinions and resolutions" of his Scotch "Farmers," when weighed against those of "English Commissioners and "Crown Lawyers," Judges and Juries, will kick the beam. But as "a decision "against Mr. Wray, authorised by a "Jury," has not convinced him, we know not what will. With "Medicines" Mr. Spillbury has an evident connection; but how does the "Horse "Act" affect him? unless he means to dispute the construction of all tax-bills, which, in truth, are generally disputable, being as loosely and doubtfully worded as if they were intended to supply loop-holes for cavils and evasion.

67. Milton's Juvenile Poems. With Notes, &c. &c. By Thomas Warton, B. D.

WE here find the Greek epigram mentioned by Dr. Sharp, p. 173, which therefore, with the note, which give an historical detail of the prints and pictures of Milton, we will add,

"In Effigiei Ejus Sculptorem.

"Ἀμειβῆν γιγνώσκειν χερσὶ τίνδε μὲν ἱκάνει
"Φαίης τίχ' ἄν, πρὶς ἱδρὸς αὐτοφυῆς βλάπτει.
"Τὸν δ' ἐκτυπῶντι δὲ ἐπιγόνους φίλοι
"Γράττει φάυνον δυσμίμητον ζωγράφου.

"This inscription, a satire on the engraver, but happily concealed in an unknown tongue, is placed at the bottom of Milton's print, prefixed to Moseley's edition of these poems, 1645. The print is in an oval; at the angles of the page are the Muses Melpomene, Erato, Urania, and Clio; and in the back-ground a landscape with Shepherds, evidently in allusion to LYCIDAS and L'ALLEGRO. Conscious of the comeliness of

of his person, from which he afterwards delineated Adam, Milton could not help expressing his resentment at so palpable a dissimilitude. Salmasius, in his DEFENSIO REGIA, calls it comptulam imaginem, and declares that it gave him no disadvantageous idea of the figure of his antagonist. But Alexander More having laughed at this print, Milton replies, in his DEFENSIO PROPRIA, 'Tu effigiem mei dissimillimam, præfixam poematibus, vidisti. Ego vero, si impulsu et ambitione librarii me imperito sculptori, propterea quod in urbe alius eo belli tempore non erat, infabre scalpendum permisi, id me neglexisse potius eam rem arguebat, cujus tu mihi nimium cultum objicis.' PROSE-WORKS, vol. II. 367. Round it is inscribed JOHANNIS MILTONI ANGLI EFFIGIES ANNO ETATIS VICESIMO PRIMO. There was therefore some drawing or painting of Milton in 1629, from which this engraving was made in 1645, eo belli tempore, when the civil war was now begun. The engraver is William Marshall; who, from the year 1634, was often employed by Moseley*, Milton's bookseller, to engrave heads for books of poetry. One of these heads was of Shakespeare, to his Poems in 1640. Marshall's manner has sometimes a neatness and a delicacy discernible through much laboured hardness. In the year 1670, there was another plate of Milton by Faithorne, from a drawing in crayons by Faithorne, prefixed to his HISTORY OF BRITAIN, with this legend, 'Gul. Faithorne ad vivum delin. et sculpsit. Joannis Miltoni effigies Ætat. 62, 1670.' It is also prefixed to our author's PROSE-WORKS, in three volumes, 1698. This is not in Faithorne's best manner. Between the two prints, hitherto mentioned, allowing for the great difference of years, there is very little, if any, resemblance. This last was copied by W. Delle, before Milton's LOOK, 1672. Afterwards by Robert White; and next by Vertue, one of his chief works, in 1725. There are four or five original pictures of our author. The first, a half length with a laced ruff, is by Cornelius Jansen, in 1618, when he was only a boy of ten years old. It had belonged to Milton's widow, his third wife, who lived in Cheshire. This was in the possession of Mr. Thomas Hollis, having been purchased at Mr. Charles Stanhope's sale for thirty one guineas in June, 1760. Lord Harrington wishing to have the lot returned, Mr. Hollis replied, 'his lordship's whole estate should not repurchase it.' It was engraved by J. B. Cipriani in 1760. Mr. Stanhope bought it of the executors of Milton's widow for twenty guineas. Another, which had also belonged to Milton's widow, is in the possession of the Onslow family. This, which is not at all like Faithorne's crayon drawing, and by some is suspected not to be a portrait of Milton, has been more than once engraved by Vertue, who in his first plate of it, dated 1731, and in others, makes the age twenty-one. This has been also engraved by Houbraken in 1741, and by Cipriani. The ruff is much in the neat style of painting ruffs, about and before 1628. The picture is handsomer than the engravings. This portrait is mentioned in Aubrey's manuscript Life of Milton, 1681, as then belonging to the widow. And he says, 'MRS. Write his name in red letters on his pictures which his widowe has, to preserve them.' Vertue, in a letter to Mr. Christian, in the British Museum, about 1720, proposes to ask Prior the poet, whether there had not been a picture of Milton in the late lord Dorset's collection. The duchess of Portland has a miniature of his head, when young: the face has a stern thoughtfulness, and, to use his own expression, is severe in youthful beauty. Before Peck's NEW MEMOIRS OF MILTON, printed 1740, is a pretended head of Milton in exquisite mezzotinto, done by the second J. Faber; which is characteristically unlike any other representation of our author I remember to have seen. It is from a painting given to Peck by sir John Meres of Kirby-Belers in Leicestershire. But Peck himself knew that he was imposing upon the public: for having asked Vertue whether he thought it a picture of Milton, and Vertue peremptorily answering in the negative, Peck replied, 'I'll have a scraping from it, however; and let posterity settle the difference.' Besides, in this picture the left hand is on a book, lettered PARADISE LOST. But Peck supposes the age about twenty-five, when Milton had never thought of that poem or subject. Peck mentions a head done by Milton himself on board; but it does not appear to be authenticated. The Richardsons, and next the Tonsons, had the admirable crayon-drawing above-mentioned, done by Faithorne, the best likeness extant, and for which Milton sat at the age of sixty-two. About the year 1725, Vertue carried this drawing, with other reputed engravings and paintings of Milton, to Milton's favourite daughter Deborah, a very sensible woman, who died the wife of Abraham Clarke, a weaver in Spitalfields, in 1727, aged 76. He contrived to have them brought into the room as if by accident, while he was conversing with her. At seeing the drawing, taking no notice of the rest, she suddenly cried out in great surprise, O Lord, that is the picture of my father! How came you by it? And, stroking down the hair of her forehead, added, Just so my father wore his hair. She was very like Milton. This head, by Faithorne, was etched by Richardson the father about

* Among sir A. Cokain's Epigrams, there is one to Moseley, on his edition of B. and Fletcher, B. ii. 35.

1734, with the addition of a laurel-crown to help the propriety of the motto. It is before the EXPLANATORY NOTES on the PARADISE LOST, by the Richardson, Lond. 1734, 8vo. The busts prefixed to Milton's PROSE-works by Birch, 1738, and by Baron 1753, are engraved by Vertue from a bad drawing made by J. Richardson, after an original cast in plaster about fifty. Of this cast Mr. Hollis gave a drawing by Cipriani to Speaker Onslow, in 1759. It was executed, perhaps on the publication of the DEFENSIO, by one Pierce, an artist of some note, the same who did the marble bust of Sir Christopher Wren in the Bodleian library; or by Abraham Simon. Mr. Hollis bought it of Vertue. It has been remodelled in wax by Goffet. Richardson the father also engraved this bust, for THE POEMS AND CRITICAL ESSAYS of S. Say, 1754, 4to. [Seccol. 2.] The drawings, as well as engravings, of Milton by Cipriani, are many. There is a drawing of our author by Deacon: it is taken from a proof-impression on wax of a seal by Thomas Simon, Cromwell's chief mint-master, first in the hands of Mr. Yeo, afterwards of Mr. Hollis. This, a profile, has been lately engraved by Ryland. Mr. Hollis had a small steel puchcon of Milton's head, a full front, for a seal or ring, by the same T. Simon, who did many more of Milton's party in the same way. The medal of Milton struck by Tanner, for auditor Benson, is after the old plaster-bust, and Faithorne's crayon-piece, chiefly the latter. So is the marble bust in the Abbey, by Ryssack, 1737. Scheemaker's marble bust, for Dr. Mead, and bought at his sale by [the late] Mr. Duncombe [of Yorkshire], was professedly and exactly copied from the plaster-bust. Faithorne's is the most common representation of Milton's head. Either that, or the Onslow picture, are the heads in Bentley's, and Tickell's, and Newton's editions. All by Vertue. Milton's daughter Deborah above-mentioned, the daughter of his first wife, and his amanuensis, told Vertue, that 'her father was of a fair complexion, a little red in his cheeks, and light brown lank hair.' Letter to Mr. Christian, ut supr. MS. Brit. Mus.

It is diverting enough, that M. Vandergucht engraved for Tonson's edition, 1713, a copy of Marshall's print 1645, with his own name and the accompaniment of this Greek inscription, an unperceived reflection on himself. I am not sure, if Vertue* has not fallen into the same unlucky mistake.

Since these imperfect and hasty notices were thrown together, Sir Joshua Reynolds

* The inscription under Vertue's plate is,
 Τὴν ἀριστερὰν Μῆσος ἐδίδου, εἰδὼ δ' ἀγαθὸν καὶ καλόν.
 Ὁρθωμένῳ μὲν ἀμείβετο, εἰδὼ δ' ἡμέραν αἰώνου. Εἰδ.

has purchased a picture of Milton, for one hundred guineas. It was brought to Sir Joshua last summer by one Mr. Hunt, a printseller and picture-dealer, who bought it of a broker; but the broker does not know the person of whom he had it. The portrait is dressed in black, with a band; and the painter's mark and date are 'S. C. 1653.' This is written on the back. 'This picture belonged to Deborah Milton, who was her father's amanuensis: at her death it was sold to Sir W. Davenant's family. It was painted by Mr. Samuel Cooper, who was painter to Oliver Cromwell, at the time Milton was Latin Secretary to the Protector. The painter and poet were near of the same age; Milton was born in 1608; and died in 1674; and Cooper was born in 1609, and died in 1672; and were companions and friends till death parted them. Several encouragers and lovers of the fine arts at that time wanted this picture; particularly Lord Dorset, John Somers, esq. Sir Robert Howard, Dryden, Atterbury, Dr. Aldrich, and Sir John Denham.' Lord Dorset was probably the lucky man; for this seems to be the very picture for which, as I have before observed, Vertue wished Prior to search in Lord Dorset's collection. Sir Joshua Reynolds says, "The picture is admirably painted, and with such a character of nature, that I am perfectly sure it was a striking likeness. I have now a distinct idea of the countenance of Milton, which cannot be got from any of the other pictures that I have seen. It is perfectly preserved, which shews that it has been shut up in some drawer; if it had been exposed to the light, the colours would long before this have vanished."

With the picture above-mentioned (by Jansen) Mr. Hollis "walked calmly out of his lodgings," when on fire, taking that only in his hand. (See our vol. L. p. 426.) Mr. Brand Hollis, we suppose, is the present possessor.——Richardson the father engraved this bust for the Poems and Critical Essays of S. Say, 1754, 4to." Here is a small mistake or two. This is the same "etching" that is before mentioned to have been made "by Richardson about 1734," which was lent, on this occasion, to the editor of Mr. Say's works, published in "1745." Mr. R. was not living in 1754. But there is another etching of Milton by Richardson, before he was blind, and much younger than fifty, with some bombast verses under it, which shall be annexed to this article:

"Authentic Homer, Light's whole soul—
 "rain flws,

"Immense, fierce dazzling yet, and tor"rent glows;

"His

" His temper'd beam the Mantuan bard
 " reflects,
 " Shines sweeter, and his fairest rays
 " selects:
 " Thine, Milton, both, but not both these " alone,
 " Thou, like Elysium, know'st another
 " sun.
 J. R. jun."

" It must be owned, that this miniature of Milton, lately purchased by Sir Joshua Reynolds, strongly resembles Vandyck's picture of Selden in the Bodleian library at Oxford: and it is highly probable that Cooper should have executed a miniature of Selden, as a companion to the heads of other heroes of the commonwealth; for Cooper painted Oliver Cromwell, in the possession of the Frankland family; and another, in profile, at Devonshire-house; Richard Cromwell, at Strawberry-hill; Secretary Thurlow, belonging to Lord James Cavendish; and Ireton, Cromwell's general, now or late in the collection of David Polhill, esquire. Cooper was painter to the party, if such a party could have a painter. The inference, however, might be applied to prove that this head is Cooper's miniature of Milton."

For "David Polhill, Esquire," in the above extract, we should read "Charles Polhill, Esquire," a descendant of Cromwell.

In a note on Milton's first Elegy, Ad Carolum Deodatum, Mr. Warton says, that this Charles Deodate (who must be carefully distinguished from Carlo Dati, Milton's Florentine friend,) "was a fellow collegian at Trinity College, Oxford, where he was entered in 1621, with Alexander Gill, another of Milton's intimate friends." But Gill, who had been admitted there in 1612, was in 1621 usher of Saint Paul's school, from which, it is afterwards said, "he sent Milton's friend Deodate to Trinity College, Oxford."

68. An Enquiry into the Effects of putting a Stop to the African Slave Trade, and of granting Liberty to the Slaves in the British Sugar Colonies. By the Author of the "Essay on the Treatment and Conversion of African Slaves in the British Colonies." 8vo. 1784.

THIS plan consists in "changing the slave trade for an ordinary commerce, or mutual barter, of commodities with Africa, on terms of equality, by establishing factories, encouraging civilization on that coast, and returning some of our West Indian slaves to their original country."—Supposing that the Sugar Colonies,
 GENT. MAG. May, 1785.

either by their own choice, or the events of war, should be separated from Britain, the Enquirer suggests "the possibility of our being supplied with sugar, that necessary of life, from Africa." Supposing them to continue united, it might afford a market for their rum. From the success of the Portuguese among the Negroes, and from the information of an intelligent sea-officer, who has lately commanded on the coast, "it is clear (he says) that the Africans are capable of instruction and improvement, and that agriculture and arts might easily be introduced among them." Sugar, tobacco, indigo, &c. might be cultivated in St. Thomas's; negro teachers and artists might in time be sent out from that island to instruct and improve their brethren on the continent, &c. Visionary as this plan may seem to those who are interested in defeating it, a blessing surely will attend the endeavours of all who shall co-operate, in any manner, to remove this scandal on our humanity and religion, this diabolical traffick in human flesh.

69. The Case of our Fellow Creatures, the oppressed Africans, respectfully recommended to the serious Consideration of the Legislature of Great Britain, by the People called Quakers. 8vo.

AFTER what we have said above, it is needless to add, that we join, heart and hand, with these humane petitioners, who have delivered, with great energy and pathos, the sentiments that must, on this occasion, impress every feeling heart, and which, we think, cannot but operate on those who, if they had the will, have certainly the power to redress this evil.

70. Outlines of a ready Plan for protecting London, and its Environs, from the Depredations of Housebreakers, Street and Highway Robbers. 8vo.

IT is here proposed that London should be patrolled every night by its militia, new modelled "on some effective plan," and Westminster, with the out-parishes in Middlesex, by detachments from the foot-guards, having "one principal guard-house, at the junction of Tottenham Court Road with Oxford Street, to supply a convenient number of detached outposts, and the Eastern suburbs being " protected

"protected by the garrison at the Tower." The stations recommended for out-posts in Westminster, &c. are, "Eastward, the N. E. corner of Grays-Inn Garden-wall, Clerkenwell Green, Hoxton Square; on the other sides, some convenient station in the upper part of the new buildings in St. Mary-le-Bonne, S. E. corner of Berkeley Square, Broadway, Westminster; and, for the interior parts, Leicester Fields, and Lincoln's-Inn Fields." A party to be mustered, and turn out every evening at eight o'clock, sufficient to furnish two serjeants' guards at each of these stations; one half to proceed, under their respective serjeants, to the outlying posts, and the other to remain at the principal guard-house, to be ready in case of alarm, and for a relief. Instead of firelocks, to be armed with large horse-pistols and short bayonets fixed to them, and provided with watch-coats; half a serjeant's guard, which consists (in the whole) of twelve men and two corporals, to take post at each guard-house, while the other half patrol the neighbouring streets, within a limited district, according to a prescribed route, for two hours, and then to return and be relieved, as should all the out-posts, at the expiration of those four hours, from the chief guard-house; and the return of the latter guard from their four hours duty will conclude the patrol of the night. These guards, while on duty, to be under the direction of the civil power, in Westminster, of the High Steward, or High Bailiff; and in Middlesex, under the Lord Lieutenant; at least till the "loose flimsy government" of that city be reformed by law; a justice of peace attending the chief guard-house in rotation every night, and a constable presiding at each of the out-posts.

The constant city-guard for London, it is proposed, should be 300 effective men, and the guard-houses are recommended to be fixed at "The Bank, for the chief central guard-house; Bartholomew Close; The Obelisk at Fleet-bridge; Monument Yard; The N. W. end of Houndsditch, in Bishopsgate Street." Parties to patrol from each of these stations, as in Westminster. And the garrison at the Tower to send parties to "three guard-houses, stationed in Wellclose Square, White-chapel Church-Yard, and at some convenient spot to the N. E. of Spital

"Fields Market." All the parishes in London and Westminster, &c. to contribute coals, candle, and beer-money, for their use and refreshment. Thus Westminster, &c. would have a nightly guard of above 300 men, and London of nearly 150*. And, in like manner, the most unfrequented roads near the capital, viz. as far as Kilburn, Acton, Hampstead, Highgate, Newington, Hackney, Stratford, Saint George's Fields, Greenwich, Fulham, and Turnham Green, are proposed to be guarded from 8 or 9 to 11 or 12 in the summer, and from 6 or 9 to 10 in the winter, by parties of light-horse, from four to six or eight on each station, and two constantly patrolling, with guard-houses for their reception and shelter.

The above plan, well digested, we doubt not, would be effectual. Objections will probably be started, of which we are not aware, as the principal seem obviated by the proposer, and of the great use and occasional necessity of such a military guard we had abundant proof in the tumults of 1780—quos animos meminisse horret.

71. A Translation of the Inferno of Dante Alighieri, in English Verse. With Historical Notes, and the Life of Dante. To which is added, A Specimen of a New Translation of the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto. By Henry Boyd, M. A. 2 Vols. 8vo.

THIS work was printed by subscription, and, by the Dedication to the Bishop of Derry, Earl of Bristol, (who, we are told, had offered it his patronage,) which is dated from "Killeigh, near Tullamore," the translator should seem to be an Hibernian†. Magnum opus movet, as, to render the darkness (if we may so say) of the Inferno visible to English eyes, requires (to say no more) great knowledge of the idioms of both languages.

Mr. Boyd first presents us with "A summary View of the Inferno, from Warton's History of English Poetry, Vol. III. Sect. 33," which is followed by "A comparative View of the In-

* "Paris is said to have a night-guard of 200 horse and 400 foot, who watch and patrol the streets, one half of them, alternately, every night."

† We should otherwise have supposed him to be of Scotland, by the Shibboleth of will for shall; e. g. p. 40, "We will at the same time see the different scars," &c.

" sermo, with some other Poems [the
 " Iliad, Æneid, Paradise Lost, &c.] re" lative to the original Principles of " Human Nature, on which they are " founded, or to which they appeal;"
 " An Historical Essay of the State of " Affairs in the XIIIth and XIVth
 " Centuries, with respect to the History " of Florence; with a View of their " Influence on the succeeding Ages;"
 and " The Life of Dante, from Leo" nardo Bruni," of which we will now add an abridgement.

" Caccia Guido was the name of his " family, one of the first in Florence.
 " Alighieri was that of the maternal " line, natives of Ferrara, from a gol" den wing* which they bore on their " arms. The poet was born in 1265,
 " and very early displayed both a supe" rior genius and an amorous disposi" tion, his passion for the lady, whom " he has celebrated in his poem by the " name of Beatrice, commencing at " nine years of age, though, by his own " account, it seems to have been as " chaste and platonic as that of his suc" cessor, Petrarch. Her death, at the " age of twenty-six, threw him into a " profound melancholy, which, as his " friends advised him, he endeavoured
 " to remove by marriage; but in vain;
 " his wife being another Xantippe, he " separated himself from her, though
 " she had borne him several children,
 " and afterwards fell into a profligate
 " course of life, from which he was " rescued by the prayers of his mis" tress, now a saint, who prevailed on
 " the spirit of Virgil to accompany him " through the Infernal regions. Such,
 " he says, was the origin of his Divina
 " Commedia, of which the Inferno con" stitutes a part. Ambition, however,
 " was the immediate cause of all his " succeeding misfortunes. Entering in" to the army, his bravery in an action
 " in which the Florentines were victo" rious, near Arezzo, prepared the way
 " for his advancement in the state. The " Guelfs having then the superiority in " Florence, Dante, in the year 1300,
 " was elected Prior, with several col" leagues, the first executive office in " the republic; and from this exalta-
 " tion he is said to date his misfor" tunes. The two noble families of " the Cherchi and Donati, in conse" quence of an old quarrel, had taken
 " arms, and a dispute between two

" branches of the family of Cancellieri,
 " of Pistoia, who had formed factions
 " called Blacks and Whites, determined
 " the Donati to join the Cancellieri, or " Blacks, and the Cherchi to join the " Whites. And, to put an end to the " quarrel, Dante and his colleagues or" dered the heads of the opposite fac" tions to remove from Pistoia to Flo" rence, where some joined the Blacks,
 " and some the Whites. Carlo Donati
 " advising an application to the Pope,
 " Boniface VIII, to terminate these in" testine broils, by sending Charles of " Valois, of the blood royal of France,
 " a great clamour was made by the " Whites, and Dante, perceiving the " pernicious consequences, took, from " that time, a decided part against " them, though, with the semblance " of impartiality, he ordered the " leaders of both parties into confine" ment. But the Whites were soon re" leased, while the Blacks remained in " bonds or exile. Charles of Valois
 " was sent to Florence. He at first pre" served moderation; but on a sudden,
 " when matters were ripe, he recalled
 " the exiles of the Black faction, and " banished their adversaries. Dante,
 " then at Rome, returned only to meet
 " the same fate, and to see his posses" sions confiscated, and his house razed
 " to the foundation, having, in his ab" sence, been declared contumacious
 " for not appearing before the Podesta,
 " to a charge for misdemeanours com" mitted during his priorate. For four " years he, and several other illustrious " exiles, endeavoured to enter their na" tive city by force; but not succeed" ing, they then dispersed. Dante's
 " first patron was the great Cane de la
 " Scala, Prince of Verona, whom he " has celebrated in the first canto of his " Inferno. But partly by his melan" choly turn, which made a buffoon
 " more acceptable, and partly, perhaps,
 " by his republican frankness, he lost
 " this prince's favour. From Verona
 " he is said to have retired to France,
 " and disputed, Boccacio affirms, in the " theological schools of Paris. In
 " 1308, Henry Count of Luxemburgh
 " being raised to the empire, Dante at" tached himself to his interests, wrote
 " in his service, it is supposed, his Latin " work, De Monarchia, and in 1311 in" stigated him to lay siege to Florence.
 " The Emperor, however, was repuls" ed, and his death next year deprived
 " the poet of all hopes of re-establish“ment in his native country. Poor and “dependent, he spent many years in “roving over Italy, till he found an “honourable establishment at Ravenna

 “by the friendship of Guido Novallo
 “de Polenta, lord of that place. Here “he was liberally entertained for the “few remaining years of his life, and “eloquence being one of his talents, “which had occasioned his having been “sent on fourteen different embassies, “Guido sent him as his ambassador to “Venice, to negotiate a peace with that “state. But not being able to procure a “public audience, and returning to Ra-
 “venna by land, from his apprehension
 “of the Venetian fleet, the mortifica“tion of his failure, and the fatigue of “his journey, threw him into a fever,
 “which occasioned his death, Sept. 14, “1321, in the palace of his friend, who “honoured his memory with the most “tender regard, by ordering the body, “adorned with poetical ornaments, to “be carried on a bier through the prin“cipal streets of Ravenna, by the most “illustrious citizens, and to be depo“sited in a marble coffin, himself pro“nouncing the funeral oration, and ex“pressing his design of erecting a most “splendid monument, which his sub“sequent misfortunes prevented. Many “epitaphs were written, at his request.
 “Bernardo Bembo, father of the cele“brated cardinal, raised a handsome “monument over his neglected ashes,
 “or rather bones, which, before that “time, the Florentines had twice un“successfully endeavoured to gain from “Ravenna. He began his immortal
 “work, Boccace says, in his 38th year,
 “and had finished seven cantos of his “Inferno before his exile. The begin“ning of his poem was fortunately “preserved, in the plunder of his “house, by an intelligent poet, named “Dino. He lent it to the Marquis
 “Marcello Malestina, who returned it
 “to the author, and urged him to pro“ceed. When he completed it, does “not appear. Among other instances “of the high estimation in which it was “held at Florence, Ceno de Alcoli, a “celebrated physician and astrologer,
 “for writing parodies on it, was burnt “there about three years after the “death of the poet whom he had “maligned.”

The Speech of Beatrice to the elected Spirits in Purgatory, with an Account of the Lapse and Conversion of Dante, the translator has annexed, from the XXXth Canto of his Purgatorio, “as

 “the best introduction to the following “work,” of which we will now add an extract, which shall be the conclusion of the XXIVth Canto, in which a noble Pistoian acquaints the author with the fate both of Pistoia and Florence.

XX.

“Ye ask to know my race—from Arnq’s vale

Hurl’d headlong down, I fought the depths of Hell;

For more than common villainy renown’d.
 No feller savage haunts the moonlight wild*,
 Nor owns a den with bloodier deeds defil’d,
 As well Pistoia knows, my native ground.

XXI.

“Yet, ere we pass, illustrious Bard †, enquire
 Why here below he feels the penal fire;
 More fit to join the sanguinary band.
 I spoke—the sinner heard my just request,
 And turning round his faded face unblest’d,
 Explain’d his title to the snaky strand.

XXII.

“No deadlier pang my parting spirit bore,
 Since first she sunk to this disastrous shore,
 Than the keen censure of thy judging eye.
 ‘Twas sacrilege, and lust of hallow’d gold,
 Among the spoiler troop my name enroll’d,
 Still forc’d the fiery plague in vain to fly.

XXIII.

“But, lest my deadly plagues regale thy sight,
 Know, if thou e’er should’st see the bounds
 of light,

(Unhappy Florentine! attend thy doom.)
 The swarthy tribe ‡ on fair Pistoia’s plain
 Shall turn the day, and rally once again,
 And colonise once more their native home.

XXIV.

“I see, by Mars exhal’d, an hostile cloud
 The tented plain of Valdimagra shroud,
 And sweep Piceno’s field with whirlwind
 sway!

See! where the swarthy band obscures the
 field!

The foe inglorious drops the silver shield;
 Go to thy friends, foretell the dreadful day.”

The above, we need not add, is sufficiently close and spirited to give an adequate idea of the original; and the same we can justly say of the whole work. The stanza, it is observable, is not that of Dante, but much more easy, a liberty, we think, very allowable.—
 The notes are very useful, and indeed necessary, additions, as they illustrate

* “Surnamed Bestia, from his savage disposition. He was notorious for robbery and sacrilege,” of which a remarkable instance is given.

† Virgil, Dante’s guide.

 Black faction under Charles of Valois, and the banishment of Dante. See Life of Dante.
 Hist. Florent.”

the facts and persons introduced in the poem. Had the translator been acquainted with some excellent verses by the late Mr. Yorke to his sister (Lady Anson), occasioned by her copying a picture of Dante by Clovio, he would certainly have mentioned them. (See vol. XL. p. 38.) And we are much surprised that the shocking story of Count Ugolino should not have extorted an eulogium on the great painter who has drawn it.

To give the reader an opportunity of comparing the first part of Scott's Christian Life, chap. III, with the view of futurity given by Dante, a "Summary View of the Platonic Doctrine, with respect to a future State," is annexed, from that author. The "Specimen of a new Translation of Ariosto" is the story of Zerbino and Isabella, Canto XXIV; but as the Furioso has been so admirably translated by Mr. Hoole, though not in stanzas, we shall only add, that "the entire translation," Mr. Boyd informs us, "has been finished some years."

This version is in general correct and spirited, and frequently poetical; it will therefore please an English, more than an Italian, reader, who compares it with the original, as it is often diffuse, and the sense of the author is often amplified, and sometimes retrenched, with a freedom which few (we should think) will approve. Thus in Canto IV, which describes "the Limbo of the ancients," and where the translator says, "he has taken the liberty of adding some characteristic imagery to the 'muster-roll of names' which constitutes a great part of this Canto in the original," among the Patriarchs, "David Re," we know not why, is omitted, and "Abraam Patriarcha," and

"Israel, con suo padre, et co' suoi nati,
"Et con Rachele, per cui tanto se,"

(literally,

"Israel, with his father and his sons,
"And Rachel, earn'd by many a tedious
"hour,")

are branched out into this stanza:

"Then he*, who with his small domestic "band
"Follow'd the vision of the promis'd land
"Through many a smiling plain to Jordan's shore;
"He† that so dear the Syrian damsel
"bought,

"His spouse‡, and they§ that to their "father brought
"The fraudulent mantle, stain'd with savage
"gore."

Here, not to cavil at the vulgarity of the word "spouse," the "characteristic imagery" is not only arbitrarily, but improperly, annexed to the "sons of Israel," as it "stains" them with an imputation of fraud at least, which, however just, Dante, far from expressing, could never intend.

In like manner, these three lines,

"Quegli è Homero poeta socrano,
"L'alt' è Horatio satiro, che vene,
"Ovidio è il terzo, et l'ultimo Lucano,"

(literally,

"'Tis Homer, he who every bard sur-
"pass'd,
"Horace approaches next, for satiric
"fame'd,
"The third is Ovid, Lucan is the last,") are expanded into these nine:

"'Tis mighty Homer, first of bards, who "sung
"How on the flying rear Achilles hung,
"And all the terrors of Scamanders
"field.
"Near him the master|| of the Latian tongue,
"Who civilis'd the rude satyric choir,
"And bade them mingle with the pe-
"lish'd throng;
"And mighty Lucan, stain'd with civil
"blood,
"With him who to the swans on Iliac
"flood
"In exile sung his sweetly plaintive
"song."

To us the names only, as in the original, are much more expressive than this circumlocution, by which, "like expanded gold," to adopt a simile in Irene, they "exchange solid strength for feeble lustre." Besides, to such a poet as Dante, the names alone were sufficient, as, when he heard who these poets were, he knew, as well as his informer, what and where they sung.

72. An Essay on Punctuation. 12mo.

THIS is an admirable treatise on punctuation, infinitely superior to any that has hitherto appeared; and though the subject is dry and unpromising, it is enlivened, by the author, with a great variety of apposite examples, pleasing sentiments, and ingenious remarks.

By an advertisement subjoined we are authorised to ascribe this tract to [the

* Abraham. † Jacob. ‡ Rachel. § The sons of Israel. || Horace.  Ovid.
Rev.

Rev. Mr. Robertson], the author of a small volume, published in 1762, intitled, "An Introduction to the Study of Polite Literature."

73. Thoughts on the Slavery of the Negroes. 80.

MR. WESLEY published an excellent tract with this title twenty years ago. (See our vol. XXXV. p. 137.)—This is totally different, though it breathes the same spirit of humanity towards our oppressed fellow-creatures, which has lately dictated several other publications on the same subject, particularly those of Mr. Ramsay and the Quakers. May they have the desired effect!

74. Verses on the Death of Dr. Samuel Johnson. 4to.

THIS tribute, though late, for which the author apologises, is not unworthy the subject, as the reader may collect from the following specimen:

"Ye youths, who, fir'd by bold Longinus' page,
Join critic chaffiness with inventive rage,

As on your classic brow ye wish to twine
The temperate olive with the glowing vine,
Fix'd on his precepts, as yon fountains rove
Through the clear Stagyræ's immortal grove,

Tell the wide world with what an eagle eye
He plann'd his progress through yon cavernous sky,

Pierc'd the thick clouds of error in his flight,

On dazzling talents fix'd his steadfast sight,
Equal the vapoury meteors to discern,
Or mark the radiant fires that purest burn,
Intensive Science saw his steps invade
The deep recesses of her awful shade.
Through the deep glade his penetrative eye
Pierc'd to those truths which vulgar ken defy,

The oak majestic skilful to divide
From the wild scions springing by its side."

"These are good rhymes," as Pope's father said of his juvenile productions; but in accenting the participle in the following line he differs from the great philologist, and from Pope:

"On each exquisite string they taught the
"note."

And some passages are rather obscure.

where they would find meet companions for themselves.

It is also false and calumnious to assert that they are bound to Jerusalem; and that rivers and seas were to be dried up before them in their passage. The Buchanians expect no such thing, and are bound no where but to seek a residence for a short while where they may be free from the insults of rude people, as they assure themselves no particular place is necessary for them, as their Lord and Master, Jesus Christ, will abundantly find them soon at his second coming, be they where they may at the time.

Some people call Mrs. Buchan a witch, which she treats with contempt. Others declare she calls herself the Virgin Mary, which she also denies; declaring she has more to boast of, viz. that the Virgin Mary was only Christ's mother after the flesh, whereas she assures herself to be Christ's daughter after the spirit.

Her husband is still in the Burgher Secession communion; and when I asked Mrs. Buchan, and others of the Buchanians who knew me, if they had any word to any of their acquaintances in Glasgow, they all declared they minded not former things, and former connections, but that the whole of their attention was devoted to their fellow-faiths, the living a holy life, and thereby balancing the second coming of their Lord Jesus Christ.

I inquired to them that there had been Millenarians before them, who died as other men, and saw not in their life-time the second coming of Christ. The Buchanians answered to this, that those Millenarians, believing the certainty of Christ's second coming, and his Millenarian kingdom coming, and his Millenarian kingdom coming, and his Millenarian king-

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

A Letter from a Gentleman at Tenerife, dated Dec. 18, 1784.

By a bark which arrived here on the 14th instant, from the island of Hierro (one of the Canary islands subject to Spain), we have the following most melancholy account. On the 6th, a vessel displaying white colours landed 37 people, amongst whom were five, or, as some say, seven women, some of them with infants in their arms. They came ashore on a beach on the S.W. part of the island, surrounded on the land side by high inaccessible rocks, which entirely prevented all ingress into the country, except at one particular part, where there is a steep and narrow declivity, through which one person at a time may pass. This inlet was immediately secured by some of the islanders who happened to be near, whilst others went to the town, and gave an account of the coming of these people to the Governor, Don Juan Britz Calderon: this officer convened the Council, or, as it is called here, Cavildo. Unfortunately for these devoted people, very strict orders had been issued (in consequence of the plague raging in some parts of Europe) not to admit any vessels whatever until, upon a due examination of their papers, it should appear there was no danger of infection. The Governor, fearing, or pretending to fear, that the new-comers might possibly have the plague amongst them, proposed the horrid measure of cutting them all off. Some of the Cavildo, to their lasting honour, strenuously opposed to shocking a step, and pleaded the cause of the innocent victims, and of humanity itself. They argued, that these unhappy strangers all appeared healthy; that some unavoidable distress might have compelled them to seek an asylum on their shore; that it was cruel and unjust to inflict the severest of all punishments upon them, for transgressing a temporary law of the country, which they could not possibly be acquainted with; and that, dom, lived not the holy life enjoined them, but cared for to-morrow, laid up treasures on earth, and in most things conformed to the world, which conduct of those men has rendered not Christ's second coming; but they, conforming strictly to God's word, cannot be disappointed, if God be true, which, they say, would be blasphemy to doubt or call in question.

I found the Buchanians a very temperate, civil, discreet, and sensible people, very free in declaring their principles when they were attended to; but most of their visitors behaved in a rude, wicked, and abandoned way, which improper behaviour they met and bore with surprising patience and propriety. Though I was far from being a convert to their doctrines, I was sorry to see them so much influenced by men whose behaviour was barbarous, and unbecoming a civilized people; I advised them to follow industry, and enforced the same by all the arguments I was master of. I forewarned them of the disgrace, poverty, and all their concomitant miseries, such principles, if persevered in, would certainly bring upon them; but they were not affected by any thing I could say; telling me, they had God's word for this, wherein they had his words, was the best book in the world. I answered, God never taught such principles, nor commanded such conduct; and that the Bible, which they applauded so much, had led them to folly, and that they would do better to pay more attention to their own judgment and common sense, than to follow the unintelligible writings of other men, and manifest absurdities.—This account has been derived from times to times for want of room.

An authentic Account of the BUCHANITES, a new religious Sect in the West of Scotland. (alias Mrs. Buchanan) is a daughter of John Simpson, innkeeper at Firmy-Cap, which is the half-way house between Banff and Portroy, in the North of Scotland, at present living there; an old man of 90 years of age, and who has now a fourth wife.

Mrs. Buchanan is about 46 years of age, and was married, about 24 years ago, to Robert Buchanan, distiller-workman, at Glasgow.

She came to Glasgow when she was about 22 years of age, and took service with Mr. Martin, one of the principal proprietors of the distillery there, and soon after married the above-mentioned Robert Buchanan, one of the workmen, and servant to the same Mr. Martin.

Robert Buchanan and Elspeth Simpson have had many children, only three of whom are alive; one a boy about 14 years of age, now in Glasgow; the other, two daughters, about 19 and 21 years of age, now along with their mother, and professing the same principles.

When she was married, she was of the Episcopal persuasion, but her husband being a Burgher Seceder, she adopted his principles, and was in communion with that sect. About five years ago, she changed her opinion greatly, became the author of many new and extraordinary doctrines, and soon brought over to her opinions Mr. Hugh Whyte, who was the settled Relief minister at Irvine, and connected with Mr. Bell in Glasgow, and Mr. Bain in Edinburgh, who have, since Mr. Whyte's abdication of his charge, settled a Mr. Robertson in his place at Irvine.

She also brought over Mr. Hunter, a writer, and fiscal of that place, with his wife, Mrs. Whyte, Mrs. Mart, shop-keeper, Mr. and Mrs. Gibson, and many others; and was gradually making new converts till April 1784, when the populace in Irvine rose, and all her converts, of whom the above mentioned are a part, to the number of 46 persons, left Irvine.

The Buchananites (for so they are called) went through Mauchlin, Cumnock Old and New, halted three days at Kircconnel, passed through Siquhar and Thornhill, and now are, if not lately driven out by the populace, at a farm-house, the office-houses of which they have all along possessed, paying for the same, and every thing they demand; which farm-house lies two miles south of Thornhill, and about thirteen miles from Dumfries.

The author of this narrative being a merchant in Glasgow, and having occasion to go to that country, spent a great part of the 25th and 26th of August last in their country.

any, conversing with most of them, but principally with Mrs. Buchanan, Mr. and Mrs. Whyte, Mr. and Mrs. Hunter, Mr. Innes, &c. The Buchananites pay great attention to the Bible, being always reading it, or having it in their pocket, or under their arm, proclaiming it the best book in the world. They read, sing hymns, preach, and converse much about religion, declaring the last day to be at hand, and that no one of all their company shall ever die, or be buried in the earth, but soon shall hear the voice of the last trumpeter, when all the wicked shall be struck dead, and remain so for one thousand years. At the same moment, they, the Buchananites, shall undergo an agreeable change, shall be caught up to meet the Lord in the air, from whence they shall return to this earth, in company with the Lord Jesus, with whom, as their King, they shall possess this earth one thousand years, the devil being bound with a chain in the infernum. At the end of one thousand years the devil shall be loosed, the wicked quickened, both shall assail their camp, but shall be repulsed, with the devil at their head; while they shall triumphantly under the Lord Jesus Christ, as their Captain General. Since the Buchananites adopted their principles, they neither marry nor are given in marriage, nor consider themselves as bound to any conjugal duties, or mind or indulge themselves in any carnal enjoyments; but, having one common purse for their cash, they are all sisters and brothers, living a holy life as the angels of God, and beginning and continuing in the same holy life they shall live under the Lord Jesus Christ, their King, after his second coming.

The Buchananites follow no industry, being commanded to take no thought for the morrow; but, observing how the young ravens are fed, and how the lilies grow, they assure themselves God that will much more feed and clothe them.

They, indeed, sometimes work at masonry, carpentry, and husbandry work, for people in their neighbourhood, but refuse all wages, or any consideration, declaring that their whole object in working is to mix with the world, and inculcate those important truths they themselves are so much persuaded of.

Rude people, who visit them, importune much on the public by propagating falsehood concerning them, such as I was told before I saw and spoke with them, viz. that fourteen of the young unmarried girls were with child. But when I was there, I could not see a woman in all the company, married or unmarried, that was with child; and they all declared to me, they valued not, nor sought after, any such enjoyments; and if any of their company were to do so, they would instantly turn them out to the world, where such practices were allowed, and

This hour, perhaps, some newer strain make Or with an amorous smile approve his
Ah no! that angel form, that tender
The soul where goodness claims to large a
Is form'd alike for constancy and love.
Last night at eve, when wand'ring through
Where echo only could the message
I whispering ask'd the sympathetic gale,
To sigh my sorrows in my Chloe's ear.
Tell her, I cried, as o'er her neck you
I live for love, and languish for her
O tell her, how I pant, from day to day,
To clasp her yielding in these raptur'd arms.
When will the hour of bliss again return,
When heart may echo mutual sighs to
heart?
When I no more in silent grief shall mourn,
Nor friends, nor fortune, dare to bid us
part.

Let vernal fountains honour's calls attend,
And forlorn misers heap up gold in store;
To me may heaven a sifter blessing send!
Give me my Chloe, and I ask no more.

CAVE NEAR WOODBRIDGE.

W H O E V E R you be, who stray these lrees among,
Pause here awhile, and read a mournful
tale;
If e'er with joy you heard the woodland
song,
A little warbler's joys you must bewail.
Here, in this spot, with patient anxious care,
A lowly wren had form'd her molly nest,
Which married grains o'er-arched from the bleak air,
And she, fond bird! hop'd nought could e'er molest.
Her brooding fondness now success had crown'd,
And all her young + had from their prisons broke!

And crush'd the roof; scarce the escap'd

If thou hast children, go, her sorrows share!
Thy roof too Fate may crush:—yet doubt not heaven's just care.

ON THE DEATH OF A BELOVED WIFE.
LAST! the bright dawn's o'ercast!
The loss of my love I deplore—
My happiness surely to part!
Since Juliet, dear Juliet's no more!
The honour that glow'd in her breast,
My heart will for ever hold dear!
The virtues my Juliet possess'd
Demand from affection a tear.
Could tears the sweet angel restore,
My eyes like a fountain should flow;
But O! 'tis in vain to implore,
And my heart is o'erwhelm'd with woe.
Heaven give me the strength to retain
The goodness that dwell in her heart;
Then, when I shall cease to remain,
We shall meet again, never to part.

GENIO LOCI.

Where the rapt Seraphs join
 With earth's redeeming throng,
 To raise the wondrous song
 Of clemency divine:
 To echo o'er the ethereal plains
 How He who bow'd to death for ever reigns.

Even now, while young Affection lays
 This tribute on Fidelio's urn,
 While mourning Friendship fondly lays,
 "He never shall return!"
 The freed immortal roves
 Through shades that far excel
 All that the Heav'n-enslaved Bard
 Could tell,
 Or our first Father know—of Eden's happy
 Groves;
 Now with his Waters he tunes the ecstatic
 Song,
 Or calls his crown before the eternal
 Throne.

And when the last loud trumpet's sound
 Shall break the silence of the tomb,
 Perade the sea, and round the ground,
 And utter Nature's final doom:
 When Fame's proud trophies all in ruin lie,
 And Desolation mingles earth and sky:
 Then shall the once-encumbering clay,
 That check'd the Spirit's ardent fire,
 Which would to sacred themes aspire,
 And sunk in weakness and decay,
 Arise, in Heaven's unfading beauties dress'd,
 And soar and triumph with the adoring
 blest.

YES, Delia! long as bears this trembling heart
 Those much-lov'd scenes shall sweet remembrance bring,

In which, as yet, had cold regret no part,
 But cheerful how'd they as the hours of spring.

Those scenes, those hours, in penfive song
 I shall live,
 When our true hearts the purest offerings
 made,

When Confidence its inmost thoughts did give
 To Friendship lifting in the silent shade.
 The flowery wreaths which then your ha-
 gers wove,

Do still their perfume, still their bloom retain;
 The tender tales which then our breasts did move,
 Now warm to pleasure, and now wake to
 pain.

Ah, Fancy! stop, and check thy wanton
 pride,

For thy gay moments shall return no more:
 Hush'd are the winds, all calm the azure tide,
 And, lo! the bark has reach'd its destin'd shore.

Yes, thou didst sit in wilder vision gay,
 And oft didst pour a sweet delusive strain;
 Soft passion list'n'd to the fairy lay,
 Nor could believe that all thy dreams were vain.

And whilst to distant climes and future hours
 Young credulous Hope in flowery bands you led,

To his rapt eye exhausted all your powers,
 His unsuspecting soul those powers obey'd.

And oft with thee he fascinated rovd
 Gay, flowery meads and myrtle groves among;

Delia can tell how much thy power he prov'd,
 For the too list'n'd to thy firen song.

But ah! soft passion must awake no more,
 So reason bids, and thus does fate ordain;
 Yet will the Muse that wayward fate deplore,

And yet lament that fancy's dreams were vain.

But Delia's charms and worth may yet inspire

A sacred flame, by Virtue's self approv'd,
 Still wake to softest melody the lyre,
 And up this heart shall reign reviv'd and lov'd.

WHEN HERE now are fled those days of soft delight,
 Dreams of fond bliss, and hours of sweet
 repose?
 Ah! where has pleasure wing'd her rapid flight?
 Why have these lids so long forgot to close?

Why, as I range the unfrequented mead,
 Flows the big tear reluctant from mine
 eye?
 And why in vain, stretch'd helpless on my bed,
 Court I the numbers which my griefs deny.

Thou, in whose presence all around was gay,
 Hast left these scenes to solitude and
 me:

Unheeded now, I linger through the day,
 And every sigh I heave is full of thee.

For thou alone couldst soothe my frantic breath,
 Correct and govern my disorder'd will,
 With one soft glance bid every passion rest,
 And every thought, but those of love, be still.

Those lips which oft in ecstasies I've press'd,
 When kisses spoke what words could never reveal,

This

That drop'd Compassion's tear;
Lifted the hand, that stretch'd to each
Dejected wretch's persuasive sigh;
And even to guilt distress'd was ever near;
Silent the tongue, whose happy art
Now rais'd the soul absorb'd in earth
To meditate her heavenly birth,
Now brought sweet comfort to the wounded
heart:
From youth to age—of Virtue's train,
He laughs her pure laws
Nor ever to attain
A mortal's vain applause,
Would holy truth conceal:
Nor with a bigot's phrase
Would meanly seek to raise
The flames of party-zeal;
But still in Scripture style he trac'd the won-derous plan
Of heaven's high glory and the bliss of man.

And oft along the walks he'd rove
Where Science, sweetly musing fair,
Beguiles the load of human care,
And gives her vot'ry all her joys to prove;
Yet chief, Religion, radiant power!
With graces smiling and serene,
'Twas thine to mitigate th' afflicted hour,
To adorn the social and the private scene;
Ah! could thy charms the deadly dart al-
lunge,
His years had stretch'd beyond a patriarch's age.

But since the mortal crime
That ravag'd Eden's favour'd land,
The good of ev'ry clime
Have felt the reflect's tyrant's hand;
The philosophic sage,
With all his studious lore,
And they who could explore
The moralizing page;
Even He has felt, for sacred gifts admit'd,
Whole life and language taught what heav'n inspir'd.

And there, alas! must holy virtue lie
Sunken in the Moral's doom;
A soul, that oft would seek her native
sky,
Immer'd in yon impenetrable tomb;
Ah—hapless ignorance of Greece and Rome!
To Life's sad vanity confin'd their view,
In sweetly-plaintive notes they sang
The frailty of the mortal man,
For dull and shade * was all that Nature's Pupil knew.

The Christian's fairer prospects rise

Where'er I search, my husband search'd before,
And soon my nest will hold an orphan brood!

"For Elbano, lo! then pour the strain,
'Till the sad note on ev'ry evening gale;
And, as the lengthening shades usurp the plain,
The silent moon shall listen to the tale."

A MONUMENTAL ODE TO THE MEMORY OF

The Reverend THOMAS GIBBONS, D. D.
OBIT FEB. 22, 1785.

Nec prius moram

Rigoris et ingenui senectus

Affert, indomitaque mori.

HOR.

AH! what avails the pall of crimson dye,
The proud cicuta's wondrous wrought by empty fame!
Alas! in vain the Sculptor's art would try
To grace Ambition with a lasting name.
Lo! Darknets shroud the form that grasp'd at power,
And to Oblivion would his deeds consign:
The Vanity preserve them for an hour,
Time's ruthless hand shall raze each hattering line.

But sacred Virtue asks no Parian stone,
No long drawn Dirge—the mimicry of woe:
Her worth a race unborn shall fondly own,
For her the Muses' sorrowing numbers
flow.

Yes! o'er the good Fido's urn
Sad Grief shall pious Friendship pay,
There soft Humanity shall mourn,
And pour a plaintive lay.
For ever clos'd his eye

The living blith, the conscious dead
 Themselves appall'd, that truth is dead.
 And can it be that worth like this,
 "Thou great High-priest of all the Nine,"
 Should mould'ring, undistinguish'd sleep?
 Even at the thought the Muses weep.
 Forbid it, Gratitude and Love!
 O for a flow like his, to prove
 How much regretted!—Honest Bard,
 Accept this shadow of regard.

 OF A NIGHTINGALE.
 BY MR. PRATT.
 FOR ELIUNO, IOW, renew the strain,
 Pour the sad note upon the evening
 Gate,
 And as the length'ning shades usurp the
 plain,
 The silent moon shall listen to the tale.
 "Sore was the time, ill fared was the
 hour,
 The thicket shook with many an omen
 dire!
 When from the topmost twig of yonder
 bower,
 I saw my husband flutter and expire.
 "Twas when the peasant fought his twilight rest,
 Beneath the brow of yonder breezy hill;
 'Twas when the plummy nation fought the best,
 And all, but such as lov'd the night, were still;
 "That, fondly sitting with a lover's pride (My tender custom, while the sun withdrew)
 Dear Eliunio sudden left my side,
 And the curst form of man appear'd in view.
 "For sport, the tube he level'd at our
 head,
 And, curious to behold more near my race,
 * A line from his Epistle to Hogarth.
 † This miserable rhymer's Nemesis surely stirr'd up to the deed for the avenging of the Scots, the players, and other unhappy wretches, whom Churchill had unmercifully lashed at the cart's-tail of his satires.
 Far from inferring the above lines, Dr.
 Kippis has not informed us, in his life of this Satirist (Biograph. Britan. vol. III.)
 where he was buried. And though he has told us where he died, and that his disorder was a "miliary fever," he has forgot to mention that excessive drinking was the cause.
 ‡ Who has written under the name of Courtenay Melmoth.

Low in the cleft the awful robber laid,
 Explor'd our haunts, and thunder'd at the place.
 "Ungrateful wretch! he was our shepherd's son,
 The harmless good old tenant of yon cot!
 That shepherd would not such a deed have done;
 'Twas love to him that fix'd us to this spot.
 "Oft' as at eve his homeward steps he bent,
 When the laborious talk of day was o'er,
 Our mellow'd warblings lough'd him as he went,
 'Till the charm'd bird forgot that he was poor.
 "Ah! could not this thy gratitude inspire?
 Could not our gentle visitations please?
 Could not the blameless lessons of thy fire
 Thy barb'rous hand restrain from crimes like these?
 "Oh cruel boy, thou tyrant of the plain!
 Could'st thou but see the sorrows thou hast
 made,
 Or didst thou know the virtues thou hast
 stain'd,
 And view the gloomy horrors of the shade;
 "Could'st thou behold my infant younglings lie.
 In the moor cradle by our bills prepar'd,
 Babes as they were, unable yet to fly,
 Their wings defective, and their bosoms
 bard;
 "Surely the mighty malice of thy kind,
 Thy power to wrong, and readiness to kill,
 In common pity to the parent's mind,
 Would cease the new-made father's blood to spill.
 "Haply, the time may come, when heav'n shall give
 To thee the troubles thou hast heap'd on
 me,
 Haply, ere well thy babes begin to live,
 Death shall precept the date of misery.
 "Just as the tender hope begins to rise,
 As the fond mother hugs her darling boy;
 As the big rapture trembles in thine eyes,
 And thy breast throbs with all a parent's
 joy!
 "Then may some midnight robber, skill'd
 in guile,
 Resolv'd on plunder, and on deeds of
 death,
 Thy fairy prospects, tender transports, spoil,
 And to the knife resign thy children's breath!

A DESCRIPTION OF THE TOMB OF WALTER.
BY MRS. HUGHES.
MIDST a sequester'd spot, for silence
made,
Beneath the quivering poplar's lonely shade,
Friendship the marble urn officious rear'd,
Where sculptur'd forms in mimic life appear'd;
Sorrow, with streaming eye and heaving
breast,
A white-robd queen in ardent prayer ad-dress'd.
Her soft engaging smile appear'd to charm
Stern justice, and suspend his lifted arm;
One snowy hand his threatening steel repell'd,
Extended one a golden pencil held,
With which, in characters so man well
known,
Maisy inscrib'd the monumental stone.
THE INSCRIPTION.
BEST here, poor erring child of misery,
The only spot where rest was found for
these:
Thy virtues and thy pangs to me were
known,
I visited them before th' Almighty's throne.
Thou' rais'd the dead that bade thy sorrows
cease,
Here he permits thee to repose in peace,
Till the bright dawn of an eternal day
Shall chase thy heavy slumbers far away!
When sudden starting from thy deep repose,
Thou trembling hear'st thy heavenly Judge disclose
That dual sentence, which must fix the fate
Alike of all the mean and all the great,
I in that awful hour will plead thy cause,
Stern justice may relax his rigid laws;
Man time be lent, Man! not idly dare
To bound that Goodness all must hope to share.

Where living MARY weeps for MARY,
Happily her grateful spirit, now rising near,
Shall check the sigh, and thus repay the
tear:

"No more lament what I no more can feel!
"From my freed bosom every passion fled,
"When on the block I bow'd my regal
head;

though they should be infected, the spot of ground they occupied effectually secured the inhabitants from catching the infection, by only guarding the avenue—offering to maintain these unhappy strangers until the Governor-general of the islands, residing at Teneriff, should be informed of the case. Unhappily their humane sentiments were not listened to by Briz and others, who adopted the scandalous and bloody resolution of slaughtering them without mercy or delay: accordingly the militia armed, and officered, with the accursed Briz at their head, marched to the place where the horrid deed was to be executed. They found the poor victims dispersed along the beach; the men, some gathering shell-fish, and others walking together in simple sociable parties; the women were, some sitting on the sand, combing and dressing one another's hair, others washing some linen in the sea-water, and others fondling their infants. Thus situated, they were found by their infernal butchers, who, in order to gather them together to perpetrate with more ease their diabolical purposes, threw down an empty cask upon the beach. The unhappy people, thinking it was some kind relief intended for them, immediately flocked together where the cask stood; and there the bloody massacre began. Humanity revolts at the shocking idea!—Suffice it to say, that in a few minutes an end was put to all their existence, except of one of the women, who took shelter with her child between two rocks, and of a man, who, after having a ball lodged in his arm, took to the sea, where he kept swimming upwards of two hours, but, being obliged to cling to a rock to escape drowning, was there cut to pieces with a sabre; the woman was also soon followed into her retreat, and stabbed to death with a knife, as was the infant on her breast.

That merciless miscreant the Governor was the first who fired his piece; and, observing a visible backwardness in many of the militia in following his example, he threatened them with instant death if they hesitated in the least; and, to shew he was in earnest, knocked down the nearest man to him with the butt-end of his musket, for appearing reluctant to the slaughter.

The news of this savage act of barbarity has been received at Teneriff by all ranks of people with the deepest concern and regret, and by none more than the Governor-general, who deplores it extremely. He could not at first give credit to it; but was at length convinced of the fatal truth by letters from the infernal wretch, Briz himself. Exasperated to the highest pitch, he has given a commission to an officer of rank to go over to Hierro, to take cognizance of this diabolical affair.

GENT. MAG. May 1785.

The advices in the foreign prints respecting the negotiations between the Emperor and the Dutch are still various and contradictory. Dispatches from Holland are said to contain the terms on which the dispute was actually to be terminated, which, if authentic, are humiliating to their High Mightinesses, and such as they were not accustomed to accede to in the days of their prosperity: 1. An indemnification for the damage done by inundating a part of the country; 2. A sum of twelve millions of florins, in lieu of Maastricht; 3. The cession of the two lordships beyond the Maese to the House of Austria; 4. The unlimited right of navigating the Scheldt as far as Saftingent, and from thence to the sea, for Austrian vessels only; and these paying a small duty. These conditions agreed to, the treaty will soon be completed.

These advices have, however, been flatly contradicted by others from Germany, while those from France confirm the same; the former announces a disposition for war, the latter, that every thing will amicably be settled by an arrangement. If we trust in words, the latter appears most probable; if in actions, the former.—Certain advices from Ostend leave no room to doubt, that a body of Austrian troops has already entered that city, which is to be followed by another body, now in full march; and all accounts agree, that the Dutch are incessant in their preparations; Gen. Monsteir, Gov. of Grave, a city in Dutch Brabant, has laid the environs of that city under water, to prevent an attack, though the inundation has extended over seven villages. Add to this, that the settlement of the limits between the Austrians and the Turks seems entirely at a stand; this, therefore, is not the immediate object of the Emperor's preparations. Another circumstance unfavourable to peace, is, that a body of 30,000 Russians, is just arrived on the confines of Poland, supposed to be in march towards his Prussian majesty's dominions.

The report of the Bavarian treaty (see p. 228) is again revived; and a letter from Utrecht, dated May 9, has this remarkable intelligence: "The Emperor is most probably, at this moment, master of Bavaria; an army of 40,000 Austrians has entered this electorate, where, so far from meeting any opposition, they were joined by 6,000 Bavarians, who are proud to march under the standard of Joseph II, and to be ranked among the subjects of that great Sovereign.

The warlike preparations of Spain intended against Algiers, of which we have already spoken (see p. 311), seem to be prosecuted with a zeal as if Spain actually designed to exterminate that regency. At the same time, their Governor in the W. Ind. Don Galvez, seems no less in earnest to expel the English English from their settlement in the bay of Honduras, who, in league with the Musquito Indians, are preparing to repel force by force. Of this the Spanish ambassador is said to have complained to our court; but it is more than probable, that, before any measure can be concluded on in Europe, the contest will be decided by arms in America.

From the horrors of a threatening war, if we turn our eyes to the calamities and distresses of the inhabitants of the Continent, owing to various other causes that have destroyed and depopulated many rich and flourishing districts, we cannot help looking upon the country in which we live as favoured by Providence in a most eminent degree. Free from plagues, subject to no foreign wars, under no apprehensions from the dreadful effects of earthquakes, nor liable to be swept away by inundations pouring down upon us unexpectedly and unapprehended, every man enjoys on this happy spot security from evils to which our neighbours are daily exposed, and of which we can have no conception, because we are strangers to their effects.

At Constantinople, on the 9th of April, it was esteemed a blessing that no symptoms of the plague had appeared in that city, or its neighbourhood, for forty days only.

On the 18th of April, the miserable inhabitants of Calabria Ultra, and Messina, were again (see Vol. LIII. p. 257, 350, &c.) alarmed by the shock of an earthquake, which in Calabria was so violent, as to throw down some of the barracks. On the 10th of March, the town of Patrassæ, in the Morea, was utterly swallowed up by an earthquake.

The effects of the inundations in Germany this season have been unusually dreadful. The Elbe, the Oder, the Havel, and the Warta, have all overflowed their banks; and the dykes being broken down, the whole of the neighbouring country is laid under water.

From Breslau, that the sudden melting of the snow on the mountains, and of the thick ice on the rivers, has caused so great an inundation, that almost all the Lower Silesia is under water. The rivers Kosbach, Bober, Oder, and others, have so rapidly overflowed their banks, that all the roads are rendered impassable, and all communication is cut off.

From Magdeburgh, in Saxony, it is written, that the dykes of the Elbe have been unable to resist the force of the waters, and that an immense tract of country is inundated. If the inhabitants have saved their lives, 'tis well, the cattle must have perished: all the winter grain is destroyed.

From Prague, dated the 10th of March, that snow had fallen incessantly from the 5th till that day; that there was not a spot to be found in the mountains that was not six feet deep; and that the birds were flying about, not knowing where to rest, so that they were easily caught by the hand. All

Bohemia was in the same situation, though in lat. 32.

But what is remarkable, at Constantinople, in lat. 46, the winter has been uncommonly mild, with soft rain, and the air so warm, that their windows were kept open the best part of the day. On the 22d. day of Feb. however, a dreadful storm arose, by which near 40 vessels were overset, and 500 persons lost their lives.

The Empress of Russia has lately established an Oriental company, of the intended plan of which we formerly gave some account (see Vol. LIII. p.); a difference, however, which has lately happened between her imperial majesty's subjects, and those of China, may possibly for a while retard its progress. Be this as it may, three ships are already in great forwardness at St. Petersburg, destined for that trade, the Czarowitz, Anna, and Kitchayster; the command of the first is given to capt. Leake, a native of Scotland, as are most of the officers, the Russians not caring to engage in such long and hazardous voyages.

At the same time the French are reviving their East India company, under the patronage of the king, who has sent his commission for its re-establishment to L'Orient, appointing 16 directors for regulating their affairs. The stock is limited to 20 millions, six of which to be furnished by the directors. The whole stock to be divided into shares of 1000 livres each; the dividends to be made from the neat profits. No proprietor to have a vote for less than 500 shares. The Company is to be entirely mercantile.

Besides this fresh attempt to renew their trade in the East Indies, the French have another project in view to enlarge their commerce. We have already noticed (see p. 311) a commercial voyage pointed out by the late capt. King. This plan has appeared so promising, that the French seem to have adopted it upon an improved scale, under the patronage of his Most Christian majesty; and the count de Peyrouse is to be entrusted with the conduct of the voyage. It is to be partly on discovery, and partly commercial. The ships are to be armed en flûte, and to retrace the Western and North Western coasts of America, which capt. Cook has already explored; and if a convenient spot is found, on which to make a settlement, they have a number of extra men, who are intended to establish factories, and to take wives from among the natives, by whom they will soon be instructed in the language of the country, and taught the arts by which the inhabitants are supported; at the same time that they will introduce the European arts, and the European cultivation. The most sanguine expectations are formed from this new source of commercial intercourse, which cannot fail of success, if the natives can be brought peaceably to favour us.

While

While the Asiatic Company is renewing in France, that of Ostend and Trieste is said to have failed for 20 millions of livres tournois, 900,000 of which are due to an eminent house at Amsterdam, and nearly an equal sum to a house at Leghorn; the rest fall upon individuals, less able, perhaps, to bear the loss. It seems the Dutch have hastened the failure, to distress the Emperor.

During the course of the last year, the number of vessels that entered the Tagus was 357 Portuguese; 11 Spanish; 89 French; 35 English; 77 Dutch; 80 Swedish; 30 Danish; 3 Prussian, 10 Austrian, 23 American; 18 Venetian; 12 Ragusan; 6 Prussian; 11 Hamburgers; 2 from Bremen; 1 from Genoa; 1 from Danzig; 1 from Lubec; 1 from Naples; and 1 from the Morea.

SCOTLAND.

At the late circuit court held at Glasgow, David Steven was indicted for the murder of Thomas Morton, by shooting him through a window, while sitting at his stockingloom, in the work-shop of John Black (see Vol. LIV. p.), was found guilty, and is to be executed on the 8th of June, and his body given to professor Hamilton, to be dissected. At the former circuit court, this David Steven, with his father William, and his elder brother William, were to have been tried for a forgery on the Aberdeen bank; but the deceased, Thomas Morton, a principal evidence, being then in Ireland, the trial was deferred; and, in the mean time, Morton returned, and was shot by the convict in the manner above described.

EAST INDIA INTELLIGENCE.

The following extracts from a letter, written by Gov. Hastings, and dated Benares, Oct. 1, 1784, will shew the critical situation of the E. I. Company's affairs in India, and how much they depend on the conduct of their servants for their success, if not for their existence, in that part of the world.

The Governor begins his letter with the strongest assurances of the steady support of the Nabob Vizier to the arrangement which had been form'd under his (the governors) immediate inspection, and of his confidence in those who were placed about him: "My only remaining fear is, that the members of the council, seeing affairs through a different medium from that through which I view them, may be disposed, if not to counteract the system which I have formed, to withhold from it their countenance and active support. While I myself remain, it will be sufficient if they permit it to operate without interruption; and I almost hope that in the event of a new administration of your affairs, which shall confine itself to the same forbearance, and manifest no symptoms of intended interference, the objects of my arrangements will be effectually attained:

but if a different policy shall be adopted, if new agents are sent into the country, and armed with authority for the purposes of vengeance or corruption (for to no other will they be applied); if new demands are raised on the Nabob Vizier, and accounts overcharged on one side, with a wide latitude taken on the other, to swell his debt beyond the means of payment; if political dangers are portended, to ground on them the pleas of burthening his country with unnecessary defences and enormous subsidies; or if even, abstaining from direct encroachment on the Nabob's rights, your Government shall shew but a degree of personal kindness to the partizans of the late usurpation, or, by any constructive indication of partiality and disaffection, furnish grounds for the expectation of an approaching change of system; I am sorry to say that all my labours will prove abortive; for the slightest causes will be sufficient to deject minds sore with the remembrance of past conflicts, and to elevate those whose only dependence is placed in the renewal of the confusion which I have laboured with zeal to eradicate, and will of course debilitate the authority which can alone ensure future success. I almost fear that this denunciation of effects will be deemed overcharged, or, perhaps, void of foundation; yet it is my duty to apprize you of what I apprehend, on grounds which I deem of absolute certainty may come to pass: and I rely on your candour for a fair interpretation of my intention."

The intelligent reader will judge how precarious that property must be which depends on the vindictive spirit of a party.

Our people in India, who judge by appearances only, think the peace with Tippoo Saib very unlikely to be of long duration. The number of French troops brought to Pondicherry in almost every East India ship that leaves Old France, added to the pains taken by Tippoo Saib to attach to his interest the neighbouring princes, who formerly were jealous of the rising greatness of Hyder Aly, sufficiently declare the hostile intentions of our enemies in that part of the world; nor are the Dutch inattentive, in case of a rupture, to provide for their own security.

The arrival of Sir Edward Hughes will probably point out a new system of politics for that part of the world.

WEST INDIA INTELLIGENCE.

Advices from this quarter still continue to be interesting. The Spaniards appear to be in earnest to expel our settlers in the Bay of Honduras, and to exterminate the Mautquito Indians, who are in friendship with them.

The latest advices from Kingston in Jamaica are to the following effect:

Kingston, Feb. 19. An advice boat is arrived here from Maj. Lowrie, on the Mautquito coast, with dispatches to his honour the Lieut. Gov. containing the most pressing solicitation on licitations for immediate succour, as the Major had received undoubted intelligence that the Spaniards were every where in motion for a vigorous attack.

Feb. 26. Every account we receive from the country of the Musquito Indians confirm the repeated reports of the determined spirit of the Musquito Indians to resist to the last extremity the attempts of the Spaniards to reduce them to obedience. Their determination is, rather than be slaves, to destroy their wives and families, and rush upon their swords.

March 5. By a brig from Hispaniola an account has been received, that the Spaniards have met with a repulse from the Samblas Indians; who obliged them to retreat with the loss of 400 of their best troops.

March 23. By the Aërial sloop of war intelligence has been received here, that the Spaniards, in full force, actually intend to make their long premeditated attack, both by sea and land, on the 29th instant. They are particularly incensed against the Musquito Indians, on whom they will have no mercy, should they succeed in their enterprise.

A private letter from Jamaica remarks that a more subtle design to extirpate our settlers on the Musquito shore never was concerted before; notwithstanding which, it seems to have been discovered in time, and, as we learn our admiral's instructions are to support our people with his whole force, there is but little doubt of its being defeated.

ADVICES FROM AMERICA.

We learn that a new loan of two millions of guilders has been negociated in Holland by the hon. John Adams, minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, to the States General of the United Netherlands, with Messrs. Welhern, and Jan Wil-luk, Nicholas Van Staphorst, and de Land and Fynje. This contract has been ratified, and declared obligatory on the State by Congress.

The House of Assembly for the province of Pennsylvania have voted the sum of 150,000*l.* in paper money to be struck, in lieu of hard cash. It is a very unpopular step; but, as the public creditors were clamorous, it was necessary.

The leg.ature of Virginia have given his excellency Gen. Washington fifty proprietary shares in the new navigation up the river Potowmack, and one hundred in that on James River; the former at 100*l.* sterling each, and the latter at 200 dollars each; making in all 42,500 dollars. A donation worthy the commonwealth of Virginia, says the letter-writer.

From Hartford there is an account of a murder too shocking to relate, committed by a man out of his senses on his wife, whom he suspected to hold an intercourse with a familiar spirit. As soon as he had killed her, he took the children, three in number, one of them from the mother's breast, and carried them to a neighbour's house, where he confessed what he had done, and expected to be commended for it. He was committed to gaol.

Were we to give credit to private letters written by interested partizans, America is at this time the most miserable country in the world. "The heavy taxes laid upon the revolted provinces (say they) have drawn multitudes from the sea-coasts, to explore new regions beyond the western mountains, who are now settling in great numbers on the banks of the Ohio. [The finest country confessedly in the whole world.] It is computed that 19,000 souls emigrated to that country in the course of last year. At Philadelphia the scarcity of money has raised the interest to five per cent. per month. Good bills 8 per cent. above par; profits on imported goods low; house-rent dear; goods daily sold from 10 to 25 per cent. less, to make partial remittances. A broker has already realized 30,000*l.* sterling, by the advantage he has taken of the necessities of the Americans," &c. &c. Though all this appears much exaggerated, we could not help laying it before our readers, to shew how far prejudice will lead very sensible men.

By other advices from Halifax, the new settlements at Port Roseaway are said to be in a most flourishing situation, and want only a few female settlers to people the colony. Most of the new settlers being soldiers of fortune, few were encumbered with wives, who now would be useful to them. The number of Europeans who wintered there were near 400.

ADVICES FROM IRELAND.

On the 12th of this inst. May, Mr. Crosbie, who had constructed a balloon upon principles of his own invention, mounted his car in the Palatine-square, Dublin, amidst an innumerable crowd of spectators, and ascended as high as the roofs of the houses; but descended again with a velocity that alarmed all the spectators for his safety. It was found that his weight was so great as to overcome the power of ascension in the machine; but in an instant Mr. McGuire, a college youth, sprang into the car, and ascended with majestic grandeur to the astonishment of all who beheld him. It was about half after two when Mr. McGuire mounted, with seemingly the wind at east. When the balloon had reached a certain height, it appeared for a few moments stationary; but presently it was carried with incredible violence towards the Channel, in the direction of Holyhead. This being observed, a crowd of horsemen pursued full speed the course it seemed to take, and could plainly plainly perceive it descending into the sea. Lord H. Fitzgerald, who was among the foremost, instantly dispatched a swift-sailing vessel mounted with oars, with all the boats that could be got, to the relief of the gallant youth, whom they found almost spent with swimming, just time enough to save his life. He was stript, clothed afresh, and brought ashore, to the unspeakable joy of the spectators. He was received by their Graces the duke and duchess of Rutland, and conveyed to town in good spirits a little after eight o'clock.

Letters patent are preparing to be passed the great seal of this kingdom, for appointing lieut. gen. William Augustus Pitt, commander in chief of his Majesty's forces in this kingdom (held by commission) in the room of Tho. St. George, esq. deceased.

On the 27th of April Mr. O'Hara, in the Irish parliament rose, he said, to bring back to the public revenue no less a sum than 10,500l. a year, which, as now applied, neither tends to promote the benefit of the state, nor to maintain the dignity of government; but is shared among three persons not resident in this country, the humble followers of the English minister, which he thought a shameful misapplication of public money. He then moved, that the office of vice-treasurer of Ireland ought to be abolished. Negatived, 91 against 6.

On the 28th of April, Mr. Flood made his promised motion for a Parliamentary Reform; and, after delivering the outlines of his plan, moved, that the better to promote population in contracted or decayed boroughs, no borough in the province of Connaught, having less than 40, or in other provinces less than 70 voters, shall return more than one member to parliament. Negatived without a division. A bill is, however, ordered to be brought in, for a reform in the representation in parliament, though the above, to stand as a clause, was rejected.

On Tuesday, May 10, the House of Lords in Ireland gave judgement in the cause of Hume against Loftus, in favour of the latter; who by this final decision becomes intitled, as representative to the late earl of Ely, to the Hume estate, worth 14,000l. a year.

PORT AND COUNTRY NEWS.

About the latter end of last month, the sailors employed in the coal trade entered into a combination to have their wages advanced; and at Shields, the disturbance occasioned thereby began to wear a very serious aspect. The sailors rose, and paraded the streets in bodies, suffering no ship to stir out of port, and threatening the masters if they did not agree to their terms. In consequence of this mutinous behaviour, the ship-owners advertised a meeting at the Star and Garter at North Shields, on the 7th instant, where they were met by a deputation of six sailors, from the main body, to whom they offered 50s. a month for a London voyage, and 40s. a month when out of the coal trade. This offer was rejected; and an express sent to York for a party of the Iniskilling dragoons to be in readiness to put an end to the disturbances, if the sailors should proceed to extremities; at the same time another express was sent to Leith for the Myrmidon cutter and Shark sloop of war to weigh anchor instantly, for the same purpose. On the 12th, in the morning, the town of Newcastle was greatly alarmed by the 12th regiment quartered there beating to arms, and marching immediately. On their entering Shields the Riot act was read; and little attention being paid to it, the soldiers, under the direction of the civil magistrates, proceeded to action, when it is said more than 60 of the rioters were killed. [This has been since contradicted.] Next day the ship-owners consented to the augmentation demanded, and it was thought the sailors would have quickly returned to their respective ships; but, instead of that, they presented a bond, ready drawn up by an attorney, for their masters to sign, which some refused, and others accepted. In this situation things remained till the 17th instant, when the ships began to sail out of port, the masters having generally agreed to advance their wages, and to sign the bond. A more circumstantial account of this combination shall be given in our next.

At Hatfield, in Yorkshire, between the hours of twelve and one at noon, five houses are said to have been set on fire at one instant, as supposed, by a ball of elementary fire; only one house and barn were wholly consumed; but several others greatly damaged.—At South Molton, Devonshire, four houses were lately consumed by fire.—At Tiverton between 60 and 70 were burnt. At East Hampstead, on the 3d instant, some persons set fire to the heath growing upon Windsor forest, which by the dryness of the season spread in a surprizing manner, consuming a valley of heath several miles in length, and damaged the trees in a neighbouring park. It continued burning on the 14th instant.

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE.

The creation of the ninth Elector is now the subject of general conversation throughout the German empire; and the Archduke Francis of Tuscany, it is thought, will be put in nomination for King of the Romans.

There appears to be a rooted hatred between the Spaniards and Algerines; a corsair belonging to the latter, of 18 guns, having chased a ship from Bourdeaux into the very road of Cadiz; a King's frigate of 30 guns split her cable and came up with the corsair, when a bloody engagement ensued, which lasted two hours before a sloop of war came up to the assistance of the Spaniard. This rendered the conflict so unequal, that the Commander of the corsair, seeing no means to escape, endeavoured to grapple with the frigate; but failing in his attempt, he took the desperate resolution to blow up his vessel rather than strike, by which the whole crew perished.

In our LIII^d volume, p. 967, we gave an account of an affront offered by M. Louis le Fevre, at that time secretary to the Prussian embassy at the court of Spain, to the Comte de Gerisdorff, then minister plenipotentiary from the Elector of Saxony at the same court, which till now has remained unnoticed; but the Comte, having lately received letters of recall, has caused a public challenge to be circulated through Europe, demanding an explanation of M. Le Fevre; which, however, he does not seem in haste to answer.

About the middle of January last, a large Guineaman belonging to Bristol, being on the windward coast of Africa, where at Old Calabar she took in a number of slaves, the crew mutined, confined their officers, and put to sea; but while they were debating how they should dispose of them, a strong S. W. wind drove them near the coast of Morocco, where they were taken by two piratical corsairs, and carried into Marmora. These wretches have paid dear for their perfidy, being sent slaves up the country where they probably must remain till death puts an end to their misery. The captain and officers have been released at the instance of M. De-billenouve the French consul, who accepted bills on their owners, and advanced money to procure them a passage home.

DOMESTIC OCCURRENCES.

A gentleman of fortune, at the west end of the town a few nights ago, had a frolic rather of the serious kind. Having a numerous company assembled at his house, and having drunk pretty freely, he walked out of the room seemingly in high spirits, and in a few minutes the family were alarmed with the report of a pistol. Directed by the sound, some of the gentlemen went to a closet where an attempt had been made some time before to break into the house, and where a bed had been placed for a servant to lie by way of guard. Here they found the gentleman lying upon the bed with a pistol close to his ear, which had been left charged by the servant, but fortunately without any wadden, so that in the act of placing the pistol the bullets had dropt out, which were afterwards found, three in number, among the blankets, and the gentleman, one examination, had received no other hurt than his hair slightly singed about the eye-brows, and a small contusion near the temple. Nobody can otherwise account for this frolic (the gentleman being happy in his family, affluent in his fortune, and universally respected by his friend,) than a sudden impulse of phrenzy owing to the effects of the wine.

Saturday, April 2.

Was argued in the Court of K. B. upon a special verdict, the case of Sarah Hazel, who was tried at Norwich at the last assize, before Lord Loughborough, for murder. The facts found by the jury were; that the prisoner being angry with the deceased, a child of ten years old, for something she had done wrong, threw a stool at her, which wounded her in her head, of which wound she died. The jury also found, that the prisoner had no intention of killing the deceased. The court, having considerable doubts upon the facts found in the verdict, postponed giving judgment till after the opinion of the twelve judges should be taken. Lord Mansfield said, the intention of the prisoner was not a matter for the jury to have found. It was an inference of law, and not always necessary to conviction. If a man, in endeavouring to kill a person with a malicious intent, kills another against whom no malice could be implied, it would notwithstanding be murder, and the jury must find it so.

MONDAY, MAY 2.

About six in the morning a young man, genteely dressed, was found hanging on a tree in the Park. He proves to be a youth of genteel education, whose friends insisted on his going prentice to a hatter. A Castles.

Wednesday 4.

The society of Free and Accepted Masons held their anniversary grand feast at their hall in Great Queen street, when his R. H. the D. of Cumberland was unanimously re-elected Grand Master; his Grace the Duke of Manchester, past Grand Master; and as proxy of his R. H. being installed with the usual solemnities, was pleased to appoint the following brethren to be the grand officers for the year ensuing: Rt. Hon. E. Effingham acting Grand Master; Rowland Hill, Esq; Deputy Grand Master; James Haselton, Esq; sen. Grand Warden; M. J. Levy, Esq; jun. Grand Warden; Rowland Berkeley, Esq; Grand Treasurer; Mr. William White, Gr. Secretary; Rev. Mr. Eccles, Grand Chap. Thomas Sanby, Esq; Grand Architect; and Mr. John Paiba, Grand Sword-bearer.

Friday 6.

In the Court of King's Bench, the late master of a parish workhouse, and a surgeon, his son in law, were brought up to receive judgement for a conspiracy in bargaining for the dead bodies of the paupers, who were deprived of burial, and delivered to the Surgeon for dissection. The prosecution was carried on by the parish, who had discharged the master; and the man having lost his character by that infamous traffic, the court fined him only 10l. and sentenced him to three months imprisonment. The Surgeon, pleading his profession, was fined 10l. and discharged.

Saturday 7.

Mr. Blanchard made another aerial trip with his balloon, from Langhorn's Repository story. The wind was westerly, and carried him in an easterly course, in which situation he worked with his oars to change his direction. The machine went right before the wind, and landed him near Hornchurch in Essex.

This morning a most dreadful fire broke out in a warehouse near the end of Stoney-lane, Horsley-down, Southwark, which destroyed property to a vast amount.

The buildings that were destroyed were extensive turpentine, pitch and tar warehouses nearly adjoining together with all their inflammable contents to a large amount. The turpentine, pitch and tar being melted ran amongst, and being thrown by the engines with the water upon the fire, the flames, instead of being appeased, ragrd with tenfold fury. Including the tea in the East India hoys that were burnt, an immense quantity of that article is consumed; the reports on this head are various and contradictory; some say that three, some seven, and others that fifteen thousand chests of tea are consumed. The fine and very extensive range of warehouses belonging to Mess. Davis's are quite destroyed, with their contents, to a vast amount. The ruins occasioned by this shocking conflagration cover several acres of ground, several hundreds of edifices, including dwellings, warehouses, stores, and out-buildings being destroyed. The loss cannot be ascertained.

Monday 9.

This day the Chancellor of the Exchequer opened what is commonly called the budget. He stated without any formal preface the national expenditure for the current year, under the following heads:

Naval disbursements	-	£2,550,307
Army	-	2,286,263
Ordnance	-	392,855
Deficiencies	-	1,612,908
Exchequer bills unfunded	-	2,500,000
Somerset House	-	25,000
British Museum	-	3,000
Miscellaneous Services	-	35,695
Arrears of duty of the Leward Islands	-	359,836

All these together, he calculated to amount to the sum of 9,737,868l.; of this, he observed, there was already provided 6,184,117l. so that there remained 3,553,751l.

He then adverted to the situation of the Navy debt, and stated the amount of our naval bills to be 9,505,808l. as calculated with interest up to the 5th of July 1785; and the ordnance debt to Midsummer next at 504,349; in all 1,010,157l. which he proposed to fund; and to prefer the 5 per. cent. stock rather than the 3 per. cent. for that purpose, although he admitted there would be an additional interest of about 30,000l. to pay annually. He stated, that the whole interest to be provided would amount to 413,000l. for the payment of which he proposed, 1. an augmentation of the tax on male servants; 2dly, a tax on female servants; 3dly, a tax on retail shops; [as a compensation for this tax, he proposed, he said, to move for the repeal of licences granted to hawkers;] 4thly, a tax on gloves; 5thly, a 5l. licence on pawnbrokers; 6thly, an additional half-penny per mile on post horses; and lastly, a regulation on the conveyance of salt coast-wise. All these together he calculated to amount to 422,000l. which, he said, was about 9000l. more than wanted in order to make good deficiencies. He then made a recapitulation of his taxes thus:

Men servants	-	£35,000
Women ditto	-	140,000
Retail Shops	-	120,000
Gloves	-	50,000
Pawn-brokers	-	15,000
Post Horses	-	50,000
Salt	-	12,000

Total, 422,000

With this increase of revenue, together with the old, he would be able to pay the interest of the loan of a million from the Bank; to make good the deficiency that would be occasioned by the repeal of some of the taxes; to provide for the funding of the navy bills; and for raising a sinking fund of a million, which should annually be applied to the gradual diminution of the national debt. In conclusion, he moved first the loan of a million from the Bank.

Tuesday 10.

The Report of the Budget from the committee of ways and means was brought up, and read. The debate that ensued was rather witty and sarcastical, than solid and argumentative.

Wednesday 11.

A fire broke out in a store adjoining to the Crown Inn, at Chesterford, near Cambridge, which destroyed the stables and offices, with all the harness; but fortunately the horses and the inn were saved. It was occasioned by the throwing out ashes not sufficiently cooled; the too common cause of fires in the country, which we are sorry to see are becoming frequent. A waggoner assisting had his poney stolen, for which two guineas reward was offered in the next Cambridge paper.

Thursday 12.

Mr. Pitt opened the business so long expected, as the ultimate intention of Ministry on the Irish Resolutions. Great indeed, he said, had been the outcry in respect to trade; it was to be ruined, our commerce totally destroyed, and our opulence diminished by the participation of a part of the profits with Ireland; but those he looked upon as idle speculations; and he trusted, on a fair representation, to that justice toward our sister kingdom, which was to be expected from the wisdom, patriotism, and liberality of parliament; and that no party party views, no fabricated outcries, would prevent them from cementing together in one indissoluble bond of union the two great divisions of the empire. He besought gentlemen to recollect the dismemberment of America from this country, what a fatal blow it was! and how great a necessity now existed for consolidating into one mutual mass of interest the resources of what were left. Having enlarged generally on the advantages that would accrue to both countries, he then proceeded to state his propositions, which he did in so clear and collected a manner as attracted the attention of the whole house; and when he sat down,

Lord North rose. He said the matter that had been submitted to the committee was so various and new, that it was impossible for gentlemen to be prepared to vote upon it; the only proper mode therefore, would be for the chairman to report progress, and to ask leave to sit again. Though much debate ensued, this idea ran generally through the house, and

Mr. Piner, upon motion, divided the house upon it; when the numbers were, Ayes 135, Noes 281. Majority 126. The business was then resumed, and

Mr. Pitt moved specifically his first resolution.

Right hon. Th. Pelham moved to have it divided, to which Mr. Pitt agreed. And at eight o'clock in the morning both motions were carried by a majority of 124 in favour of ministry; and the house adjourned.

Saturday 14.

The grand jury for Middlesex found a bill of indictment against John Lockrell and a constable his accomplice for perjury, having sworn against two men Peter Newberry and William Ivesen (both capitally convicted and included in the dead warrant) but since found innocent on the fullest enquiry, and sworn against only to obtain the reward. What punishment can be adequate to such an offence?

Sunday 15.

At 8 in the morning a fire broke out in the house of Mrs. Ayton, milliner, in Turnstile. It was occasioned by a lad, her son, setting his hair on fire by lighting the parlour fire; or, as some say, curling his hair; and endeavouring to extinguish it, by covering it with the first linen he laid his hands on, communicated the fire to more linen, and soon set the house in a blaze. Mrs. French, and her two daughters, lodgers, with difficulty escaped out of the windows, and one of them was much bruised. The roofs of the houses on each side were much damaged, and one of the party walks.

Monday 16.

A fire broke out in the stables of the Green Man at Barnet, occasioned by a stone-horse kicking down the candle, which burnt eight horses belonging to a waggon.

The sessions, which began at the Old Bailey

on Wednesday the 11th, ended, when eleven convicts received sentence of death.—Seventeen convicts at the former sessions were ordered to be transported to Africa.

Wednesday 18.

The House met according to adjournment, and a great deal of private business was dispatched without debate.

Adm. Sir Edw. Hughes was introduced to his Majesty, and had the honour of a long conference of near two hours.

Thursday 19.

The question for reading a first time the bill for imposing a tax upon retail shopkeepers was put by the Speaker,

Mr. Ald. Sawbridge objected to it, as partial and oppressive.

Lord Surrey thought, if properly regulated, it would prove a good tax.

The bill was then read, and on a motion ordered to be read a second time.

Mr. Pitt moved his third Resolution on the Irish business, which was violently opposed. And at half after five in the morning

Mr. Sheridan moved, that the chairman do now leave the chair, and the House divided: Noes 195; Ayes 90; majority in favour of ministry 105.

Mr. Pitt then moved the fourth Resolution, but on the opposite side pointing out an amendment, the same was deferred till Monday.

A court was held at Christ's Hospital, when the Lord Mayor was chosen President in the room of Alderman Allop, who has resigned.

This evening Vaux-hall Gardens opened for the season.

Mr. Sadler mounted his show car at Manchester, and rambled through the air till he dropped down near Pontefract. A voyage of no great use to the public.

His Majesty has been pleased to grant his free pardon to Peter Newbury and Thomas Iveson, the two men falsely sworn to have robbed John Lockell on the highway.

Friday 20.

His R. H. Prince Edward embarked on board the Augusta yacht, Capt. Elphinstone from Greenwich for Stadt, in his way for Germany.

Thursday 26.

This morning, at five o'clock, as the mail cart was coming over Blackeath, the driver observed a lady struggling for life; he went to her assistance, and found her with a rope tied round her neck, naked to her shift, which had the marks cut out, as likewise out of her silk stockings. She had on satin shoes with silver buckles; appeared about 17 years of age, and was so far exhausted, that nothing could be learned from her story but the name of Dunmore, and something relative to a post-chaise. She was taken to the Woolpack at Deptford; and as soon as she was able to speak, she related as follows: her name is Bridget Bonner, she believes believes she was born in Bristol, continued there till five years old, where she had the small-pox; her parents died in her infancy; and she was left under the care of her uncle, whose name was Charles Ruffel, a captain formerly in the Guinea trade, and sailed from Bristol, at which place he occasionally resided, but died about six years ago at Edinburgh, and was buried there. At the age of five years she was placed with Mrs. Patterson, who lodged at Dunbar, with whom she resided, and was instructed in the necessary part of female education, and with whom she lived till nine years of age. When she left Mrs. Patterson, she went to live with her uncle Ruffel, who soon after put her to school at Miss Brown's, on the college green in Bristol, with whom she remained till fifteen years of age; her uncle about that time married a lady of the name of Brown, and she resided with her uncle in the Cowgate, Edinburgh, till his death, which was about three or four months after his marriage; that in her uncle's last illness, when his wife and Mr. Thomas Dunmore, who was a particular acquaintance, were in the room, he took an opportunity to recommend her particularly to their care, and said he had left her five hundred guineas, which was as much as he could afford; that Mrs. Ruffel, about three months after Mr. Ruffel's decease, married Mr. Thomas Dunmore before-mentioned, and she continued to reside with Mr. and Mrs. Dunmore in lodgings in the Cannongate for a year and half; after which they removed to other lodgings near the Leith Wind, where they continued to reside till they all quitted Scotland about a month ago; that Mrs. Dunmore was executrix to her late husband's will, as she believes, and that the female servant who lived with them at the Cannongate, was named Peggy Duncan; that after her uncle Ruffel's death she was kept very much confined, and never suffered to go out alone, and, whenever she asked questions respecting any persons or places, received from Mrs. Dunmore always evasive answers, and that she was kept in as much ignorance as possible: that Mr. and Mrs. Dunmore kept no company at their own house, and she remembers hearing him often mention the name of Mr. Birch, who lived somewhere in that neighbourhood, and of a Mr. Irvine, near Dunfries; that Mr. Dunmore made frequent excursions from home to York, Dunfries, and other places, and was generally absent about two or three months at a time, and once in particular for six months; that Mr. Dunmore did not follow any profession or business as she knew of; that being of age last Christmas, she asked Mr. Dunmore for her legacy, who paid it her all in gold about a fortnight before they quitted Edinburgh, and with professions of great kindness; that Mrs. Dunmore in general treated her with harshness,

GENT. MAG. May, 1785.

for which Mr. Dunmore often checked her; that on Thursday the 5th instant Mr. and Mrs. Dunmore and herself quitted the Cannongate, Edinburgh, the furniture of the house being previously sold to a rousing woman, as she called it; that the phaeton was marked with the initials T. D. and they all arrived in London on Sunday last about seven in the evening, and passing through several streets, they stopped at a house. A tall young lady came to the door much marked with the small-pox, and very red hair, whom they called Miss Brown, and an elderly lady; that Mr. Dunmore went away with the phaeton, and herself, Mrs. Dunmore, Miss Brown, and the other lady, in doors: after a few minutes, Mrs. Dunmore and Miss Brown retired from the room, and soon coming in again, Mrs. Dunmore said Miss Brown had received a letter from Dover, informing her, that Mrs. Dunmore's brother was very ill there, and that if Mrs. Dunmore did not make haste to see him, she would not see him alive. Mrs. Dunmore said she would set off that evening, but Mr. Dunmore then coming into the room, he advised Mrs. Dunmore not to go till the morning, which was agreed to. Mrs. D. asked her to go, as it would be only a few days, when they would return to London together, and she might see the town; to which she agreed; and Mr. Dunmore also asked her what she intended to do with her box of cloaths and money: she answered, it would be better to take them with her, as it was all together in the trunk, than leave it there, as she knew nobody in the house. Accordingly, at three o'clock in the morning Mr. Dunmore's phaeton came to the door with fresh horses, and a boy riding on one of them. Mr. and Mrs. Dunmore, and Miss Brown, got into the phaeton, and she rode a saddle horse; the phaeton horses were dark brown, and the horse she rode a bay; the boy who rode one of the horses had a light-coloured drab jacket on and a narrow gold lace round his hat, seemingly all much worn; herself dressed in a light-brown cloth habit, white cape turned down, black beaver hat and ribband. In this manner they proceeded till they came on Blackheath, where Mr. Dunmore stopt the phaeton, and called to her that Mrs. Dunmore was fainting, and desired she would come and assist her, and give her the smelling bottle. She rode up to the side of the phaeton, got off her horse, stood on the step, and held the smelling bottle to Mrs. Dunmore; at this instant Mrs. Dunmore seized her by the collar of her riding habit, and pushing her very forcibly backwards, Miss Brown and Mrs. Dunmore got out of the phaeton, and Miss Brown attempting to lay hold of her, she struck Miss Brown twice or thrice: Mrs. Dunmore got behind her, and pulled her backwards, and both of them fell on her, so that she fainted away, and was insensible of what was afterwards wards done to her, except feeling a sensation like cutting her neck and the back of her head, and a great heat in her face: she had in her pocket, at the time, five shillings and two dollars, on one of which was engraved Samuel Montgomery: she adds, that Mrs. Dunmore is about sixty years of age, and Mr. Danmore 47 or 48, and her trunk, in which was her money and clothes, marked B. Bonnor in brass nails; when brought by the boy of the mail-cart to the public-house on Deptford-bridge, she was quite insensible, and continued so till medical assistance was had from the Kent Dispensary in that neighbourhood. At eight in the morning one of the surgeons of that charity was sent for, who found her insensible and in strong convulsions; in a few hours her life was out of danger: she now remains very weak, her speech low, and but just intelligible. The above minute relation, as taken in the presence of several gentlemen, is inserted for the purpose of leading to a discovery of the persons who could be guilty of so atrocious a crime; or, if this should prove to be an imposition, which seems more probable, that the persons said to be concerned may have an opportunity of vindicating their characters from such a foul charge.

In the Temple, aged 80, the rev. John Carpenter, M.A. rector of Bignor, and 35 years vicar of Pagham, both co. Suffex.

At York Gate, near Boroughbridge, Yorksh. Mrs. Barugh, daughter of the late Admiral Murrice, of Berthanger, Kent.

At Holmes Chapel, Chesh. a man named Froome, aged 125 years and 8 months. This patriarchal rarity was gardener to the late hon. John Smith Barry, who, in consideration of his great age and long services, left him an annuity of 50l. which he enjoyed, with unusual health, till about two years before his death. He has a son now living, turned of 90, who works at a manufactory in Lancashire, and promises fair to arrive at as great an age as his late father.

At Malta, in Switzerland, aged 93, Count Vandecope, of Belhelgen, a descendant of Bhemund, prince of Apulia, who overthrew the Turks in the famous battle of Nice; a count of the Roman empire, and formerly physician to the empress queen of Hungary. The title devolves to Dr. Cope, formerly of Baliol-college, Oxon.

26. In Wyche-street, Mr. Smallwood, in consequence of a violent fall, occasioned by a vertigo, in St. James's park. A concussion of the brain, without any appearance of external injury, was produced, and he died in ten days. Though in no higher rank in life than a seller of buttons and taylor's trimmings, he was a very valuable member of society. His strong sense, and clear understanding, his pleasing manners, his easy temper, and courteous behaviour, endeared him to all his acquaintance. His knowledge of business, and skill in figures, made him farther extremely useful. He was a faithful executor and trustee to many: he was a good adviser to persons in difficulties, and, whenever one of his debtors became a bankrupt, he was sure, from the opinion the other creditors had of him, to be chosen an assignee. Among others, he was assignee in the bankruptcy of Mr. Pearce, the famous patriotic taylor of Cattle-street, Leicester-fields, whose concerns were very large, and said to be very complicated. The writer of this article knew him upwards of 30 years, and had great satisfaction in conversing with him on many useful subjects.

29. At Brompton, Mrs. Bloxam, wife of Mr. W. B. Stationer, of Lombard-str.

30. Samuel Blackwell, esq. M.P. for Cirencester, and colonel of the northern battalion of the Gloucestershire militia.

At Frankfort on the Oder, Prince Leopold of Brunswick, son of the reigning duke of Brunswick, having gone upon the waters on the 27th of April, to relieve the inhabitants of a village that was overflowed, the boat overset, and his highness was unfortunately drowned.

The Leiden Gazette gives the following account of this unfortunate event: "We have within these few days experienced the greatest calamities by the overflowing of the Oder, which burst its banks in several places, and carried away houses, bridges, and every thing that opposed its course. Numbers of people have lost their lives in this rapid inundation; but of all the accidents arising from it, none is so generally lamented as the death of the good prince Leopold of Brunswick: this amiable prince standing at the side of the river, a woman threw herself at his feet, beseeching him to give orders for some persons to go to the rescue of her children, whom, bewildered by the sudden danger, she had left behind her in the house: some soldiers, who were also in the same place, were crying out for help. The Duke endeavoured to procure a flat-bottomed boat, but no one could be found to venture across the river, even though the Duke offered large sums of money, and promised to share the danger. At last, moved by the cries of the unfortunate inhabitants of the suburb, and being led by the sensibility of his own benevolent heart, he took the resolution of going to their assistance himself: those who were about him endeavoured to dissuade him from this hazardous enterprise; but touched to the soul by the distress of the miserable people, he replied in the following words, which so nobly picture his character: "What am I more than either you or they? I am a man like yourselves, and nothing ought to be attended to here but the voice of humanity." Unshaken, therefore, in his resolution, he immediately embarked with three watermen in a small boat, and crossed the river: the boat did not want above three lengths of the bank, when it struck against a tree, and in an instant they all, together with the boat, disappeared. A few minutes after the Duke rose again, and supported himself a short time by taking hold of a tree, but the violence of the current soon bore him down, and he never appeared more. The boatmen, more fortunate, were every one saved, and the Duke alone became the victim of his own humanity. The whole city is in affliction for the loss of this truly amiable prince, whose humility, gentleness of manners, and compassionate disposition, endeared him to all ranks. He lived indeed as he died, in the highest exercise of humanity. Had not the current been so rapid, he would no doubt have been saved, as he was a remarkable good swimmer."

His highness is the son, as we suppose, of his Majesty's sister, consequently his nephew.

May 1. In Holles-street, Miss Catherine Stuart, milliner. Her death was occasioned by her cloaths catching fire on the evening before.

2. At his house in Doctors Commons, Mr. Thomas Thorne, formerly a silversmith in Wood-str. He had walked from Islington, and expired as he was sitting down in his chair.

At his house in Barb, Thomas Bowdler, esq. of Ashley, co. Somerset. He married Elizabeth Stuart Cotton, second daughter and co-heiress of Sir John C. of Connington, co. Hunt. and Sretton, co. Bedf. bart. the last male heir of Sir Robert Cotton, of Connington, knt. and bart. the illustrious founder of the Cottonian library, and representative of the ancient family of Bruce of Exton and Connington: by this lady Mr. B. had 2 sons and 3 daughters, John, Thomas, Jane, Frances, and Henrietta.

3. At Pollock, Sir James Maxwell, bart.

Of a deep decline, Mr. Haddick Hill, merchant, in Broad-str.

4. Dropped down dead in Cheney-walk, Chelsea, Mr. John Robert le Cointe, merchant. He had said, not many days before, that he should not live long.

5. In Russel-str. Covent Garden, in his 75th year, Mr. Thomas Davies, bookseller; a man of uncommon strength of mind, and who prided himself in being through life "a companion of his superiors." In 1728 and 1729 he was at the university of Edinburgh, completing his education; and in 1736 we find him among the Dramatis Personæ of Lillo's celebrated tragedy of "Fatal Curiosity," at the theatre in the Haymarket, where he was the original representator of Young Wilmot, under the management of Henry Fielding. He afterwards commenced bookseller in Duke's court, but met with misfortunes which induced him to return to the theatre. For several years he belonged to various companies at York, Dublin, and other places, at the first of which he married his wife, Miss Yarrow, daughter of a performer there, whose beauty was not more remarkable than her private character has ever been unsullied and irreproachable. About 1752 he returned to London, and with Mrs. Davies was engaged at Drury-lane, where they remained for several years in good estimation with the town, and played many characters, if not with great excellence, at least with propriety and decency. Churchill's indiscriminate satire has endeavoured to fix some degree of ridicule on Mr. Davies's performance; but the pen of a satirist is not entitled to implicit credit. Mr. D. exchanged the theatre for a shop in Russel-street about 1762; and we should have been happy could we have recorded that his efforts in trade had been crowned with the success which his abilities in his profession merited. In 1778 he became a bankrupt; when, such was the regard entertained for him by his friends, that they readily consented to his re-establishment; and "none of them," as he says himself, "were more active to serve him than those who had suffered most by his misfortunes. But all their efforts might possibly have been fruitless, if his great and good friend Dr. Johnson had not exerted all his power on his behalf." He called upon all over whom he had any influence to assist Tom Davies; and "prevailed on Mr. Sheridan, patentee of Drury-lane theatre, to let him have a benefit, which he granted on the most liberal terms." In 1780, by a well-timed publication, "The Life of Mr. Garrick," which has passed through four editions, (see vol. L. p. 330,) Mr. Davies acquired much fame, and some money. He has since published (see vol. LIV. pp. 281, 360,) "Dramatic Miscellanies," in 3 vols. of which a second edition appeared a few days only before the author's death, with the addition of a posthumous P.S. which we could have wished had been totally suppressed. His other works are, "Some Memoirs of Mr. Henderson," "A Review of Lord Chesterfield's Character," "A Life of Massinger," "Lives of Dr. John Eachard, Sir John Davies, and Mr. Lillo," and fugitive pieces without number, in prose and verse, in the St James's Chronicle, and almost all the public newspapers. The compiler of this article (who is not ashamed to say that he has been indebted for a great part of it to the European Mag. for March 1784) knew him well; and has passed many convivial hours in his company at a social meeting, where his lively sallies of pleasantry have been used to set the table in a roar of harmless merriment. The last time he visited them he wore the appearance of a spectre; and, sensible of his approaching end, took a solemn valediction. Poor ghost! how would it comfort thee to know, that at a subsequent meeting of thy sincere friends, the impression of thy last appearance was not eradicated; and that every breast heaved a sympathetic sigh, lamenting the loss of so excellent an associate! Mr. Davies was buried, by his own desire, in the vault of St. Paul, Covent-Garden, close by the side of his next-door neighbour the late Mr. Grignion, watch-maker. The following lines have been given in the newspapers as contributing to mark the man:

"Here lies the author, actor, Thomas Davies:

Living he shone a very rare avis.

The scenes he play'd, life's audience must commend:

He honour'd Garrick—Johnson was his friend.

At Newmarket, on her way to Norwich, lady of W. Towers, esq. of Q. Anne-str. West.

6. In child-bed, Mrs. Whitth, wife of Mark W. esq; one of the commissioners of excise, and dau. of the late rev. Dr. Saunders, vicar of St. Martin's.

7. In the Circus, Bath, John Hawkins, esq. eldest son of Sir Caesar H. serjeant surgeon to his Majesty.

8. At Oakley, otherwise Ugley, near Quendon, co. Essex, Paul Wright, D.D. F.S.A. vicar of that place, and rector of Snorham, in the same county. A remarkable peculiarity appertains to the latter place; there is no church belonging to the parish, but, once a year, service is performed under a tree. This living is in the gift of John Strutt, esq. M.P. for Maiden. Dr. Wright was educated at Christ's Hospital in London, and at Pembroke-hall, in Cambridge, and was presented by the governors of the city hospitals to the vicarage of Oakley, with the parochial chapel of of Burden, in Essex, in 1739. He was also for some time curate and lecturer of All Saints, Hertford. In 1773 he gave the public a much improved edition of "Heylin's Help to English History," with the arms on copper-plates, and copious additions, particularly, "The Prætorian Banner displayed," being the arms of all the lord mayors of London, accurately engraven, and executed by true blazonry. In the same year he published proposals for printing by subscription, in one vol. 4to. price one guinea, Sir H. Chauncy's History of St. Albans and its Archdeaconry, continued to the present time, with the Antiquities of Verulam, including, among other MS. Collections, the MSS. of Mr. Webster, many years surgeon there. Drawings of various Antiquities in the neighbourhood were to be engraved. In May, 1775, the work was promised to be put to press as soon as the editor should meet with sufficient encouragement; and a specimen of it was exhibited in our last vol. p. 745. In 1781 his name appeared to the "Complete British Family Bible," in 80 folio numbers; a literary manœuvre on which the old adage, de mortuis, &c. forbids us to enlarge.

At Kenfington, in her 40th year, Mrs. Disney, wife of the rev. Samuel Disney, vicar of Hattled, Essex, and eldest daughter of the right rev. Dr. Chr. Wilson, bp. of Bristol.

9. Mr. Richard Hett, a printer, of great reputation and amiable manners, in Wild-court, Lincoln's-inn-fields. His father was many years treasurer to the stationers company; and his only brother is now a master in chancery.

At Lambeth, Robert Maw, esq. late commander of the Asia East Indiaman.

Universally regretted, in Orchard-street, Portman square, Richard Timms, esq. late second lieutenant and lieutenant-col. of the second troop of horse-guards, which commission he had sold a very few days previous to his death. He has left one son, a youth, at Eton school. Had his life been prolonged, he would have succeeded to a very considerable estate, as the nephew and heir of John Elwes, esq. late member for the county of Berks. His loss is the more to be deplored, as he had a heart susceptible of others sufferings, and a hand liberal to bestow, wherever he might have met with objects deserving his generosity. His acquaintance regret in him the accomplished gentleman and the sincere friend. He was well versed in classical learning, in which he greatly delighted. He never discovered a disposition in any one to oblige him, but he contemplated the happiness he should enjoy, when in a situation to shew his sense of it. As an officer, he was brave; as a man, noble and benevolent. He was a great encourager of theatrical merit, and had convinced the world of great abilities in that line at Sir William East's theatre, where, whilst he amused himself, he excited every tender every generous feeling in his audience. He is said to have caught a cold by attending his duty, in escorting their majesties to the oratorio, which threw him into a hasty decline. Friendship yields this tribute to his memory. Many may arrive at as great a portion of riches as he would have done had he survived; but no one will ever be capable of doing more good with it.

At Shoreham, Kent, rev. Vincent Peronet, M.A. upwards of 90 years of age, and 57 years vicar of that parish. He succeeded Dr. Wall in 1728, who had been vicar 52 years—(two vicars only in 109 years). See vol. LIV. p. 435.

9. At Paris, in his 67th year, the Duke de Choiseul, whose death is an infinite loss to France. Fully satisfied that his country might give the law to Europe, if she should be able to acquire the dominion of the sea, he thought that every thing ought to be risked to destroy the marine power of England, which was alone able to withstand the aspiring ambition of Bourbon: he accordingly directed all his thoughts to that one object. Though not filling any ostensible office, he was, notwithstanding, the soul of the French cabinet during the whole of the American war; and it was he who not only prevented the powers most attached to England from declaring in her favour, but also set on foot the armed neutrality; and through the medium of his friend the Duke de la Vauguyon, induced Holland to renounce her treaties of friendship with the best and oldest of her allies, and declare against her. Since he quitted his ostensible situation of minister he took only one public step, and that was in concert with his relation the Duke de Praslin, to contradict, in the newspapers, a report which seemed to be credited—that France had bound herself to England, during his administration, not to keep up, or build more, than a certain, fixed number of men of war. This the two dukes declared under their hands to be a groundless report.—Two days before the Duke de Choiseul died, the rector of the parish attended him, to prepare him for eternity: after having made his last confession to him, his Grace declared, in the presence of several noblemen who attended him on the melancholy occasion, that though he had made it a point of duty to consult the personal satisfaction of his sovereign (Louis XV.) while he was in office, he was not conscious of having, in any one instance, sacrificed to the prince the interests of the state, or his own honour as a gentleman. He constantly opposed the extravagance of Madame de Barré, scorned to pay his court to the king by flattering his mistress, and therefore refused to give an order that she should have the honour of being attended by a guard whenever she went out. The countess, however, had influence enough with Louis to obtain the order in spite of the duke; and she did not fail to let him feel, on a particular occasion, that her influence was greater than his. At a party of whist one evening with the king, she had the Duke de Choiseul for her partner: she had already got eight of the game, and held three honours in her own hand, and might consequently have laid down the game if it had so pleased her; but she wished to mortify the duke for his refusal to let her have the guards to attend her: she therefore asked him if he could give her an honour; he answered in the negative; upon which she replied, "Well then, monsieur le duc, you see (said she, throwing down three) that I can get honneurs without your assistance."

10. As he was returning from Leeds to York, Lionel Place, esq. barrister at law, recorder of Richmond, and commissary to the dean and chapter of York.

12. In East Harding-street, Mrs. Knight, wife of Mr. T. K. merchant.

At Lee, near Canterbury, Mrs. Barrett, relict of Thomas B. esq. and daughter and co-heiress of Humphry Pudner, esq. of that city.

13. John Bates, esq. one of the sheriffs of the city of London, and alderman of Queen-hishe ward, possessed of an affluent fortune, acquired with high reputation at the Queen's Arms Tavern, in St. Paul's Churchyard. He dined on Wednesday at the feast of the sons of the clergy, and appeared in better health than he had for some time past. He afterwards spent the evening with some select friends, whom he left at a prudent hour, with his usual abstemiousness, and went home to bed seemingly without any complaint. At four in the morning he was waked by a violent pain in his head, and, having rung the bell for his attendants, complained that he was very ill: soon after which he expired.— And on the morning of the 21st, about ten o'clock, his remains were removed from his house in St. Paul's church-yard, in order to be interred in the family vault, at Beaconsfield, co. Bucks. The hearse was preceded by two marshal's-men, on foot, with ten men on horseback, and followed by three mourning coaches and six, the sheriff's state-chariot, and three private carriages, empty, the servants all in deep mourning.

Mr. Payne, master of Spring Gardens coffee-house.

At Tockington, co. Glouc. Sam. Peach, esq. father-in-law of H. Cruger, esq. M.P. for Bristol.

14. At Fulham, ——— Thornhill, esq. a gentleman of extensive property in Massachusetts government before the revolution in America.

Mr. Thomas Shairp, secretary to the Royal Bank of Scotland.

15. At Bath, the right hon. Lady Lucy Stanhope, daughter of James late Earl Stanhope, and twin-sister of Philip the present Earl.

At Whitehall, the lady of John Sinclair, of Ulster, esq. (M.P. for Loftwithiel, and author of several curious pieces on the finances and revenue of this kingdom,) only dau. and heiress of the late Alexander Maitland, esq.

At Newington. She was carried, on the 21st, in great funeral pomp, to the burial-ground in Bunhill-fields.

At Leicester, Mr. Edmund Johnson, aged 85. He has bequeathed a considerable fortune to his relation, Ald. J. of the same place.

16. Suddenly, at Kington, co. Warwick, Mr. John Harnham, vicar of that parish, formerly of Sevenoaks in Kent.

17. At Kentish town, Solomon Hargrave, esq. formerly an attorney at law.

John Pratt, esq. of Kington, co. York. He had been near 40 years upon the turf, and was particularly celebrated as a breeder.

The only son of ——— Mr. Baynes, master of a boarding-school with Upton on Severn, in Worcestershire, a ——— Knight, esq. of Woverley, ——— Leicestershire, drowned in bathing in the Severn.

18. At Walthamstow, Mr. Imbleton, carpenter.

19. At Bath, aged 67, Lieut. Gen. Sir Robert Rich, bart. of 4th reg. of foot. He lost one of his hands in the battle of Culloden.

20. At Edinburgh, rev. Dr. Miles Cowper, one of the ministers of the episcopal chapel there, and formerly president of the college of New-York. He was rector of Sulhampstead, co. Berks. and of Cowley, co. Glouc. the former living in the patronage of Queen's coll. Ox. the latter of the Lord Chancellor.

In Whitechapel, aged 99, Maria Anna Moses, a rich Jewess. She has left 1000l. among the poor of her own persuasion.

21. Mr. Rich. Heavyside, an eminent saddler, in Bishopsgate-street.

George Mertins, esq. of Bedford-row.

At his house on Enfield-chace, Mrs. James, wife of Mr. Hugh J. many years an eminent grocer at the corner of Chancery-lane, Fleet-street.

At Broughton on Furness, Lancashire, Joseph Harrison, esq. formerly lieut. col. of the 57th reg. after serving 30 years in the army.

22. Lady Bowyer, aged 76, relict of the late and mother of the present Sir William B. bart.

In the queen's palace, Mrs. Eliz. Stainforth, house-keeper to her majesty.

23. In Upper Brook-st. Rathbone-place, Mr. William Woollett, engraver to his Majesty. He was born at Maidstone, Aug. 27, 1735, and instructed in engraving under the late Mr. Timney, at the same time with Mr. Anthony Walker and Mr. Brown. He has left behind him many plates nearly finished.

24. In Great Marlborough-street, greatly advanced in years, Robert Alfop, esq. alderman of Bridge-ward Without, and father of the city. He had been exactly forty years a member of the court of aldermen, having been chosen in the month of May, 1745, during the rebellion in Scotland. He served the office of sheriff in the year 1733, and on the death of Thomas Winterbottom, esq. in the year 1752, was elected mayor for the remaining part of the year.

At Reading, Mr. Prince, many years coroner of the county of Berks.

28. At Brighthelmstone, Richard Atkinson, esq. M.P. for New Romney, alderman of London, and a director of the E. I. C.

29. In his 72d year, at his house at South Lambeth (after having returned only three days from a fortnight's journey into Kent, where he held a visitation for himself, and three different ones for his friend Archdeacon Backhouse) Andrew Coltée Ducarel, esq. LL.D. F.R. and A.SS. Sec. Antiq. Cassel. Sod. Honorar. commissary and official of Canterbury, commissary of the Royal Peculiar of St. Catherine's, and of the Sub-deanries of South-Malling, Pagham, and Tarring, in Sussex; one of the three gentlemen appointed to superintend the paper office, and keeper of the archiepiscopal library at Lambeth. He was born at Greenwich (where his father, descended from an ancient family in Normandy, resided) in 1714; and went from Eton school to St. John's college, in Oxford, as a gentleman commoner, in 1731. In 1729 he was three months under the care of Sir Hans Sloane, on account of an accident which deprived him of the sight of one eye. He has frequently said, that he never ate meat till he was 14, nor drank wine till he was 18. He became a member of the college of Doctors Commons in Nov. 1743; and married in 1749 the lady who survives to lament the loss of a most affectionate husband. Adrian Coltée Ducarel, a considerable merchant, and a S. Sea Director, who was the Doctor's younger brother, died July 1, 1745, leaving a widow, still living, and a son, not long since returned from the East Indies with unblemished reputation. Another brother of the Doctor's, James Coltée Ducarel, (who lived 16 years at Laurence St. Ayott, Herts, and was a member of the famous Royston Club) is now living in Normandy; and a sister, Mrs. Blennerhassett, at Bath. The Doctor had the pleasure of enjoying the esteem of five successive primates, and was the oldest officer remaining in the palace of Lambeth. His official attendance to the duties of Doctors Commons was uncommonly remarkable; and his attachment to the study of English antiquities afforded his principal amusement. His collection of books and MSS. in that particular line was valuable; and his indexes and catalogues so exact, as to render them particularly convenient to himself and the friends he was desirous to oblige. He had also a good collection of coins and medals. All these he has given to his nephew Mr. Ducarel.

For many years it was his custom to travel incognito, in August, with his friend Sam. Gale, esq. attended only by Dr. D.'s coachman and Mr. G.'s footman George Monk. Twenty miles was their usual stage on the first day, and every other day about fifteen. It was a rule, not to go out of their road to see any of their acquaintance. The coachman was directed to say, "it was a job; and that he did not know their names, but that they were civil gentlemen;" and the footman, "that he was a friend of the coachman's, who gave him a cast." They usually took up their quarters at an inn; and penetrated into the country for three or four miles round. After dinner, Mr. Gale smoked his pipe, whilst Dr. D. took notes, which are still among his MSS. They constantly took with them Camden's Britannia, and a set of maps. In Vertue's plates of London bridge chapel, the figure measuring is Dr. D. that standing is S. Gale. (The house belonged to Mr. Baldwin, haberdasher, who was born there; and when, at 71, he was ordered to go to Chislehurst for a change of air, could not sleep in the country for want of the noise he had been always used to hear. (Dr. D.'s pointment of Lambeth librarian took place under Abp. Hutton, May 3, 1757; and the catalogues of that valuable collection are not a little benefited by his diligence and abilities. The catalogue begun by Bp. Gibson, and continued by Dr. Wilkins, has been by him perfected to the present time; a distinct one made of the books of Abp. Secker; and another, in three volumes folio, of the pamphlets and tracts bound up by the direction of Abp. Cornwallis. And in the library of MSS. the catalogue begun by Dr. Wilkins, and continued by succeeding librarians to No. 888, he extended to No. 1147. Of all the honours he enjoyed, none gave him greater satisfaction than the commendariate of St. Catherine's, a place to which he has done due honour in an elaborate History adorned with beautiful engravings, and where he has long pointed out to his friends a resting-place for his ashes. Of Croydon palace, and of that of Lambeth (the last remaining testimony of episcopal grandeur) he has given particular histories; and had drawn up an account of Doctors Commons, and of the different Chancellors of this kingdom, which he intended for publication in the course of the present year. In the latter part of life he was too much immersed in professional engagements to enter into new attachments of friendship; but with those who were admitted to an intimacy he associated on the most liberal terms. It was a maxim which he religiously observed, that "he was an old Oxonian, and therefore never knew a man till he had drunk a bottle of wine with him;" his entertainments were in the true style of the old English hospitality; and he was remarkably happy in affording the company he not unfrequently invited to his table. The writer of this hasty sketch, drawn up literally currente calamo, gives his tributary tear to the memory of a friend whom he truly esteemed, with whom he has passed many convivial hours, not unmindful of the solemn change by him now experienced. An account of his various publications, with such corrections and additional particulars as recollection or the favour of our correspondents may suggest, shall be given in our next. His executors are his good friends M. C. Tutet, esq. F.S.A. and Michael Fountaine, esq.

Gentleman's Magazine;

For JUNE, 1785.

BEING THE SIXTH NUMBER OF VOL. LV. PART I.

††† The friendly Communication of an inestimable Dissertation for the human Calculi, by being misdirected, did not come to Hand till too late to be inserted; but shall certainly have Preference in our next. Direct to J. NICHOLS, Fleet-Street.

MR. URBAN, Birmingham, June 16.
 R. Badcock having in your last Mag. p. 365, mentioned the loss of a curious MS. which he formerly gave me, I shall be obliged to you if you will give me leave to make another attempt to recover it, by means of the more extensive circulation of your publication than that of the Theological Repository.

The MS. contains a copy of old Mr. Wesley's diary, and letters written by his daughters to the distant members of the family, relating to some strange noises heard in the house, all in the hand-writing of Mr. Sam. Wesley. Not long before my removal from Calne, I lent it to some person who visited me at my own house; and being about to remove, and in a very bad state of health, I neglected to take an account of the person to whom I delivered it. If he, or his executors, should meet with this letter, I hope they will not hesitate to return it.

If by this means the MS. should be recovered, I promise you, Mr. Urban, that (if you chuse it) the substance, or the whole of it, shall be at your service; and I do not know a more proper repository for it than your useful miscellany. This MS. though extremely curious, is, however, the least valuable part of the collection of papers with which Mr. Badcock favoured me. The letters I am now in possession of will supply the most authentic materials for the history of Mr. John and Charles Wesley, about the time that they took their religious turn; and the publication of them will be, of great use at a proper time, I am,

 Sir, your very humble servant,
 J. PRIESTLEY.

††† An old correspondent, who has frequently answered the queries of others, would be happy to learn some particulars of Richard Mason, M. A. of Jesus College, Cambridge, whence he was ejected in 1644; and, on the Restoration, became M. D. Q. Where did he reside, and did he follow any profession in the mean time? He had a son, John, supposed to have been of Jesus Coll. and a non-juror. Q. Was he in orders? They were related to WELSTEAD the poet, of whom also any un-noticed particulars would be acceptable.
 EUGENIO.

Edgeware Road,
 MR. URBAN, June 16, 1785.
 THE part which the late Dr. Johnson was known to have taken in the introduction * and establishment of the Gentleman's Magazine, makes me particularly desirous of a place for the inclosed in that learned and useful publication. His humility, respecting the inscription he ordered for his grave, is no reason why the admirers of his genius and virtues should not endeavour to do them justice. This I have attempted in the Epitaph I now send you: By inserting it in your next Number you will oblige, Sir,

Your most humble servant,
 JAMES FORDYCE.

* Mr. Samuel Johnson was not a writer in the Gentleman's Magazine till it was introduced, and fully established, by Mr. Cave.

EDIT.
 " Under

" Under this stone are deposited,
 Among poets, philosophers, orators, and heroes,
 The remains of DR. SAMUEL JOHNSON,
 Who united in himself
 Their best qualities.
 His imagination was bold, rich, and sublime;
 His judgement clear and comprehensive,
 Penetrating and profound,
 The power of addressing at once,
 The fancy, the understanding, and the heart,
 He possessed in an eminent degree.
 Of invincible resolution,
 In the cause of truth and virtue,
 He exhibited conspicuous marks.
 The vices and follies
 Of the fashionable or the affluent, the learned or the great,
 He disdained to flatter.
 The favour of an unprincipled age,
 He never courted,
 By employing his talents to subvert religion or morals,
 To propagate infidelity, or encourage licen-
 tiousness.
 The former he strenuously vindicated, and constantly enforced;
 The latter he firmly and openly condemned and exposed;
 Standing forth on all occasions
 The undaunted censor of the public,
 The majestic teacher of mankind.
 If in his conversation
 He little studied the graces of polite address,
 He was no stranger to the feelings
 Of friendship or benevolence.
 If in his writings
 He sometimes neglected the softer arts of composition,
 His style often pleased by its harmony,
 And always impressed by its vigour.
 On most subjects he thought for himself:
 On none did he write or speak,
 Without advancing something new or uncommon.
 His wit was brilliant, ready, and unborrowed;
 The vivid energy of sense,
 Not a play of words, or the glitter of vivacity.
 That he was perfectly acquainted With the derivation and extent, the elevation and force,
 Of the English tongue,
 He hath left behind him an illustrious proof,
 In his celebrated Dictionary of that language.
 Whether he was more distinguished By strength of memory, or universality of learning,
 By critical or biographical skill,
 Were difficult to determine.
 His knowledge of nature and of life
 Was chiefly intuitive;
 And his representations of either can only fail to affect and delight
 The ignorant, or the prejudiced.
 But that which crowns the character
 Of this extraordinary man,
 Is the length of years he devoted,

To the improvement of his fellow-creatures,
 From a principle of piety to his Creator.

He was born Sept. 7, 1709.

He died Dec. 13, 1784.

*As the smallest remains of the late Dr.
 Johnson are sought after with avidity by the literary world, we are happy to lay before the public an original letter from that great man to Gov. Hastings, and we are happy also to find that the letter had the effect desired.*

 Governor-General in Bengal.

 tiplicity of affairs in which your

• • • We are much obliged to the valuable correspondent who has furnished us with Mr. Stringer's fine drawing of Dr.
 Johnson's "favourite willow," and the picturesque scenery which surrounds it;
 and are sorry to inform him, that the ad-measurements and description are not yet come to hand.

MR. URBAN,
DR. JOHNSON, in one of his letters to Mr. Cave, inserted in your Magazine for January last, recommends a Mr. Macbean to his notice, as a person well qualified to carry into execution a plan then in agitation for compiling a Military Dictionary. "Mr.
 Macbean," says the Doctor, "was with
 Mr. Chambers"—he certainly was, and I believe in the capacity of an amanuensis.

As you, Mr. Urban, seem desirous to preserve every "drop" of a drop of genius, I have sent you a copy of a letter from Mr. Chambers to Macbean, which I have in Mr. Chambers's hand-writing; perhaps it may be means of bringing to light some particulars of both or one of these gentlemen. I have several more of Mr. Chambers's letters to different people in my custody, which indicate him to have been a man of great vivacity, acute observation, strong judgement, exquisite feelings, and a good heart; some of which I will transmit to you at a future opportunity, together with a few biographical anecdotes respecting him*. In the mean time I am,

Yours, &c. M——.

"Mr. Macbean,
I want all the apparatus that I used in correcting the new edition of my book, to be brought to Cambury-house. I fancy you can guess pretty nearly what it is. The principal thing is the desk with shelves and papers on them: the top of this I left, I think, almost every thing else wanted, particularly a number of books, I believe ten or twelve, and an index wrapped in thick brown-paper; the first volume of the dictionary too, I was at work upon, could be sent: it is cut in two, the letter A by itself.

"I am sorry to give you this trouble, but know not how to get the things without you. I am your assured friend and servant,
E. CHAMBERS."
Cambury-house, Monday morning.

MR. URBAN, May 16.
I MUCH wonder you have so long been so inattentive to the literary department of your excellent work, as to have suffered a fellow-labourer in the field of criticism †, and at this late period too, to have got the start of you in his animadversions upon that phenomenon of learning, that formidable rival to other productions of genius, the most wonderful Cheshire Pig. To be serious—It is no unfrequent practice among the graver part of society, to ridicule the numerous fashionable absurdities which so remarkably characterise the present age. Perhaps no subject has so well deserved this censure, as the many efforts to humanize the different species of brutes which at present serve to amuse the town; but whoever has paid a due observance to the nature and disposition of mankind in all ages, must have remarked, that they have undergone very little change from the lapse of time; and, if the follies of the present be fairly contrasted with those of former times, I trust it will appear, that we are neither less wise, nor more extravagantly ridiculous than our ancestors. If the present age has exhibited its learned horses and its learned pigs, its dancing dogs and its drumming hares, it may be shewn that former ones have not been less diligent in degrading the human species, by similar endeavours to exalt the capacity of the brute creation. I shall collect a few examples in support of my assertion, and for the amusement of your readers.

Among the most remarkable instances of animal sagacity may be placed Banks's famous horse, whose repown is alluded to by Shakspeare in "Love's Labour lost," act I. scene iii.; and by Dekker in his "Untrussing of the humorous poet." It is related of this horse, that he would restore a glove to its owner after his master had whispered the man's name in his ear; that he would tell the number of pence in any silver coin, and even perform the grosser offices of nature whenever his master bade him †. He danced likewise to the sound of a pipe, and told money with his feet ‡. Sir Walter Raleigh says, "that had Banks lived in elder times, he would have shamed all the incanters in the world by the wonderful instructions which he had given to his horse §."

Of the sagacity of a hare, Dr. Swift || has given a strange instance, which may be well put in competition with the feats of this animal at Sadler's Wells. This hare, which was a native of Brill, would stand upon her hind legs, bow to the company, and beat several marches on a drum. Sir Kenelm Digby speaks of a baboon that played on the guitar , and we are informed of an ape that played at chess in the presence of the king of Portugal ††. Various are the scientific performances of elephants. Bishop Burnet says, he "saw one at Milan that played at ball *. This animal is said to possess the passion of jealousy †; and Ælian relates two stories of an elephant's falling in love with a woman ‡. Jealousy is said likewise to exist in many other animals, as swans, camels, doves, &c. Of the swan, Chaucer says,

"The jealous swanne against his death that sageth."

CHAUC. Assembly of Fowls.

There is hardly an end to collecting examples of the great sagacity of brutes, of their docility in receiving the instructions of man; and of the foolish application of the latter to so trifling a subject. Those already mentioned are sufficient for my purpose; and I conclude with a wish, that the time and talents of my countrymen may in future be directed to better or more laudable purposes, than can be possibly acquired by so ridiculous and useless a pursuit, as an endeavour to exalt brutes to a situation for which Providence most certainly never designed them.

MR. URBAN,

June 9.

I MUST beg the favour of you to obviate a mistake of yours in your account of Mr. Warton's book, p. 292, in which you represent me as the translator of Don Quixote. This is an undertaking for which I own myself absolutely unqualified. To adopt an expression of Milton's on Shakspeare, I have too much conceiving of the merit of the original of Cervantes, ever to think of appearing in that character. I own my incapacity of clothing my own ideas in proper language. The difficulties of a translator must arise in proportion to his knowledge of the original: this he may comprehend as fully and satisfactorily as he may his maternal tongue, and yet find it impossible to discover adequate expressions in that for his own conceptions. An obvious reason presents itself; languages are not tautologous. Industry, Industria, Industria, give very different ideas to an Englishman, a Frenchman, an Italian, and Spaniard. I am, Sir,

Yours,

J. B.

which the public have reason to complain, give me leave to notice two.

"VIII. HOUSES and WINDOWS."

In this, not only the table and explanation were false, as your Reviewer remarked (vol. L. p. 327), and, in consequence the leaf cancelled; but every new clause, some of which are extraordinary, and affect numbers, is omitted. I will instance one, § XVII. by which the covenants of many leases are expressly abrogated, and tenants, not landlords, are charged with this tax: "any covenant or agreement made or entered into previous to the passing of this act, relative to the payment of any duties imposed, or to be imposed, &c. to the contrary notwithstanding."

"XI. PAVING." The new statute, 24 Geo. III. c. 42, like the above, and all other new statutes, is imperfectly mentioned in the Appendix, with this remarkable addition:

"And there are several regulations concerning duplicates of goods, and other matters; but as the act is only of force for one year, the parliament, at their next sessions, may perhaps give it a re-consideration." In the meantime, the justices of the peace, who were to enforce this act, and the poor brokers, who were bound to obey, though they had purchased, perhaps, this new and expensive edition, were left totally in the dark, and were obliged to refer to the statute book, if they could buy or borrow it, or else wait for what the parliament might, perhaps, do on re-consideration. Of what use is a book, so defective in these and many other instances, to those who are to enforce, and to those who are to obey, the laws; many of whom, so established is its character, have no other guide? But this is like the blind leading the blind, of which we all know the consequence. Yours,

A Justice of the Peace.

Some short Account of the Caves on the Elephanta Island, near Bombay, by Lieutenant-Colonel Barry.

IN several parts of the coast about Bombay are found caves of such remote antiquity, that neither tradition nor records can reach their origin; in many of them are inscriptions, written in a language and characters now totally unknown; but of these disused, or dead languages, besides the Shanscrit, or sacred one, there are, in India, many remains. I am told the Jews at Cochin have yet the grant of their synagogue, at present passage unintelligible; this, I once conjectured, might be in the primitive Hebrew, as these people are supposed to be of the missing tribes; but I am assured, the country powers never admitted their public deeds to be drawn in the language of foreigners.

That these caves were formed for religious purposes cannot even be doubted, as well from their construction, as the sculptured representations of Gentoo mythology, which all of them contain: perhaps a description of one might be introduced, with good effect, as an episode to some eastern heroic poem.

It is not unpleasant to trace, as men grow refined, the temples of their worship, from the darkness of caves and forests, through the gloom of Gothic structures, to the airy elegance of Grecian architecture.

As I visited the Elephanta, the principal, I would call it, cathedral, of these caves, I shall attempt some account of it.

This extraordinary offspring of human industry is on Elephanta Island, so called from the statue of an elephant, of natural size, tolerably cut out of a solid rock, on its west coast, which is nearly six miles from the castle of Bombay: the caves are about the middle of this islet; the approach to them being through a deep ravine, so that one is struck with surprise at coming suddenly on their openings, and seeing an abrupt precipice, of more than 60 feet perpendicular, rising from the roofs of these excavations, and covered at the summit with shrubs and trees, that hang over the rock, which is of hard stone, more so than that usually employed in our home edifices; but as many quarries are known to indurate when exposed to the air, it may not be unreasonable to infer, that its present density is partly original and partly acquired; but of this, however, I neither made experiment, nor sought information.

Of these caves there are three; the principal being in the centre, and the lesser ones on either hand, though not placed in similar directions; one having a common front, the other being at right angles with it: in each of the inferior ones is a small chapel with baths at the end.

To the grand cave, or temple, there are three entrances by porticoes of four pillars each, of the same order with those within. Its elevation is very disproportionate to its area, which last is nearly a square of 40 yards, whilst its height is not more than half as many feet; but the eye is not only offended at first by the lowness, but also by the flatness of the roof; which certainly would have acquired more of grandeur by being arched, the effect of which we observe in our own churches. This roof is supported, by 36 columns, placed at equal distances, though some of them have been broken down by the intemperate zeal of the Portuguese to exterminate idolatry; which, as well as the tasteless curiosity of latter visitors, has likewise impaired many of the figures.

Each column is divided into three equal parts, the pedestal being one, the shaft another, and the capital, including the entablature, the third; the pedestals are square; the shafts rudely grooved, and not, as usual, cylindrical, but gradually bulging outwards to the centre, their greatest diameter being more than half their height. The capitals are, as their shafts, grooved, and appear, to use the miner's phrase, like globes flattened by the pressure of country on them. The entablatures are simple, and without distinct divisions of members. These proportions and forms, so different from Grecian rules, are not pleasing to a corrected taste; but as they have in themselves the strictest uniformity of common principle, undoubtedly prove the arts to have been far advanced at the early period of their construction.

To the right, and within the large cave, extending the square of four pillars, which form its angles, is a small temple or chapel, having on the ground a large altar, oblong, somewhat raised, and coarsely cut; on the top of which is a cone, resembling the pivots of the rocking stones in Cornwall, or at Stonehenge, the tops of the uprights for receiving their transoms, and, perhaps, in its design, for some such purpose. In each of the lesser caves, there are several chapels.

On the sides of the porticoes, and in compartments at the further end, are, in basso relievo, pieces of sculpture, most of their figures being Colossian, and all representing parts of the Gentoo mythology; the centre is an image of the quadruple-faced Brimha, the god of the Bedas. These statues, such as we see them, grotesque and fanciful, are to us the objects of eastern adoration, and in their present mutilated state, prove the artist neither unskilful, or unacquainted with animal proportions, which are well preserved, even in those which extend the height of the excavation, or

which the hieroglyphic doctrines of the bramins represent most whimsically; for, indeed, the acquaintance with nature and symmetry may as well be displayed in the statues of a Silenus or Medea, as in those of an Apollo or Venus.

I have had the greater pleasure in sketching this account, as it brings to remembrance one of the most agreeable parties I was ever on. This was given to General MacLeod, a man of public merits and private virtues, by Mr. Hull, the charms and manners of whose lady added elegance to the hospitable repast of friendship. To me it will be now a full recompence for these minutes, if they but recal to her mind half the satisfactions she then imparted to those whose fortune it was to be of her company; and to her, therefore, I take the liberty of addressing them, and the following occasional Sonnet.

To Mrs. H U L L.

To thee, bright lamp, that lum'd El'phant's cave,

And lent mild lustre to its dusky scene,
To thee is due that light thy beauties gave,
When soft they rose as night's chaste,
peerless queen.

If the fine forms which nature gives to please,
When by her mimic sons with ardour
caught,
Draw, by resistless charm, the raptured gaze,
And deeply stamp the inspired artist's
thought;

Happy the pupil who at once surveys
The archetype of symmetry and grace;
Then sees the types correctest taste displays,
And thence is learn'd symmetric rules to trace.

The lesson taught is to the teacher due,
And what belongs of right, the muse devotes to you.

MR. URBAN,

WITH all due deference to the poetical abilities of Mr. Warton, to the laurel lately conferred on him by his Majesty, and to the elogiums so liberally bestowed on his edition of Milton's Juvenalia by you and some of your correspondents, I cannot help thinking several of his notes the jarrage of a tasteless, insippid antiquary, rather than comments worthy of such a poet as the divine Milton: e. g. his bluntly affirming that his author (the finest harmonist in the world) had "a very bad ear" (p. 207), his saying, that Sir Henry Wootton's common expression of "a friendship interrupted in the cradle," means, "when you ~~was~~ a child," in the very teeth of fact and common sense, and the words of Wootton's letter* (p. 1163), after passing over difficulties of real importance, passim, and beauties the most brilliant, without explanation or notice; his stopping to say, that "stories" mean "histories," and filling pages with quotations from Shakespeare, &c. of no consequence, nor relevant to the sense of his

MR. URBAN,

THE following pathetic lines I found a few days ago in one of my country rambles, written upon a window at a house on Mount Pleasant, near Syden-ham. My reason for requesting your insertion of them, is, merely to learn from any correspondent, whether they are to be met with in any author.

In a female hand, the following:

Alas! I have lov'd too long, too well,
The man who owns no merit in sincerity,
And treats my faithful heart with proud contempt,
And an unfeeling coldness.

Close under the above the following,
in a man's hand-writing:

This woman has a soul of god-like mould,
Intrepid, and commanding;
To that she's fair, few more can boast
Of personal charms;
And, in spite of me, challenges my best esteem;
But oh! she has passions that outstrip the winds,
And tear her virtues up
As tempests meet the sea!

There are names signed under each,
that appear to be of the same hand-writing as the lines; which, though not in rhyme, yet are written in the above irregular divisions. I should apologize for craving room for such an accidental trifle, but I hope the pathos it contains will make my excuse. H.

* "You lately bestowed upon me here the first taste of your acquaintance." "They were not children together," says Mr. War-ton, "Wootton being sent from Winchester to Oxford in 1584, twenty years before Milton was born."—"Interrupted in the cradle," is evidently synonymous to "strangled in the birth." In this same letter of Wootton, dated 1638, Mr. Warton says of Mr. H. "perhaps Milton's friend, S. Hart-lib;" though he afterwards tells us, that he came into England about the year 1640."

MR. URBAN, Settle, May 25.
PERMIT me to return thanks to the Barrowist, p. 252 (mispaged 192) for his seasonable advice with respect to accuracy in descriptions of antiquities, which would be of much greater utility to the world were they more generally attended to. I cannot but acknowledge that the computation of the dimensions of the barrow was in some degree inaccurate, as it mentioned 9 or 10 feet instead of 9 or 10 yards, which was certainly erroneous, though a mistake easily committed. The circumference of the base is 210 feet; and the diameter of the top of the present wall or coating, or what he pleases to call it, 45 feet. But as the summit of the coating is much broken and very irregular, and great part dislodged by the workmen, the present actual altitude is only 7 yards. The stones which compose the coffer are 6 feet 9 inches long, and 3 feet broad, some more and some less, according to their situation in composing the cell. The meaning of "stones piled in such a manner as to rest upon each other's basis" is very evident, that they are to each other a solid prop, foundation, or support, as the barrow is formed in an inclined position, or conic shape. The barrow is delineated as accurately as possible with respect to the appearance before its late investigation, except with regard to the oval form, which was certainly too circular for its extent; but this was my fault, not the engraver's, who has, much to his credit, made an excellent and true copy of the original sketch. After allowing myself to blame in those two oversights, which are rather the effect of chance than inaccuracy, let me put a few reasonable queries to the Barrowist, and answer some of his objections, which are equally faulty in their turn. Mr. Collinson, it is true, in his "Beauties of British Antiquities," gives the world a pleasing account of several monumental reliques in the barrow line; but there is an innumerable quantity of barrows in Britain, and in those quantities different species, which have, in a general sense, their various peculiarities, of which this may be one. The judicious and accurate Captain Grose, in the second edition of his "Antiquities," in his treatise upon the subject, coincides in this point; as well as Camden, Weever, and many other authors who have written upon this head. Mr. Collinson, no doubt, described with accuracy many different species; but let me ask the Barrowist, if he could reasonably expect to find every barrow minutely described, with its peculiar appendages, either opened or unopened? In different situations, considerable variations may be discovered in investigating tumuli: where stones were most convenient to form the whole, they were used; and many barrows are almost entirely composed of earth, where earth was rich, and stones few. I would recommend to the Barrowist, to satisfy himself with personal observation, and then he will find this argument indisputably true, as description and expression will not convince his delicate sensibility. I have a shrewd suspicion that this gentleman disputes the validity of my correspondence, or, at least, has an idea of a glaring extension, magnified beyond the bounds of truth or reason, by comparing it injudiciously with Dr Chandler's curious description of Herodotus's mausoleum of King Gyges. I have a hope, at least, that the present account of the dimensions will satisfy his incredulity. I should deem it the highest ingratitude to transmit to so valuable a publication accounts of things unexisting, or at least supposed to be stretched beyond the line of probability. The Barrowist must be a person of extraordinary discernment, if he can judge, from the engraving, of what sort of internal materials the barrow is formed. The internal materials are composed of stones, some much larger than the external coating; and, as the barrow is situated near a considerable quantity of stones, rocks, &c. they have undoubtedly been more convenient to collect than the earth from a barren rocky moor. The summit of the barrow was certainly originally above the coffer: is it said in the description that it was not? Though this barrow is much exposed, yet the weather could not decompose the internal parts, as it required the force of several men, with iron handspikes, to remove them: and it would be a work of many days to explore this vast mass. I am of opinion, that it has been a general burial-place for the Danes or Pagan-Saxons, so late a quantity of bones having been found, that, were they collected together, they would would form several bodies. Had the Barrowist a proper knowledge of ancient customs, he would have found, that it was our ancient forefathers (not the moderns) who, out of a superstitious veneration, increased the sepulchral tumuli. I am sorry he disputes the opinion of the great Mason, one of the first historians of the age, who supports this just idea. But how comes he to compare the barrow with the Tower of London? He must have seen neither of those places, or his ideas must be very capacious indeed; and I should be afraid of drawing upon myself the ridicule of all the cooks in England, were I to introduce the extraordinary scheme of poaching an egg with the shell on. I should have been glad of hearing the Barrowist's opinion respecting the origin of this tumulus. His sentences are so copious in strictures, that I expected something extraordinary to be the result of his letter; but I was greatly disappointed in not finding one single opinion in favour of my request, except the old repetition, want of historical information, which cannot withhold opinion. I am afraid he runs into the same error himself as the gentleman who described the tapestry. The tapestry was described minutely; but without pretending to know the history represented. Was this the case with me? I cannot take the hint, as my description was only faulty in two trifling mistakes. An opinion was formed, every circumstance was described, and only a civil request for the opinion of others, in conjunction with my own. I should have contemplated his remarks with a contemptuous silence; but I was roused, and uncommonly struck, with his erroneous ideas, which could have originated from nothing short of a fire-side observation, and not from an experienced personal investigation of barrows. Hasty opinions are not always just. And, as an apology for my egregious inaccuracies, permit me to plead myself a juvenile antiquary; in short, I should not have replied, but, with regard to the words of the poet, let me tell the Barrowist, he forces

“as it were in spite

“Of nature and my stars to write.”

At the same time let me return thanks to E. p. 249, (189) for his observation respecting K. John, which is just. Capt. Grote, under the article Hants, vol. II.

p. 202, speaking of K. John's house at Warnford, tells us, that “it is an imitation common to many ancient structures in which that King had no concern, King John and the Devil the founders to whom many of the evils are imputed most of the ancient buildings &c. I rather apprehend, this building must be King Henry VIII's palace mentioned by Mr. Gough in his “Topographical Topography,” for the singularity of its architecture.

In compensation for the trouble which I have given in reciting a long narration of sentiment, &c. I send Mr. Urban [see the plate, fig. 1, 2, 3], the spoon, glove, and boot of Henry VI. which I delineated from the real ones, as preserved in a chest at Bolton-bath, near Sawley, in Bolland, Yorkshire, where that prince was some time screened from the unhappy troubles of his reign.

MR. URBAN,

SEEING, in your Magazine, pp. 210, and 212, very just and honourable mention made of the Rev. Mr. Cunningham, of Eyam, both in verse and prose, by the Music of Lichfield and the Minstrel of Wardlow, I hope his excellent rector will excuse the following extract of a manuscript sermon, which lately fell into my hands, as I think it will give as much pleasure to others as it has to me.

“Conclusion of a Sermon preached by the Rev. Mr. SEWARD, Canon Residentiary of Lichfield, at his rectory of Eyam, in Derbyshire, on Sunday, Nov. 19, 1775, from St. Matthew, vii. 7. ASK, AND IT SHALL BE GIVEN YOU, &c.

“LET us “therefore remember our Creator” both in youth and age, in sickness and in health, in prosperity and adversity. This is the best and properest admonition which I can impress on your minds now that I am going to leave leave you for a season; and it is the best legacy I could wish to bequeath to my friends whenever I take my last leave of them in this world. I hope and trust that I shall return to you, and frequently address you from this pulpit; but, in the mean time, I have the greatest consolation and joy that I leave you under the care of so excellent a preacher, whose piety to God, whose delight in the performance of the duties of his office, whose amiable, engaging, courteous, and affectionate behaviour to the richer, and condescending, affable, and charitable treatment of his poorer neighbours, is a continued living sermon to us all, and has so endeared him to us already, that he is become our general friend, our delight, and our joy. Like holy Job, "when the ear heareth him, then it blesteth him; and when the eye seeth him, it giveth witness to him." One hearer "telleth another" how rational and clear he is in his arguments, how affecting and convincing he is in his persuasions, and how zealous and devout in his prayers; and one neighbour "certifieth another" how cheerful and engaging he is in his common conversation, how candid and charitable in his opinions and characters of others, and how ready in shewing pity to all who are in the least distress.—Think not that I have put so much of the pulpit duty upon him, since we have been here together, through idleness and indolence: no; it was that I would not disappoint so many longing ears that wished to hear him; it was that I rejoiced at the occasion of really preferring his sermons to my own, and of giving so eminent and worthy, though so young, a man, "the right hand of fellowship." Grey hairs may receive instruction from his lips, and the aged bow down to him; and that, because he keepeth the commandments of the Lord, and delighteth in the law of his God. O may he long continue amongst us our happiness and our crown! may his moving instructions sink deep into all your hearts, and spring up into a harvest of virtue, piety, and goodness! and may the fruits of it be a plentiful treasure of happiness to himself! may his eye see it, and rejoice in the success of his pious and zealous labours! There is one thing indeed that I have reason to fear, which is, that his health and strength may not enable him to perform, so diligently as he wishes, the more laborious part of his office, the frequent visitation of the sick, or private baptism of infants, particularly in the more distant parts of the parish, during storms of violent winds, rain, and snow. His constitution is tender and delicate, and has been weakened by too sedentary an application to his studies. Let me therefore intreat you all not to press him to this without real necessity, but to be cautious of endangering his health and life, as he is desirous of continuing to do you all the good offices in his power, and of promoting at all times your eternal, external, and internal happiness. May long-continued health, prosperity, and, above all, the blessings of a good conscience, attend both him and you! may I find my parish, at my return, if it please God to grant me a return to it, a seminary of piety, sobriety, charity, and every moral and christian virtue! and may the good seed which he sows amongst you with so diligent, so judicious, and so bountiful a hand, spring up to eternal life in all your hearts!"

Mr. Seward obtained, I have been told, this living of Eyam, by the curate of his predecessor being a very different character from the young gentleman above described. Eyam was offered to a clergyman whose name I forget. He wrote to the curate, to desire some account of it, and what was its real value. The curate's answer represented it as no very desirable situation, and the yearly income about 200*l*. And he made it appear to the gentleman, that he should be hardly a gainer by giving up his own preferment. It was then offered to Mr. S. who, on going down to take a survey, found it to produce an income of more than 700*l*. per annum. The tempter of our first parents had led this wretched curate to transmit a false account, hoping thereby to obtain this noble living for himself.

MR. URBAN,

I TAKE the liberty to explain two of the queries of your correspondent in p. 328. If he consults the parallel passage of John, chap. xxi. ver. 15, he will find that the Simon Barjona of Matthew means Simon son of Jonas.

As to "Claudite jam rivos, pueri, sat prata biberunt," I answer, that it is an allegorical expression, elegantly taken from a river's refreshing the meadows, and very naturally applied to music and poetry, delighting the ears, the fancy, and the judgment.

420 List of all the Parishes in Middlesex, with Incumbents, &c.

MR. URBAN,
I SEND you a List of all the Parishes in the County of Middlesex, ranged according to their several Hundreds, together with the Chapels of Ease in each Parish, and the Names of the present Patrons and Incumbents, so far as I was able to discover them.

I am not certain whether all the Parishes here allotted to Holbourn and Kensington Divisions are rightly placed; or whether any of them ought to be transposed—nor whether all the Chapels in Town are allotted to their proper Parishes. As to those with this Mark ¶, the Churches stand within the Liberties of London, but a Part of the Parishes is in Middlesex. With respect to the Patrons, I have followed Mr. Browne Willis where I have no later Information. E.

ANECDOTE OF LORD TYRAWLEY.

(From Mrs. Bellamy's Apology.)

FROM his Lordship's residing many years at the Courts of Spain and Portugal, he had acquired a strong attachment to the natives of both those kingdoms; and, as he was happy in every opportunity that offered of shewing his regard for them, they entertained the highest respect for his Lordship. During his residence as ambassador at the Court of Russia, he observed a Spaniard to walk frequently, for several days together, before the court-yard of his hotel. Excited by the national attachment just mentioned, his Lordship ordered one of his domestics to invite the Don to dine at the second table. The Spaniard accepted the invitation with the greatest readiness, and seemed glad to have an opportunity of laying-by his long spado for some hours every day. This continued for several months; so that the stranger was at length considered as one of the family. One evening he came late, and requested the domestic in waiting to inform his Excellency that he wished to have the honour to speak to him. The servant, supposing his business was not of a nature to require seeing his Lordship that night, desired he would call in the morning. But on the man saying, "The morning will not do, it must be immediately," his Lordship was informed of his request, and the Spaniard ordered to be admitted. Upon his being introduced, he thus accosted his Lordship in Spanish: "I am come, my Lord, to repay all your civilities;—but, before I explain myself, order your berlin to be got ready." The mysterious air which the Spaniard assumed upon this occasion, soon convinced his Lordship of what he had suspected for some time, that his new dependent belonged to that fraternity, so necessary to every power, termed Spies. He therefore ordered his carriage to be got ready. When this was done, the stranger thus continued: "I have for some time, my Lord, formed a very strict intimacy with a Russian in the suite of the Marquis de Châtardie*. After leaving your Excellency's hotel, I generally go to spend some hours with him. Staying at the Marquis's, a few evenings ago, later than usual, I saw a person come in, who endeavoured to hide himself from observation, as if desirous to remain unknown. This, your Lordship may be assured, awakened my suspicions; and, as from the glimpse I had of him, I "could only guess who he was, I resolved, if possible, to arrive at some certainty about it. For this purpose, when my friend returned, I asked him, with a careless air, 'Whether the Count ——— usually walked at that inclement season of the year?' I took no further notice at that time, but went, as usual, to visit my friend the following evening. I did not, however, ring at the gate till I saw the Count go in, who I guessed would be there about the same time. Having gained admittance soon after him, instead of going to my friend's apartment, being well acquainted with every part of the house, I gained, unobserved, the back stairs, and placed myself near the closet in which his Excellency, the Marquis, and the Count were in close conversation. There I heard the latter say, among other things, I think the sooner you go the better; the credentials will be ready by eleven o'clock. As soon as I heard this, I stole from my hiding-place, and went immediately to my friend, who chid me for being so late, as he could not now profit by my company, having much to do. I asked him what he had to do at this time more than another; to which he replied, "that he would not betray his master's secrets; though he merited it, as he had broke his promise in not taking him with him." I did not make any further enquiry, lest what he imparted to me should be under the seal of secrecy; and a Spaniard, your Excellency knows, is too tenacious of his honour to betray any thing that is divulged to him in confidence."—"And what do you suppose," said his Lordship, "are the motives, and will be the consequences, of the Marquis's going away?" "A REVOLUTION," replied the Spaniard; "and if your Lordship does not make haste to the Empress, and acquaint her with what I tell you, it will be too late to prevent it. I am acquainted with the whole circumstances, but am not at liberty to mention more. Your Lordship, however, may take my life, if the intelligence I give you proves false." His Lordship, having been already convinced, from his own observations, and the information he had received from other quarters, that there was something portentous to the welfare of the Russian empire in agitation, after having tried the Spaniard to the utmost, he gave credit to what he said, and was now

* Mispelt 'Chattardie' in the original.

now satisfied that his informant had received some intelligence under the seal of secrecy, as he termed it, the particulars of which he made a point of honour not to disclose, although he thought it no breach of honour to repeat the substance of it. The carriage being by this time ready, Lord Tyrawley and the Spaniard set out together for the Empress's palace. Notwithstanding the lateness of the hour, and the inclemency of the weather, the English ambassador procured admittance to her Majesty immediately; but the Empress seemed to doubt the possibility of his information, till the Spaniard was called in, who gave such convincing proofs of what was intended, that she could no longer doubt the truth of his assertions. Her Majesty then proposed sending such a particular troop to prevent the designs she had just been informed of from being carried into execution; but the Spaniard exclaimed, "No, no, you must secure them, as they are actually under arms against you." The light at this time shone full upon them, as they were part of her body guard, and her favourite Wall colonel of them. Some troops were sent to prevent the escape of the Marquis de Chetardie, but he was already fled, and, though pursued, found means to make his escape. He had not, however, time to destroy his papers. They were secured, and brought to the palace. The regiment suspected was found under arms, which created a certainty of their intended treason. The treachery of her favourite the Count was fully proved, but through some remains of that regard which she once entertained for him, his life was spared, and he was banished to Siberia; whilst all those whom he had prevailed upon to join in his treacherous views were immediately executed. Her Majesty took the Spaniard into her service, and nobly rewarded him; and the presents she made Lord Tyrawley for the services he had rendered her on this occasion, though of immense value, were not, in his estimation, of so much worth as the friendship with which she honoured him to the day of his death.

them so early as but a few weeks after he had taken his master of arts degree, and was but just qualified to preach before that learned body. They are now become very scarce, and, it is said, are about to be reprinted. He was an excellent textuarius; eloquent, and mighty in the scriptures, as appears from his often beautifully introducing passages from them into his discourses. If some are applied in a new sense, they are justly applied, and cannot but be pleasing and agreeably surprising to an ingenious reader.

"In a vault, on the other side of this wall,
Are interred the remains of
The Rev. THOMAS NEWLIN, B. D.
Late fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford,
And vicar of this parish.

His works are a lasting monument
Of his great worth, and shining abilities;
Nor was he more admired by the judicious
For his compositions,

Than he was esteemed by the good
For his simplicity of manners,
And integrity of life.

He was a prudent and zealous defender
Of the Constitution and Liturgy
Of the English Church;
An able and discreet pastor,
And a truly Christian Divine.

In his conversation
He was polite, lively, and improving,
And as singularly modest and humble
As he was learned and knowing.

He was an indulgent husband,
An affectionate brother,
A generous and charitable neighbour,
And a sincere friend.

He died Feb. 24, Ann. Dom. 1743,

MR. URBAN,

I LOOK upon the emendation of your friend Y. Z. (p. 36) in substituting inimicus for mimicus, to be so certain and indubitable as to want no confirmation. For the satisfaction, however, or rather the gratification, of your correspondent, I shall briefly observe, 1st, that, though we currently use the word mimic, the Glossaries do not acknowledge the Latin mimicus.

2dly. That there is no reason why Nicola should be debarred from marrying her daughter to a mimic, as Maud, the daughter, was a great heiress, and the mother neither likely to think of disposing of her so meanly, nor the king to trouble himself about any such disposal of his ward, should the mother think proper to adopt it.

3. But what weighs most with me, and will with you, as I conceive, Mr. Urban,

Urban, is, that I find a like clause in an old lease of the Abbat and Convent of Beauchief, A. 1641, where the demise is to the lessè and 'such his assigns as to the same Abbat and Convent, and their successors, have not been enemies, nor 'hurtfull;' a case exactly parallel; the King being in the situation of the Abbat and Convent, and Nicola in that of the lessè. Yours, &c. T. Row.

MR. URBAN,

FROM Mr. Ayscough's notes relative to William of Wykham, inserted in p. 189, it is certain that King Edward III. presented his favourite clerk to the church of Irthde, in Norfolk, before he gave him the rectory of Pulham; and, according to Mr. Blomefield, in his History of that county, William of Wykham was then in possession of several other parochial benefices. The passage alluded to is in vol. III. p. 264, and is as follows: "In 1357 William de Wykham was presented in the Pope's consistory at Rome, for illegally holding this benefice [the rectory of Pulham] with so many that had cure of souls; but to no purpose; for King Edward III. who gave it him, and did every thing for him he desired, immediately confirmed it, by patent under the great seal, to be held, in commendam, for life, with all his other preferments. And though he was attacked again, it availed nothing, for he had another patent of confirmation passed in 1360; but the next year he resigned it voluntarily to his friend, for whom he had procured a presentation from the King, viz. Adam de Stratford, a relation to Archbishop Stratford." When I made the above transcript, I neglected to minute on what authority Mr. B. relates this circumstance.

To Mr. A.'s list of persons of the name of Wykham may be added John Wyckham, capellan of the diocese of Ely, admitted to the rectory of Maplescombe, in the diocese of Rochester, on March 17, 1394. Reg. W. Bottlesham, fol. 64, a. In May, anno 1400, he exchanged this rectory for the vicarage of Selmeiston, in the diocese of Chichester. Reg. Epif. Cicest. R. fol. 140.

In the account given by Mr. Hutchins (Hist. of Dorsetshire, vol. I. p. 77) of the late Dr. Samuel Lisle, Bishop of Norwich, who was a native of Blandford Forum, in that county, a blank is left for the name of the parish in London of which he was rector. It was St. Mary-le-Bow; but he had been before rector of Tooting in Surrey, and was presented to the vicarage of Northall, in Middlesex, November . . . 1739. He was also elected prolocutor of the Lower House of Convocation in 1734 and 1741. Mr. H. mentions Dr. L.'s publishing a Latin Sermon, and a Discourse about Rural Deans. The former was "Concio ad Synodum, 1735," 4to; and he printed four other Sermons, viz. 1. In the chapel of Croydon Palace, at the consecration of Dr. Baker, Bishop of Bangor, 1723, 4to; 2. A Fast Sermon before the House of Lords, 1744, 4to; and, 3. what is rather unusual, another Fast Sermon before the same, 1745, 4to; and 4. A Sermon before the Society for propagating the Gospel, 1748, 4to. The Sermons I have read, but do not recollect the having met with the Discourse about Rural Deans, nor to have seen the title of it in any Catalogue. Qu. Was it sold, or only circulated among the author's friends? and was it written with a design of reviving that very ancient office?

THE following extract abounds with so much good sense, that I think it deserves a place in your Miscellany, and therefore I send it for insertion.

Yours, &c. G. P.

Extract of a Letter from Colonel Robert Hunter, Governor of New York, Sept. 12, 1711, to Mr. Secretary St. John.

"A greater assertor of liberty, one at least who understood it better than any of them, has said, 'That, as national or independent empire is to be exercised by them that have the proper balance of dominion in the nation, so provincial or dependent empire is not to be exercised by them that have the balance of dominion in the province, because that would bring the government from provincial

‘vincial and dependent to national and ‘independent;’ which is a reflection that deserves some consideration for the sake of another from the same person; to wit, ‘That the Colonies were infants, ‘sucking their mother’s breasts, but such, ‘if he was not mistaken, would wean ‘themselves when they came of age.’

“Upon the whole, I humbly submit, if it may not be advisable at this time, until a proper remedy be applied, that her Majesty, by her royal letters (for what a Governor says passes for nothing) put them in mind of all such privileges as they claim as a body politic, they hold of her special grace, and no longer than they shall use them for her interest, and the support of her government. This, which assuredly will be of no force toward the settling of a revenue here, yet may be of use to keep them within bounds in other matters.”

AS I have been a constant friend to your Magazine ever since I was a school-boy, I cannot resist the inclination I have to send you a slight sketch of a phenomenon (see the plate, fig. 9) seen here on the 13th of April last, at 10 minutes before 5 o’clock in the afternoon, and which lasted about fifteen minutes. There were three rain-bows, or slates, appeared together; but, what was contrary to the common appearance of rain-bows, which are frequently seen in the opposite horizon from the sun, they were all seen betwixt the spectators and the sun. The sky was rather cloudy, but without rain; and the place of the sun could but just be discerned. The first bow, which exhibited nearly half a circle about the sun, had all the prismatic colours extremely vivid and bright. The second bow was inverted, with the back of the bow joining the first, and a portion of a larger circle, as in the drawing, and the colours fainter. The third bow intersected the second, and was much fainter. The moon, which was then about a quarter old, could but just be seen, as in the drawing; and the whole made the most beautiful appearance I ever beheld; and a great number of people here saw it at the same time with myself. I am apt to think that this phenomenon was quite local, as I have not seen any mention of it. Perhaps some of your numerous correspondents, who are conversant in meteorology, and are used to the investigation of such appearances, may favour us with their thoughts upon this phenomenon. S. BENTLEY.

MR. URBAN, May 2, 1785.

AS Mr. Badcock's account of the Wesley family, p. 363, hath attracted the attention of the public, the following extract from a book little known may be deemed a curiosity.

The book is entitled "Miraculum Basilicon, or the Royal Chronicle, truly exhibiting the wonderful preservation of his sacred Majesty in, with his miraculous escape, after the battle of Worcester, &c. &c." By A. J. [Abraham Jewings] Eirenophilalethes 1664.

The author gives a very circumstantial account of the King's perils and hair-breadth escapes; particularly at Charmouth, in Dorsetshire; "for it had almost come to pass that the tarrying of the Lord Wilmot there, in order to the shoeing of his horse, had cost him dearly, by reason of a discourse arising between one Henry Hull the hostler, and one Hammer, a smith in that place; for the smith asking from whence these gentlemen came? the hostler answereth, From Exeter, they say. To whom the smith replies, *But I am confident that those shoes were made and set in the North. Moreover other things being called into examination, viz. that the horses were not unsaddled for the night, and the travellers themselves had likewise remained the whole night without sleeping, and that their servant went from the inn exceeding early in the morning; from those things they presently conclude, that these are noblemen who escaped from the battle of Worcester, and by many windings and turnings are come down into these parts, and perchance the King himself is amongst them. From hence the hope of great reward being conceived, the hostler goeth to one WESTLEY, the puffy parson of the place, and a most devoted friend to the parricides, to ask his advice what is to be done in the case. But he being at his morning exercise † ought not to be disturbed: neither doth the hostler await the end of his long-breathed devotions (or his bloody prayers), for fear he should lose his scute at the gentleman's departing; and therefore returning without his errand's end, suffers the gentlemen to ride away unnoticed.

"This story being noised abroad by the smith, behold how Wesley, this pitiful, dwindling parson, putteth to the innkeeper, and with most eager blusterations catechiseth him concerning what travellers he had lodged that night; from whence they came, and whither they would, and what they did there. But his suspicions being increased by the answers he received, he went to Dr. Butler, the next justice of the peace, requiring a warrant, in which he would excite and stir the people upon all quarters, together with the soldiers, to endeavour the apprehending of the king. The justice refusing to do it, Captain Massey, now living in Lyme, and seeing the matter required haste, gathers as many soldiers as he was able, and followeth after them, directly in the way towards London, until he came to Dorchester. But by a most divine instinct (as it was clear) the king was turned another way*, and so the Captain losing his hopes returns from whence he came."

In a marginal note the author says—"This WESTLEY is since a non-conformist, and lives by the practice of physick in the same place. He told a gentleman, That he was confident that if ever the king did come in again, he would love long prayers, for had he not been then longer than ordinary at his devotion, he had surely snapt him."

Of this Mr. Wesley (whose name was Bartholomew), Dr. Calamy says—"After his ejection in 1662, though he preached as he had opportunity, yet he had much more employment as a physician than as a minister. He did indeed use a peculiar plainness of speech, which hindered his being an acceptable popular preacher. He lived several years after he was legally silenced: but the death of his son [John Wesley, ejected from Whitchurch, near Blandford, in Dorsetshire] made a very sensible alteration in the father, so that he afterwards declined apace, and did not long survive him."

This Mr. Bartholomew Wesley was the great grandfather of the famous Mr.

* The king, accompanied by Lord Wilmot, &c. crossed the country a little beyond Bridport, and slept a night at Broad-Windjer, near Crewkerne.

* "Had been made in four several counties," says Ld. Clarendon, who relates this story (III. 130) "from the king himself." He also styles the preacher "a weaver, who had been a soldier." EDIT.

† It was a fast-day, says Clarendon.

John Wesley, the great leader of the Methodists.

His grandfather, John Wesley of 'Whitchurch, was a most zealous Non-conformist; and a long conference which he had with Bishop Ironside is printed by Dr. Calamy. It concerns church authority and the power of ordination.

Mr. Samuel Wesley, rector of Epworth, was the son of this last gentleman, and the father of the present Mr. Wesley.

He distinguished himself by a variety of publications in prose and verse; and was ridiculed by Garth and Swift for his poem called the Life of Christ; as Mr. Badcock hath particularly noticed.

His son, Samuel Wesley of Tiverton, distinguished himself by his poetry and by his political attachments.

And how his two sons still living, viz. John and Charles, have distinguished themselves, may be learned from their Journals.

I am also informed that in the rear of this celebrated family are two young men (the sons of Mr. Charles Wesley), of most distinguished abilities in the musical line; and who discovered an astonishing prematurity of genius both in composition and execution *.

In the Wesley family there have been strange revolutions in sentiment. The two first were rigid Nonconformists; the third in succession was a zealous High Churchman. The branches from this stock were Toryism (Mr. Badcock says, and I believe him, Jacobitism) and Methodism. And from a branch of the fourth we have a sprout of Popery; for Samuel Wesley, the younger son of Charles, hath commenced Catholic, and hath laid the fruit of his fine musical talents at the feet of his HOLINESS.

I am, Sir, your constant reader.

INVESTIGATOR.

MR. URBAN,

AS your valuable repository seems particularly appropriated to subjects of antiquity, the following epitaph probably may not prove unacceptable: the whole of it is written in a style by no means contemptible, and the last couplet but one contains a sentiment eminently fine, and not unlike a passage in Milton; it is to be found upon the monument of Lady Paston, in the church of Paston, an obscure village in Norfolk. The monument itself is the work of Nicholas Stone, and is in his best manner; it consists of a recumbent figure large as life, under a canopy; the ruff, robes, and embroidery well deserve attention; it has suffered considerably from time and negligence, and will lose even the last melancholy graces of decay if not soon repaired. Mr. Anson (to whom I am informed, the estate of the now nearly extinct family of the Pastons belongs†), would do well to appropriate something to the protection of so excellent a piece of sculpture, and rescue from oblivion the few relics of that grandeur which distinguished its once popular and splendid possessors. Mr. Walpole, in his Anecdotes of Painting, vol. II. p. 46, has the following extract from Stone's Memorandums—"And in 1629, I made a tomb for my Lady Paston of Norfolk, and set it up at Paston, and was very extraordinarily entertained there, and paid for it 340l."

E P I T A P H.

To the reviving memory of the virtuous and right worthy Lady Dame Katherine Paston, daughter unto the Right Worshipfull Sir Thomas Knevit, Kt. and wife to Sir Edmund Paston, Knt. with whom she lived in wedlock 26 years, and had issue two sons yet surviving, viz. William and Thomas; she departed this life 10th day of March, 1628, and lyeth here intomb'd, expecting a joyful Resurrection.

Not that she needeth monument of stone,
For her well-gotten fame to rest upon,
But this was rear'd, to testify that thee
Lives in their loves, that yet surviving be;
For unto virtue who first rais'd her name,
She left the preservation of her fame,
And to posterity remain it shall
When marble monuments decaye shall all.

Upon the base of the monument are the following lines:

Can man be silent, and not praises find,
For her who liv'd the praise of womankind;
Whose outward frame was lent the world to gaze,
What shapes our souls shall wear in happiness;
Whole virtue did all ill so overawe,
That her whole life was a communion daye?

See Milton's Ode on the death of a fair Infant:

"Or wert thou of the golden-winged host,
"Who having clad thyself in human weed,
"To earth from thy prefixed seat didst post,
"And after short abode fly back with speed,
"As if to brew what creatures heaven doth breed,
"Thereby to set the hearts of men on fire,
"And scorn the sordid world, and unto heaven aspire!

MR. URBAN, Lewes, Feb. 9, 1785.

IN your Magazine of Jan. p. 62. under the article of Foreign Discoveries, mention is made of a memoir having been laid before the French Academy of Sciences, by M. Le Roy, of a method of renewing fresh air in ships, crowded transports, &c.

I am not a little surprised to find, that what has been so many years practised in the English navy should not at this time be well known in France, where they have not been backward, on many occasions, of adopting the maxim—"Fas est et ab hoste doceri."

More than twenty-four years ago, I had an opportunity, on board Sir Charles Saunders's fleet in the Mediterranean, of seeing such windsails, or ventilators, which were placed at the fore, main, and mizen hatchnoup, the three great communications between the ship's hold and the upper deck. The ventilators were cylindrical tubes made of canvas, whose mouths were kept open by circular hoops, as recommended by M. Le Roy. The upper part, or as much as appeared above board (viz. about 7 or 8 feet), was made in the form of a circular sentry-box, which it did not inaptly resemble, with its door directly to windward; which construction intercepted the air, and directed it into the crater, to more advantage than could be effected by the mere expansion of the mouth of the tube. As these ventilators were not spoken of at that time as if newly discovered, they possibly might even then have been of long standing in the navy; and must have been observed by many French prisoners of all ranks during their occasional captivity.

I hope the name of the original inventor of this very simple, cheap, yet highly efficacious mode of renewing fresh air on shipboard is known, that due honour may be paid to his memory; at the same time M. Le Roy is entitled to his share of praise for his proposition; as doubtless he knew not that he had been anticipated in this discovery so long ago.

I should be glad to know by some of your correspondents, whether these windsails are in general use on board merchant-ships, the owners of which (especially those concerned in the slave trade,) should enjoin the use of them, as an indispensable duty to their respective captains or masters, for reasons too obvious to mention.

J. CRANE.

MR. URBAN,

WHEN I was in the Isle of Ely some years ago, I was informed of the same circumstance which your correspondent P. B. C. mentions (vol. LIV. p. 661.) relating to the mustard (sinapis nigra Linn.) growing on the mud, and earth, that was thrown on the banks, whenever the ditches were cleaned. On examining the banks where the ditches had not been cleansed for some years, I found mustard growing in an humble state, by the sides of the ditches, and in many places hanging over the water. My friends, to whom I shewed these plants, agreed with me that they were sufficient to furnish seed for a plentiful crop, when the ditch was scoured. Not but it is probable, that the crop of scattered seed of one casting of the ditch would remain, and grow at the next, for plants of the class tetradynamia are known to preserve their vegetative powers for a great length of time. But why the seeds of the mustard should remain inactive at the bottom of the ditch, while those of the water-plants* in the same situation feel the vernal influence, and expanding, rise to the surface, float on the water, and vegetate, is a phenomenon, which it is much easier to admire than comprehend, or explain.

Many other sorts of seeds will grow, after having been buried in the ground for a great number of years. Of this farmers are very sensible, who often find, on ploughing a field deeper than ordinary, that plants spring up which had not been observed on that land before within their memory.

As to plants arising on the spot where fires have been made, I can say nothing positively; but that heat alone assists vegetation the following remarks will shew.

Having occasion to make a strong charcoal fire last May; I placed the chafing-dish on a large plate of iron to preserve the grass, where it stood on the lawn before my house. Soon afterward it appeared, that so far as the influence of the fire extended the grass grew, and still continues, much more vigorous, and of a much darker green than any other part of the lawn, exactly resembling the verdure of those circles called fairy-rings. The trefoils, hawkweeds, and plantains soon disappeared from this spot; probably they were choaked by the luxuriance of the grass, as I find they are in places where the turf has been much manured by the penning of sheep. From some appearances of circles in electrical experiments, it has been surmised, that fairy-rings are caused by lightening, and the effect above described seems to give countenance to such a conjecture. These particulars are mentioned to shew, that heat alone has a great influence on vegetation, and probably a greater share in imparting fertility to places where fires have been made, than the ashes to which it is generally attributed. So where the solar heat is most powerful, the plants are most vigorous.

May not the seeds of the fox-gloves have remained a length of time in the earth, and been called into vegetation by the fires that cleared, and the warmth that fertilised the ground for them? Many seeds force themselves into the earth, by the expansion, and contraction of their arista, or beard, and though the seeds of the fox-gloves have no such apparatus, yet they may perhaps be endowed with an unknown power of sinking into the earth, when the surface does not suit them to vegetate; without such a power it is difficult to comprehend how seeds penetrate to the considerable depths they are frequently found to have done.

Notwithstanding the attempts that have been made to explain, how heat and alkaline salts assist the growth of plants, still the poet's doubts remain in full force. (Virgil Georg. i. v. 84.) This uncertainty has by no means been removed as yet in regard to the effects of other manures; neither chemists, nor naturalists have given any satisfactory reasons, why dung, marl, or lime, spread in small quantities, supply plants with nourishment, through several courses of agriculture, though there fall every year at least two feet of rain, which in speculation might be expected to dilute, and wash away in a very short time the salts, or any other parts of the manure which communicate fertility. T. H. W.

MR. URBAN,

ALL your readers of any taste or fancy must feel their obligations to you for having given them Mr. Warton's explanation of that sublime, but hitherto unintelligible, passage in Lycidas, which describes "the great Vision of the guarded Mount." Such criticisms are among the best efforts of genius joined with sagacity. The writer of these lines is almost angry with himself for presuming to fancy, that (like the dwarf on the shoulder of the giant), he may perhaps see a little farther than he did, by whose aid alone he is enabled to look round him at all.—St. Michael (the angel and great vision alluded to in these lines of Milton, and the patron of the mount), was the tutelary Saint of voyagers, and their protector against injury from storms. He is represented here as seated on the mount, and fixing his view and attention towards the opposite promontory of Spain, while Lycidas was tempest-tost off the Cornish coast. Does it not seem as if some taunt or reproach for his negligence was intended in the last line,

"Look homeward, angel, now! and melt with ruth?"

and may not the line be thus paraphrased?

"Oh angel! withdraw your attention from Namancó's and Bayona's hold!
—Look nearer home, where your guard and protection were lately wanted, while you were wasting your vigilance on a distant shore: Look homeward! See the shipwreck you should have prevented; and weep from compunction and remorse." &

I am apt to think that ruth rather means remorse than pity. The rutblefs deep,—the rutblefs fates,—may as well denote the remorseless as the pityless. Its theme to rue, signifies, I believe, generally to repent, to regret;—sometimes lament;—but never (as I recollect), to pity or compassionate. "Great vision" alludes probably to St. Michael's dignity as first of the arch-angels.

* * * To the passages of Shakspeare in your last Magazine, p. 278, which bear an accidental resemblance to those in other writers, may be added that of Lear,

—————"I will do such things!
"What they are, yet I know not; but they shall be
"The terrors of the earth."

Progne in the 6th book of the Metamorphoses says,

—————"Magnum, quocunque paravi!
"Quid sit, ad huc dubito."

This beautiful perennial shrub grows naturally in the woods of Malabar, Ceylon, Java, and others of the East-India islands, where I do not find that it is celebrated for possessing any medical, or other virtues. The smell and taste of the leaves, when broken, is rather disagreeable. It rises from 12 to 16 feet in height, sending out many long weak branches, which support themselves on the neighbouring trees. The flowers, with which it is covered in great profusion for near two months, are drip white, and have some resemblance to those of our common jasmine, but are much larger and more blunt at the teguments, which are quite reflexed. The stamina and style, which are a shining bright purple, project a long way out of the flower, and give it an uncommon elegant appearance. They have however no smell, contrary to what Miller asserts. Though a native of so hot a climate, yet there it always grows in the shade, and thrives here best in a moderate degree of warmth. It will even live through winter in a common greenhouse. The soil, which this, and indeed most tropical plants require, is a light rich loam from a common, mixed with an equal quantity of any fine vegetable earth.

make no apology for sending you the following history and botanical description of a most beautiful inhabitant of our shores, the volhameria inermis, the culture of which not being generally understood, is seldom seen covered over with its numerous jasmine like blossoms, and much less known and admired than it deserves.

The root perennial, branching, very fibrous.

Stem shrubby, solid, climbing, almost quadrangular, smooth-jointed, cross-armed, the branches numerous, and similar.

Leaves opposite, spreading, oval, very entire, smooth, evergreen, slightly raised, and with very short footstalks, the base of which is left after the leaf drops.

Peduncles, or flowerstalks, numerous, interfoliaceous, opposite, spreading, round, with the flowers in little umbells.

Very rotten leaves are superior to all others. It is readily propagated by cuttings, the least twig of which, potted and plunged in the bark bed, will readily grow. Take them off in spring, and when they begin to shoot, put them in separate pots, training the principal stem neatly up to a stick, otherwise it will hang over the neighbouring plants, and become not near so handsome. During the hot summer months give them plenty of air and water, by the latter end of which they must be shifted into pots a size larger, pruning off all the side rambling branches within 5 or 6 inches of the main stem. In winter let them enjoy as much air as possible in all mild weather. In spring shift them again into pots still larger, and the following summer they will produce their elegant flowers, but not in such quantities, as when a year older, and more stunted in their growth. After this, every summer, the roots should be suffered to run through the bottoms of the pots into the bark, where they will spread and support the branches, so as to flower and seed in no less perfection than in their native soil. Every spring, in January or February, when they are in the most inactive state, take take them out of the pot, trim off all the matted roots, and replace them with some fresh earth, at the same time pruning away the side-branches pretty close; they will soon shoot out again with the greatest luxuriance, and in a few months be loaded with a profusion of flowers.

LEODIENSIS.

MR URBAN,

THE Hon. Daines Barrington inclines to think that the bow and the thrusting sword were the only weapons of the old patriarchs in war, 'and that the killing with the edge of the sword,' Gen. xxxiv. 26. is therefore improper, as the Septuagint expression is εσφαζατο μαχαίρας, and the literal translation from the Hebrew is, in ore gladii *.

This gentleman, I am told, is not a little fond of a paradox; he will not allow small birds to have a natural note of their own, to migrate at seasons from hence into other countries; nor the world, notwithstanding our own severe feelings and the experience of A. 1739-40, 1784 and 1785 (to say nothing of some intervening years), to be as cold as formerly; and, therefore, I the less wonder that such a paragraph, as the above, should fall from his pen, though it be adverse to the sentiments of every body else.

Now, Sir, when Saul 'took a sword and fell upon it,' 1 Sam. xxxi. 4. or a Roman suicide should choose to go out of the world the same way, as many did, in such cases, should the phrase εσφαζατο μαχαίρας be used, it might easily be allowed that by εσφαζατο, or εσ of the Latins, the point of the sword was intended. But this was far from being the sense and meaning of the word εσφαζατο universally, when applied paraphrastically to the sword, among the ancients in the East; or even among the patriarchs; since the sense of the phrase, when occurring amongst them, as Gen. xxxiv. 26. must be determined by the usage of it in later times. St. Luke xxi. 24. speaking of the evils and miseries to happen at the destruction of Jerusalem, and says πνιγνύσονται εσφαζατο μαχαίρας; but now when the slaughter was general, and so many thousands were slain, it would be absurd to think they all died by stabbing; consequently, by εσφαζατο we must necessarily understand the edge here: as likewise in the case of the Sychemites, Gen. xxxix. where the carnage was great, and all the males slain. No one will doubt that the people of the East anciently used truncheon blades, as well as pushing or thrusting ones, after observing that David cut off Goliath's head with the giant's own sword; and that Samuel hewed Agag to pieces, which surely was done by a sword, as we do not find any other weapon at hand. The word in the LXX is εσφαζατο. So when the Amalekite slew Saul, as he pretended, 2 Sam. I. 10. he says, he stood upon him, which certainly there was no occasion for him to do, had the king been only to be run through the body with a rapier. Nor can it possibly be imagined, when St. Peter cut off Malchus's 'ear with a sword,' that he did it with the point. The metaphor again of devouring, so often applied to the sword, Deut. xxxii. 42. 2 Sam. ii. 26. Is. xxxi. 8. 2 Sam. xi. 25. Is. xxxi. 8. is much better accommodated to the notion and idea of slashing and cutting, than stabbing. But what may be thought still more material, we find μαχαίρα διστος, and ρουμεχια διστος, thrice in the New Testament, and as often in the LXX, which can be understood of nothing but the edge, since nobody ever heard of a sword with two points.

To conclude, for I do not wish to be tedious, Mr. Urban, it appears very rash to suppose the patriarchal swords were only thrusting, and not striking ones; especially when we reflect, that at this day the eastern people make so much use of the scymitar, a cutting instrument, and very anciently have done so.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.

MR. URBAN,

THAT elegant Fibula, in the plate of your Supplement, fig. 4, is what we call a keep-sake, a gift, that is not to be parted with, as the inscription denotes. The letters in fig. 7 of the same plate, are neither Runic nor Sclavonian, as suggested, p. 976, but the old English black letter. It probably was a wedding ring, and cotte Teors, which I suppose to be the name of the lady, or bride, appears to be French, and of the 14th or 15th century.

Fig. 6 in same plate represents, in my idea, a priest putting the host into the mouth of a communicant, that being the way, even at this time, which the papists use in giving the sacrament.

Yours,

T. ROW.

For my esteemed Friend Nat. Blandford, at Stratford.

Dear Friend, 11.7 mo. 93.

I WAS greatly surprised last night, when I was told of thy great illness and weakness and desire to see me. Surely had I ever heard it, I should have broke through all my exercises to have seen thee; and I cannot express my trouble that my landlord should not tell it me, though ordered by Jos. B. 7th day week; and truly I wonder Jos. never hinted it himselfe. I now dispatch my kinsman this morning to hear of the state of thy health, desiring of the Lord his mercifull loveing kindness towards thee and thyn in thy preservation. And I pray God sanctify this visitation to thee on thy better part's account, that truth in the inward parts may get ground, and the testimony and cross of Jesus may prevale to thy prosperity every way. I have been thinking to see you sometimes; then interrupted by sorrowfull occasions, as at this time; then of writing to thy dear wife, whom I love and esteem above most I know, and with it send her a few books, but I know not how I have been prevented. The all-wise God give us faith to believe all shall work together for the best. So, with our true love and concerne for thee and thyn, I rest

Thy most assured friend, W. P.

My poor friend, we hope, is in a mending way, though slowly, and is very weak.

SIR, Eastbampstead, June 29, 1697.

I AM gott to my country-house in Berkshire, to take a little fresh aire, and gett rid of the spleen as well as I can, or (as Horace better expresse^d it) ducere sollicita jucunda oblivia vite. From this solitude I have nothing to returne you but my hearty thanks for the favour of severall of your letters, the last whereof is of the 2d July: intreating you to continue the same kindnesse to me, as often as your occasions permitt, the accounts you give being of no lesse use, than satisfaction to me. The affaires, not only of this poor island, but of all Europe, seem to be in a great crisis, and where and when the disease will end, the all-wise God onely knows: to his good providence I hope I shall be able readily to submitt. ANTIQUARIAN NOTES, by the late Dr. DUCAREL.

Faringdon, co. Berks.

MEMORANDUM. March 18, 1749.

I was at Faringdon. The east end of the church is very remarkable for its antiquity: the windows thereof being as old as those of the Temple-church, and of the same form. On the south side of the altar is the monument of the founder, now unknown.—On the north side of the chancel, in an ancient chapel, are several fine modern monuments of the family of the Pyes, the present lords of the manor of Faringdon.

In the middle of the church, on the north side, some ancient monuments of the family of the Darnleys, the ancient possessors of this manor. The church is in good repair. Part of the steeple having been destroyed in Oliver's time, there only remains a square tower, not much higher than the church. Near the church stands Mr. Pye's house, situated in a park, which commands a fine prospect every way. The house is not yet finished; the east front is badly contrived; and the north front will want a true or an artificial window to make it regular.

Cirencester, co. Gloucester.

March 19, 1749. Saw Cirencester church. The tower has twelve bells (and chimes), and is 44 yards in height. In the church are the five following chapels, viz. St. Mary's, St. Katherine's, Trinity, Jesus, and St. John's. The chapels of St. Mary and St. John have each a stone roof finely ornamented, and several modern monuments. In Trinity chapel are several very ancient monuments. The windows, once finely painted, are broke in too many places. The altar, without rails, is paved with black and white marble; near it are several pews, where the sacrament is (by custom) administered. Here is a stone pulpit and two fonts; an old one of stone, standing upon a pillar, and a new one of marble, erected by the contribution of several gentlemen of that town, which is constantly used. The present parson*, aged 94, baptizes and marries, but does not perform any other part of divine service. Here is one charity-school for 20 boys, who are cloathed in yellow, and are taught to make stockings; and another for 20 boys and 20 girls, who are put out apprentices. A legacy of 80*l.* was here left by an old taylor, to be lent to young tradesmen, for two years without interest, to set them up, upon giving good and sufficient security to repay the same. The town has a good market, and is supported by the woollen manufacture.

Dorchester, co. Oxon.

I was at Dorchester, March 31, 1749. In the north window of Dorchester church are twelve figures painted on glass with very old characters. In the south window a representation, said to be St. Birinus baptizing king Lucius. The stone-work of the E. N. and S. windows is very ancient. The founder's monument is on the south side of the altar. There are also 24 figures in stone.

In the choir are the following monuments, viz. 1. A knight templar. 2. Ditto of one Stonner. 3. Ditto of an earl of Cornwall. 4. Ditto of an abbot of Dorchester, who was a bishop (same date). 5. Ditto of a mitred abbot, discovered in 1748.

The first has eleven very ancient figures. In the said choir is the following inscription:

Hic jacet Joh'es Middam Par. Paratus de Tamen in com. Stafford, abbas de Dorchester nec non Epif. Cujus a't'e misereatur Deus, Amen.

Round one of the bells:

Protege Berine quos

Tu sine fine Raf. Rastwood.

Temple Balsall, co. Warwick.

We went to a house called Temple Balsall, which formerly belonged to the kn'ts templars; it is almost ruined now, and only the hall where they used to dine remains entire, and also some of their coats of arms are still to be seen upon the walls; the chapel where they used to go is very entire, and is daily used by a parcel of old women, who have an hospital just by, founded, I think, by one Mrs. Saunders, or Saunderson. From thence we went to see the noble ruins of Killingworth castle. We saw several rooms, the hall, &c. by which it appears to have been formerly a very fine place; we were told that there was an under-ground way that went from thence to Warwick, but we did not go down into it. The gentleman who shewed it us told us, he had been himself a good way under ground; but that what deterred many people from going was the hissing of snakes, which is often heard there, and of which there are many about the castle, as there are commonly about old ruins. Thence we went to Offchurch, and to Northampton.

Northampton is a very pretty neat town as ever I saw; the market-places large; and there is at the entrance of the town as neat a church as can be. About a mile from Northampton there is an old cross that remains entire, commonly called Queen's Cross, said to be built by Q. Eleanor. Thence we went to Towcester, where we crossed the old Roman road, called Watling-street, which was the last remarkable thing we met with. A.C.D.

MR. URBAN,

THE following particulars, extracted from original letters of Dr. Cutler of Boston to Dr. Z. Grey, will doubtless be acceptable to your readers.

Yours, &c. EUGENIO.

"April 2, 1725. I rejoice in the growing greatness of Cambridge, and pray God favour it. In the mean time I cannot help envying you, when there is a snatty town of the same name, where there are near 300 scholars among whom a Churchman dare hardly say that his soul is his own: and I think it will never be well till that College become an Episcopal College, or we have one founded with us."

"July 18, 1729. Dean Berkeley is at Rhode Island, highly honoured by the whole Church, and Dissenters of all denominations. He will pass the next winter there; and we promise ourselves he will use his interest to place his College in these parts; and this will be some compensation for the loss the Church has sustained as to Harvard college. Notwithstanding my struggles about it, I have been forced to put my son under Dissenting tutors."

"May 9, 1730. Dean Berkeley leads a private life at Rhode Island, and I have yet wanted the happiness of paying my respects to him. Some say, his designs will come to nothing; and I fear they guess right."

"April 20, 1731. Dean Berkeley is going home, to leave us lamenting the loss of him."

MR. URBAN,

IT would afford me, I confess, a singular pleasure, if any one of your numerous and enlightened correspondents would inform me, why the title of Milton's serious poem should have been invariably written, in all the editions of that author's works, Il Penseroso, when in fact

But surely it is a little surprising that it should never been missed. I am, Sir, yours,

The lady who was the subject of Dr. Jeremy Taylor's panegyric in a funeral sermon, is, in the title-page of the sermon, and in a Latin monumental inscription on the back of the title, called Frances countess of Carbery, who died Oct. 9, 1650. Lady Alice Egerton was the third wife of Richard earl of Carbery, and appears to have been alive in 1653; when, accord- ing to Mr. Warton (p. 141) Henry Lawes dedicated his Ayres and Dialogues to her.

Is it possible that our very learned and ingeni- ous critic could have so far forgot him- self, as by these words to refer to the note at the bottom of p. 346? Dr. Taylor says of her, that she had "the blessing to be descended from worthy and honoured ancestors, and herself to be adopted and ingrafted into a more noble family;" which could not have been said with propriety, in case she had been an earl's daughter. I mention this to prevent the supposition of a pos- sible misnomer.

MR. URBAN,

J. B. who in your LIII. vol. p. 127, communicated two correct copies of Milton's Poems on Shakespeare and H. Lawes, desires also "an account of A- riadne, mentioned in Milton's note," as composed by the latter. Mr. Warton can now inform him, that "Lawes pub- lished 'AYRES AND DIALOGUES, for 'one, two, and three voyces, &c. Lond. '1653,' fol. The first piece in the book is the 'COMPLAINT OF ARIADNE,' written by William Cartwright, and printed in his poems. For a composition to one of the airs of this piece, which gained unusual and excessive applause, Lawes is said to be the first who intro- duced the Italian style of music into Eng- land," note on Sonnet xiii. I wonder that J. B. in his just zeal for the correct- ness of Milton's juvenile pieces, did not add exact copies of four of his sonnets, which in the common editions are ex- tremely incorrect, particularly the xxiii, which is more mutilated than any. This I will therefore extract from Mr. War- ton's edition.

Give me leave to add, from the same

Mr. Thyer, has supposed.

kings, to antient magnificence, and to all that is venerable and majestic, should have been buried in the chapel of Henry the Seventh. But there is great dignity both of sentiment and expression in this Sonnet. Unfortunately, the close is an anticlimax to both. After a long flow of perspicuous and nervous language, the unexpected pause at "Worcester's laureat wreath" is very em-phatical, and has a striking effect."

their growth by penal statutes. Against such enemies, Milton's chief hope of enjoy-

MR. URBAN,

JUNE 7.

THE great similarity between the following Latin epitaph on a tombstone (erected in the last century) in the church-yard of Lavenham in Suffolk, and the English epitaph from Amwell in your Magazine for April, induced me to send it you. I quote indeed from memory, for it is many years since I have seen it: and that the epitaphs may more readily be compared, I subjoin that from Amwell.

Quod fuit esse, quod est; quod non fuit esse,
quod esse;
Esse quod est, non esse quod est; non est,
erit esse.

That which a being was, what is it? show:
That being which it was it is not now.
To be what 'tis, is not to be, you see:
That which now is not, shall a being be.

Perhaps if the master of the grammar-school at Lavenham would be so obliging as to copy the epitaph from the tombstone, and send it you, it would make the matter clearer.

I very well remember my worthy master, Mr. Smythies, and some other clergymen, conversing upon the subject of this epitaph, when one of the company pointed out the following passages in Ec-clesiastes as what the writer seemed to allude to.

"The

"The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be; and that which is done, is that which shall be done," ch. i. 9.

"That which hath been, is now; and that which is to be, hath already been," ch. iii. 15.

Yours, A. F.

MR. URBAN,

IN this land of liberty the spirit of toleration is now so universally diffused among all denominations of Christians, that I was never more surprised, than by the angry reflections of a late correspondent of yours (p. 278) on the consecration of Dr. Seabury. Had that gentleman been sent across the Atlantic, for no other purpose than to propagate in the new world vice and infidelity, his mission could not have excited in the breast of a good man greater indignation, than his advancement to the episcopal dignity by the Scotch prelates, seems to have raised in the intolerant breast of your correspondent.

That the established church of Scotland has, both before and since the revolt of the colonies, sent missionaries into America, is a fact well known; that the English dissenters have done the same, I have been credibly informed, and have not a doubt; that either the one society, or the other, acted by the authority of their sovereign, I never heard supposed; and yet, so far as I know, neither of them has been accused of acting criminally.

While the colonies continued subject to the mother country, the Scotch bishops did not interfere, in any manner, either with their civil or their ecclesiastical affairs: for such interference, they were sensible, there was no occasion. The episcopalians of British America were supplied with clergymen by the bishops of that church which has hitherto been, and which, in spite of the revilings of anonymous scribblers, it is hoped will continue to be, "the glory of the Reformation." Even after the colonies were declared independent, and were as alien from Great-Britain as Japan and China, the prelates in Scotland, whom your correspondent would fain represent as the most aspiring of men, did not volunteer in the cause of episcopacy; they did not send into any of the United States one of their own body to take upon himself the ecclesiastical government of that state; they well knew that they were looked upon with a jealous eye, and therefore they cautiously avoided a measure, which might have awakened the dormant rage of their numerous enemies. But when a clergyman from Connecticut, warmly recommended by his brethren in that province, requested them to invest him with the episcopal character, they did not imagine, that by complying with his request they should give to any man greater offence than the presbyterian ministers of Scotland or England had given by sending into America missionaries of their order. Over the state of Connecticut the Scotch bishops were never so absurd as to claim any kind of jurisdiction; but to have refused to confer upon a clergyman of that state a character, which in their opinion is essential to the very being of a church, would have been to circumscribe, as much as they could, the limits of their great master's vineyard.

That episcopacy is essential to the being of a church, is an opinion very offensive to your correspondent, and to all who have thrown off that form of ecclesiastical government. In holding that opinion, it is possible that the Scotch episcopalians may hold an error; but as it is an error which was held by St. Cyprian, and "the noble army of martyrs," before the kingdoms of this world became the kingdom of Christ, they hope it is such as may obtain forgiveness from their "Father who is in heaven," as they know that it cannot injure their brethren who are upon earth. Did they indeed, with a certain "respectable and salutary establishment of religion," maintain, that those who are not in the church cannot be saved*; their opinion, that episcopacy is essential to the being of a church, would not, without reason, be very generally offensive; but while they presume not to limit the mercy of God, the tenderness of which "is over all his works," it is not easy to conceive why they may not, without offence, hold the divine right of episcopacy, as well as a presbyterian holds the divine right of presbytery, or an independent the common rights of Christians.

* "They, who, having NEVER HEARD "the Gospel, know not Jesus Christ, and "believe not on him, CANNOT BE SAVED, "be they NEVER SO DILIGENT to frame "their lives according to the LIGHT OF "NATURE, or the laws of the religion "which they profess; neither is there salvation in any other but in Christ alone, "who is the Saviour ONLY of his body, the "church." Larger Catechism of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, approved by the General Assembly of the Kirk of Scotland.

"The

"The laws of Scotland," however, says your correspondent, "have excluded all episcopacy;" and therefore he seems to think, that there can be now no bishop on the north of the Tweed. But if the office of a bishop was instituted by the apostles, and that it was, the Scotch non-jurors think there is abundant evidence, I am humbly of opinion, that it cannot be "excluded" by any human legislature; nor do I think it clear, that any power, inherent in the office, can be taken away by any authority but that by which it was originally given. The Scotch convention which voted episcopacy a grievance, might likewise have voted Christianity a grievance, and have established the religion of Mahomet in its stead; but Christianity would not, in consequence of that vote, have become a false, nor Ishmaelism a true, religion; an act of convention could not have made the Bible a collection of fables, nor the fictions of the Koran the truths of God.

At the Revolution the Scotch bishops were deprived of their titles of honour, and of all legal jurisdiction, by an act of parliament, and for that deprivation an act of parliament was certainly competent; but the powers of preaching, of administering the sacraments, and of "sending labourers into Christ's vineyard," as they were received from no human authority, by no human authority could be taken away. After their deprivation they were indeed no longer peers of parliament, entitled to the appellation of their Graces and their Lordships; but they continued to be bishops of the catholic church, as much as when possessed of their cathedrals and establishment. When destitute of every worldly comfort, and, like their divine master, while he sojourned upon earth, often "without a place where to lay their heads," they were as capable of conferring upon others the episcopal character, as when in possession of their dignities and revenues; and from them, by a regular succession, has that character been conveyed down to the "anonymous bishop who publishes the consecration-sermon," and at whom your correspondent seems to have taken a most unreasonable dislike. Had his dislike been expressed to the sermon alone, it would not, perhaps, have deserved that epithet. Some parts of that discourse are as little approved by the generality of episcopalians in Scotland, as they can be by those in England; but the candid in both countries will reflect, that the merits of the preacher are distinct from the claims of the bishop.

So far are the right rev. author and his colleagues from "grasping" (as this libeller alleges) "at the united privileges both of the crown and crozier," that these despised and persecuted men "grasp" at nothing but the spiritual guidance of such Christians as believe episcopal orders to be necessary to the valid administration of the sacraments, and who, in consequence of that belief, voluntarily put themselves under their direction. Unconnected by their situation with every kind of civil policy, they are so far from "assuming to themselves names the most ostentatious," that, as your well-informed annotator has justly observed, there is among the Scotch episcopalians "no archbishop;" the eldest prelate, whoever he is, presides among his brethren, and is styled primus episcopus, or, more shortly, primus; the very title of primate being laid aside, lest it should raise in the breasts of the evil-minded ill-grounded suspicions of an authority claimed from a source which could not fail to make it offensive.

In England every class of presbyterian ministers assumes, I suppose, authority to ordain pastors, and to exclude from their communion scandalous offenders. Except the privilege of administering the right of confirmation, nothing beyond this is claimed by a bishop in Scotland; and although, in the opinion of an English dissenter, confirmation may be deemed a superstitious rite, there is surely nothing in it which can injure society, or at which the state has cause to be alarmed.

"The establishment of that country in which they are" connived at (for your correspondent mistakes when he supposes them to be tolerated) the Scotch episcopalians treat with no other "contempt," than what is necessarily implied in their dissenting from it. Although, like the church of England, they admit not of presbyterian orders, I do not think that the most intemperate of them had ever the insolence to compare that kind of ordination to "the knighthood of Don Quixote," or the ordainers to "the Tempter making an offer of the kingdoms of this world, and the glory of them, when he had no title even to a single acre;" or to brand the established ministers, as this writer has branded "most modern bishops," with "possessing in an eminent degree the wisdom of the serpent, though not that species of it recommended in scripture."

"But of the serpent's wisdom," he says, "it required only a very small portion

tion to have suggested to Dr. Seabury, that the colonies, who lately shook off the dominion of the mother-country, will not be disposed to yield much reverence to the suffragan of those mighty prelates, whom a law, enacted in 1748, prohibited from ordaining even a single deacon." Dr. Seabury is called "the suffragan of those mighty prelates," for the purpose, I presume, of raising against them the hand of power—that pious purpose, which this writer has so zealously laboured through the whole of his abusive letter; but I trust in the lenity of government, that his aim will prove as unsuccessful as it is cruel and unchristian, when it is known, that over the American bishop these "mighty prelates" claim no superiority. Whether the episcopalians in Connecticut "will yield" due "reverence" to the diocesan whom they have chosen, time alone can determine; but they have already declared, that of the validity of Scotch consecration they entertain not a doubt; and that to them it was a matter of perfect indifference through what channel they should obtain a valid episcopacy, which they, as well as the wicked nonjurors, think can be derived only from the apostles, independent of every human authority.

Had Dr. Seabury been consecrated at Lambeth by that accomplished prelate, under whose primacy the English church is now so happy, his consecration would doubtless have been attended with greater pomp and solemnity; but it is by no means evident, that his reception on the other side of the Atlantic would have been better, than with the consecration which he has received from the Scotch bishops. Ever since their independence, the Americans have shewn themselves sufficiently jealous of a renewal of the claims of Britain to the sovereignty of their country; and had a bishop been sent thither by the church of England, there possibly would not have been wanting such writers as your correspondent to sound the alarm, however unjustly, of England's still claiming some kind of superiority over the United States, of which the consequence to episcopacy might have been fatal. But that a few bishops, who neither possess nor arrogate to themselves any power, or legal jurisdiction, in their own country, should claim any kind of superiority over a foreign state, no man can be so absurd as to imagine, and therefore it may be hoped that their missionary will be permitted to perform his episcopal offices in peace.

The law to which your correspondent refers, and in which he seems so much to rejoice, severe as I cannot but deem it, pretends not to nullify orders conferred by the Scotch bishops; it only renders those who are so ordained incapable of holding any living or preferment in England; and subjects them, if they shall officiate in Scotland to a greater number at once than four, to imprisonment for the first and second offence, and for the third to the punishment of transportation. Were a law to be enacted, prohibiting English dissenters from marriage, it would no doubt (within the dominion of England) sufficiently preclude the children of such dissenters, as should afterwards marry, from the rights of legal children; but surely no one imagines that it would have force to render such marriages absolutely unfruitful; or the children of them incapable of being considered as legitimate in foreign countries. If human laws cannot abrogate the laws of nature, neither can they render inefficacious the institutions of grace; if the restraints laid in one country upon the exercise of man's natural rights, in another are not binding, neither are those binding which are laid upon the exercise of religion.

That the framers of the law enacted in 1748 meant well, I shall not controvert; but the consequences of that law have not been beneficial. It was, no doubt, intended to crush disaffection to the government, but I know nothing which it has really crushed but religion, as it has driven out of the episcopal church many persons of consequence, whose principles, or prejudices, will not allow them to communicate with another. At the period when it was enacted, the species of disaffection, which it was meant to eradicate, was not confined to one denomination of Christians; at present it has hardly a place among any; and the little that may remain among a very few old people, an event daily to be expected will certainly banish. At any rate, those who have given to government the security of oaths for their allegiance, would not, one should think, be in danger of violating those oaths, merely for being allowed the public exercise of religion; and the Scotch bishops have never taught politics, nor made political opinions terms of their communion. Whatever truth there may formerly have been in the charge of disaffection, so often brought against these persecuted prelates, it seems not to be renewed with much propriety on the occasion of their consecrating Dr. Seabury.

That

That gentleman, they all know, acknowledges the legality of the present government of the state of Connecticut, and consequently of that legislature which declared the colonies independent: as this was made no objection to his consecration, I think it is hardly fair in your correspondent to conclude, that the principles of the bishops by whom he was consecrated are "inimical to the illustrious family on the British throne." If this letter-writer be a dissenting teacher, which, by his injurious reflection upon "modern bishops," he appears to be, it surely was not generous in him, secure as he is in a legal toleration, to call thus loudly for the severity of government on a harmless society of Christians, over whose heads the weight of penal laws is still suspended. I do not envy the English dissenters the liberty afforded them to worship God according to their consciences. May they long enjoy it! may they long deserve to enjoy it! for it is the undoubted right of every man. But while all sects (even such as "deny the Lord who bought them") enjoy the privilege of a free toleration, I hope it will not be deemed improper repining, if I think it hard that the only denomination of protestants excluded from that privilege, is a society which agrees with the church of England in doctrine, in discipline, and in worship. If, under the impression of feelings, which this reflection must naturally produce, I have expressed myself with undue acrimony against the reviler of the society to which I belong, I ask his and your pardon, for I know that my duty is not to "render evil for evil, or railing for railing; but, contrariwise, blessing." I shall, therefore, conclude this long letter with the words of an ancient Christian in circumstances differing little from mine: "Da veniam, Rex summe, tuos persequenibus famulos; et, quod tue benignitatis proprium, fugientibus ignosce tui nominis et religionis cultum." So prays, Mr. Urban,

An Episcopal Clergyman of the Scotch Church*.

MR. URBAN,

YOUR correspondent, J. Hunt, p. 328, wishes to be informed what the belt-like appearances of the planet Jupiter are supposed to be. Sir Isaac Newton imagined them to have been clouds formed in the Jovial atmosphere.

* We think the correspondence of this learned writer an honour, and shall be happy in the continuance of it. Sit animus nostrum
suus EDIT.

Other astronomers have, however, discovered that Jupiter's belts are not loose and distinct, like those of Saturn, which probably are formed by clouds, but inherent to the planet itself; and these gentlemen take them to be seas which alternately cover and lay bare the surface of the planet. In addition to which it hath been conjectured, that the maculæ in the belts are gulphs in those seas, which are sometimes full and sometimes empty. However, the more probable and general idea is, that such of the maculæ as are moveable, are nothing more than the shadows of the satellites.

Mr. Hunt also desires to know the meaning of the allegorical expression in Virgil, Claudite jam rivus, pueri, sat prata biberunt; and you, Mr. Urban, have judiciously referred him to the note upon that passage in the Delphin edition, which well explains the spirit of the passage in general; but there is a peculiarity in the usage of the word rivos, which Ruæus, the editor, seems to have overlooked. Rivus is, I believe, not uncommonly used for a head of water, which is confined by a dam, and occasionally let out to supply the adjacent grounds with moisture; and sometimes is meant to imply the channel itself in which the water is so confined. Probably they were canals inclosed by massive walls between two gates, one at each end, which are very common in Flanders, and not uncommon in Italy, at present. In the first Georgic the husbandman is described, after sowing his seed and breaking the clods, as letting out the sluices upon the land: "Deinde satis fluvium inducit, rivosque sequentes;" and in another place in the same Georgic we have "rivos deducere nulla religio vetuit." Many other instances occur which might be adduced in confirmation of this hypothesis; but as I would not be thought to engross too much of your room in investigating what many will, no doubt, call a stupid, and more, a useless subject, I shall conclude with observing, that this construction will throw a new light on the "mobilibus rivis" of Horace, mentioned in Od. vii. lib. 1; and on the prorum rivum, in Epist. x. lib. 1. MACER.

SUM-

SUMMARY OF THE PROCEEDINGS IN PARLIAMENT, SESS. II.

Debates in the present Session of Parliament, continued from p. 356.

Tuesday, March 8.

MR. Fox disapproved of the order of time in which those two great objects, the Parliamentary Reform and Commercial Arrangement with Ireland, were to be brought forward. He ardently wished success to the measure of Parliamentary Reform; and therefore was desirous that it might precede the other, to have a full, fair, and substantial trial; for, in his opinion, if the commercial business should come on first, it would be attended with a considerable diminution of credit to the present administration.

Mr. Pitt could not help remarking the wonderful condescension of the Rt. Hon. Gentleman (who, on a former occasion, see p. 353, was for preferring charges against his Majesty's ministers) in expressing his concern lest their reputation and credit should suffer diminution in the progress of the arrangement of the business with Ireland. If that should really be the case, it would be some consolation to him, he said, that in proportion as the credit of ministry should fall, that of opposition would rise; so that the plan of Parliamentary Reform would be equally safe, whether in his hands, or in the hands of the Rt. Hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Fox replied, that the censure sarcastically implied might have had weight, if he had ever pledged himself to support ministers; but he had not.

The question for the call of the House on Thursday se'nnight was put, and agreed to.

The Lord Advocate of Scotland rose to present a petition from a number of the inhabitants of Glasgow, praying that the resolutions of the Irish Parliament might not be adopted till they should be heard by their counsel against them.

Sir Wm Cunningham said, the Irish resolutions threatened ruin to the landed interest of Scotland. If grain was to be imported from Ireland into Scotland, in the same manner as from hence into that kingdom, the markets for grain the growth of Scotland would be lost, and the farmers undone. He pleaded for time to call evidence to prove the fact.

The order of the day was now called for; and the House went into a committee, for adjusting a system of commercial intercourse with Ireland.

Mr. Pitt rose, and moved, "that the committee be adjourned till Thursday;"

GENT. MAG. June, 1785.

which, after some conversation, was agreed to. And the order of the day, for the third reading of the bill for regulating public offices, being read;

Mr. Sheridan rose to oppose the bill. He considered it clause by clause; and, though he believed the intention might be good, yet he combated the principle. The unconstitutional power delegated to the commissioners therein named, was so great, he said, as not to be trusted in the hands of any men, or set of men, whatever. On the question being put, it passed without a division.

Wednesday, March 9.

The order of the day, for taking into consideration the motion for expunging from the Journals of the House the resolutions respecting the Westminster scrutiny, being read;

Mr. Francis rose, and, after giving his reasons for not having spoken before on the subject of the Westminster scrutiny, though no man had given greater attention to the debates upon it, execrated the whole proceeding from beginning to end. He was not inflexible, he said, to the injury that had been done his honourable friend, nor unheeded of the wound that had been given the constitution. The whole nation felt it; who, betrayed by their confidence, had unfortunately placed the sword in the hand that had aimed the stroke; but now, that they had seen their error, he hoped the gentlemen, who had approved the scrutiny, would join those who had disapproved of it from the beginning, and eradicate so dangerous a precedent, never again to be applied either to the purposes of personal oppression, or to shake the fundamental principles of our happy constitution. He enforced the motion with great strength of argument.

Mr. baftard was clear, that the scrutiny in question was illegal, and suggested two ways to render the resolutions respecting it ineffectual; either by expunging them, or passing an act of parliament for rescinding them; the latter he would prefer, as best calculated to prevent in future any corrupt administration from taking advantage of the precedent.

The Attorney-General said, he had not hitherto given an opinion on the legality of the scrutiny; but he would now, from a minute examination of the several acts of parliament for regulating the mode of electing representatives to sit in parliament, venture to affirm, that the comment

one man. He therefore wished to know, if the House chose to receive it in that form.

Lord North reminded the House of a petition, purporting to be the petition of a whole county, being received in his time, though signed only by one man. This was the petition of the county of Sussex on the subject of Parliamentary Reform.

Mr. Steele said, that one man was the sheriff.

Mr. Jenkinson observed, that the House could not take cognizance of any body of men assembled without the authority either of the crown or the parliament; but, as it must be the wish of the House to receive every information possible on the present occasion, the difficulty might easily be got over, by receiving it as the petition of the single person who subscribed it. This proposition was agreed to, and the petition was brought up and read; but a fresh difficulty arose, how to frame the order for the petitioner to be heard by counsel, and some conversation passed on the matter of form, which was at length put an end to, by making an order, "that the merchants and manufacturers of Manchester be heard by counsel at the bar."

The Speaker then put the question, "that the House resolve itself into a committee on Irish affairs next Tuesday."

Mr. Fox rose, and observed on the report of the committee of council that had been laid before the House, and on the conduct of his Majesty's ministers, which he thought extremely unwise, that two questions only had been referred to their Lordships consideration, viz. "I. On the propriety of reducing duties payable in Great-Britain to the same rate with the duties payable in Ireland. II. What preferences are now given to goods imported from Ireland to those of the like kind imported from foreign parts," whereas what had struck him as the primary consideration of all, was, the propriety and policy of permitting the produce of Africa and America to be brought to Great-Britain thro' Ireland, and this had never been once mentioned. This, therefore, had confirmed him, he said, in an opinion that had been long floating in his mind, that time should be allowed for full information to be received on every point of the ten propositions submitted to the consideration of the House, previous to going the length of voting for the first, which was a general proposition, involving and implicating all the rest. He wondered, he said, that the Rt. Hon. Gentleman had not himself thought it necessary to call to the bar of the House some of the best informed and principal manufacturers of the kingdom, in order that the House might, from their own mouths, have heard the probable consequence, that would result to their respective trades from the intended commercial agreement, now under consideration, with Ireland. He enlarged on this head. This was the more necessary, he said, as it appeared on the face of the report, that the Lords had drawn conclusions from the evidence given before them, which the merchants and manufacturers at their public meetings were now contradicting. Among others, he said, the ship-builders were forgotten by the Lords of Council. They ought, surely, to have been examined. He pressed the House to hold in remembrance, that they were now finally to determine a question of the greatest magnitude, and which involved in it the mutual peace, interest, and happiness of two sister kingdoms; and that the compact that was now to be made could never be broken without certain ruin to both. He concluded with asking, if gentlemen were prepared to divide on such a momentous question?

Mr. Pitt in reply observed, that the Right Hon. Gentleman had laboured much to prove what he was ready to admit, that the general proposition involved and implicated all the rest. The great object was, to give Ireland a full participation of commercial advantages, and the resolution was to carry that object into effect. As to calling to the bar the same or like evidence to that which had been examined before the Lords of Council; he well knew that it was perfectly unnecessary to invite witnesses to their bar, after so many arts had been practised, so much industry used to look for men, and bodies of men, in order to send them to the House sufficiently prepared and prompted with clamours and complaints. The Rt. Hon. Gentleman had, no doubt, expected, that by this time the table would have been loaded with petitions, and the bar crowded with witnesses; but, disappointed in this, he now endeavoured to defeat the measure by delay, and to deter the House from discussion till all the manufacturers in the kingdom should unite in requesting a decision. The great body of manufacturers of this country, Mr. Pitt said, though as liberal a class of men as any of the same rank in the known world, are yet so various in their pursuits, pursuits, and so opposite in interests, that to endeavour to persuade them to concur in one general system of commercial regulations, would be as weak as it would be ineffectual. They have given unsolicited evidence on a subject in which their interests are concerned, and where, if they had any bias, it might be supposed to incline to their own side. Their evidence is on the table; and, if contrasted with other evidence, witnesses may be brought to invalidate evidence till the House be confounded with contradictions. He insisted, that the House was now in possession of evidence sufficient to enable them to proceed; and if the Right Hon. Gentleman meant to mispend time to illustrate by evidence a matter of speculative opinion, which no evidence could prove, it would be evident what he had in view, which he [Mr. Pitt] trusted to the good sense of the House to prevent. For that reason he should most certainly oppose entering into a general examination of evidence; but if any gentleman wished to be heard by evidence, and would state the particular grounds on which he meant to proceed, he should have his full support.

Mr. Fox, to explain, said, it was the duty of the Rt. Hon. Gentleman, as the mover of the propositions, to give the House the most ample evidence of the truth of his propositions; and the rather, as he had declared, what he had hitherto concealed, that the first general proposition was to comprehend the other nine. He denied that the evidence contained in the report of the Committee of Privy Council could warrant the House in proceeding to a final discussion.

Mr. Jenkinson, as one of the Committee, remarked on the pains that had been taken to impress the House with an idea, that the evidence taken by the Committee was partial. Nothing, he asserted, was ever fairer. To the remark made by Mr. Fox, that many of those gentlemen who had given evidence before the Committee, were now meeting in opposition; he said, he did not believe that any gentleman would contradict the testimony he had given before the Committee. It was now three weeks since the report had been printed, and nothing had been said to invalidate it; if, therefore, nothing further should appear in the course of a few days, the fair presumption was, that the proposition met with general approbation.

Mr. Fox said, many of the gentlemen had certainly drawn from their evidence very different conclusions.

Mr. Pitt desired to be heard in explanation. He did not mean, he said, that the general proposition should include the whole of the other nine propositions, but the purport or substance; so as, generally speaking, what was intended might be comprehended.

Alderman Newnham said, there were two bodies of men who certainly had reason to complain; the West-India merchants, and sugar-bakers. The new regulations with Ireland, if adopted, would certainly ruin the sugar-bakers.

Mr. Rose made a short reply; and the question being put for Tuesday, the House adjourned.

Monday, March 14.

Mr. Dundas moved, "that a committee be appointed to enquire into the state of the British fisheries." He trusted that a matter of such national concern would not want arguments to enforce it. Certain regulations were necessary, without which that important object would sink into nothing.

Mr. Dempster, from personal knowledge, rose, he said, to second the motion. Ordered accordingly.

Mr. Stanley rose, to present a petition from the manufacturers of callico and cotton in the town of Lancaster, praying to be heard by counsel against the Resolutions, which, if adopted, would materially affect the branches of trade in which they were concerned, and on which no less than 500,000 individuals depended for bread. When he had said this, he moved, "that counsel be heard upon it on Thursday."

Mr. Pitt observed, that as the order of the day for the Irish business stood for to-morrow, and the Manchester petition on the same subject was then to be considered, in his idea that would be the proper day, in order to save time, to hear counsel in support of the Lancaster petition.

Mr. Fox thought the proposed arrangement with Ireland required a more minute investigation than it had yet received, and that a whole day would scarce be sufficient for that purpose. It was necessary to enquire how far it would affect the revenue of this country; and to that end, he thought it incumbent on the House to examine the Commissioners of Customs and Excise; and contended for the expediency of setting apart to-morrow for that purpose.

Mr. Pitt observed, that three weeks had passed since he had explained the nature of the arrangement with Ireland, and and but three petitions had been presented against them; but if the Right Hon. Gentleman would state any specific grounds for such examination, he should not oppose it.

Mr. Eden said, that he had seriously directed his attention to the plan proposed; but the more he considered it, the more he was bewildered. He wished, he said, to extend his enquiry into the nature of the customs, excises, drawbacks, and allowances, as now prevailing in both kingdoms.

Mr. Poyns thought further information necessary; and wished the commissioners to be examined.

Mr. Sheridan insisted, that it was not till Friday understood, that by agreeing to the first proposition the House would become pledged to adopt the spirit of the other nine; and he was firmly persuaded that other respectable bodies were under a similar delusion. He warned the minister against precipitation.

Mr. Pitt said, that misapprehensions had been disseminated throughout the kingdom, as if those specific propositions were to be unalterably adhered to; whereas it is well known, that wherever the specific propositions of the Irish parliament were found to militate against the interests of this country, any evil that might be apprehended might be effectually done away by a supplemental regulation.

Lord North said, the Irish resolutions were drawn up with great art. They stated, in general, that reciprocal benefits were their object, but they specified no return for the concessions made by England. He was for examining the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, as the information conveyed to the House by the report of the Committee of Privy Council was defective.

Mr. Dundas wished the Right Hon. Gentleman who moved the enquiry would specify what questions he meant to put to the Commissioners.

Mr. Eden observed, that the Irish resolutions went to effect a total revolution in the rating and collecting the duties; therefore it was impossible to say what questions he should put to the Commissioners, as one question would naturally arise out of another.

After some farther conversation, it was agreed, that all the Commissioners should have notice to attend at the bar on the morrow.

The report from the committee upon the ordnance estimates was then read.

Mr. Bastard moved, "that the same be recommitted."

Capt. J. Luttrell opposed the re-commitment, and endeavoured to prove the necessity of extending the fortifications.

Capt. Macbride said, he must object to voting the public money for erecting works which could not tend to the security of the nation.

Mr. Courtenay compared the fondness, which the master-general of the ordnance shewed for fortifications, to the fondness of a man in the decline of life becoming enamoured with a young wife, and repenting of his folly when he found he had not wherewithal to answer her purposes or his own. By the calculations that had been given in, it appeared, that an enormous sum, and a great length of years, would be necessary to complete the fortifications; which, when done, could in no considerable degree tend to the defence of the nation.

Col. Barré entered into an estimate of the sums expended in fortifications since the year 1744, which, he said, were sufficient to have beggared a less opulent nation, and which were, notwithstanding, of no material use. He suggested a board of officers as necessary to survey the works that were made and making for the defence of the several dock-yards, that the House might have some ground to stand upon in voting away such enormous sums of their constituents money.

Mr. Pitt adopted the Hon. Gentleman's idea. He said there were 50,000 l. granted last year for the purpose of fortifications, not one penny whereof had been touched, nor with his consent should be, till parliament should be satisfied in what manner it might best be applied. There were, he said, two very necessary considerations on the subject—one, whether the proposed system was absolutely necessary—the other, if found necessary, whether it might not be carried on in a cheaper manner than now proposed. He was, therefore, for suspending any farther proceedings till parliament should be satisfied, from the report of persons in the first ranks of the several military and naval departments, how far the objects in view were worthy of the expence. This gave rise to the commission already stated (see p. 319); and Mr. Bastard's motion was withdrawn.

Tuesday, March 15.

The order of the day being read, for the House to resolve itself into a committee on the propositions respecting Ireland;

Mr. Eden said, that as the motion for the attendance attendance of the commissioners originated with him, he thought it necessary to state to the House his motives for so doing. By the 5th resolution, where the articles of consumption are charged in either kingdom with an internal duty, the same article, when imported from the other kingdom, should be charged with an adequate countervailing duty; so far, so good. But the resolution farther states, that the countervailing duty shall continue only "until the manufacture coming from the other kingdom shall be subjected there to an equal burden, not drawn back or compensated on exportation. This part of the clause, Mr. Eden said, though apparently just, seemed to him of very serious import; and he had wished for the assistance of gentlemen, conversant with the custom and excise laws, to explain it. According to his conception, from the moment these resolutions shall be adopted by the British parliament, it will be in the power of the Irish parliament to support the national expenditure of that kingdom by the national revenue of this. To illustrate this position, he adduced the case of candles. Candles in this country are charged with a duty of three halfpence a pound: let candles in Ireland be charged there with the same duty, and they may be sold here by the importer at a much cheaper rate than by the manufacturer here. In this case, not only the revenue would be sacrificed, but the profit of the English manufacturer annihilated. These remarks, he said, led to the most extensive considerations. The revenue arising from the customs and excise amounted to more than a million and a half, and that revenue would be materially affected by this clause.

Mr. Pitt acknowledged the Hon. Gentleman's construction of that part of the proposition to be accurate; but that was not the essential part of the proposition.

Mr. Fox wished to know what the Rt. Hon. Gent. meant by the essential part of the proposition.

Mr. Pitt in reply said, it was so common for loose expressions to get abroad, grossly perverted to the most mischievous purposes, that he should not at all wonder, if, from what had been said, a paragraph should appear in to-morrow's papers, affirming, that a million and a half of the public revenue of England was about to be sacrificed to Ireland. He thought it right, therefore, to state to the House, that a million and a half was produced by the duties on tobacco, sugars, candles, soap, glass, &c.

last year, and he would venture to add, that just so much would continue to be produced, should the ten propositions be agreed to and made the basis of an act of the legislatures of both kingdoms this year. He then proceeded to explain, in answer to Mr. Fox's question, what he considered the essential part of the proposition; and that was, the equality of duty under which each country would trade.

A debate then arose, about stating a general question to be put to the commissioners, for them to answer when they should be again called to the bar, which was strongly urged on one side, and as strongly combated on the other. At length the question was put, "that the Commissioners of Customs and Excise be called to the bar;" and being come,

Mr. Eden desired to ask, if they had seen the propositions in question; and how far, in their opinion, they were likely to affect the revenue, should they be adopted?

One of the commissioners answered for the rest, that they had seen the propositions casually, but that they had not officially considered them.

Mr. Eden was proceeding with his interrogatories; when

Mr. Pitt, having desired the commissioners to withdraw, urged the impropriety of proceeding, as upon the first answer that had been given it had appeared, that no material information could be expected from them.

Mr. Eden was ready to admit, that, as a board, nothing of consequence could be gathered; but, as individuals, some questions, he thought, might be proposed, from which the committee might receive much useful information. He was proceeding to state some questions in conformity to this idea; when Alderman Watton suggested a mode of examination, by stating the questions on paper, sending them to the respective offices, and receiving from them individually their answers at the bar.

Mr. Jenkinson doubted whether any such mode had ever been practised; but, after the ablest speakers had exhausted the patience of the House with questions, replies, and rejoinders, he suggested two or three words to be stated on paper, and sent to the respective boards: "how far, in their opinion, the laws passed for the protection of that part of the revenue committed to their care respectively, would be affected by the Irish propositions being made the basis of an act of the British parliament?" This met the general neral concurrence of the House. The commissioners were called in, and the chairman read the question to them, and informed them that it should be sent them in writing, and that they might commit their answers to writing in like manner. And thus this tedious business ended at near NINE in the morning.

Wednesday, March 16.

Mr. Stanley brought up a petition from the gentlemen, clergy, merchants, and manufacturers of Manchester, Warrington, and many other towns and townships in Lancashire and Cheshire, where the manufactory is chiefly carried on, signed, as it was said, by EIGHTY THOUSAND persons, complaining of the late tax on fustians &c. as ruinous to those important branches of manufacture. It set forth a variety of allegations, tending to shew the manifest advantages that Ireland enjoyed in the manufacture of the same articles over those of the petitioners, and particularly in the article of exportation of their commodities.

Mr. Pitt declared, that, if the case, as stated by the petitioners, could be made out, the tax ought not to exist a moment longer.

Mr. Stanley moved, "that the petitioners be heard by counsel on Monday."

This brought on a long contention, which, however, was at length agreed to.

Lord Beauchamp, among other reasons for a speedy repeal, stated the unconstitutional introduction of excisemen into the houses of the manufacturers, which had caused a general alarm throughout that body of men in all parts of the kingdom.

Mr. Rose contended, that the tax on fustians was not the first instance of introducing excisemen into the houses of manufacturers, nor ought it to be placed to the account of his Rt. Hon. friend.

There now being a short pause ;

Mr. Burke took the opportunity of saying a few words relative to the punishment of convicts under sentence of transportation. Under colour of humanity, he said, we were guilty of the most aggravated cruelty ; and by a commutation of punishment, on the ground of mildness, the poor wretches were doomed to sufferings, compared with which the gibbet was gentle, and the halter mercy. He was about to make a motion in their favour, when

Lord Beauchamp rose, and laid claim to the honour of having already made a similar motion.

Alderman Newnham said, he did not doubt but the Hon. Gentleman meant well ; but it would certainly be a great and serious cruelty if the villainous part were to be let loose on the honest part of the community. At present the gaols were full of the former, and the latter could hardly walk the streets in safety. Surely, he said, the honest citizen had some claim to a share in the Hon. Gent.'s humanity as well as the villain. He wished to know in what palace the Hon. Gent. would have them placed.

Mr. Burke said, that every body knew that remission of punishment to criminals was, in many cases, inhumanity to the innocent : all he aimed at was, that, when we professed to be merciful, we should not en throne cruelty on the bosom of mercy. The island on the river Gambia, where it was now proposed those wretches should be sent, he said, if there was a palace upon it, it must be the palace of pestilence, where death and destruction reigned with never-ceasing devastation.

Some other members observed, that the motions were ill-timed, and wished them to be referred to a more vacant day.

The order of the day being then read ;

Mr. Pitt rose, and, previous to the examination of any witnesses on the Lancashire petition, moved, "that the examination of the gentlemen who had given evidence on the part of the cotton and callico manufacturers of that county, before the Committee of Privy Council, might be read ;" at which

Mr. Eden, after listening with attention, expressed some satisfaction, as he was free to own, he said, the answers there given had puzzled him ; but he hoped now to have an opportunity of hearing the gentlemen explain themselves.

The committee then proceeded to examine witnesses.

Mr. Peel, an eminent manufacturer of Manchester, was then called to the bar. The questions proposed to him led into a very minute detail of the expences incident to the different branches of the manufacture of both kingdoms. From what he said, it appeared, that the Irish manufacturer, after paying a duty of ten and a half per cent. (which was looked upon as the equivalent to the internal excise of this kingdom) would afterwards, from various causes, retain a superiority of 13 per cent. This gentleman being asked, said, he employed at least 6,800 persons, and paid an annual excise of 20,000*l.* He was then asked, what number he thought thought he should employ if the propositions were passed into a law? His answer was, most certainly the same, if not a greater number; but it should be in Ireland. Being farther asked respecting the sentiments of his friends; he affirmed, that all whom he had conversed with on the subject were of the same mind. His examination lasted till twelve at night, when the House adjourned.

Friday, March 18.

The House, after the private business was over, proceeded on the examination of witnesses on the Manchester petition.

Mr. Smith of Manchester was called to the bar. He fully confirmed the evidence of Mr. Peel—said, he paid last year £6,000l. duty to government; that the new taxes would this year increase it £5000l. more; that, should the propositions as they stood at present pass into an act, he should most assuredly transfer his business and property to Ireland, and was certain that most of the other manufacturers in the same branch would do the same. That the superiority of the manufacturers of this country over those of Ireland consisted only in the taste of executing the finer branches; in the coarser they have the advantage. After finishing his examination, Mr. Garrow (their counsel), in a speech of an hour and a half long, made many shrewd and pertinent observations, availing himself of Mr. Pitt's former declaration, that all the propositions should stand or fall together. He placed the equivalent of revenue that we were to receive, in return for our concessions, from Ireland, in the most contemptible light; and acquitted himself, on his first appearance in the House, much to the satisfaction of his clients. As soon as he had finished, the House adjourned till

Monday, March 21.

The order of the day being read, for taking into consideration the petition from the gentlemen, clergy, merchants, and manufacturers of the county of Lancaster, the House went into committee on the same; and Mr. Pigot and Mr. Garrow being ordered to the bar, to substantiate the facts set forth in the petition,

Mr. Walker was the first witness examined. He said, that since the 15th of October last, when the duty on cottons, &c. took place, the home business at his house had decreased three parts in four; that they were now in no condition to enter into a rivalry with France; that in some countries British cotton goods were absolutely prohibited; in others they were admitted under heavy duties, which, added to the difficulties and heavy charges attending exportation, operated next to a prohibition every where; that the drawbacks were rendered next to nothing by the delays and difficulties that attended the recovery; and that, in short, if the duties were continued, the trade must infallibly be lost to this country. He entered minutely into the several processes; and concluded, that either the act must be repealed, or many thousand useful subjects deprived of bread. As soon as the examination of this business was finished, the House adjourned.

Tuesday, March 22.

There not being members in the House sufficient to make a ballot for a committee to try the merits of the Buckinghamshire election, the House was therefore under the necessity of adjourning.

Wednesday, March 23.

The bills ready received the royal assent by commission; and the House adjourned till after the holidays.

MR URBAN,

June 13.

A Farewel address, said to be intended to have been spoken at Mrs. Bellamy's benefit, having found its way into a morning paper*, I have procured for you a copy of that which was really spoken upon the occasion. Why it did not meet with the applause Miss Farren's elegant and pathetic manner of speaking it, and its own merit, entitled it to, was visible to the whole audience.

I must just beg leave to observe, that the author of the farewel address has made a trifling mistake; as Mrs. Bellamy's Apology would have informed him, that during the memorable run of Romeo and Juliet, which procured her the distinction of the first Juliet, she coo'd (as he prettily expresses himself) with Mr. Garrick, and Mrs. Cibber bill'd with Mr. Barry.

I have likewise sent you an address, which she would have spoke, had she not chosen to return her thanks to the audience in her own way. I am, Sir,

Your humble servant, C. D.

An Introductory Address, spoken by Miss Farren at the Benefit of Mrs. Bellamy, May 24, 1785. Written by Mr. Bicknell, Author of the Life of King Alfred, the History of Edward the Black Prince, and Compiler of Capt. Carver's Travels, &c. &c.

That various are the turns of fortune's wheel
All records tell us, and still thousands feel:

* It is thence transplanted among our political articles; see p. 469. ED 111

Now on the top the favour'd mortal stands,
Gayly bedeck'd with wreaths from both her
hands;

Profusely kind, her bounty she bestows;
And loving seems the spring from whence it flows—

Anon the ever-circling wheel moves round,
And lays her favourite prostrate on the ground;

Of ev'ry good as suddenly bereft,
And not a trace of all her favours left;
Her boon appears but like a flatter'ing dream,
The pang more poignant for the wide extreme.

On fortune's scroll imperial Rome of old
Once saw her Belisarius high enroll'd; Wealth pour'd her stores; loud rang the trump of fame;

And ev'ry votive honour grac'd his name;
Yet the same Roman saw their hero's foot;
Sad, sad reverse! sit cheerless at his door,
Oppress'd by penury; and forc'd to live
On what the charitable hand would give—
Thus the deluding deity beguiles,
Thus transient and unsteady are her smiles.

A female Belisarius of the stage
Presumes to-night your notice to engage:
One whom your favour, whilom rais'd to wield

A heroine's truncheon in our bloodless field;
Who oft in scenic armour bright has shone,
And bravely led theatric squadrons on:
High in the list of our dramatic band,
As the first Juliet will the ever stand.

Alas! like his, revers'd has been her fate;
The day of affluence past, she finds too late
That fortune's gayest wreaths, neglected, fade—
But her Apology's already mad—

Already, by your smiles, her hopes revive;
And this gay scene will keep these hopes alive.

To such a generous circle, ne'er, in vain,
Can Error sigh, or can Distress complain:
Complete the work your goodness has begun,
And give new lustre to her setting sun—
But see, oppress'd with gratitude and tears,
To pay her dutious tribute she appears.

[*The curtain drew, and discovered Mrs.
Bellamy.*]

An Address, written for Mrs. Bellamy to speak at her Benefit. By Mr. Bicknell.

Long absent from these boards, alarm'd, I find Unusual tremors agitate my mind.

In vain I strive my feelings to impart,
And speak the grateful dictates of my heart.
Yet, tho' thus trembling, something would I
say;

Fain, fain I would my dutious tribute pay:
Tell that your kind indulgence, deep impress'd
In liveliest tints, is glowing in this breast—
But, overwhelm'd by gratitude and tears—
Accept th' attempt—accept these speaking tears.

MR. URBAN,

YOU have told the public in p. 190
[450], "that Dr. Manton's meeting-house, in New Court, Carey-street, was pulled down by the mob in Sacheve-rell's time, but soon rebuilt."

Be so kind as to correct a mistake made through want of better information. Dr.
Manton died Oct. 18, 1677. The meeting-house referred to was erected, since this century commenced, for Mr. Daniel Burgefs and his congregation, who removed thither from Russell-court, Covent-Garden. In 1710 it was not pulled down by the mob; but the pulpit and pews were taken out, and carried into Lincoln's-inn-fields, where they were burnt: agreeably to what Bishop Burnet says of the meeting-house near him in Westminster, out of which the mob, encouraged by some of better fashion, drew every thing that was in it, and burnt it.
Mr. Burgefs's place of worship was soon repaired, at the expence of government.

Permit me also to inform your correspondent E. in p. 191 [251] that in Diodati's Annotations, 4th edition, printed in 1664, he every where writes Solomon, not Salomon.—As to the word swindler,
it is derived from the German word schwindel, which signifies to cheat.

Yours, R. W.

IF any of your intelligent correspondents would be so obliging as to reveal any certain, innocent method of eradicating hair from the human body, it will be esteemed a particular favour by a person, who had the misfortune to be born with one cheek almost as thickly covered as the top of the head. That such method is discovered, is undeniable, as in some countries even the men so entirely eradicate their beards, as to render their chins as smooth as those of the women.

Many of the nostrums offered to the public in the daily prints, with the strongest assurance of success, have been found no better than impositions;
besides, the compositions of such powders and compounds being kept secret, there is great reason to apprehend they may be of prejudicial qualities, not only to the parts rubbed with them, but to the constitution of the whole frame. H. H.

MR. URBAN, N—s, March 14.

I HAVE frequently derived infinite pleasure and information from your excellent Magazine; and, if my avocations in life would have permitted it, should have been long ago one of your constant correspondents; to some of whom I must resort for satisfaction in the following

following query, viz. Whether there ever was a version of Homer in any one of the Oriental languages? For my own part, I had never heard of any such work, till I met with, in a book called "Huntingtoni Epistolæ," printed in 8vo. at London, 1704. a letter addressed to Father Paul Bertoni at Jerusalem, containing this passage: "Rogo insuper, ut opera nonnulla Syriacè exarata S. Ephremi, quicquid reliquum sit, Bar Bahluli Lexicon, Gregorii, vel Georgii potius cujusdam, historica (quæ memini me vidisse in ædibus patriarchæ) Jacobitarum, et Homeri versionem, quæ in Catalogo Damasceno sub hoc titulo occurrit exquirere velles." From this letter, dated Halabi, 5 Julii, 1677, it appears, that Dr. Huntington, afterwards bishop of Raphoe (whose fondness for amassing Oriental manuscripts is apparent from his very valuable collection now preserved in the Bodleian library at Oxford) had endeavoured to obtain this curious work; though, I am rather apprehensive, without success, as I do not find it in the catalogue of his books inserted in the "Catalogus Librorum Manuscriptorum Angliæ et Hiberniæ, Oxon. 1697." I have also looked into Hottinger's "Bibliotheca Orientalis," and some other books of the same kind, in hopes of meeting with some account of this version of Homer, but cannot gain the least intelligence of it. Probably some one of your learned correspondents may procure, in the course of his reading, some information of this matter, and will communicate his discovery, through the channel of your publication, to Yours, &c. J. C.

MR. URBAN,

I Should be much obliged to any of your learned correspondents for information with respect to the following particulars. In looking over the other day some fragments of a worthy friend lately deceased, I found this observation: "And a judicious author has told us, that it is a rule in our law, that if a man drinks to another against whom he has an accusation of slander, or other verbal injury, he loses his action; because it is from thence supposed, that he is reconciled to him"—Query, Who is this author, and where is this rule in our law to be met with?

In reading a sermon of a very elegant composer*, I noticed this passage:

* Dr. Blair.

"Hence, the rose-leaf doubled below them on the couch (as is told of the effeminate Sybarite) breaks their rest." I am not ignorant, that the Sybarites in general were a very effeminate people; but I should be happy to learn who the Sybarite was †, that is alluded to in the above passage.

INVESTIGATOR.

MR. URBAN,

Oxford, April 4.

AS it is very well known that many authors of distinguished excellence, whose merits would probably have otherwise remained unnoticed, have been brought to light by the means of your valuable publication; a correspondent, presuming upon the success that has already attended others in similar researches, ventures to require from some of your literary friends an account of M. Kyffin, the translator of the Andrian of Terence. This translation, printed 1518, is frequently quoted by Johnson and Steevens, in their edition of Shakespeare; and the author's name occurs more than once in the entertaining and instructive "Anecdotes of William Bowyer."

MR. URBAN,

June 20.

BEING yesterday visiting a friend, whose son is studying mathematics, we entered into a discourse on the doctrine of chances, and its use or application in ascertaining the credibility of human testimony. The young gentleman observed, "that the truth of a fact becomes highly probable, when several independent witnesses give evidence thereof; even though each of them should be known to relate, upon an average, as many falsehoods as truths." As I was aware of his mistake, I replied, "that five hundred, nay ten thousand, of such testimonies as he had just mentioned, did not, in any degree, augment the truth of the matter related; for it was as equally probable they would all deny the truth, as affirm it." On this he produced a book, which, he said, would convince me that I was wrong: and indeed I was surprized to find, in a work published by the celebrated Dr. Priestley, a proposition militating against what I had advanced, and knew to be true. I saw at once the fallaciousness of the proposition, and apprized the young gentleman of it; giving him, at the same time, a true one for the purpose: but, as he was strongly prepossessed in favour of his author, I left him, without being able to remove the prejudice he had imbibed. Wherefore, for the sake of preventing youth from rashly adopting any proposition upon the credit of an author, howsoever reputable, and thereby from the danger of falling into errors, I shall, in this instance, shew the fallaciousness of the proposition alluded to, on its own principles, and, in lieu thereof, advance a true one for solving such problems. The proposition is the 39th in Hartley's "Theory of the Human Mind," published by Dr. Priestley, in which he discourses on the probability of the truth of facts attested by a variety of witnesses, independent on each other; and says, if the evidences are all of equal credibility, and the common deficiency in each be $\frac{1}{a}$, and the number of evidences be n , the deficiency of the resulting probability will be no more than $\frac{1}{a^n}$.

It is happy for the author that he has not proved it. Indeed it would have been a task too great. He might, however, have seen his error, the absurdity being gross enough, as I shall presently shew from the author's own principles. Thus, if $\frac{1}{a}$ express the total deficiency in the truth, $\frac{a^n - 1}{a^n}$ will be the total probability of truth: also, $\frac{1}{a}$ being the common deficiency of each person, $\frac{a-1}{a}$ is the probability of each person's relating the truth; and, from the author's principle, $\frac{a-1}{a^n}$ is the total deficiency in the lye, or the resulting probability of truth. Hence $\frac{a^n - 1}{a^n}$ and $\frac{a-1}{a^n}$ are equal to each other, which is absurd; as a is, in this case, always greater than an unit. Therefore the proposition is false.

Now to give the true rule, we $\frac{a-1}{a}$ for the probability of each person's relating the truth, and $\frac{a^n - 1}{a^n}$ for the probability, before this testimony is delivered, of all the evidences agreeing the truth; also, $\frac{1}{a}$ being the probability of each separate person not relating the truth, $\frac{1}{a^n}$ is the total probability, before they deliver their testimony, of their agreeing in the falshood, or of their not relating the truth; but when their evidence is given, and their testimonies are the same, $\frac{a-1}{a^n} + \frac{1}{a^n}$ becomes a certainty, or equal to an unit;

and therefore, $\frac{a-1}{a^n}$ and $\frac{1}{a^n}$ become $\frac{a-1}{a^n + 1}$, and $\frac{1}{a^n + 1}$, respectively;

which expressions are the respective probabilities of the truth or falshood of the relation given. Therefore, $\frac{1}{a^n + 1}$ is the theorem for finding the deficiency of the resulting probability of truth, and not $\frac{1}{a^n}$, as is erroneously laid down in that book.

N. B. It may not be improper to observe, that, since writing the above, I find the same fallacious principles have been published in the "Transactions of the Royal Society," and other works of equal reputation. Yours, &c.

MR. URBAN, June 4.
I SEND you the following explanation of the seal engraved in the Gent. Mag. p. 89. Having seen an impression on wax, I can assure you that the drawing is very exact, particularly in the marks of contraction in the border, one over the first V, another over the word V'GO, and a third at the end of the inscription. I read it, RINALDO NATVM LVCY FAC VIRGO PLACATVM: that is, "O Virgin, make thy Son propitious to Rinald Lucy." This accounts for every letter clearly, and the words are very apposite to the device. Rinaldus and Lucy are names well known to antiquaries, the latter as a surname. V'GO is undoubtedly for virgo, as the monks frequently expressed re and the preceding vowel by a stroke. I read placatum, because it makes rhyme, sense, and tolerable metre.

MR. URBAN,

TO the enclosed strictures on the Elm are added a few critical remarks, with an intent to shew, that some attention to Natural History would, in abler hands, be of considerable use towards explaining many obscure passages in the ancient writers.

T. H. W.

Ulmus campestris Linnæi. The Elm. In Italian Olmo; in Spanish Ulmo; in French Orme; in German Ulmer; in Danish and Swedish Alm; in Saxon Elm or Ulm.

“ — præbens

“ Et frondem armentis, et aratris utile lignum,

“ Villica, sed foelix, et Baccho conjuge clara.”

The remark of Linnæus, that Botanists have not been able to distinguish between the species and the varieties of Fungi, holds good also among several sorts of trees, as the Oak, Elm, Poplar, and Willow. For instance in the Elm, of which they give us four varieties: one of them, the Wych-Hazel, is certainly a different species, as are perhaps some of the others.

The Wych-Hazel, or Elm, or, as K. Alfred in his Saxon Glossary calls it, Þrit-Þær, is an undoubted native, being dispersed in woods throughout the whole island. It is perhaps the largest tree we have, even exceeding the Oak; and its leaves are much larger than any other sort of Elm. The wood of this tree is very tough, and supplied our ancestors with a kind of boy, as a substitute for the Yew. Cartwrights prefer it for the naves of wheels, as it will not split or cleave.

The common Elm, or that which grows near London and other towns in the southern part of the kingdom, blooms regularly, and plentifully every year, but is generally prevented by frost from producing perfect seed. The early foliage of this tree gives that forward appearance of vegetation so observable in the environs of London. This kind of Elm will grow as close as any tree in a single row, or narrow thicker; but will not bear crowding together in woods: a fortunate circumstance for our ancestors, to whom as it afforded no pawnage, (mast for swine,) if it had intruded on their Oak it would have been very detrimental.

As this Elm is chiefly found near towns and villages, connected as it were with cultivation; as it is scarce ever known to propagate itself by seed; has a Roman name* in this country, in common with the rest of Europe; and, as Evelyn says, in his time was scarce found north of Stamford; it is most probable that it came originally from Italy. Villages and hamlets taking their names from the Elm prove nothing to the contrary, since places of abode are full as likely to be distinguished by introduced, as by native trees.

This kind of Elm is cultivated to great advantage; we have known a tree sell for five pounds which had not been planted sixty years. But the slender straight trees of this sort bear the greatest price, being converted into pumps for exportation, and carried even to the East Indies. It is also one of the best deciduous trees that we have to plant for ornament, or shelter to buildings, as it is successfully transplanted, grows quick; is very early in leaf, and, bearing no perfect seed, is always furnished with a plentiful foliage, which it retains till late in the autumn; and therefore is much preferable to the Lime, as that in a dry soil frequently fades in July, is far more liable to be disfigured by insects, and the wood is of much less value.

There is one advantage from trees planted among buildings beside their purifying the air (see Priestley) that ought to be attended to, and it cannot be introduced more properly than in the account of the friendly Elm, which is, that trees are great preservatives from fire; naked towns and villages are often burnt wholly to the ground, whereas if a fire happens where houses are intermixed with trees, it seldom spreads.

But the Elm in rural economy is not of that consequence to us that it was to the Romans, to whom it furnished fodder for their cattle, and supports for their Vines, which were wedded to the living tree in the southern part of Italy, where the heat was sufficient to ripen the grapes though shaded by its branches; in more northern latitudes it supplied them with stakes for the same purpose. When the Romans became luxurious, the Elm was discarded from their ornamental plantations, as carrying with it an air of homely cultivation; and the favour-

* This circumstance we shall more particularly discuss in a future account of some other tree.

rite but useless Plane superseded it. Of this Horace complains :

"Platanusque cœlebs
"Evince Ulmos."

The Plane-tree not wedded to the Elm will exclude the Elms.

In the hot climate of Italy the grass is burnt up early in the Summer in low situations; and, where there were no cool mountains to retreat to for fresh pasture, it was necessary to support the cattle with the branches of trees (frondes), of which the Elm was the principal; and it was the business of the frondator, in early times, to provide this kind of fodder*: Θαλλοῦ τ' ἐριφίου φορνῶναι. HOM. Od. xvii. v. 224. But the scholiast on Theocritus (Idyll. xi. v. 74,) does not seem to be acquainted with this practice, when he substitutes ωα, grass, as a synonyme for θαλλοῦ, the branch of a tree. It appears surprising, that the commentators on Virgil †, and translators, should render frondator, in the following verse, a pruner of Vines, a nightingale, or a linnet ‡.

"Hinc allâ sub rupe canet frondator ad avas."
ECL. I. v. 57.

The vine was cultivated by the putator, who pruned it in winter; the pampinator, who removed the superfluous shoots in summer; and the vinitor, who gathered the grapes. Ovid distinguishes between the frondator and the putator, when he describes Vertumnus paying his Harlequin addresses to Pomona.

"Falce datâ frondator erat. vitisque putator."
MET. lib. xiv. v. 649.

The dried branches of the Elm were laid up for winter-store. The hay-making of the ancients seems to have been very imperfect; the festive scenes attending our lawn'd baycocks in the mead would have obtained a compartment in Homer's shield of Achilles; neither would they have been neglected by Theocritus and Virgil. But it was not necessary to make any great provision against the short winters of Greece, Sicily, or Italy. Short as they were, however, it is plain that the store was sometimes deficient by the caution that Cato gives.

The commentators in several places do not seem to be aware of the full meaning of the word frondes: for instance;

"Hinc adeo media est nobis vina, namque
"sepulcrum

"Incipit apparere Bianoris: hic, ubi densas
"Agricola stringunt frondes; hic, Marti, ca-
"namus."

VINO. ECL. IX. v. 59.

Martyn, after giving the various explanations of Servius, La Cerda, Ruzus, Marolles, Catrou, W. L., Lauderdale, Dryden, and Trapp, is inclined to think that agricola stringunt frondes "signifies "either the pruning of the trees, or "gathering the young shoots, in order
"to strew them upon the tomb of Bia-
"nor." All this waste of criticism might have been spared, and the sense of the verb stringo in this passage fully ascertained, by the following line, where Horace says to his rural agent,

"— beneque

"Disjunctum curas, et strictis frondibus explas."
Lib. I. EP. 13 T. xiv.

And you take care of the unyoked ox, and fill him with bundles of branches.

Whence it is plain that agricola stringunt frondes means, that the hinds collected branches near the tomb of Bianor for fodder; accordingly Cato, who lived near a century before Virgil, directs that Elms should be planted for this purpose by the road-side. "Cir-
"cum coronas*, et circum vias Umas
"seruo, et partim populos, uti frondes
"ovibus et bubus habeas, et materia, si
"quæ opus sit, parata erit." CAP. V.

A poet of the third century introduces an old experienced shepherd instructing his pupil thus:

"Incipe falce nemus vivaſq; recidere fronda.
"Tunc opus est teneras summam stringens
"vargas,

"Tum debes servare comas, dum permanet
"humor,

"Dum viret, et tremulas non excutit Afri-
"cus umbras.

"Has tibi conveniet tepidis sænilibus olim
"Promere, cum pecudes extremus clauſerit
"annus."

CALPURNIUS, ECL. V.

The poet was a Sicilian; and it is observable, that, among the variety of his directions, none relate to hay-making.

* What is the meaning of corona in this passage? The word occurs in Frontinus, and seems to be used in the same sense; but without an explanation.

* The deer in our forests are fed by a frondator in winter. See vol. LIV. p. 21.
"Cold performs the effect of heat."

† All do not. Minellius defines the word frondator. "Rusticus mercenarius discerpens frondes." EDIT.

‡ See Martyn's edition of the Eclogues.

The wedded Elm of Italy, though trimmed up, did not make an ungraceful figure when encircled by the Vine, and ornamented with its festoons.

"Ulmus erat contra, spatiosa tumentibus uvis:
"Quam socia postquam pariter cum Vite pro-
"bevit;

"At si stare, ait, caulebs, sine palmitis truncus,
"Nil præter frondes, quare peteretur, haberet.

"Hæc quoque, quæ junctæ Vitis requiescit
"in Ulmo,

"Si non nupta foret, terræ adclinata jaceret."
OVID. Metam.

"An Elm was near, to whose embraces led,
"The curling Vine her swelling clusters
"spread:

"He view'd her twining branches with de-
"light, [sight,

"And prais'd the beauty of the pleasing
"Yet this tall Elm, but for his Vine, (he "said)

"Had stood neglected, and a barren shade;
"And this fair Vine, but that her arms sur"round

"Her ~~surry'd~~ Elm, had crept along the "ground."

POPE.

Had the elegant translator been aware of the purport of frondes in this passage, he would not have rendered it shade. But our naked and unmarried Elms, so unmeaningly and unnaturally robbed of their branches, disfigure and disgrace a country. It is not easy to conjecture whence this absurd custom took its rise among us, or why it is now continued; the timber is spoiled by concealed and decayed knots, the growth is much stunted, and the produce often not worth the trouble of collecting. No timber-tree but the Elm will bear such abuse; the sturdy Oak absolutely refuses it, for which reason there is scarce a stately tree of that kind to be seen within several miles of London.

We have observed an Elm, in Essex and Hertfordshire, that produces a great quantity of seed, as well as the Wych-Hazel, but seldom brings any to perfection. The leaves of this kind do not appear till late in the year, and the foliage is always thin and mean. This, though a very different tree, is in some places confounded with the Wych-Hazel. The Dutch Elm is inferior, in its growth and appearance, to the other sorts, and very apt to run to suckers, and should not have been introduced.

Elm should always be felled in or before December; in mild seasons the sap flows, and the blossom-buds are enlarged in January. Whatever wood of this kind is cut then, or later, will be worm-eaten, and soon decay; it is this improper practice that has brought Elm-timber into disrepute. When this wood is used abroad, and exposed to the open air, it is a good method to give it a coat of boiling tar: but this must not be done till it is perfectly seasoned and dry.

Hesiod directs his countrymen to bring home whatever crooked timber they could find, and particularly the ever-green Oak, ωρεῖν, for the plough. But Virgil says, that the Elm was in his time forcibly bent into the form of a plough-beam as it grew in the woods. (Georg. lib. i. v. 169.) We have heard an eminent timber-merchant, who was certainly unacquainted either with Hesiod or Virgil, remark, that, if weights were tied to young Oaks, to bend them as they grew, the timber would be much more valuable for ship-building.

It is with deference to abler critics that the following passage is produced:

"Nec si, cum moriens alta Liber ardet in Ulmo,
"Æthiopum versemus oves sub fide Can-
"cri." VIRG. Ecl. X. v. 64.

All the translators we have seen, adhering perhaps too scrupulously to quantity, render Liber in this quotation the bark of the Elm; whereas, if we can allow the poet the same licence here which he has taken in other passages, of using the same syllable long in one place and short in another*, we may then translate the verse thus: Nor if when the dying Liber (Bacchus, the Vine) is scorched on the lofty Elm— This interpretation heightens the image, and strongly expresses the distressful consequences of excessive heat to a Roman cultivator, whose prosperity depended much on the success of his vineyard, wine being in those days a principal export. It is then one of the calamities that the pastoral prophet mentions in his beautiful and pathetic apostrophe.

Altho' the Fig-tree shall not flourish,
Neither shall there be fruit on the Vine,
The culture of the Olive shall deceive,
And the Cornfields yield no food,
The Flocks shall be cut off from the fold,
And there shall be no Herd in the stalls;
Yet I will rejoice in the Lord,
I will joy in the God of my salvation.

* Magni longa et cum celerant fastidia menses.

"The making of the last syllable but one short, sufciant, is a poetical licence not very unusual; thus we read sufciant and mifciant, for sufciant and mifciant."

MR. URBAN,

May 29.

A LEARNED writer at Vienna, in order to shorten judicial proceedings, without laying any restraint on human liberty, by a very sensible Latin tract, circulated all over Europe, has offered a premium to those who resolve the following

" PROBLEM.

" For every possible kind of instrument, by which any one can bind himself, or transfer his property to another, whatever be the motives and conditions, to invent such forms as may suit every individual case, and in each case may require to be filled up with single terms only, and those the most common; which terms, as well as the expressions used in the forms, may be such as may leave no room for doubt or litigation, as in mathematics.

" The first premium is a thousand, the second five hundred imperial gold pieces (aurei), which will be paid by Messrs. Smitmer,, merchants, at Vienna: to whom, or to Buson and Co. at Paris, or to Anthony and Bartholomew Songa, in London, copies, in Latin, in one packet, are to be transmitted, at the expence of the authors, on the July 1, 1787, at farthest. Some other directions are given.

" To obtain the first premium, a full solution of the problem is required; that is, he who would obtain the premium is obliged to demonstrate, with mathematical rigour, that the forms invented by him fully satisfy the conditions of the problem. To approach nearly to a solution, is not sufficient; a solution in every respect compleat must be exhibited.

" They therefore, who are inclined to this task, should thus undertake it:

" First, they should investigate every possible method by which any one can bind himself, or transfer his effects, on whatsoever motives, and under whatsoever conditions, to another, to represent to himself all the contingencies that may thence arise, to make various and the usual remarks on all these cases, which may afford such classes, that is, divisions and subdivisions, that in them all possible species, which may be at all suited to every case, may be included. After this, it remains,

" Secondly, that, for every one of these species, the plainest and shortest method of expressing it in words, or perhaps representing it even by signs, be chosen; and this properly is the construction of forms.

" Thirdly, follows the demonstration of the solution. This, when the others are properly executed, will not be difficult. It will consist of two parts: 1. It must be demonstrated, that every kind of transfer of property, and of condition, are in fact comprised in those classes: 2. That in those forms, by whose assistance every species of condition and transfer is represented, every individual case is comprehended, and most plainly and briefly expressed.

" For the other part of this demonstration, a sight of all the forms is required: nor does it suffice (which is studiously to be regarded) to send forms only, without adding the methods, without the classes, without demonstration*.

" The proposer of the problem has deposited the value of one thousand five hundred gold pieces with these merchants.

" The more I consider this, the more I am convinced that the solution of the problem is not only possible, but not so difficult as it seems. It may be proper here to subjoin the beginning of the classification of the conditions, only for example's sake, which every one may adopt, or not, as they please.

CONDITIONS,

which depend

do not depend on persons who are parties to any covenant, which require

possible, impossible;

action, or omission;

depending,

past, future; past, future;

on the will of a 3d person, on chance.

Among these classes certain relations will be observed, which may be formed if they are diligently considered, and from thence perhaps new methods may be deduced, which may much diminish the number of forms, and consequently may wonderfully facilitate the execution of business.

* He who undertakes this in a proper method will touch the whole subject in a few leaves, the forms excepted.

75. Milton's Juvenile Poems. With Notes, &c.
By Thomas Warton, B. D.

(Concluded from p. 377.)

WE cannot dismiss this truly classical edition of our great English classic without adding some more specimens of the Editor's taste and judgment, not only as a commentator on Milton, but as a critic, occasionally, on some other authors; first observing, that, by his English notes on the Latin poems, he has (as he says) "opened a new source of criticism on Milton, which displays him in a new light and character." These Latin poems, hitherto too much neglected, will now be found to be truly worthy of their author, and, if the Paradise Lost had never appeared, if he had never been known as the English Homer, they would have transmitted him to posterity as the English Ovid.

"Lycidas, v. 11. To sing and build the lofty rhyme.] That is, 'the lofty verse.' This is unquestionably the sense of the word rhyme in Paradise Lost, b. i. 16.

'Things unattempted yet in prose or rhyme.'....

It is wonderful that Bentley, with all his Grecian predilections, and his critical knowledge of the precise original meaning of ΠΡΟΜΟΣ, should, in the passage from Paradise Lost, have wished to substitute song for rhyme. Gray, who studied and copied Milton with true penetration and taste, in his Music Ode, uses Rhyme in Milton's sense:

'Meek Newton: self bends from his state sublime,

'And nods his hoary head, and listens to the rhyme.'

Mr. Say, by the way, whose Critical Essays on Milton are not once mentioned in this edition, observes, that Rhyme and Rime, "the jingling sound of like endings," are constantly distinguished by Milton in all the editions of his works which were corrected by himself, being spelt five times without the b, in the short account of the verse prefixed to the later copies of the first edition of Paradise Lost, added at the request of the bookseller, and again in the second.

27. "We drove afield.] That is, 'we drove our flocks afield.' I mention this, that Gray's echo of the passage in the Church-yard Elegy, yet with another meaning, may not mislead many careless readers:

'How joyous did they drive the team afield!'

40. "With wild thyme and the gadding vine o'ergrown.] Dr. Warburton supposes that the vine is here called gadding, because, being married to the elm, like other wives she is

GENT. MAG. June, 1785.

fond of gadding abroad, and seeking a new associate."

Dr. Warburton, it may be observed, loses no opportunity of girding at the ladies. Witness Job's wife, and his Shakspeare, passim. Mr. Warton derives the word from the "old verb gade, "a frequentative from go."

63. "Down the swift Hebrus, &c."]

As the Hebrus is a slow river, Milton is supposed by his commentator to have been "misled in this epithet by a very ancient but wrong reading of Virgil, Æn. 321, (not 317, as misprinted,) "volucrumque fugâ prævertitur Hebrum;" which Janus Rutgerrius (he says) has amended, by substituting "Enrum." But was not this emendation first suggested by the Bishop of Avranches, in his Huetiana, LXIV.? See our vol. XXXIX. p. 383.

110. "Two massy keys he bore, &c.] Hence perhaps the two keys, although with a different application, which Nature, in Gray's Ode on the Power of Poetry, presents to the infant Shakspeare."

Il Penseroso, ver. 106,

"Such notes, as warbled to the string,

"Drew iron tears down Plato's cheek.

When Handel's L'Allegro and Il Penseroso were exhibited at Birmingham, a few years ago, this passage, for obvious reasons, was more applauded than any in the whole performance."

142. "While the bee with bonied thigh.] Dr. Johnson censures Gray, who was a scholar, for giving to adjectives, derived from substantives, the termination of participles; as in bonied spring. But here is Gray's authority; and we have bonied again in Samson Agonistes, v. 1066, and in one of Shakspeare's Henries, [and also in one of his Sonnets.]

157. "And love the high-embowed roof.] So the line should be printed. Highly-vaulted. EMBOWED is arcuatus, arched. It is the same word in Comus, v. 1015:

'Where the bow'd welkin slow doth bend.'

Old Saint Paul's Cathedral, from Hollar's valuable plates in Dugdale, appears to have been a most stately and venerable pattern of the Gothic style. Milton was educated at Saint Paul's school, contiguous to the church, and thus became impressed with an early reverence for the solemnities of the ancient ecclesiastical architecture, its vaults, shrines, iles, pillars, and painted glass, rendered yet more awful by the accompaniment of the choral service. Does the present modern church convey these feelings? Certainly not. We justly admire and approve Sir Christopher Wren's Grecian proportions.

Truth.

Truth and propriety gratify the judgment, but they do not affect the imagination."

Milton seems to have borrowed (Mr. Warton observes) the subject of L'Allegro and Il Penseroso, together with some particular thoughts, expressions, and rhymes, more especially the idea of a contrast between these two dispositions, from a forgotten poem (of which he adds an extract) prefixed to the first edition of Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, written about the year 1600.—Mr. W. adds,

"As to the very elaborate work to which these visionary verses are no unsuitable introduction, the writer's variety of learning, his quotations from scarce and curious books, his pedantry sparkling with rude wit and shapeless elegance, miscellaneous matter, intermixture of agreeable tales and illustrations, and, perhaps, above all, the singularities of his feelings, clothed in an uncommon quaintness of style, have contributed to render it, even to modern readers, a valuable repository of amusement and information."

Among the "modern readers" who have admired that work was Archbp. Herring, as appears by one of his letters, in which he mentions "the author "as the pleasanter, the most learned, "and the most full of sterling sense. "The wits (he adds) of Queen Anne's "reign, and the beginning of George "the First's, were not a little beholden "to him."

The beauties of Milton's juvenile poems were fully relished by Hughes, as well as Addison, as we find him even adding the following supplement and conclusion (which he thought it wanted) to the Penseroso, after "prophetic strain,"

'There let Time's creeping winter shed
'His hoary snow around my head;
'And while I feel, by fast degrees,
'My sluggish blood wax chill, and freeze,
'Let Thought unveil to my fixt eye
'The scenes of deep Eternity,
'Till Life dissolving at the view,
'I wake, and find those visions true!

Mr. Mason's Il Pacifico and Il Bellifico, though not mentioned by Mr. W. or even collected by the author himself in his Poems, must surely be deemed very happy imitations, particularly the conclusion of the latter, where the veteran is supposed to "recite" his "past campaigns" at Greenwich or Chelsea.

P. 123. "When you was but a "child." That Mr. W. should use this exploded solecism is surprising. One of our correspondents has remarked this mis-interpretation.

"Comus, v. 291. — *The labour'd ox
In his loose traces from the furrow come.*

This is classical. But the return of oxen or horses from the plough is not a natural circumstance of an English evening. In England the ploughman always quits his work at noon. Gray, therefore, with Milton, painted from books, and not from the life, where, in describing the departing day-light, he says,

'The ploughman homeward plods his 'weary way.'

Ib. 707. "I take this opportunity of observing, that it is wonderful Hamlet's 'Suit 'of Sables' should have been ever and so long misunderstood. Hamlet. A. III. S. 2. He certainly intends an equivocation between Black and Sables. But the skin of the Sable, or Martin, was a sumptuous and showy article of dress."

P. 316.

"Such as the wise Demodocus once told
In solemn songs at king Alcinous' feast,
While sad Ulysses' soul and all the rest
Are held with his melodious harmony
In willing chains and sweet captivity."

We cannot help observing, on this passage, that Milton has here, more than twenty years before his blindness, introduced a musician who so strikingly resembled him in that misfortune, that Homer's lines upon him have been often very happily applied to our poet, as well as to Homer himself:

Τὸν οἷός μιν ἐφίλησεν, δίδου δ' ἀγαθήν τε καὶ ἄλκιον ὀφθαλμῶν μὲν ἄμεινον, δίδου δ' ἑλπίαν αἰετὴν.

P. 321. "— My Shakespeare.—] Of all the many encomiums passed on our great dramatic poet, the most truly poetical one seems to be contained in the third strophe of Mr. Gray's admirable Ode on the Progress of Poetry. 'Far from the Sun,' &c. Particularly in the fine Prosopœia and Speech of Nature to him:

'This pencil take, she said, whose colours
'clear
'Richly paint the vernal year;
'Thine too these golden keys, immortal
'boy!
'This can unlock the gates of Joy;
'Of Horror that, and thrilling Fears,
'Or ope the sacred source of sympathetic
'tears. Dr. J. WARTON.'

"In 1762 the late Mr Thomas Hollis examined the Laurentian Library at Florence for six Italian Sonnets of Milton, addressed to his friend Chimentelli, and for other Italian and Latin compositions, and various original letters, said to be remaining in manuscript at Florence. He searched also for an original bust in marble of Milton, supposed to be somewhere in that city. But he was unsuccessful in his curious enquiries."

P. 367. "Birch has printed a Sonnet said to be written by Milton in 1665, when he retired to Chalfont on account of the plague, and to have been lately seen inscribed on the glass of a window in that place. LIFE, p. xxviii. It has the word Sbene as a substantive. But Milton was not likely to commit a scriptural mistake. For the Sonnet improperly represents David as punished by a pestilence for his adultery with Bathsheba. Birch, however, had been informed by Vertue, that he had seen a satirical medal, struck upon Charles the Second, abroad, without any legend, having a correspondent device."

This Sonnet, as it is not inserted, we will annex:

' Pair mirror of foul times, whose fragile
' Sbene
' Shall, as it blazeth, break; while Pro' vidence,
' Aye, watching o'er his saints with eye
' unseen,
' Spreads the red rod of angry Pestilence
' To sweep the wicked and their counsels
' hence;
' Yea all to break the pride of lustful kings,
' Who Heaven's lore reject for brutish
' sense,
' As erst he scourg'd Jethites' sin of ' yore
' For the fair Hittite; when on seraph's
' wings
' He sent him war, or plague, or fa' mine sore.'

Notwithstanding the above obvious mistake, and the want of two lines, it must be owned to be much in Milton's style and manner.

P. 432. Mr. Warton supports his assertion, in the Life of Batburs, that "Milton was whipped at Cambridge," which (he says) has been reprobated and discredited, as "a most extraordinary and improbable piece of severity," by the manuscript authority of Aubrey the antiquary, a contemporary, and also by the context. He likewise corrects a mistake in the Biographia, p. 3106, as to Milton's being entered a fixar, "pensionarius minor" (the term used), being "a pensioner, in contradistinction to a fellow-commoner," pensionarius major.

P. 441. "Ld Monboddos pronounces his 1st Elegy to be equal to any thing of the elegiac kind to be found in Ovid, or even in Tibullus."

P. 495. Mr. W. concludes a note on the vanity and pedantry of Queen Christina with the following paragraph: "I do not mean to make a general comparison; but Christina's pretensions to learned criticism, and to a decision even in works of profound philosophical science, at least remind "us of the affectations of a Queen of England, who was deep in the most abstruse mysteries of theology, and who held solemn conferences with Clarke, Waterland, and Hoadly, on the doctrine of the Trinity." In the Latin lines to Queen Christina, p. 499, which are styled "simple and sinewy," but which, with "Dr. Newton, whose opinion is weighty," are here ascribed to Marvell, (and in whose "Miscellaneous Poems, 1681," they are printed,) our copy has the following variations: l. 3. for "Cernis," "Aspice;" l. 4. for "terro," "gero."—This Epigram introduces some other anecdotes of this Amazonian Queen, as Milton also styles Queen Elizabeth (Thermodontia Puella) in one of his Latin poems.

P. 502. Mr. Mason says, of the superior keenness of Marvell's sarcastic raillery against his adversary [Bishop] Parker,

' Ev'n mitred dulness learns to feel.'
"As conveying a general idea, the combination mitred dulness may have its propriety. But in the present particular instance, he might have said "as justly, and more characteristically, "mitred meanness."

P. 503. "In obitum Procancellarii, medici.] Dr. John Gosslyn, Master of Caius College, and King's Professor of Medicine at Cambridge, who died, while a second time Vice-Chancellor of that University, in October 1626. . . I am favoured, in a letter from Dr. Farmer, with these informations: "I find, in Baker's MSS. vol. xxviii, Charge of buryall and funeral of my brother doctor Gosslyn who departed this life the 21 of Oct. 1626, and his funerall solemnized the 16th of Nov. following. And so it stands in the College Gesta-Book. He was a Norwich-man, and matriculated Dec. 3, 1582. A benefactor to Caius and Catharine-Hall; at which last you once dined at his expense, and saw his old wooden picture in the Combination-room."

P. 579. Ad Joannem Rousum, &c.] Milton, at Rouse's request, (who was M. A. fellow of Oriel College, Oxford, and chief librarian of the Bodleian Library,) had given his little volume of poems, printed in 1645, to the Bodleian Library. But the book being lost, Rouse requested his friend Milton to send another copy. In 1646 another was sent by the author, neatly, but plainly, bound, munditie nitens non operosa, in which this ode to Rouse, in Milton's own handwriting, on one sheet of paper, is inserted between the Latin and English Poems. It is the same now marked M. 168. Art. 8vo. In the same library is another small volume, uniformly uniformly bound with that last mentioned, of a few of Milton's prose tracts, the first of which is of Reformation touching Church Discipline, printed for T. Underhill, 1641, 4to. marked F. 56. Tb. In the first blank leaf, in Milton's own hand-writing, is this inscription, never before printed, 'Doctissimo viro proboque librorum æstimatori, Johanni Rousio, Oxoniensis Academiz Bibliothecario, gratum sibi hoc fore testanti, Joannes Miltonus opuscula hæc sua, in Bibliothecam antiquissimam atque celeberrimam adscribenda, libens tradit: tanquam in memoriam perpetuam famam, emeritamque, uti sperat, invidiæ calumniæque vacationem, si veritati bonoque simul eventui satis sit liturum. Sunt autem De Reformatione Angliæ, Lib. 2.—De Episcopatu Prælatice, Lib. 1.—De ratione Politicæ Ecclesiasticæ, Lib. 1.—Animadversiones in Remonstrantiæ Defensionem, Lib. 1.—Apologia, Lib. 1.—Doctrina et Disciplina Divortii, Lib. 2.—Judicium Bucerij de Divortio, Lib. 1.—Colasterion, Lib. 1.—Scripturæ loca de Divortio, instar Lib. 4.—Arcopagitica, five de Libertate Typographiæ Oratio.—De Educatione Ingenueorum Epistola 4.—Permata Latina, et Anglicana sorsum.' About the year 1720 these two volumes, with some other small books, were hastily, perhaps contemptuously, thrown aside as duplicates, either real or pretended; and Mr. Nathaniel Crynes, an esquire beadle, and a diligent collector of scarce English books, was permitted, on the promise of some future valuable bequests to the library, to pick out of the heap what he pleased. But he, having luckily many more grains of party prejudice than of taste, could not think any thing worth having that bore the name of the republican Milton; and therefore these two curiosities, which would be invaluable in a modern auction, were fortunately suffered to remain in the library, and were soon afterwards honourably restored to their original places."

P. 587, 8. On Milton's political writings, or of his prose works in English, both as to their doctrine and their style, Mr. Warton passes a censure not more severe than just. "Lord Monboddo (he says) is the only modern critic who ranks Milton, as a prose-writer, with Hooker, Sprat, and Clarendon." And as to his "Latin performances in prose," he "cannot allow that they are formed on any one chaste Roman model."

"They consist (says Mr. W.) of a modern fastidious mode of latinity, a compound of phraseology gleaned from a general imitation of various styles, commodious enough for the author's purpose. His Defensio pro Po- pulo Anglicano against Salmasius, so liberally rewarded by the presbyterian administration, the best apology that ever was offered for bringing kings to the block, and which diffused his reputation all over Europe, is remembered no more.

"Dr. Birch observes of this prophetic hope in the text, that 'the universal admiration with which his works are read, justifies what he himself says in his Ode to Rouse.' Life, p. lxiii. But this hope, as we have seen, our author here restricts to his political speculations, to his works on civil and religious subjects, which are still in expectation of a reverent fame, and still await the partial suffrages of a sans posteritas, and a cordatior ætas. The flattering anticipation of more propitious times, and more equitable judges, at some remote period, would have been justly applicable to his other works; for in those, and those only, it has been simply and conspicuously verified. It is from the ultimi nepotes that justice has been done to the genuine claims of his poetical character. Nor does any thing, indeed, more strongly mark the improved critical discernment of the present age, than that it has atoned for the contemptible taste, the blindness and the neglect, of the last, in recovering and exalting the poetry of Milton to its due degree of cultivation and esteem; and we may safely prognosticate, that the posterities are yet unborn which will bear testimony to the beauties of his calmer imagery, and the magnificence of his more sublime descriptions, to the dignity of his sentiments, and the vigour of his language. Undoubtedly the Paradise Lost had always its readers, and perhaps more numerous and devoted admirers, even at the infancy of its publication, than our biographers have commonly supposed. Yet, in its silent progression, even after it had been recommended by the popular papers of Addison, and had acquired the distinction of an English classic, many years elapsed before any symptoms appeared that it had influenced the national taste, or that it had wrought a change in our versification, and our modes of poetical thinking. The remark might be still farther extended, and more forcibly directed and brought home, to the pieces which compose the present volume.

"Among other proofs of our reverence for Milton, we have seen a monument given to his memory in Westminster Abbey. But this splendid memorial did not appear till we had overlooked the author of Reformation in England, and the Defensio; in other words, till our rising regard for Milton the poet had taught us to forget Milton the politician — Not long before, about the year 1710, when Atterbury's inscription for the monument of John Philips, in which he was said to be seculi Miltono secundus, was shewn to Dr. Sprat, then dean of Westminster, he refused it admittance into the church; the name of Milton,

Milton, as Dr. Johnson observes, who first relates this anecdote, 'being, in his opinion, 'too detestable to be read on the wall of a 'building dedicated to devotion.' Yet, when more enlarged principles had taken place, and his bust was erected where once his name had been deemed a profanation, Dr. George, provost of Eton*, who was solicited for an epitaph on the occasion, forbearing to draw his topics of reconciliation from a better source, thought it expedient to apologise for the reception of the monument of Milton the republican into that venerable repository of kings and prelates, in the following hexameters, which recall our attention to the text, and, on account of their spirited simplicity and nervous elegance, deserve to be brought forward, and to be more universally circulated :

Augusti regum cineres, sanctæque favillæ;
Heroum vespæ O, vix tanti nominis, umbræ!
Parcite, quod vestris infensum regibus olim
Sedibus infertur nomen, liceatque supremis
Funeribus finire odium: Mors obruat iras.
Nunc sub fœderibus coeant felicibus una
Libertas, et jus sacri inviolabile sceptri.
Rege sub Augusto fas sit laudare Catonem."

P. 603. In the curious account of "James Wright, one of the earliest "historians of the English stage," he is said to have "died, almost eighty, "about 1715," though "he was born " (we are told in p. 602) at Yarnton, "near Oxford, about the year 1644."

P. 606. The "Thomas Clarke," who presented Milton's MSS. to Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1736, was afterwards Master of the Rolls.

76. Sonnets and other Poems, &c. (See p. 199.)
By S. Egerton Brydges, Esq. of the Middle Temple, and late of Queen's College, Cambridge. A new Edition, with Additions. 8vo.

THE author's name and the additions now require farther notice. They consist of a Dedication (which shall be inserted), A Dirge on the fictitious Author of some "Lines to Miss L. L." &c. and two other small pieces. The "Dirge" was occasioned by the lines abovementioned (really by this writer) being printed in our vol. LIV. p. 47, in the name of a person supposed to be dead.

"DEDICATION.

To Mrs. Brydges,

Of St. Lawrence-House, near Canterbury.

"O Thou, whose care o'er all my life presides,
Whose hand supports me, and whose judgment guides;
From jocund parties of the noisy bar,
From crowds, and unencumbering circles far,
Pleas'd to whose cheerful roof I steal away,
In sweet domestic bliss to pass my day!

* Rather "of King's." See p. 435. EDIT.

(For what wild joys, what flattery can supply
The tender watchings of a mother's eye?)
Beneath thy smiles I catch poetic fire,
And strike, with rapt'rous hand, my echoing lyre!

[bear,
For thou without contempt my faults dost
Though oft unmeaning, they have drawn thy
tear,

My ill-tim'd ardors, and my scorn to raise
On the soft arts, that grace the world, my praise,

Whilst wild Ambition leads my hopes astray,
To draw attention to the simple lay,
Which strives the Fancy's visions to impart,
Or wake the slumb'ring feelings of the heart.
Vain hope! For to the most neglected string
Of the neglected lyre I dare to sing.

Yet these wild wishes, free from blame or scorn,

[borne;
With all their train of follies, hast thou
To whom but thee, my mother, then belongs
The small requital of my humble songs?

Middle Temple, April 5, 1785."

77. Pictures from Nature. In Twelve Sonnets.
To which is added, The Lock Transformed. 4^o.

AS the preceding "Sonnets," &c. open with the amiable effusions of filial affection, these are introduced by a no less amiable instance of conjugal love, 'e.g.

"INTRODUCTORY SONNET.

To my Wife.

"For Thee, whose love I value more than life,

[inspire,
Whose fond smile fosters what the Nine
For Thee I re-assume my humble lyre,
Here, in this shade, far distant from the strife
Of scenes, where Fashion's pamper'd votaries,
rise

In Dissipation's revel, quench thy fire,
O Mose! and blast the hallow'd name of WIFE
'Mid the dark orgies of impure desire.

"For Thee, though ne'er my unambitious
strain

Shall sooth th' unfeeling world, I yet awhile
Tune the rude shell; and, haply, not in vain,
If (sweet reward of every anxious toil)

My simple song have still the power to gain
From my own LAURA an approving smile."

The others, on the rural and "picturesque objects of still life," are all equally pleasing. Two of them, however, are not "Sonnets," their structure, as the author allows, being "critically illegitimate." "The pensive "Muse of Bignor Park" (see p. 307) is the model he has endeavoured to follow. The "Beautiful," he observes, is characteristic of this "miniature "painting," but that the "Sublime" is incompatible with it. But in this we cannot agree with him when we recollect Mr. Edwards's Sonnet "On a Family Picture," in Dodsley's Collection, vol. II.

Vol. LXXV. For the Year 1785. Part I. 40.

ART. I. An Account of an artificial Spring of Water. By Erasmus Darwin, M. D. F. R. S. [of Derby.]

This new water was gained by boring through a stratum of red marl, which was found about 100 yards from the river Darwent, in Derby, at the bottom of an old well, four yards deep, that had been many years disused on account of the badness of the water. It "has now flowed about twelve months, " and is already increased to almost " double the quantity in a given time." The process is curious, but too long to detail. Some power beneath them, and subterraneous fires, adds this writer, it is evident, forcibly raise up mountains, and even islands, and the same may be supposed of other great elevations of ground; of which " proofs are " to be seen on both sides of" Derby. And the more elevated parts of a country being much colder than the valleys, from the water there condensed originate " our common cold springs," which, sliding between two strata, " descend till they find or make themselves an outlet, and will, in consequence, rise" to their original level. " The water from the lowest stratum " will therefore generally rise the highest (as in this instance), if confined " in pipes, because it comes, originally, " from a higher part of the country." Dr. Darwin's theory is confirmed by Sir Thomas Page's experiments at Sheerness, and others.

ART. II. An Account of an English Bird of the Genus Motacilla, supposed to be hitherto unnoticed by English Ornithologists. Observed by the Rev. John Lightfoot, M. A. F. R. S. [of Uxbridge.]

This " bird haunts the reeds of the " river Coln," and its nest and eggs " were repeatedly brought by a fisherman on" that " river to the Dutchess Dowager of Portland, who first communicated them to" Mr. Lightfoot. From some very accurate descriptions annexed it appears to be " a species of " the Motacilla of Linnæus," which, as he finds " no such is described by any " systematic writer," he has " named, " after the Linnæan manner,

' Motacilla (arundinacea) supra olivaceo fusca, subtus albida, loris et orbitis fusco-albescentibus, angulo carpi subtus lateo-fulvo, cauda subcuneata fusca, plantis luteo-virescentibus.'

" The only author who can be suspected of having noticed this bird is " SEPP," who, in a late splendid Dutch work, has described and figured a bird in many respects similar. As we have already the Willow-wren, this, our author thinks, " may be denominated, " from its haunts, the Red-wren."—It is found " from Harefield Moor down " to Iwer, about the space of five miles," and also near Dartford in Kent, and probably in many other parts of the kingdom. The structure of its nest, as here described, is uncommonly curious, and unlike that of any other known bird. Mr. L. thinks it " a bird of migration," its food being insects. But this at present is conjecture. A print of it shall be given in some future plate.

ART. III. An Account of Morne Garon, a Mountain in the Island of St. Vincent, with the Description of the Volcano on its Summit. By Mr. James Anderson, Surgeon.

The mountain here described, which " terminates the N. W. end of the " island, and is the highest in it, has " always been mentioned to have had " volcanic eruptions from it." After two attempts, and the incessant labour of four days climbing, with the utmost hazard of his life, assisted by two or three negroes and a boy, this intrepid adventurer reached the top of it March 4, 1784, and saw its amazing crater, whose diameter is more than a mile, and its circumference, apparently, a perfect circle. Its depth is above a quarter of a mile, and in the centre at bottom (to which he descended) is a burning mountain, of about a mile in circumference, which seems only to have begun to burn lately, with a small one on its summit. The appearance of the whole is extremely well described, and also drawn; but we cannot enlarge farther than to add, that Mr. Anderson supposes submarine communications between the volcanos in the islands, and from them to the volcanos on the high mountains of the continent of South America.

ART. IV. A Supplement to the Third Part of the Paper on the Summation of infinite Series, in the Philosophical Transactions for the Year 1782. By the Rev. S. Vince, M. A.

See our vol. LIII. p. 858. The reasoning in the third part of his paper on this subject having been misunderstood, the author here offers an explanation.

ART. V. Description of a Plant yield-

Asa Foetida. By John Hope, M. D. F. R. S.

Asa foetida was introduced by the Arabian physicians near 1000 years ago, yet the first satisfactory account of it was given by Kœmpfer, about 70 years ago, in his Amœnitates Exoticæ. But the plant described by him differs, in many respects, and, as Sir Jos. Banks supposes in a note, might probably be a different species, from that now presented, which was sent to Dr. Guthrie, of St. Petersburg, six years ago, by Dr. Pallas, and by Dr. G. to Dr. Hope, who has planted it in the open ground in the Botanic Garden at Edinburgh, where having flowered and produced seed, it promises to "become an article of cultivation in this country of no inconsiderable importance." A print, from an accurate drawing by Mr. Fife, is annexed.

ART. VI. Catalogue of Double Stars. By William Herschel, Esq. F. R. S.

"Having already pointed out the great use of Double Stars," Mr. H. has "now drawn up a second collection of 434 more," which he has "found out since the first was delivered," and which (he adds) is more perfect than the former. The same method of classing them is adopted, the numbers of the stars is also continued; and, as many of these are not in Mr. Flamsteed's catalogue, they are pointed out by a method here described, for which we must refer to the article. These observations were generally made with a power of 460.

ART. VII. Observations of a new variable Star. By Edward Pigott, Esq.

The star α Antinoi, by a series of observations, Mr. Pigott has found "subject to a variation very similar to that of Algol, though not exactly the same in any one particular." When brightest, it is of the 3d or 4th magnitude, and at its least brightness, of the 4th or 5th, and its changes, "which hitherto seem regular and constant, are performed in 7 days, 4 hours, 38 minutes."

ART. VIII. Astronomical Observations. By M. Francis de Zach, Professor of Mathematics, and Member of the Royal Academies of Sciences at Marseilles, Dijon, and Lyons.

These observations are on an eclipse of the moon, March 18, 1783, (made at Lyons,) of the vernal equinox, on Jupiter's satellites, (at Marseilles,) a new solution of a problem that occurs in computing the orbits of comets; and an observation on the transit of Mercury, at Marseilles, November 12, 1782.

ART. IX. Observations of a new variable Star. By John Goodricke, Esq.

β Lyræ is the star here observed.— "The extent of its variation is twelve days and nineteen hours, during which time it undergoes eight variations from the 3d to the 4th and 5th magnitude, and vice versa." This is a quadruple star, N° 3, of Mr. Herschel's Vth class of Double Stars, and is one of those which he supposes to have undergone an alteration. It seems also to have varied in former times, Hevelius, in his Catalogue, differing from Flamsteed.

ART. X. On the Motion of Bodies affected by Friction. By the Rev. Samuel Vince, M. A. of Cambridge.

Though "the subject of this paper seems of considerable importance, both to the practical mechanic and speculative philosopher," yet being necessarily abstruse, and depending on experiments, propositions, and diagrams, those who are conversant with such disquisitions must be referred to the article.

ART. XI. Observations and Experiments on the Light of Bodies in a State of Combustion. By the Rev. Mr. Morgan [of Norwich].

This is a series of facts and conclusions from them, and certain data, with experiments and observations on electric and phosphoric light; for which we must also refer to the article.

ART. XII. On the Construction of the Heavens. By William Herschel, Esq. F. R. S.

Mr. Herschel here resumes this important subject, begun in a former paper (see p. 40), confirming "several parts that were before but weakly supported," and giving some "further extended hints."—"That the milky way is a most extensive stratum of stars, and that our sun is actually one of the heavenly bodies belonging to it, admit no longer of the least doubt." Having "now viewed and gaged this shining zone in almost every direction, in order to develop the ideas of the universe, suggested by" his "late observations," from a theoretical view of the heavens, he finds that the laws of attraction, "which no doubt extend to the remotest region of the fixed stars," will probably produce nebulae of several forms, in various rious combinations, great cavities or vacancies, &c. To this he states and answers objections, accounts for the occasional destruction of stars and optical appearances, and, in conclusion, shews that his theoretical view of the system of the universe "is perfectly consistent with facts, and seems to be confirmed and established by a series of observations." Annexed is, "Table I. of Star-Gages," exhibiting the right ascension, north polar distance, and the contents of the heavens, and shewing from how many fields of view the gages were deduced, with occasional memorandums, followed by a problem, and an attempt "to shew that the stupendous sidereal system we inhabit, this extensive stratum, and its secondary branch, consisting of many millions of stars*, is, in all probability, a detached nebula." The "use of the gages" is exemplified by Table II, followed by a "Section of our sidereal system, the origin of nebulous strata [the nebula we inhabit seems to have fewer marks of profound antiquity upon it than the rest], an opening in the heavens [in the body of the Scorpion], phenomena, at the Poles, of our nebula, enumeration of [ten] very compound nebulae, or milkyways, a perforated nebula, and [eight] planetary nebulae," which the author is in "doubt where to class."—Our limits will not suffer us to follow him in these extraordinary researches

"Beyond this visible diurnal sphere," in which, we fear, he will bewilder both himself and his followers.

ART. XIII. Remarks on specific Gravities, taken at different Degrees of Heat, and an easy Method of reducing them to a common Standard. By Richard Kirwan, Esq. F. R. S.

This writer has here shewn that a principal use resulting from a comparative view of the weights of equal volumes of water, and all other substances, is unattainable by a perusal of the common tables, and has pointed out a remedy for this defect.

ART. XIV. Electrical Experiments made in order to ascertain the non-conducting Power of a perfect Vacuum, &c. By Mr. William Morgan.

These experiments seem to be decisive, but cannot be rendered intelligible without a diagram, any more than Mr.

* One hundred sixteen thousand and seventy stars have passed through the field of view of Mr. Herschel's telescope in a quarter of an hour.

Brook's method of making mercurial-gages, related in a note.

ART. XV. Experiments and Observations relating to Air and Water. By the Rev. Joseph Priestley, LL. D. F. R. S.

The opinions lately advanced by Mr. Cavendish, Mr. Watt, and M. Lavoisier, the first of whom "was of opinion, that, when air is decomposed, water only is produced;" the second, "that water consists of dephlogisticated and inflammable air;" and the third, "that there is no such thing as what has been called phlogiston," are the hypotheses to which Dr. Priestley had a view in these experiments, which, he hopes, "will be an admonition to himself, as well as to others, to adhere as rigorously as possible to actual observations," and have given him occasion also candidly "to notice his own mistakes with respect to conclusions," though all the facts were strictly as he represented them." In two phlogistic processes no water was produced when the air was made to disappear; in others he found, to his surprise, that the iron which had been melted, imbibed the dephlogisticated air, gaining weight in the proportion of $7\frac{1}{2}$ to 24, &c. &c. But, without farther investigating these facts and conclusions, or entering into the calculations, we shall only add, that on the subject of "melting of iron in dephlogisticated air," the Doctor hints, in his Postscript, "that some important conclusions seem to be nearly within our reach."

This article concludes the volume, or rather Part I.

79. The Coalition; or, Family Anecdotes. A Novel. By Mrs. Boys. Dedicated, by Permission, to Mrs. Hastings. 2 Vols. 8vo.

NO political Coalition this, but one, in private life, which we can recommend to our readers as being conducted with a pasbos that is made subservient to the cause of virtue; and the situations in which the principal characters are placed, though interesting, are not improbable, a commendation that can be given to few modern novels. At the conclusion, in the author's words, we find "virtue triumphant, universally loved, esteemed, admired, and revered," and "vice sunk beneath contempt, buried in obscurity, unpitied, unregarded, tormented by mental reflections, and harrassed by mutual reproaches and revilings—but such was the fate of a COALITION!"

82. Archæologia, Vol. VII.

(Reviewed by a Correspondent.)

THIS VIIth volume opens with

I. Observations, by various authors, and professors of Oriental languages, on a pillar brought from Alexandria, and, after passing through the hands of Mr. Ames and Mr. West, by the gift of Mr. Brander, fixed in a corner of the Society's splendid meeting-room. — It proves at last to be nothing more nor less than a common head-stone to a grave.

II. Mr. Pegge, as usual, gives us some new information about antiquarian discoveries in Derbyshire.

III. A very sensible deduction of the office and authority of the Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, who is proved to be a mere spiritual officer, or delegate, of the Bishop of Ely, in whose diocese the University is. — This is a search into antiquity to some purpose, and worth all the random conjectures hashed up from the reading and invention of some other authors, who will by and by present themselves to our review. The author was the late Rev. Dr. Richardson.

IV. Mr. Barrington's Observations on Archery in England are not so copious as we have a right to expect from his extensive reading, and as the subject demands. He will, however, have the merit of reviving the science among us.

V. The late deceased President explains a non-descript seal of Richard III. when Duke of Gloucester.

VI. We have here some new and curious observations on the course of the Roman road called "The Fosseway," which Mr. Cade has continued, by actual observation, from Lincolnshire, through the county of Durham, quite into Scotland. Here, again, actual observation and description outweigh a thousand conjectures.

VII. is a Letter from the worthy archdeacon of Northumberland to his friend the writer of the preceding paper, on a Roman inscription described in the Philological Transactions, which he recovered from a cottage chimney-corner.

VIII. Mr. Bray, who makes his tours to good purpose, describes the Roman Millary found on the Leicester road, and ascertains the ancient name of Leicester to be Ratae, beyond a doubt. This millary was dug up in 1772, and this is the first authentic account of it; for as to that communicated to Mr. Urban (vol. XLIII. p. 16), it was not accompanied with a drawing, nor explained with due precision.

GENT. MAG. June, 1785.

IX. Mr. Pegge, with his usual candour, controverts his friend Brooke's ideas about the antiquity of Aldborough church, and the Saxon inscription which he had explained in vol. VI. art. 9.

X. introduces us to a new correspondent. A fair lady undertakes to gratify the Society with a minute detail of old rags dug up round a skeleton, at the depth of 12 feet, in an Irish bog. Unfortunately, they are all that remained of the immense treasures found at the same time and place. Found, did we say? we should have said, supposed to have been found. No wonder Ireland asserts her claim to independent jurisdiction, when she has such hoards of wealth, and boasts an antiquity equal to that of the Hebrews. In vain would a sceptic object, that Lady Moira borrows the dresses of the rude figures on the Gaulish temple of Montmorillon to clothe her ancestry. Can we detract so much from the good housewifery of a female antiquary, as to suppose she is unacquainted with the fashions of every age, from the fig-leaves of the first happy pair to the modern short or long apron? Critics avaunt! Ogygia must be Ophir; and if Lord M. digs up his bogs, and his steward does not lose his bundle, some future Solomon, whether he reign in Ireland or America, may "lay up gold as dust, and the gold of Ophir as the stones of the brooks." — It is presuming too much on the accuracy of Montfaucon's drawings, and more than has been allowed them on actual comparison, to deduce arguments from them for the conformity of the Irish with the Gaulish dress. But, as if this were not sufficient, the Isis of the Egyptians, and an Isis drawn by the fantastic pen of Stukeley, must be lugged in. — Who can doubt, after this, that every Chinese, Mexican, Peruvian, Sumatran, &c. with other barbarous pagods, are equally liable to be pressed into the service? We beg the fair correspondent's pardon if we doubt her intention; but, as she is of an history-writing family*, she is admirably qualified to carry on the joke. Of the extraordinary quality of peat moss to preserve bodies and clothes, we have an instance in the Philosophical Transactions, N^o 434, from Dr. Balguy, a physician at Peterborough. But that was for scarce 50 years, this for near 8 centuries.

XI. contains an account of an old coat of an Irish weaver, sent to the Society by Mr. Fox, not Charles, who would wear a more inflammable Irish habit.

XII. Mr. Barrington traces the progress of gardening from the gardens of Solomon to Mr. Walpole's Essay on the subject at the end of his fourth volume of Painters.

XIII. Mr. Pegge here illustrates the Arbour lowes, and other remains of ancient British sepulture in Derbyshire.

XIV. We launch into the wide ocean of conjecture, and, had we not Major V. for our pilot, should sail to all eternity in the wide ocean of metaphysical existence under ærial substance. To change the metaphor, were it not for the Major's "IF fixt like a petard on the portal of the Governor's argument in a hypothetical syllogism," we should be reasoned out of our reason by Nanic institutions.

XV. Larger fossil horns than any ever before known, are communicated from Ireland by Bp. Percy. Some gentlemen of the Royal and Antiquary Societies have pronounced the creature that wore them to be a non-existent animal.

XVI. Mr. Cade describes the old Roman station of VINOVIUM, now Binchester, and seems more than half inclined to deduce all local names beginning with VIN from convivial debauchery.

XVII. Mr. Pownall, or rather Mr. V's letters to him, on the early Irish antiquities, for which a Chinese coin is mistaken.

XVIII. Mr. Pegge describes a second Roman pig of lead, found in Derbyshire, near Matlock, inscribed, L. Amconi verecund. metal. Lund.

i. e. "The property of L. A. V. lead-merchant of London."

XIX. A further account of Druidical remains in Derbyshire, by Major Rooke, with draughts.

XX. Mr. Bray's remarks on the preceding article.

XXI. A brilliant memoir on the sideboards and toasts of the Romans, by

Gov. Pownall, with a touch of Egyptian mythology.

XXII. Curious discoveries of Roman pottery, &c. near Bagshot, by the Rev. Mr. Handaside.

XXIII. A Roman hypocaust, discovered near Brecknock, described by Mr. Hay.

XXIV. Mr. Pegge's observations on the ancient British chariots.

XXV. Mr. Bowle explains certain musical instruments in Le Roman de la Rose.

XXVI. Mr. Tooke, whose residence at St. Petersburg, as chaplain to the British Factory there, enables him to draw information from the fountain-head, gives a particular account of the burying-places of the ancient Tartars, with curious conjectures;—a proper supplement to the accounts before published in the II^d volume, art. 33, 34.

XXVII. A description of an ancient castle at Rouen in Normandy, built by our Henry V. and threatened with demolition by Louis XVI. By Mr. Turnor.

XXVIII. Certain excavations in the ground in Berkshire, which might be paralleled with many more in this kingdom, without going to the North Pole, have suggested to Mr. Barrington's lively fancy the idea of a British ostrac, like those at Kamtschatka.

XXIX. A very ingenious memoir on Hokeday, by the Rev. Mr. S. Denne, who seems to have exhausted the subject. From a variety of circumstances, he inclines to derive the institution of this ancient festivity from the death of Hardicanute at Lambeth. As this was the last of our sovereigns of the Danish race, and his death happened at a wedding, it is not improbable that the nation adopted this method of celebrating their deliverance from that race by that event rather than by the massacre of the Danes, 40 years before. Mr. D. very pertinently seizes the opportunity to expose the pretensions of Rowley to originality*.

XXX. With a fancy equal to that celebrated in Art. XXVIII, the pracfices of the Wiðs, Vics, Viðs, Pheachs, Pelasgians, or Smones (for they are all one and the same people), are traced into Ireland, at another ship-temple.

XXXI. Ireland has no cause to complain of her sister for non-importation of her antiquities, which crowd upon us faster than we can print them, and fill both her own Collectanea and our Archæologia. Yet the author of this paper is a respectable antiquary.

XXXII. A curious account of the subterraneous temples of Elephanta and Salset, at Bombay, of which so little notice has hitherto been taken by English travellers *.

XXXIII. (misnumbered XXXII.) Ecce iterum Crispinus! Ireland is to have the honour of setting ancient history to rights—if her antiquaries can but agree among themselves.

XXXIV. An earlier account of Elephanta, by Capt. Pyke, of the Stringer East India-man.

XXXV. A description of the pagoda of Salset, extracted from the papers of the late Governor Boon, by Mr. Le-thieullier.

XXXVI. A curious subsidy-roll of Edward III, communicated by Mr. Topham.

XXXVII. An interesting paper, by Mr. Astle, on the radical letters of the Pelasgians, and their derivatives, stating the origin and improvement of the Etruscan alphabet and language.

XXXVIII. Some new observations on the Coliseo, or Amphitheatre, of Vespasian at Rome, by Mr. Thomas Hardwick, a young English student at Rome. This paper was accompanied by an exact model of this celebrated amphitheatre in cork, made on the spot by an Italian artist.

XXXIX. Gen. Melville determines an ancient sword, found in Gloucestershire, to be Roman. It is in the possession of the Rev. Mr. James Douglas, who has taken so much pains in searching into the various sepulchral hills in this kingdom, and whose letter, with one from the Rev. Mr. Mutlow, on the same subject, make Articles

XL. and XLI.

XLII. A very curious paper, by Mr. Mariden, the Sumatran traveller, deducing the language of the Gypsies from the Hindostan, though we cannot think the comparison universally exact.

XLIII. is a collection of words in the same language, by the learned Mr. Bryant, and further comparisons with that of Hindostan.

XLIV. A skilful description of the old bridge at Rochester, illustrated from very ancient records by that able architect (we are sorry to add the late) Mr. Essex.

The volume closes with an Appendix of such miscellaneous articles as the Council, by a resolution in 1776, thought proper to publish abstracts of, accompanied with three plates. One of these represents the bronze figure of Cupid, or Mercury, found at Cirencester.

81. Elegies and Sonnets. 4to.

IN the title and subject these Elegies are similar to those of Mr. Hammond, but in originality they are much superior, it being certain that those are only translations from Tibullus. "The Roman imagery, and allusion to Roman customs and manners," so justly reprobated by Dr. Johnson in our English elegiast, are here also carefully avoided, and their place is supplied by "the personification of the Passions." The following Elegy and one Sonnet, which are not selected for superior excellence, will give an advantageous idea of the author's sentiments and versification.

82. Letters addressed to Mrs. Bellamy, occasioned by her "Apology." By Edward Willett.

WE have not entered into the particulars of Mr. Woodward's affairs, as related by Mrs. Bellamy, nor will we now, farther than to say, that this gentleman, who acted as solicitor to his executors, thinking himself aggrieved by her representation, has here given one far different, stating that, contrary to her assertions, he settled "a regular account" 15 April, 1783, and received the balance; that he refused to make her will, though she had left him 20l.; that he advised the executors to advance the money to reverse her outlawry; that, instead of "voluntarily involving what was bequeathed to her

"in law-suits," he obtained a decree in chancery against Mr. Barry's executrix for 754l. 10s. due to Mr. Woodward; that, instead of receiving only 59l. of his effects, she has received 619l. 13s. &c. &c.; and, in short, that she has been "distressed, ill-treated, and depressed," not by him and his clients, but "by her own duplicity, unprincipled behaviour, and unjustifiable extravagances."

83. Memoirs of George Anne Bellamy, including all her Intrigues; with genuine Anecdotes of all her public and private Connections, By a Gentleman of Covent Garden Theatre, fm. 8vo.

Mutato nomine iantum. This Gentleman, as he calls himself, has taken a most unwarrantable advantage of a distressed lady, and has also grossly imposed on the credulous publick, by pirating the most striking incidents in Mrs. B.'s Apology, without adding a single fact, or a single acknowledgment; and thus compressing her five volumes into one—unus et idem. Such a wretched catchpenny needs only be known to be universally exploded.

84. An Apology for the Life of George Anne Bellamy, &c. &c. Vol. VI. 8vo.

More last words, or "fragments," as the writer styles them, dedicated to a "most generous unknown benefactor." They consist of several anecdotes which escaped her remembrance, ses souvenirs, as the French would term them, and a few "unintentioned errors" are corrected. Mrs. Godfrey's "insensibility and critical recovery," (see p. 206) having been questioned by some, is here confirmed by the authority of "the present Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge," in a pamphlet which he published in 1757.—Mrs. Bellamy, on recollection, has fixed her birth to "1731," instead of "1733." And she now remembers that she played Miss Prue at Covent Garden before she played Monimia. Of Quin and Garrick she gives the following anecdote: "After Garrick's performance of Othello, a gentleman called in upon Mr. Quin to give him an account of it; when the latter, with the utmost good humour, exclaimed, 'You must be mistaken, my dear friend; the little man could not appear as the Moor, he must rather look like Desdemona's little

Dr. Peckard.

"Black

"black boy that attends her tea-kettle." This, in our opinion, is a good story marred in the telling. At least, that which we remember to have heard, and believe to be true, is this: When Garrick undertook the part of the Moor, he said to a friend, "When I appear in 'Othello, if Quin is in the house, I suppose he will say, Here's Pompey—' where's the tea-kettle?' in apt allusion to Hogarth's print. That Quin called him "Master Jacky Brute, and "not Sir Job," is certain.—The following impromptu of Lord Chesterfield's to Lady Ely, on her appearing at court, on the anniversary of the battle of the Boyne, in white satin, with orange-coloured ribbons, "has not been hackneyed:"

"Pretty rebel, where's the jest
"Of wearing orange on your breast,
"When that breast does still disclose
"The whiteness of the rebel rose?"

Our apologist in this volume appears in one new character, that of a poetess.—One of her essays is

"On bearing the Rev. Mr. ARCHER'S "Discourse in Advent.

"While thy sweet voice announces truths
"divine,

"We feel our God in his disciple shine.

"Proceed, great Seer, in moderation's plan,

"To serve thy Maker in reclaiming man:

"Thy lenient words transfixes in the heart,

"Thou first of Archers, for we bless the "dart."

As a "first essay," we will not cavil at the two words in Italics, though, on such a subject, we could have dispensed with a pun. The letter in which this occurs contains also a disquisition on earthquakes, occasioned by some interesting particulars of the catastrophe at Lisbon in 1755, communicated by Mrs. B.'s brother, Capt. O'Hara. But the instance she mentions of the "Tower of Siloam" would have warranted the opposite deduction, viz. that the Portuguese were not sinners above all other nations, and that the cruelties exercised by those bigots did not "draw down" upon them this mark of the divine "displeasure." I tell you, Nay, &c. This, however, shews, that our author, though a Catholic, is not a bigot.—Another of her poems is "To the Rev. Mr. Wharton," of Worcester, we suppose, (see p. 448).—The story (told by Foote) of long Sir Thomas Robinson (as he was called) being mistaken, in France, for le fameux Robinson Crusoe, we have often heard related, but not of him. The "rich financier," to whom "his sister was married," was Mr. Knight, the cashier.—Another letter begins with solemn "Reflections on my "Pillow," worthy of Madam Guyon (misprinted Gynon), and concludes with "Phyllis, a Pastoral," in Mrs. Bellamy's praise, by Mr. Cunningham.—The account of the late King's receiving the news of the battle of Culloden at the theatre, though a good story, can hardly be a true one, as Lord Bury, who brought the express, arrived, the Gazette says, in the morning.

We cannot enter farther into the unconnected but amusing incidents, here interspersed, of peers and players, the late Duke of Grafton, Miss Gummings, the Cibbers, Mossop, &c. but must add, that it gives us pleasure to hear, that, though "the emolument she reaped" from the sale of the former volumes," being applied towards satisfying her creditors, she has lately been twice arrested for fresh debts, and at length extricated by several noble and generous benefactors, here named, and that she has "every prospect of being comfortably situated for life."—Of a certain "publication" against her (reviewed above) the author, she says, is "too much below contempt for her to bestow a thought upon" it. "Let the gall'd jade wince, our withers are unwrung."—And she has "every hope to be rescued from his power."—Annexed are some benevolent anonymous letters to her, with two from a Shepey curate, who signs himself "William Thomas Hervey," (but who gives us no high idea of his erudition by confounding Telephus, king of Mysia, with the Telephus of Horace, or of his bien seance by calling a certain prelate "Silenus;") "The Seasons, a Dramatic Entertainment," by the late Mr. Woodward," on the plan of the "Seasons" in the Spectator, and several encomiums on the former volumes of the "Apology," taken from the Reviews and Magazines.

85. Remarks upon the History of the Landed and Commercial Policy of England, from the Invasion of the Romans to the Accession of James the First. 2 Vols. 8vo.

THIS work contains "Remarks upon the landed and commercial policy," 1. of the ancient Britons, 2. of the Britons under the Roman government, 3. of England under the Anglo-Saxon government, and, 4. of England, from the Norman Conquest to the reign

"reign of Elizabeth." The author confines himself to such laws and customs as had the greatest influence on agriculture, commerce, and the state of the people, and has collected such particulars as relate to his subject from various voluminous histories. In this he has displayed much reading, and no less judgment. His work therefore deserves an attentive perusal of those intelligent gentlemen, senators, and merchants, who study the landed and commercial interest of their country, and who wish to have a fuller insight into the difficulties and discouragements which each of them, in its turn, has encountered, and to investigate the gradual improvements that they have made in the several reigns through which this writer has marked their progress. Some of the greatest and most important improvements in agriculture appear to have been made towards the end of the reign of Henry VII, when the obstacles to them were removed by weakening the power of the barons, and industry was farther encouraged in the reign of his successor by the dissolution of the monasteries, and the lands gradually felt the change that was made by the increase of manufactures and commerce. But, however interesting, so various and detached are the particulars here introduced, that we cannot pretend to analyse or discuss them. Suffice it to say, that those who have leisure and talents for such enquiries will think themselves amply repaid by the perusal.

86. The Duties of the Parochial Clergy considered, in a Charge delivered to the Clergy of the Diocese of Bangor, at the Primary Visitation held in the Months of August and September, 1784. By John Lord Bishop of Bangor. To which is added, An Appendix, containing Directions concerning the Instruments proper to be brought for obtaining Orders, &c. Together with some other Matters.*

THE Bishop enforces, with great good sense and moderation, the usual parochial duties of the parochial clergy, pre-supposing constant residence; with a few exceptions allowed by law and conscience. "But if it should so happen," concludes his Lordship, "that they neglect their important charge, and so demean themselves as to dishonour God, disgrace religion, and give just cause of offence to those who are under their care, what is to be done then? The answer is easy. They "are liable to heavy penalties, which it is the business of the Ordinary to inflict, as well as to correct all such irregularities. And this would naturally bring me to enquire into the power and authority of the Diocesan; but as I shall, I hope, never have occasion to proceed to a rigorous exertion of any part of the power vested in me, I shall wave this enquiry for the present, and add nothing more but my most earnest prayers," &c.— Besides the usual Directions and Instruments in Ecton and Burn, the Appendix contains an Act for the better Maintenance of Curates, 12 Anne, Stat. 2. c. 12, an Abstract of an Act to promote the Residence of the Parochial Clergy, &c. 17 Geo. III. c. 53, and A Schedule containing the Forms of the several Instruments required in the Execution of it.

87. Memoirs of a Pythagorean. In Three Volumes. Sm. 8vo.

WE only name this work to caution our readers against it, and to intimate our surprise that a bookseller of character should affix his name to such gross indecencies. Qui capit, ille facit.— He who prints or publishes such trash makes it his own.

ODE for His MAJESTY'S BIRTHDAY.

JUNE 4, 1785.

WRITTEN BY THE REV. T. WARTON,
POET LAUREAT.

AND SET TO MUSICK BY MR. STANLEY, MASTER OF THE KING'S BAND.

I.

TRUE Glory scorns the pride of war,
Nor sits in Conquest's echoing car,
Nor bids the sword her bays bequeath,
Nor stains with blood her brightest wreath;
No plumed host her tranquil triumphs own;
Nor spoils of murder'd multitudes she brings
To swell the state of her distinguish'd Kings,
And deck her chosen throne.

On that fair throne, to Britain dear,
With the flow'ring olive twin'd,
High she hangs the hero's spear;
And there, with all the palms of peace combin'd,

Her unpolluted hands the milder trophy rear.
To Kings like these, her genuine theme,
The Muse a blameless homage pays;
To GEORGE, of Kings like these supreme,
She wishes honour'd length of days,
Nor prostitutes the tribute of her lays.

II.

'Tis his to bid neglected genius glow,
And teach the regal bounty how to flow.
His tutelary scepter's sway
The vindicated Arts obey,

And hail their Patron-King:
'Tis his, to judgement's steady line
Their flights fantastic to confine,
And yet expand their wing:
The fleeting forms of Fashion to restrain,
And bind capricious Taste in Truth's eternal chain.

Sculpture, licentious now no more,
From Greece her great example takes;
With Nature's warmth the marble wakes,
And spurns the toys of modern lore:
In native beauty, simply plann'd,
Corinth, thy tufted shafts ascend;
The Graces guide the Painter's hand,
His magic mimicry to blend.

III.

While such the gifts his reign bestows,
Amid the proud display,

Those gems around the throne he throws
That shed a softer ray:

While from the summits of sublime renown
He wafts his favour's universal gale,

With those sweet flowers he binds a crown
That bloom in Virtue's humble vale:

With rich munificence the nuptial tie
Unbroken he combines:—

Conspicuous, in a Nation's eye,
The sacred pattern shines!

Fair Science to reform, reward, and raise;
To spread the lustre of domestic praise;

To foster emulation's holy flame;

To build society's majestic frame;

Mankind to polish and to teach,

Be this the Monarch's aim;

Above Ambition's giant-reach

The Monarch's need to claim.

GEN T. MAE. JUNE, 1785.

O D E,

PERFORMED ON THE 4th OF JUNE, 1785, BEING THE ANNIVERSARY OF HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY, AT THE CASTLE OF DUBLIN.

CHORUS.

CONCORD, lovely child of Heav'n,
To whom the signal grace was giv'n
To bind our hearts with sympathetic chain!
Thy kindest influence now infuse,
Inspire, support the votive Muse,
To hail an added year of Brunswick's reign!

RECITATIVE, accompanied.

On fair Creation's hallow'd day
Nature felt thy parent sway;
Thy voice the list'ning planets heard,
And mov'd oobsequious to thy word;
Earth, water, fire, and restless wind,
By thee to sep'rate bounds confin'd,
Their stated place and course maintain,
Exulting in thy equal reign.

AIR.

On Man, when Passion's lawless band,
Spleen, Jealousy, and Hate, molest,
Mild Goddess, lay thy healing hand,
And sooth the throbbings of his breast.

RECITATIVE.

O bid each jarring sound of tumult cease,
And link contiguous shores in harmony and peace!

DUET.

Children of one parent sprung,
Then their kindred-duty show,
When, the toils of life among,
Each adopts another's woe.

AIR.

Chiefly, mortals, learn to weigh
What woes invade a Monarch's breast;
Bedim fair day's benignant ray,
Disturb the silent gloom of rest!

CHORUS.

What mingled cares his moments must in-thral,
Who thinks, and hopes, and fears, and feels for ALL!

RECITATIVE.

Bid then each jarring sound of tumult cease,
And link contiguous shores in harmony and
peace!

So may the festal song in lively bound,
With equal joy, from shore to shore resound.

CHORUS.

Concord, lovely child of Heav'n,
To whom the signal grace was giv'n,
To bind our hearts with sympathetic chain!
Thy kindest influence now infuse,
Inspire, support the votive Muse,
To hail an added year of BRUNSWICK'S reign!

SONNET

S O N N E T *.

THE rose had been wash'd, just wash'd in a shower,
That Mary to Anna convey'd,
The plentiful moisture encumber'd the flower,
And weigh'd down its beautiful head.

The cup was all fill'd, and the leaves were all wet,
And it seem'd to a fanciful view
To weep for the buds it had left with regret
On the flourishing bush where it grew.

I hastily seiz'd it, unfit as it was
For a nosegay, so dripping and drown'd,
And swinging it rudely, too rudely, alas!
I snapp'd it—it fell to the ground.

And such, I exclaim'd, is the pitiless part
Some act by the delicate mind,
Regardless of wringing and breaking a heart
Already to sorrow resign'd.

This elegant rose, had I shaken it less,
Might have bloom'd with the owner awhile—
And the tear that is wip'd with a little address
May be follow'd perhaps by a smile. W.C.

To the Memory of the Rev. Mr. VINCENT PERRONET †, WHO,

After having been Vicar of the Parish of Shoreham, in Kent, more than LVII Years,
DIED ON MAY 9, 1785, ÆTAT. SUE XCII.

RIPEN'D by age—but more matur'd by
grace,
At once to close his labours and his race,
The MAN of GOD, high fix'd on PISGAH's top,
Survey'd the prospect, as he felt its hope;
With eye reflective view'd the seasons past,
The world's vast NOTHING, and its end-at
last.
His former labours, and his ceaseless pains,
His toil unwearied, as minute its gains;
Now deep revolv'd, he longs his CHARGE
to meet,
And cast his mission at the MASTER's feet.

From earth he springs—while Prophets gone before [shore,
Stretch their wide arms to land him on the Where smiling hosts the Patriarch-guest surround, [ground,
Mount on the car, and bear him from the
Thus, bright attended, see him soar on high,
Borne, as on wings, beyond CREATION's
sky.

When brought in sight of the eternal throne,
Lightning he sail'd to HIM that sits thereon:

Behold! a voice from out the MERCY-SEAT
Bids straight—"Arise, and stand, as on thy

"That crown be thine, by thee its honours worn, [borne."

"Whose patient arm my weightier cross has There, next to SERAPHS, and perhaps still higher,

With beams of light, and of distinguish'd fire,
Shall shine, as glowing with superior flame,
The PROPHET's mantle and his diadem.
And there, the sweeter rapture to impart,
Who, next his GOD, lay nearest to his heart,
Shall SHE be found—a MOTHER, long no
more.

But earlier call'd from TIME's morbid shore,
Where too shall stand, if HOPE can feel its ground, [found.

A num'rous offspring with the PATRIARCH
Amazing LOVE! its lot, my SOUL, betime, To shine with STARS—where STARS for ever shine!

A PICTURE OF ARRAN MANNERS.

A TRUE STORY.

FROM Ireland once, in search of knowledge,

A Student came to Edna college,
Where, when he had been long,
Again he wanted to repass
The channel—not on horse of brass,
Balloon, or dragon strong;

But in a common trading ship,
Which soon the sailors did equip,
And with fair wind set sail:
But ah! ere they had gotten far,
The elements began to jar,
And adverse blew the gale.

Loud roar'd the wind among the shrubs,
High swell'd the waves, dark were the clouds,
And heavy was the rain;
Rapt rose the water in the hold,
This way and that their eyes they roll'd,
And sought a port to gain.

The isle of Arran rose to view;
The ship got in,—glad were the crew;—
Here various huts they found;
But, ah! they could procure no meat,
Or little else that they could eat,
For barren was the ground.

Our Student left the ship and shore,
Th' interior regions to explore,
And see what they 'd afford;
If haply food of any kind,
Or fowls, or eggs, he there might find,
To store their scanty board.

Ere long he found a little cot,
Where ten or twelve fresh eggs he got;
And, lest he these should break,

He wisely did some straw provide,
And in his handkerchief them tied,
Then on his stick did take.

Yet still these eggs were all too few
To satisfy a whole ship's crew,—
Some more he fain would find:
A little farther on he spied
A few thatch'd hamlets scatter'd wide,—
To reach these he'd a mind.

But soon a river cross'd his way,
And forc'd him on its brink to stay,
While it roll'd on amain,
Fed by innumerable rapid hills,
Which tumbled from the neighbouring hills,
Swell'd by the heavy rain.

Upon the margin of the flood,
Deep lost in thought, awhile he stood,
Nor wist he what to do:
With anxious eye he look'd around,
No bridge he saw, no steps he found—
How was he to get through?

The River God, with ardent prayer,
He thrice invoc'd him 'cross to bear;
No River God appear'd;
Eor he lay slumbering in the mud,
Nor rais'd his head, as sure he wou'd
If he the prayer had heard.

Tho' disappointed and perplex'd,
Still he had hope, invoking next
The Goddess of the Isle:
With joy he found this latest prayer
Was not dispers'd in empty air—
The Goddess deign'd to smile.

Then quickly two of her fair train
Came barefoot tripping o'er the plain,
Th' imploring youth to aid:
One of the Maids tuck'd up her clothes,
Nor blish'd her well-form'd limbs t' expose,
But straight across did wade.

The student gaz'd with glad surprize,
And scarce could credit his own eyes,
But thought 'twas all a dream.
"What shall I do, sweet nymph?" he said:
"Come on my back," replied the maid:
Thus safe he pass'd the stream.

Ye lovely fair, by fashion dress'd,
Whose snowy limbs full robes invest,
Be not too rash to blame
This friendly act:—The Arran Maid,
In virgin innocence array'd,
Was free from guilty shame.

PROLOGUE TO CARACTACUS.

BY MR. TOOLE—A YOUTH OF SIXTEEN.
ACTED AT VELSTED-SCHOOL, ESSEX
APRIL 16, 1785.

PROLOGUES by ancient custom lead the way,
And in due order usher in the play;
As powder'd footmen run before the coach,
And thunder at the door my Lord's approach.

Our humble Theatre must dare disown
All the gay pageantry that charms the town:
No paper seas, no thunder from the skies,
No witches to descend, no ghosts to rise;
No grand processions, long-extended scenes,
All heaven at once descending in machines;
No magic art, no "slipper'd Pantaloon,"
Not ev'n Lunardi in his air balloon,
The eye shall dazzle here: begone, each art
That fetters genius, or contracts the heart!
Our Stage-scholastic, spurning tricks like
these,
Would rouse by action, by instruction
please,
And brings a British tale by Britain's Sophocles.

We set before you, what you all admire,
The cause of liberty, that sacred fire—
Which Britain's gallant sons, with honest rage,
Has warm'd to boldest deeds in every age.
That fire which, Britain's earliest annals
show,

To latest time in British hearts shall glow.
See our great hero, with a god-like zeal,
Undaunted struggling for his country's weal;
In vain his efforts—Rome's victorious hand Spreads her proud banners o'er the conquer'd land.

Yet pity brave Caractacus's fate:
He fails—'tis heaven's decree—but still is great.

If to aid Virtue, and to shame the age
From Vice's fatal lures, becomes the stage,
Oh, may our efforts in fair Virtue's cause
Receive the sanction of your kind applause!
Though art be wanting, and our talents fail,
Indulge th' attempt in justice to the tale.

V E R S E S,

OCCASIONED BY SEEING A PAINTING, BY SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS,
OF

LOVE UNLOOSING THE ZONE OF BEAUTY.

FANN'D by the summer's gentlest wind,
Within the shade a nymph reclin'd.
As on her neck they artless stray'd,
The zephyrs with her tresses play'd;
A careless vest around her thrown
Was girded with an azure zone;
Her figure shone replete with grace,—
She seem'd—the Goddess of the place.
The soothing murmur of the rill,
The plumed warbler's tenderest trill,
The perfum'd air, the flow'ry ground,
Spread a delicious languor round;
Her swelling breast new tremors move,
And all her melting soul was Love.
Cupid saw her soft alarms,
And flew insidious to her arms;
The little God she warmly prest,
And ruin in his form carest;
For, by indulgence hardy grown,
He slyly loos'd her guardian zone.
Virtue saw the sleight, and sigh'd—
"Beware, beware, fond nymph!" she cry'd:
"Behold

"Behold where yonder thorny flow'r,
 "Smiling in summer's radiant hour,
 "With out-stretch'd wing a painted fly
 "In thoughtless pleasure flutters nigh,
 "Nor heedless sees, beneath the brake,
 "The jaws of a devouring snake."

The nymph look'd up,—with conscience
 flush'd,

And, as she ty'd her zone, she blush'd.
 It chanc'd that Genius, passing by,
 Remark'd the scene with eager eye:
 Then, with the tint from Virtue stole,
 With Reynolds' pencil sketch'd the whole.

R. B. C.

S O N N E T,

ADDRESSED TO LADY CATHERINE POWLET.

THO' Fashion, proud of such an envy'd
 part,

May wreaths prepare more worthy charms
 like thine;

Yet disdain not him whose humble art
 A rural garland thus has tried to twine.

Of violets 'tis made, that first appear,
 Type of thy maiden sweets and early worth;

Of jasmine, like thy virtue, white and clear,
 That needs no sun to draw its blossoms
 forth;

And blooming roses, bath'd in gentle dew,
 That best of all the vernal flowery race,
 Express both loveliness and pity too,
 Like the soft lustre of thy beauteous face.

O! blest, to whom those looks propitious
 prove;

Who myrtle boughs may add, the symbol sweet of love.

S. E.

FAREWELL ADDRESS,

INTENDED TO HAVE BEEN SPOKEN AT
 MRS. BELLAMY'S BENEFIT. (See p. 449.)

WRITTEN BY MR. C. STUART,
 AUTHOR OF GREYNA GREEN, &c. &c.

A WOE-WORN heroine in me you spy:

Pardon my foibles—oh, indulge this sigh!
 It is the sigh of gratitude to you;
 Drawn from misfortune and misconduct too.
 Had I possess'd the worldly prudent art,
 Had I possess'd a cold unfeeling heart,
 Felt for myself more than for others' woes—
 I should not long have felt distressing throes:
 But in some calm retreat have pass'd my age,
 Undoom'd to fret my hour upon the stage!

Once a saint star in the theatric sky,
 When Garrick and his Cibber blaz'd on high!

Cooing like turtles, billing like the dove,
 Barry and I bore off the palm of love.—
 Like Cleopatra then the world I trod;
 For bare reign'd Love's luxurious little God!

[Pressing her hand to her breast.

But vain these vaunts and egotisms pass;
 "To this complexion I am come at last."

Ye gen'rous friends, that here appear tonight,

Fill'd with compassion, oh, sublime delight!
 In me frail Folly's victim now behold,
 Without a shelter, comfortless and old!
 But what Apology can I well give
 For living long, not learning how to live?
 Ah, none! Infirmary's my only plea.
 Mortals yourselves, like mortals, feel for
 me.

Oh, if my artless, serio-comic pen,
 Save but one female from the snares of men,
 My checquer'd life not sadly I'd deplore,
 In hopes my woes may rescue many more—
 Yet o'er my exit ere the curtain fall, Let my most heart-felt thanks be giv'n to
 all.—

A tear must drop at my Dramatic Death,
 Since 'tis the prologue to my latest breath.—

[Curtseys.

I can no more—but may this night's good
 deed

Pluck from my bosom all the thorns of need;
 And, oh! may you be blest for what you gave,—

A kind and easy passport to the grave!

A GENTLEMAN IN THE CITY, RE-CEIVING A GROUP OF FLOWERS,
 PAINTED BY MISS BRANHAM, WROTE THE FOLLOWING.

ONE day, in a sweet and frolicsome mood,

Dame NATURE, not erring, though out of her way,

By chance did on my busy mansion intrude:
 I star'd, and I blush'd, at a loss what to say.

She, noting surprize which my looks did betray,

In a good-natur'd tone thus pleasingly said,
 "This group 's of the best I have seen all the day:

Whence call'd you the flowers of which it is made?

Not a garden, or field, which I have sup-vey'd,

Can equal or vie with this nosegay of June.
 I pronounce it the best (if I am not betray'd)
 'Mongst all of my flowers of eve, morn, or noon."

'Tis, Madam, your ladyship's great condescension

In giving to BRANHAM such singular merits;

'Twill sharpen her genius, enliven invention,
 When you thus encourage the taste she inherits.'

"Ah! what says this saucy, this impudent
 boy,

Who ventures thus boldly on me to impose?

Think

Think ye I'll let BRANAM her pencil employ,
To pluck from my bosom this delicate rose !
When Holland and France have often attempted,
And Italy's genius hath ventur'd to try ;
I laugh'd, and I left them, from favour exempted ;
While this northern island thus dares me defy.

How I long this bold, vent'rous hussy to beat !
How I tremble her art-pleasing pencil to spoil !
I never before saw such subtil deceit ;
It makes my mind frantic, my blood to recoil.

Thus, amid so much smoke with soot and sea-coal,
So daring with my sendest labours to vie !
With impunity robb'd !—I am pierc'd to the soul :
'Tis therefore high time that Dame NATURE should die ! E. B.

TRANSLATION

LATIN EPITAPH ON MR. SPURRELL, in p. 308.

UNLEARN'D, uncultivated was this wight,
He could not write, read, reason, spell, indite ;
Heir to no man ; no gamester ; nor did he Traverse, for Indian wealth, an Indian sea ;
Vers'd in no liberal arts, with ceaseless toil
He bright'ned harrows in the furrow'd soil ;
He plough'd, he sow'd, he barter'd, and he bought ;
He got a large estate—the thing he sought ;
He worship'd God ; with him a written deed
Was useless, " word and honour " was his creed.

His house almost an hermitage—yet he
Was not devoid of Christian charity :
The poor, the servant, here no tyrant saw ;
The law of kindness was the master's law :
Friendship was his, not that of modern days,
Gem of mock lustre, and of mimic rays.
Onward he look'd—two orphan boys he found,
In blood allied, and by affection bound ;
His their joint fortune now, full fifty thousand pound.

Learn hence what thrift and industry can do ;
Th' example is for all, for me and you :
Learn hence, that thrift and industry can give

To all the manner and the means to live.

DAMNONIENSIS.

* * * J. W. N.'s Translation of the above Epitaph is received ; but, being rather too diffuse, the above has been preferred.

MR. URBAN,

JUN 8.

I DO not believe the following Verses have ever appeared in print ; but I am not certain of it. They were written by the worthy Dr. Johnson, in his younger days, at the request of Mrs. Porter, his future wife. If they have not appeared, I do not doubt but you will esteem them worthy of a place in your Magazine. B. W.

DR. JOHNSON UPON FRIENDSHIP.

FRIENDSHIP ! peculiar boon of heav'n,
The noble mind's delight and pride,
To Men and Angels only giv'n,
To all the lower world deny'd ;

While Love, a stranger to the blest,
Parent of thousand wild desires,
The human and the savage breast
Inflames alike with raging fires.

With bright, but oft destructive gleams,
Alike o'er all his lightnings fly ;
Thy lambent glories only beam
Around the fav'rites of the sky.

Directress of the brave and just,
O guide me through life's darksome way,
And let the tortures of mistrust
On selfish bosoms only prey.

Thy gentle flows of guiltless joys
On fools and villains ne'er descend ;
In vain for thee the monarch sighs,
And hugs a flatterer for a friend.

When Virtues kindred Virtues meet,
And sister souls together join,
Thy pleasures, permanent as great,
Are all transporting, all divine.

Oh, must their ardours cease to glow
When souls to blissful climes remove
What rais'd our Virtues here below,
Shall aid our Happiness above. S. J.

R O N D E A U,

SET BY MR. HOOK, AND SUNG BY MRS. WETCHELL, AT VAUXHALL.

WHEN the soul is worn with grief,
And has lost its old delight,
Time will bring its sure relief,
Other joys appear in sight.
Sweet oblivion comes in-aid,
Present pleasures glad the view,
Former scenes no more invade,
All is grateful, all is new.
What we lost, we don't deplore ;
All is fled, like clouds in June ;
Memory haunts the mind no more ;
Soon the heart is put in tune.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

THE preparations for war are all at once suspended, and have given place to the improvements of commerce.

The Ministers of the Court of Madrid, breaking through the narrow policy of an exclusive commerce, are actually employed in digesting a plan for opening a trade between the western coast of South America and foreign nations, by constituting therein three free ports. We hear the plan has already gone so far, that these ports are actually named; viz. Baldicia in Chili, Bonaventure Bay in New Granada, and Cinalme in New Mexico. All this, it is said, has been effected by an application lately made by the British Minister, at the instance of some merchants of London, for a partial renewal of the Asiento Treaty, by which a British ship was annually permitted to trade with the Spanish dominions in the South Seas: How that trade was dropped by the South Sea Company is well known.

They have also, after the example of France (see p. 394) established a new East India Company: the ordinance relative thereto is dated the 28th of April. The amount of their capital is to be 30 millions of livres, of which the Caracas Company, which is re-united to it, is to furnish nine, the King five, the Bank of Madrid three, and the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands a similar sum. The remaining 10,000,000 are to be divided into shares of 1000 livres each. The company will be charged with the equipment of the merchant ships destined for Spanish America, where they will carry the merchandize necessary for that country, and receive in exchange piafters, corn, and fruits, which they are to carry to the Philippines, where they will purchase the goods of India and China. The King permits to all nations the free entrance into all the ports of the Philippines. The company will have there a Council of Administration; and there is to be another established at Manilla, and one at Madrid, with which the other two are to correspond.

The Empress of Russia has ordered a new expedition to be undertaken, in order to extend the discoveries already made by different navigators of the Empire. Lieut. Col. Bleumer is to have the command, and will take with him several persons skilled in different arts: they will embark at the mouth of the river Anadir, and will sail from thence to those parts where former navigators have discovered inhabited islands advantageously situated about the 64th degree of latitude, and with whom a fur trade is already established. The Colonel will double the cape of Tschurky, and, coming down the straits which separate Siberia from America, will pursue his voyage as far as the 74th degree of latitude, or farther, if he finds it practicable.

The Emperor appears equally attentive to promote the trade and manufactures of his subjects, and to extend their commerce; but this monarch seems to be unfortunate in his commercial schemes. Not to mention the failure of the Asiatic Company of Ostend, the trade undertaken by the way of the Danube to the Black-sea, far from turning to advantage, has been attended with considerable loss. His Imperial Majesty is, notwithstanding, indefatigable in his endeavours to promote industry. There are no less than 24 new manufactures established in his hereditary dominions, besides a new hospital erected in Vienna, to which all beggars are sent to work; besides workshops in the suburbs, where all who are able and willing to work may find employment.

The galleons from the Spanish settlements in South America have brought home this year in pearls to the amount of 1,200,000 livres, and about the same value in emeralds, with more than two millions of amethysts and other precious stones; add to these, more than two millions in skins cochineal, and indigo; besides large sums in gold, silver, and valuables. There is, however, an account from St. Domingo, of the loss of the Sanctorum, a rich ship from Lima, on board of which there were diamonds of great value. A frigate lately arrived from Vera Cruz, and one from Guyara; a packet also at Cadiz from Carthage, and a brigantine from Honduras; these vessels brought 947,516 crowns, two cases of pearls, a quantity of cocoa, cotton, hides, and other valuable merchandizes.

The ships of Denmark, now in the East Indies, amount to 31 in number. The Asiatic Company expect five of them from China, and four from India; the West-India Company expect three from East-India; the Baltic Company two; that of the Canal one; and divers houses of commerce 16.

During the course of the last year, the number of vessels that entered the Tagus was, 357 Portuguese; 11 Spanish; 89 French; 252 English; 77 Dutch; 80 Swedish; 30 Danish; 3 Russian; 10 Austrian; 23 American; 18 Venetian; 12 Ragusians; 6 Prussians; 11 Hamburgers; 2 from Bremen; 1 from Genoa; 1 from Dantzig; 1 from Lubec; 1 from Naples; and one from the Morea.

Though the news from abroad has lately been of the pacific kind, yet suspicions have arisen, as if some secret enterprize was in view. Two squadrons arming, one at Brest and the other at Cadiz, cannot but excite the jealousy of other powers; and it is said, a frigate has been placed to observe the motions of the one: and the frequent dispatches from Gibraltar leave no room to doubt that a watchful eye is kept over the other.

EAST INDIA ADVICES.

Letters lately received from the East Indies deserve attention: among others, one from Bombay,

Bombay, which, when compared with that from Gov. Hastings, written from Lucknow (see p. 18.) will not appear destitute of probability. It is as follows; an event has lately taken place among the Country Powers, which may be productive of consequences to the East India Company, of which no man can foretell the issue, as it has thrown power into the hands of Mata jee Scindia, a friend of the English. Hearing that two of the Chiefs, or Princes, under the King of Dehli, had quarrelled, he joined one of them, and it was agreed between him and one Chief, that they should attack the other in the morning; but the evening preceding the intended attack the Chief, which Scindia had joined, was assassinated in his tent, of course the attack was postponed. Scindia had address enough to prevail upon the officers belonging to the assassinated Chief to continue with him, though it was supposed that he had been the cause of the death; and in a few days he obliged the other party to lay down their arms, and surrender to him, by which means he has got possession of one of the largest countries in the East, and reduced the King of Delhi to a mere cypher: and should he now take a part against the East India Company, he will be a most formidable enemy. Add to the above, the following mysterious advices from India, by the way of France: "We cannot yet rightly understand what passed in India last Autumn. We are assured, that Trinquemale is in the possession of the French, whose Squadron still anchors in the road of that factory, and that M. de Pennus, menacing the English forces, has obliged them to retire. The latter, it is said, are gone to Pondicherry, where they have landed their troops, under the orders of General Macartney, who has entered that city, and is settled there. He has not made any prisoners, and seems to share with Comte de Buffy the rights of government, and the power of receiving the subsidies. M. de Buffy hath committed no acts of violence, knowing that the greatest part of the inhabitants are devoted to the English policy. He hath sent a frigate to France; and his complaints, having reached the court, have been communicated to the Duke of Dorset: the Court of London, it is said, have disavowed the proceedings of a certain Gentleman, and has recalled him, that an enquiry may be made into his conduct." This certain Gentleman is now arrived, and no doubt will explain the above as well as many other mysterious particulars with which the Public has long been amused. Nothing, however, has yet transpired, but much may be expected.

AMERICAN INTELLIGENCE.

The meeting of Congress for the present year is at New York, where it is now sitting, and have under deliberation the appointment of consuls to several of the European powers for the advancement of trade, particularly at Genoa, Leghorn, Constantinople, Denmark, and Lisbon.

The Hon. J. Atlee, Francis Johnson, and Arthur Lee, Esqrs. commissioners of the United States for Indian affairs, are returned to Philadelphia, after having effected an honourable peace with the different Indian nations. It is said, they have obtained a very advantageous cession of territory.

The Dutch Consul, M. Valkhem -bt, has made a proposal to Congress, for the establishment of a Dutch colony at the Four Indian Pass on the North River, which it is thought will be accepted.

Congress resolved, on the 12th of April, that 700 troops should be raised for the term of three years, for the defence of the North-Western frontiers, &c. to be provided for by several States, in proportion to their supposed abilities.

IRELAND.

From the best authority we learn, that the goods and manufactures of this kingdom are received in Portugal on the same terms with those of Britain.

On the 8th of June there was a review in the Phoenix Park, Dublin, before General Ld Charlemont, of the City and County corps of Volunteers, strengthened by the junction of several country corps, in number about 1200. They made a fine appearance, and went through their exercise with great exactness.

SCOTLAND.

At a meeting of the Merchants Company at Edinburgh, it was unanimously resolved, That the tax upon shops was a bad tax; and to request the Lord Provost and Magistrates to instruct their Members to oppose it.

At a meeting of the Faculty of Advocates, held at the requisition of several respectable inhabitants, to take into consideration the bill, lately introduced into parliament, for lessening the number of Scots judges, it was unanimously agreed to write to their Dean (probably Mr. Dundas) to stop any farther proceedings upon it, till the faculty should have time to deliberate upon it.

A sloop from Fifeshire, loaded with lime-shells for Carron, sunk a few weeks ago in Leith-roads. The lime getting water, swelled to such a degree as to burst the vessel, and she went down directly. The man and two boys that navigated her were saved by a vessel in sight.

Neal M'Lean, condemned for uttering forged notes on the Glasgow arms Bank, was executed there on the fourth of June. He appeared penitent, but to the last could not be convinced of the heinousness of his crime.

A great tumult began on the 4th instant at Edinburgh. In the evening, the people got together in crowds, on pretence of celebrating his Majesty's birth-day; but in fact so shew their resentment to some of their fellow-citizens who had offended them. It was quelled, however, with much less damage than mobs usually are in that city.

COUNTRY NEWS.

The following article having appeared in Lloyd's Evening Post, and from thence having been transcribed into the other papers, we are desired to give the answer annexed, from the Kentish Gazette of June 15.

"That the most wretched arts are made use of to evade the payment of taxes, cannot be more substantially proved than from the following return of livery servants made to the Excise-Office from the cities of Canterbury and Bristol for the last year. From Canterbury three, from Bristol seventy-six, making in the whole seventy-nine. That two such large cities should contain no more livery servants is hardly possible; yet, incredible as it appears, a correspondent asserts the above return as a fact. And another correspondent asserts, that the town of Liverpool pays but 50*l.* a year to the land-tax."

Answer. "That the most wretched arts are made use of to evade the payment of taxes," may be most true; but if the writer of the above paragraph has no better proof, than what he has so substantially advanced on this occasion, very little credit deserves to be given to any thing he may please to assert; for we are authorised to say, that there are not less than seventy livery servants returned to the Excise-Office from the city of Canterbury. We leave Bristol to answer for herself."

On the 16th instant, a most dreadful storm of thunder and lightning threw the town of Green-hammerton, in Yorkshire, and its neighbourhood into the utmost consternation. Its violence exceeded any thing of the kind ever remembered by the oldest man living. It began about noon, and for 20 minutes the elements seemed to be in a blaze, and the thunder incessant and tremendous. The lightning shivered a large oak near the town, tearing it up by the roots, and casting its limbs, some half a ton weight, to the distance of 20 yards, and others not so ponderous to the distance of 100 yards. Two women near the place had a miraculous escape. A great deal of damage was done in the neighbourhood by the hail-stones, some of which measured an inch and a half in circumference.

On Thursday the 19th, as Mr. Morton of Gainsborough was walking out, he observed in a field something of an immense size rolling on the ground, and, pursuing it, found it to be a balloon, and attached thereto a large basket, with nothing in it but a knife and a hat; he therefore concluded that the owner had been dashed to pieces. It has since appeared, however, that Mr. Sadler, the owner, is alive and well, and ready for another ramble. See p. 484.

A balloon was launched at Norwich in the afternoon on the first of June, and a boat attached to it, in which was embarked Mr. Decker, (a Miss Weller was to have gone, but she was taken ill.) It rose almost perpendicular, took a western course towards Yarmouth, and was presently out of sight.

At Axminster revel in Devonshire, held on the 30th past, a man, who had formerly acted as a Merry Andrew, had the presumption to stand twice on his head on one of the battlements of the tower, to the astonishment of innumerable spectators, who having liberally rewarded him, he attempted the same a third time, but fell and was dashed to pieces.

At Norwich a murder was committed, which is in point to the supposed case adduced by Lord Mansfield (see p. 398). One Wm. Lantern, a weaver of that town, having quarreled with his wife, seized a board from the bed where she lay, and was aiming a blow at her, which the mother-in-law, to save her daughter, received, and it killed her on the spot. The Coroner's jury sat upon the body, and brought in their verdict wilful murder.

On the 16th instant, a most dreadful fire broke out at noon-day, in Biggleswade, Bedfordshire, by which near one half of the town was reduced to ashes, and 220 dwelling-houses, besides warehouses, barns, granaries, stables, &c. consumed. More than 400 men, women, and children, were totally deprived of sustenance, and must have perished, but for the charitable relief of those who escaped, and the liberal contributions of the neighbourhood.

The same day, and about the same hour, a fire broke out at Shepton Montescute near Wincanton, which entirely destroyed two farm-houses with all their appurtenances.

Several attempts, it is said, have lately been made to set fire to the town of Chatham, merely, it is thought, for an opportunity to plunder.

DOMESTIC OCCURRENCES,

omitted in May, or imperfectly stated.

May 5.

Mr. Sadler, and a young gentleman of fortune, took their departure in a balloon from Moulsey-hurst. The machine took a S. E. course, strongly impelled by the current of air towards the sea. They, however, had the good fortune to land near the conflux of the Medway and the Thames, not a mile from the water's edge. The country people, to whom they committed the care of the balloon, while they secured the instruments they had taken with them for observation, suddenly quitted their hold, when it took its flight to the Eastward, and, as it afterwards appeared, fell in the sea, a few leagues to the Eastward of the Nore, where it was taken up by Capt. John Sherwin of Sunderland, to which port it was carried, and and left with the owner of the vessel; but has since been restored, and another voyage made with it from Manchester to Pontefract, in which Mr. Sadler was still more unfortunate; for there being no person near when it descended, and not being able to confine it by his own strength, he was dragged by it over trees and hedges; and at length forced to quit it at the utmost peril of his life, after which it rose, and was almost instantly out of sight, and he returned to Manchester without knowing where to look for it. It was found near Gainsborough. See p. 480.

May 7.

The Archduke Maximilian, of Austria, was consecrated Bishop of Cologne by the Abp of Treves, assisted by the suffragan Bps (see p. 372.) of Cologne and Munster.

May 12.

The Rt. Hon. the E. of Leven, his Majesty's Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, opened the synod with the usual solemnity. The sermon, on that occasion, was preached by Dr. Drysdale, moderator to the last General Assembly. His Excellency presented his Majesty's letter, and warrant for 1000*l.* and then delivered an elegant speech from the throne; to which a suitable return having been made, a committee was appointed to draw up an answer to his Majesty's most gracious letter, and the assembly adjourned.

May 13.

Mr. Lunardi ascended, or more properly made a feeble attempt to ascend, with his balloon, after having excited the curiosity of the Public to a very high degree by the miracles he pretended to perform. A more numerous assembly of respectable people was hardly ever brought together, nor perhaps was there ever a more contemptible exhibition. Indeed the process of ballooning seems at present at a stand, and to rest in a rivalry among shewmen, which of them shall bring most idle people together, and make the most money for themselves. There appears no scientific emulation among them to make discoveries; nor have they so much as attempted to ascertain the different properties of the air below and above the clouds, from whence some salutary effects might possibly have been derived. It is not less reasonable to suppose, that some disorders may be relieved by taking an airing once a day above the clouds, than that others are known to be so by change of place from low to high below the clouds; but no such use has yet been suggested. From this censure, however, the author of a Treatise on Aerostatics should be exempted. That gentleman seems to have nobler pursuits in view; and as the machine which he is constructing is borrowed from nature, much may be expected from his ingenuity.

May 14.

An Edict was published at Copenhagen, declaring the opening of the New NAVIGENT. MAG. June, 1785.

CABLE CANAL, which connects the NORTH SEA with the BALTIC, to all the nations of Europe.

The ancient town of Orton, in the Austrian Netherlands, was consumed by fire. Nothing now remains but the Convent of Carmelites, that of the Capuchins, and one magazine belonging to the Emperor.

May 17.

An express arrived at the Admiralty, with an account of the safe arrival of the Sultan man of war, Adm. Sir Edw. Hughes, from the East Indies.

The Commissioners, appointed to survey the new works at Plymouth, arrived at that Port. See p. 319.

May 22.

This morning Mr. Pitt moved, That the sum of 650,000*l.* be raised by way of lottery. There are to be 50,000 tickets, at 13*l.* each, prime cost, and the money to be played for is to be after the rate of 10*l.* each. Thus the money raised is to be 650,000*l.* and the money to be played for is only 500,000*l.* Add to this 40*s.* a ticket for manœuvring in the alley, and the purchasers will then play 30 to 20 against themselves. Is it possible that such a lottery can fill?

At a general Quarterly Court of Proprietors, held at the East India House, the dividend for the half year from Christmas to Midsummer was declared to be after the rate of 8 per cent.

May 23.

Mr. Pitt, after the private business was over, rose and again moved his fourth Resolution (see p. 400); which was strongly opposed by Lord Beauchamp as it appeared to his Lordship calculated to create dislike and aversion between the two kingdoms, instead of mutual agreement. Did it not, he said, arrogate in the greater island a power of legislation over the lesser? And did it not in so many words declare, that even in concerns of a commercial kind, if admitted, it would still exercise exclusively and absolutely the power of dictating? How, he added, would the Irish coincide with a principle thus derogatory to their recent claims of independence? He concluded with moving an amendment, "That it is highly important to the general interests of the British Empire, that laws for regulating trade and navigation should be the same in Great Britain and Ireland." Mr. Pitt rose to remark on the Noble Lord's ingenuity, as every argument he had used could have no other possible tendency than to excite the jealousy, and to disturb the tranquillity of the Irish nation. Are these, said he, the effects of the Noble Lord's anxiety and friendship for both kingdoms, which he has urged with his usual address! Mr. Pitt called to the recollection of the Noble Lord, that, in all treaties that ever were made, there was something claimed on one side to be yielded to on the other. In the present case, it was impossible it should be otherwise. There could could be no degradation whatever in adopting its immunities, by sharing equally those regulations by which the spirit of the whole is supported. He trusted for a liberal construction of every part of the system, from the good sense of a manly and enlightened people.

Several other members pressed his Ldp's objections with great force, and were answered with equal ingenuity. Col. Fitzpatrick said, the distinction between internal and external legislation was well understood in Ireland; they were in full possession of the former, and would never be satisfied till they had obtained the latter. The resolution tended to do away the latter, and of course would rouse a spirit of jealousy productive of the most serious consequences. About two in the morning, the question on his Lordship's amendment was put, and negatived by a majority of 158, viz. Ayes 36. Noes 194. The original motion passed without a division, and the House adjourned.

May 24.

Mr. Pitt again brought forward his resolutions for a commercial intercourse with Ireland, which were combated one by one, by a powerful opposition, but without success. This day he had got over the 8th proposition; but at eleven at night, the motion being brought on, and several amendments proposed, it was agreed to report progress, and to sit again.

In the House of Lords, came on the second reading of Capt. Inglis's divorce-bill. Mr. Esq. opened the case, which was, in brief, that, in the year 1770, the captain, late commander of his Majesty's ship Pandora, intermarried with Anne Stewart, daughter of Ch. Stewart, Esq; of Wardour-street; that they cohabited together till the year 1780, when being ordered abroad, he left her at a lodging-house in Gosport, where she soon entered into an unlawful familiarity with Joseph Lancaster, late a midshipman in his Majesty's navy, with whom she lived in open adultery. Mrs. Antrim proved, that Capt. Inglis and his wife lodged with her at Gosport; that just as the captain sailed Mr. Lancaster came to lodge with her; that she soon remarked an improper familiarity between them; that on the 12th day of Mr. Lancaster's coming to lodge with her, they removed to a lodging-house in Portsmouth Common, where they lived as man and wife, and where she took Capt. Inglis's child to them. Ann Atkinson, servant to Mr. Lancaster, proved their sleeping together constantly in the same bed; that her mistress said she had been married before to a Mr. Inglis (father of her little boy), but that he was dead; that one day two men came to the door, and asked if Mrs. Inglis did not live there; her answer was, that her mistress's name had been Inglis. They said, that was all the same, and rushed by her; the one knocked at the parlour door, and the other went into the kitchen. When her mistress soon came and exclaimed,

"Where did you come from! I thought you was dead." This she understood to be Capt. Inglis, and the other to be Mrs. Inglis's brother. The fact being thus established, the marriage proved, and a divorce from bed and board produced, nothing remained but the award of the House of Lords to enable the Captain to marry again; which he has since obtained.

This evening Mrs. Bellamy had a benefit at Drury-lane theatre, which was much encouraged. The play was Braganza; and Mrs. Yates made her appearance in the character of the Dutchess. It was expected that she would have spoken the occasional prologue; but she only spoke a few words, and left her tears to express her gratitude. See pp. 449, 476.

The London Gazette, of this day, announces the marriage of Donna Marianna Victoria, Princess of Portugal, with the Infant Don Gabriel of Spain. The contract of marriage was signed, at the palace of Nossa Senhora de Ajuda, on the 12th of April; and in the afternoon the marriage ceremony was performed by the Patriarch of Lisbon. At night there were fire-works; and a serenada at court, to which the foreign ministers were invited. Next day the foreign ministers were admitted to pay their compliments to her Most Faithful Majesty and the Royal family, and separately to the Portuguese Infanta. The entertainments on this occasion, which lasted for three days, were splendid, and the illuminations grand beyond description. Several promotions took place; and the Condesa de Luminares was appointed to attend the Spanish Princess on her arrival. See April Mag. p. 311.

On the 8th of May, the Spanish Infanta arrived at Villa Viciosa; and the afternoon of the same day the exchange of the new-married Princess (see p. 311.) took place. On the 11th in the afternoon, the Portuguese Infanta Donna Marianna Victoria set out from Villa Viciosa on her journey to Spain, and on the 23d arrived at Aranjuez.

May 25.

The committee on Irish affairs was resumed; and a variety of amendments were proposed and rejected. Mr. Eden, upon an amendment he offered to the 12th article, divided the house, but was negatived 84 to 15.

Mr. Perham, on the 14th Resolution, proposed an amendment, and likewise divided the House, with the like ill success, 85 to 20.

Mr. Fox, to the 15th, offered an amendment, and divided the House. Negatived, 75 to 17.

Lord North, to the 16th, offered an amendment, by substituting the word equal in the room of official, which was agreed to; and it being near one in the morning, the further consideration of the remaining Articles were referred to the next day.

May

May 26.

The consideration of the remaining Resolutions was resumed. The Articles were read. Several Gentlemen spoke. Several amendments were proposed and rejected; and the subject being in a great measure exhausted, about 12 at night,

Mr. Pitt thinking it necessary to adopt some hints that had been thrown out by the Gentlemen in opposition, the Committee was dissolved, and the House resumed, pro forma, to receive the report of the Propositions in order to re-commit them: this done, a conversation took place among the acting Members, the amendments were made, and the business for the night concluded. The report was ordered to be printed, and taken into consideration on Monday.

Prince Edward arrived at Stadt, in perfect health.

May 27.

The House came to a resolution to repeal the late Game Act; and, in lieu of the Duties therein granted,

Resolved, That every person in Great Britain, who sports with dog, gun, or net, or other engine, for the destruction of game (not acting as a game-keeper), shall previously deliver in his name, and place of abode, to the Clerk of the Peace or Sheriff, annually, to take out a certificate thereof, which certificate shall be charged with a duty of 2 l. 2 s.

Game-keepers in like manner to take out deputations, but charged with half a guinea only, instead of 2 guineas—This bill has been represented as placing unqualified persons in a much worse situation than they were before; for, instead of extending their privileges, it narrows them. The last act disqualified gentlemen who were qualified by law to kill game, unless they paid two guineas annually for being qualified. This bill subjects unqualified persons, after they have taken out their certificates, to much heavier penalties than persons who have no certificates, and grants no new privileges, other than sporting with dog, gun, &c. to those who pay their money.

The skeleton of a boy of about 14 was found buried in a ditch at Taskburgh, in Norfolk, supposed to have been murdered. His father, Richard Nobbs, a Brick-maker, has since been found hanging in a wood near the same place, suspected of being the murderer.

May 30.

The order of the day being read, the report on the Irish Propositions was brought forward.

Mr. Pitt wished to know how the matter was to be debated, in order to save time.

Mr. Minchin said, he found himself peculiarly circumstanced. What property he had was nearly divided between the two countries, and he was equally a friend to both. Indeed, no man, he said, could be a friend to the one, who was not a friend to both. He professed himself not fully satisfied in his mind as to the probable operation of the propositions, and he believed many other gentlemen were equally at a loss; he would therefore move, that the words, now received, be omitted; and that this day three months be inserted in their stead.

This was strongly contended for by opposition; but negatived 37 against 43. It was then agreed that the Resolutions be reported specifically—thus they came to be argued over-again; and the powers of elocution were never more forcibly exerted upon any occasion than in this night's debate. Ministers were, in a manner, compelled to admit amendments by mere strength of argument, and not a few were admitted. At half after four the debate ended, when the House came to the following Resolutions:

1. That the Resolutions be communicated to the Lords, and their concurrence requested.

2. That a conference with the Lords be desired.

3. That the Marquis of Graham do go to the Lords, and desire their conference.

May 31.

The Committee appointed to manage the conference with the Lords repaired to the Painted Chamber; and being ranged on one side of the table, and the Lords on the other; the former standing uncovered, the latter sitting with their hats on;

Mr. Pitt acquainted their Lordships, that the House of Commons had taken into consideration so much of his Majesty's most gracious speech to both Houses of Parliament, on the 28th of January last, as relates to the adjustment of the commercial intercourse with Ireland; and had come to twenty Resolutions, which he had the honour to present to their Lordships, with a copy of the evidence, &c.

Lord President received the papers, and each party bowed, which concluded the conference.—Thus ended the matter in the Commons House for the present.

The Rt. Hon. Thomas Harley, Esq; alderman of Portsoken Ward, surrendered the same, and accepted the Ward of Bridge Without, pursuant to the act of Common Council in that behalf. By the death of Alderman Alsop (see p. 406), he becomes father of the City.

In this evening's Gazette, the Address of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland is inserted (see p. 481.). They accept his Majesty's donation of 1000 l. with gratitude; and they promise to apply it in such a manner as may most effectually promote the pious and benevolent purposes of the Royal donor.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 7.

This day John Adams, esq. minister plenipotentiary from the United States of America, rica, had a private audience of his majesty, to deliver his credentials.

This day Col. Smith (late aid-de-camp to Gen. Washington) arrived, in character of secretary to his excellency John Adams, esq. ambassador and plenipotentiary from the United States of America to the court of Great-Britain.

The ten following malefactors were executed over against the debtors' door in the Old Bailey; a horrid spectacle, highly disgraceful to the police of one of the first cities in Europe; viz. Tho. Bateman, for assaulting Hanna Smith in the open streets, and robbing her of a gold locket; John Hughes, for a crime of a similar nature; James Haywood, for a burglary in Whitechapel; Wm. Harding, for a burglary in the house of Robert Snow, esq. and stealing a great quantity of plate; Tho. Scott, for robbing Wm. Thompson on the Whitechapel road; Patrick Daley, for stealing iron in bars out of a barge on the river; Henry Wood, for robbing Humphry Stokes on the highway; George Mawley, for escaping a second time from the hulks; Geo. Ward and Tho. Conner, for assaulting Alice Welden on the highway. They all behaved decently.

Friday 3.

A grand musical concert, from Handel's Works, was performed in Westminster Abbey to a most brilliant audience of more than 2000 persons, many of them of the highest rank, and patronized by the royal family. The instrumental performers amounted to 600.

Benjamin Hammet, esq. banker, was chosen alderman of Portoken Ward.

This day Sir Edward Vernon, Major Money, Mr. Blake, and Mr. Lockwood, took their departure in a balloon from Tottenham-court road about one o'clock, and about four were set down near Higham Farm, in Essex, where Mr. Blake jumped out. The balloon was no sooner lightened than it was again lost in the clouds; and, after having sailed about 36 miles farther, the voyagers opened the valve, and came down on a heath near Colchester. Major Money and Mr. Blake, in their way to London, dined with Lord Orford at High Beach, on Epping Forest, where they found Mr. Pilatre de Rosier and his friend already seated.

The same day Col. Thornton mounted in another balloon from South Lambeth, and taking a dog with him by way of experiment, precipitated him in a parachute, a sort of umbrella, which descended to the earth with great velocity, and broke the poor dog's bones to pieces. Mr. Blanchard afterwards ascended in the same balloon (the colonel's weight being found too heavy for it), and took a cat with him, which he likewise threw out in a like vehicle, which descended gradually, and lighted on a tree, where the cat has since been found, inclosed in a net. He himself descended near Woolwich.

Saturday 4.

Being the anniversary of his majesty's birth-day, when he entered into the 48th year of his age, the same was observed with more than ordinary magnificence. The usual solemnities were attended to; and the Ode, see p. 473, performed with good effect. The drawing-room, in point of splendor, never appeared with more brilliancy.

Monday 6.

The disturbances which have for some time past prevailed among the sailors in Sunderland (see p. 397) were completely settled, and upwards of 300 sail of ships have lately sailed from that port.

The musical commemoration at Westminster Abbey was again represented. It consisted of a selection of Handel's miscellaneous pieces. The performers were the same as in the last concert, and the composition was admirably correct in all its parts. Their majesties countenanced this performance likewise with their presence.

Wednesday 8.

In the committee of ways and means, Ld. Surrey, in the room of the tax on maid-servants, which he utterly disliked, proposed, 1. a tax of 1s. for leave to wear silk stockings. This, he said, would produce 70,000l. 2. A similar licence for wearing hair-powder, which, he said, would produce about the same sum, 70,000l. And, 3. a licence to wear watches; to married men 2s. 6d.—to bachelors 1s. 6d. more. These taxes, though they were negatived, will probably, like his lordship's tax on running horses (see vol. LIV. p. 859) be all hereafter adopted.

As soon as the House had got rid of his Lordship's taxes;

Mr. Pitt rose, and proposed his taxes on Bachelors and Attornies.

This day the sacred Oratorio of the Messiah, the most sublime of all Handel's compositions, was performed as the entertainment of the third day of the musical festival, in an orchestra, consisting of more than 600 musicians. The performance was so exquisitely correct, that it was heard by their Majesties, and all present, with the most rapturous attention.

Thursday 9.

John Adams, Esq; Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States of America, had a private audience of her Majesty.

Friday 10.

Mr. Pitt delivered a message from his Majesty, stating, that in 1767 his Majesty settled an annuity of 9000l. a year as a provision in part, for the honourable support of his dearly beloved brother the Duke of Gloucester, payable out of the 4 per cent. duties in Barbados, and the Leeward Islands; but that fund not being sufficient for the regular payment of the said annuity, &c. recommends the consideration thereof to the House.

His Royal Highness Prince William Henry arrived at the Queen's Palace from Hanover, Hanover, and was most affectionately received by their Majesties.

This evening was celebrated Carlton-house Fête, when more than 400 of the first nobility and persons of distinction were entertained in a style never before known in this kingdom. Lord and Lady Southampton were left to receive the company, while the Prince went to Buckingham-house to welcome his favourite brother Prince William, and to invite him to be a partaker in the entertainment. A little before twelve the Prince returned, made his apology, and expressed his concern that he could not succeed.

Wednesday 22.

Was celebrated in the theatre, at Oxford, Lord Crewe's Anniversary Commemoration of founders and benefactors to the University; during which ceremony the honorary degree of Master of Arts was conferred on Lord Wycombe, eldest son of the Marquis of Landdown; to which he was presented by the Rev. Mr. Sawkins, student of Christ Church. The Degree of Doctor in Divinity was conferred, by Diploma, on the Rev. Mr. Hornsby, Savilian Professor of Astronomy; and Dr. Ayrton, of Cambridge, Doctor in Musick, was admitted ad eundem.

The Commemoration Speech on this occasion was spoken by the Poetry Professor; after which the English Essay on Dramatic Composition, and the Latin Verses on the Destruction of Rome by the Goths, to which the Chancellor's Prizes had been previously adjudged, was recited: the former by Mr. Blackstone, Fellow of New College; the latter by Mr. Benwell, scholar of Trinity.

Thursday 23.

Was held the annual Meeting of the President and Governors of the Radcliffe Infirmary; when a Sermon suited to the solemnity, was preached at St. Mary's church by the Rev. Dr. Jackson, Dean of Christ Church.—In the course of the choir service were introduced Hall and Hine's Te Deum and Jubilate; the Old Hundredth Psalm, with accompaniments, by the late Dr. Hayes, and an anthem composed for the Charity by Dr. Philip Hayes, Professor of Musick in this University.—After the Sermon a Collection was made at the Church, amounting to 145*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.*

The Governors afterwards dined together at the Star Inn, when Oldfield Bowes, esq. of North Aston, and John Fane, esq. of Wormsley, were appointed stewards for the ensuing year.

The Solicitor General moved for leave to bring in a bill, for the better securing the peace of the city of London and Westminster, and the borough of Southwark. The outline of his plan is, to divide the metropolis and its neighbourhood into nine divisions, each division to have an established officer; one Magistrate constantly to attend, with two others at his call; three Commissioners to superintend all the rest, in whose hands the whole power of the police to be concentrated. Each division to have a patrol of 25; 12, with a leader, to do duty nightly; the nightly watch to be new modelled; the periods of gaol-delivery to be shortened from six weeks to one week; Barristers of ten years standing, being Justices, to try offenders (except for treason or murder); destitute and friendly boys to be recommended to the Marine Society, &c. This plan, so far as it goes, seems to be well enough digested for the detection and punishment of rogues in the metropolis. But no means is provided for prevention. Till some mode of employing rogues is devised, all other modes are only traps to hasten them to the gallows. What are rogues to do? no honest man will employ them; no honest servant, knowingly, will associate with them, and, if they do, they soon will be corrupted.—Drive them from the metropolis, and no traveller will be safe; no farm or lone house in the country will escape robbery. Render them desperate, and they will murder; they are already cruel: the Solicitor General owns, that Patrols have been productive of a new species of robbery called the Rush; that is, a number of villains assemble at the door of a house, and as soon as opened rush in, bind the family, and plunder the house. The above plan is therefore rather calculated for patrol than prevention, as all employers are to be paid by the public, and the reward for felons, in part, is to cease. It begins at the wrong end, viz. First, establish in every County Houses of Industry. The same in each of the above divisions. Confine prostitutes to certain places of public notoriety, and place them under proper regulation. Enforce the laws against Sabbath-breaking. Empower and oblige beadle to apprehend all vagrant and idle boys and girls, and pass them to their respective parishes. Punish parents who abandon their children. Put a stop to tippling in sermon-time. Establish Sunday-schools in every parish, and encourage children to attend them. These regulations will lay a foundation for future reformation. And for the present; pitch upon some pleasant, fruitful, and desolate island, of which there are many, for the banishment of the abandoned. Furnish them with provisions for six or eight months, in proportion to the numbers you transport, and with tools and instruments for building and cultivation; and establish a government among them for their own preservation.

Sunday 26.

A murder, attended with most uncommon circumstances of barbarity, was perpetrated in Charlotte Street, Rathbone Place. Mr. Orrell, an attorney in that street, and his wife, went out at three o'clock, leaving their servant-maid in the house. They returned within the hour, when the servant not answering

twering the door, they concluded that she had stepped out; and they went away again for a short time. Upon their second return, the same difficulty occurring, it was determined to enter the back part of the house, by getting over a wall; when the girl was discovered upon the kitchen-floor, weltering in her blood, a most horrid spectacle. From the various marks of violence, she must have made a strong resistance. Her head appeared to have been struck at with a poker; her throat effectually cut through the wind-pipe; two fingers nearly cut off; a deep gash on one breast, and otherways dreadfully mangled. She was yet alive, and made signs, but was unable to speak; and was conveyed to the Middlesex Hospital, where she expired about one in the morning. The house was found to be robbed of spoons, and some other plate; and the suspicion falls upon a man who had visited the girl as a sweetheart on two or three preceding Sundays.

Monday 27.

At a Court of Aldermen held at Guildhall, present the Lord Mayor, Recorder, the Aldermen Townsend, Wilkes, Halifax, Lewes, Flower, Peckham, Saintsbury, Wright, Kitchen, Gill, Pickett, Watson, Skinner, Curtis, Hammet, Baydell and Hopkins, Sheriffs.

The Lord Mayor laid before the court a copy of a bill, intitled, "An Act for the further prevention of crimes, and for the more speedy detection and punishment of offenders against the peace, in the cities of London and Westminster, the borough of Southwark, and certain parts adjacent to them." Whereupon the court

Resolved unanimously, That it is the opinion of this court, that the bill now read appears founded upon principles the most arbitrary and dangerous, and that the provisions of it, if passed into a law, would be injurious to the regular and legal administration of justice, and utterly subversive not only to the charter rights of the City of London, but to the constitutional liberties of all his Majesty's subjects, who shall be so unfortunate as to be included within its jurisdiction:

Resolved unanimously, That it is the duty of this Court, both to the City of London, and the public at large, by every legal means, and with their most zealous exertions, to oppose a measure so dangerous and alarming:

Resolved unanimously, That this Court do now resolve itself into a committee forthwith, to prepare a petition to the House of Commons against the said bill:

Resolved unanimously, That the Lord Mayor be requested to call a court of Common Council for Thursday next, in order to take their sense upon the dangerous situation into which the rights of the City of London and the liberties of the kingdom are brought, by such a measure being proposed in Parliament, and that the cause thereof be specially inserted in the summons.

Thursday 30.

The Court of Common Council met on the business referred to them as above, but too late for us to report.

P. S. As landlords have greatly advanced their rents, taxes and levies sit easier on them than on the labourer and manufacturer, who have no advance, but rather abatement, in wages, though provisions have doubled the price they took a few years ago, even in this plentiful season, to answer the exorbitant value of land.

I know of a lordship, not far from Leicester, which from 700l. is improved to 2100l.
 per annum, whereby the tenants are greatly distressed with no prospect of redress.

Hear a brief for the country; it ever alleges rack rents and a numerous poor. I believe, when Religion retires, Oppression succeeds. The English should consider, that an oppressive gentry in Denmark forced the free populace to take refuge, and seek redress, in arbitrary monarchy.

MR URBAN, Canterbury, April 19.
THE Meteorological Account which has lately appeared in the papers relating to the greatest degrees of cold in the several winters for ten years past, said to be taken, with Reaumur's Thermometer, at the Royal Observatory

servatory at Breslaw, although curious in itself, will, I presume, convey little information to the generality of your readers, without at the same time acquainting them with a circumstance not therein mentioned; that is, the difference between the scales of Reaumur's and Fahrenheit's thermometers; the former being hardly known, but the latter universally made use of in England.

The scales of both these instruments are constructed by taking the same fixed points, or two different degrees of heat, by means of freezing and boiling water; but the intermediate space between those points being divided into a greater number of parts in one than the other; and the zero, or cypher, from which the degrees are numbered, as well upwards as downwards, being placed at different parts of the scale in respect to the fixed points before-mentioned, render them totally different from each other.

The zero of Reaumur's scale is placed at the freezing point, and the degrees numbered upwards to 80 only, before they reach the boiling heat; in Fahrenheit's, zero is placed 32 degrees below the freezing point, the numbers ascending to 112, the degree of boiling heat on that scale; in either of them the degrees are numbered from zero downward, as far as there may be occasion for them.

Taking it therefore for granted, that the beforementioned observations were made with such a mercurial thermometer of Reaumur's, as is now in common use on the continent, the degrees of cold compared with Fahrenheit's will be nearly as under.

28. Sir W. A. Cunyngham, bart. M.P. for Linlithgowshire, to Miss Udney.

DEATHS.

DEATHS.

LATELY, at St. Helena, Lieut. Gov. Maj. Gen. GIZARD.
In the East Indies, M. de Buffy, governor of Pondicherry.

Capt. Arthur, of the Major East Indiaman. Having lost his ship by fire while she lay at her moorings in Bengal river, he was coming home passenger in the Southampton East Indiaman, when he was seized upon the voyage with a violent fit of the gout, which fell upon his stomach, and carried him off about a fortnight before the ship arrived.

At Paris, l'Abbé Milot, author of several useful abridgements of history, histories of France and England, elements of general history, political memoirs, and literary history of the Troubadours. He is succeeded in the French academy by Abbé Morellet.

Rev. Mr. Ramsay, rector of Bushy, Herts.
At Milan, Father Frin.

At Leyden, the great Valkenaer.

George John Cooke, esq. colonel of the west reg. of Middx. militia.

At York, Mrs. Howarth, relict of Col. H. and sister to Gen. Baugh, commander in chief of his majesty's forces in Ireland.

At Hellefchau, in Moravia, Thomas Kaspruck, weaver, in his 118th year. He never had any illness in the course of that long life; and till the day of his death he retained the use of his senses. He continued to work at his trade till his 114th year.

Aged 80, John Williams, esq. of Nevis, son of Col. W. of St. Kitt's. He was the oldest planter in the old sugar islands, and had been senior member of the council above 40 years.

May 16. At Magheratempany, near Ballynahinch, in the county of Down, aged 118, Mary M'Donnell. She was born in the isle of Sky, in Scotland, which place she left in the year 1683, and resided ever since in Down. Last year she walked to Moira, 14 miles, in one day, to see her landlord; and in the year 1783 reaped her ridge of corn as well as the youngest people in the country. When she was at Moira, she had all her senses perfect, except a little weakness in her eyes, and seemed strong, healthy, and active.

May . . Suddenly, by a fall from a horse, in his 20th year, at Sebergham, in Cumberland, (where he was upon a visit to his uncle and relations,) Mr. James Robson, son of Mr. R. bookseller, in New Bond-st. His many virtuous and amiable qualities render his loss (especially by such a melancholy accident) most grievous and distressing to his friends and connections.—Mr. Jerminham has written the following elegant epitaph on the occasion: To mark the hapless youth's disastrous doom,
The sorrow-wedded Father rears the tomb;
On which a Mother wishes to express
The mingled pride, that swells with her distress;

For He was all Affection could desire—

All, Duty ask'd—All, Friendship could require!

Simplicity was His, and strength of mind,
With every milder excellence combin'd.

While Virtue, eager to compleat the whole,
Diffus'd her magic colouring o'er the soul.

24. At Boroughbridge, Andrew Wilkinson, esq. a captain in the navy.

At Windleston, Miss Caroline Eden, dau. of Sir John E. bart.

At Bristol, where she had lately opened a boarding-school for young ladies, the wife of Mr. Bowring.—A singular instance of fatality, worthy of recital, has in a short space of time attended the family of Mr. B.—he had a son died April 12 last; May 13 his father died; the 24th of May his wife died, as above mentioned; and May 29 terminated his mother's existence.

In his 80th year, rev. Jacob Wragge, formerly Fellow of Emanuel college, Camb. and late Rector of North Cadbury, co. Somerset.

25. In the Stable-yard, St. James's, in the 79th year of his age, the right hon. Francis Godolphin, lord Godolphin, governor of the Scilly islands. He married first in February, 1734, Barbara, da. of Wm. earl of Portland; which lady dying without issue in 1736, he married secondly, May 28, 1748, Anne, da. of John Earl Fitzwilliam, and dying without issue, the title is extinct; but his estate will be divided between the marq. of Carmarthen and Rob. Godolphin Owen, esq. He was the youngest son of Dr. Henry G. provost of Eton, and dean of St. Paul's. He is said to have died worth a million in ready specie. About five years ago, his lordship, having received 15,000l. dividend on bank and other securities, and returned with it to his country seat, on going to his chest the next morning found he had been robbed of the whole sum. Proper steps were immediately taken, and the delinquent discovered, but, for particular reasons, the matter was hushed up, and carefully concealed till within these few days, when his lordship's executors, in looking over some papers, discovered a letter which served to elucidate the whole transaction! but whether it will be made public remains a matter of uncertainty.

Gideon Dupont, esq. of Charlestown, merchant.

27. Aged 76, Mr. James Hewitt, of Little Carter-lane.

28. Richard Lowe, esq. banker. Among the singularities of the world, few have occurred more extraordinary than some circumstances in the death and will of this gentleman. Though his eldest daughter was esteemed the favourite, he has omitted her entirely in his will, leaving only 2000l. each to her younger children, in case she should have any. To his wife he has bequeathed 1000l. with the same sum annually; and to his youngest daughter, of whom he took little notice during his life, the bulk of his fortune, provided she agrees to marry any one of four gentlemen whom he has named, who is to change his name for that of Lowe. If she sails in this, she is to have only 10,000*l.* and the residue of his property devolves to a distant relation.

30. Mrs. Blake, wife of Mr. B. proctor, in Doctors Commons.

June 1. At Bath, Richard Shadwell, esq. formerly chief clerk in the Secretary of State's office.

2. Mrs. Dickins, wife of Francis D. esq. of Enfield-chace-side, and daughter of the late Mr. Astley, bookseller, in St. Paul's church-yard.

5. At Rochester, William Hammond, esq. many years master attendant of Chatham dock-yard, but lately superannuated.

6. Mrs. Law, wife of Mr. Henry L. Hamburg merchant.

Rev. James Rawes, B.D. of Chedworth, co. Glouc. and late Fellow of Queen's coll. Oxf.

At Bath, Mr. . . . Street, son of the late Mayor of that city, who had been interred but a few days before, was thrown from his whiskey, and killed on the spot; and his brother, who was with him, had his arm broke, and was otherwise much hurt. A sister of these gentlemen was burnt to death a few years ago, and an elder son disappeared about twenty years since, and has never been heard of.

7. At Broughton, co. Stafford, the lady of the rev. Sir Thomas Broughton, bart. She has left eight sons and five daughters.

At Euston-castle, near Towcester, the right hon. George Fermor, Earl of Pomfret: he is succeeded in the title by his eldest son George Lord Leominster.

8. At Edgware, Mrs. Carolina Linton, sempstress to his present Majesty when Prince of Wales.

Aged 31, the rev. Thomas Carey Leech, Fellow of Exeter coll. Oxf.

10. At Kensington, aged 85. Mr. Benjamin Harvey. He went to Kensington, in a dangerous state of health, in the year 1720, and resided there, much respected, to the day of his death. His character will best appear in the following epitaph written to his memory by his learned friend E—nd B—y G—e, esq. of Kensington.

"Through winter's evening, from the morn of youth,

His deed was virtue, and his word was truth.
Alike that morning, as that eve serene,
Till death reluctant clos'd his earthly scene.
By heaven and prudence lent, the boon of health

Avow'd his gratitude for more than wealth.
Thro' life he wish'd not, nor he fear'd his doom;

A better life he saw beyond the tomb:
While angels, hov'ring o'er the paths he trod,
Conscious attend to guide him to his God."

12. Mr. Joseph Wickenden, banker.

17. At Edmonton, Mrs. Willis.

18. At Norbury, co. Derby, rev. Simon Mills, M.A. Rector of that place, and Vicar of Leek, co. Staff.

19. At Ipswich, aged 75, George Cobb, esq. captain of invalids at Langard fort, and brother to the late Sir Eyre C.

Mrs. Cox, wife of Mr. C. printer, in Great Queen-street.

20. At Somerton, co. Somerset, Jonathan Randolph, gent. aged 107: he practised as an attorney upwards of fifty years, by which he acquired a competent fortune, and had retired near thirty years.

23. Mr. William Spence, near fifty years one of the choristers of Chester cathedral, and reckoned one of the finest toned basses in the kingdom.

In St. John's-squ. Clerkenwell, Mr. John Rivington, jun. printer, son of the worthy bookseller of the same name.

25. In Holborn, in her 58th year, Mrs. Langdale.

In Whitechapel, Capt. Gillwright, aged 70, many years in the Russia trade.
